lus and men followed after who turned every clog to the inward side. Where the gates were to be made, the plough was carried over the space; since otherwise nothing unclean could have entered the city, as the track of the plough was holy. In the co-mitium a vault was built underground, which was

* In his Lectures on Roman history (pp. 39, 40, ed. Schnitz, 1848) Niebuhr brings forward many reasons to prove what he had hinted at in his History (vol. i. note 618), that the latter hill was the one mentioned in the ancient tradition, and that the story relating to it was afterwards transferred to the Aventine, since this hill was the special abode of the plebeians, and there existed between it and the Palatine a perpetual feud.
that of Romulus and Titus Tatius, may have arisen simply from the circumstance of there being two magistrates at the head of the state in later times. Romulus now found his people too few in numbers. He therefore set apart, on the Capitoline hill, an asylum, or a sanctuary, in which homicide and runaway slaves might take refuge. The city thus became filled with men, but they wanted women. Romulus, therefore, tried to form treaties with the neighbouring tribes, in order to obtain connubium, or the right of legal marriage with their citizens; but his offers were treated with disdain, and he accordingly resolved to obtain by force what he could not gain by entreaty. In the fourth month after the foundation of the city, he proclaimed that games were to be celebrated in honour of the god Consus, and invited his neighbours, the Latins and Sabines, to the festival. Suspecting no treachery, they came in numbers, with their wives and children. But the Roman youths rushed upon their guests, and carried off the virgins. The old legend related that thirty Sabine virgins were thus seized, and of those wounding the swampsy but the number of the females seemed so incredible to a later age, which looked upon the legend as a genuine history, that it was increased to some hundreds by such writers as Valerius Antias and Juba (Plut. Rom. 14; comp. Liv. i. 13). The parents of the virgins returned home and prepared for vengeance. The inhabitants of three of the Latin towns, Caenina, Antemnae, and Crustumarium, took up arms one after the other, and were successively defeated by the Romans. Romulus slew with his own hand Acron, king of Caenina, and dedicated his arms and armour, as spolia opima, to Jupiter. At last the Sabine king, Titus Tatius, advanced with a powerful army, against Rome. His forces were so great that Romulus, unable to resist him in the field, was obliged to retire into the city. He had previously fortified and garrisoned the top of the Saturnian hill, afterwards called the Capitoline, which was divided by a ravine, and of the river of the same name, by a swampy valley, the site of the forum. But Tarpeia, the daughter of the commander of the fortress, dazzled by the golden bracelets of the Sabines, promised to betray the hill to them, if they would give her the ornaments which they wore on their left arms. Her offer was accepted; in the night time she opened a gate and let in the enemy; but when she claimed her reward, they threw upon her the shields which they carried on their left arms, and thus crushed her to death. Her tomb was shown on the hill in later times, and her memory was preserved by the name of the Tarpeian rock, from which traitors were afterwards hurled down. On the next day the Romans endeavoured to recover the hill. A long and desperate battle was fought in the valley between the Palatine and the Capitoline. At one time the Romans were driven before the enemy, and the day seemed utterly lost, when Romulus vowed a temple to Jupiter Stator, the Stayer of Flight; whereupon the Romans took courage, and returned again to the combat. At length, when both parties were exhausted with the struggle, the Sabine women rushed in between them, and prayed their husbands and fathers to be reconciled. Their prayer was heard; the two people not only made peace, but agreed to form only one nation. The Romans continued to dwell on the Palatine under their king Romulus; the Sabines built a new town on the Capitoline and Quirinal hills, where they lived under their king Titus Tatius. The two kings and their senates met for deliberation in the valley between the Palatine and Capitoline hills, which was hence called comitium, or the place of meeting. But this union did not last long. Titus Tatius was slain at a festival at Laviniun, by some Laurentines to whom he had refused satisfaction for outrages which had been committed by his kinsmen. Henceforward Romulus ruled alone over both Romans and Sabines; but, as he neglected to pursue the murderers, both his people and those of Laurentum were visited by a pestilence, which did not cease until the murderers on both sides were given up.

After the death of Tatius the old legend appears to have passed on at once to the departure of Romulus from the world. Of the long period which intervened few particulars are recorded, and these Niebuhr supposes, with some justice, to be the inventions of a later age. Romulus is said to have celebrated the festival of Fides, and to have taken the city; and likewise to have carried on a successful war against the powerful city of Veii, which purchased a truce of a hundred years, on a surrender of a third of its territory. At length, after a reign of thirty-seven years, when the city had become strong and powerful, and Romulus had performed all his mortal works, the hour of his departure arrived. One day as he was reviewing his people in the Campus Martius, near the Goat's Pool, the sun was suddenly eclipsed, darkness overspread the earth, and a dreadful storm dispersed the people. When daylight returned, Romulus had disappeared, for his father Mars had carried him up to heaven in a fiery chariot ("Quirinus Martis equis Acheronta fugit," Hor. Carm. iii. 3; "Rex patris astra petebat equis," Ov. Fast. II. 490). The people mourned for their beloved king; but their mourning gave way to religious reverence, when he appeared again in more than mortal beauty to Proculus Julius, and bade him tell the Romans that they should become the lords of the world, and that he would watch over them as their guardian god Quirinus. The Romans therefore worshipped him under this name. The festival of the Quirinalia was celebrated in his honour on the 17th of February; but the Nones of Quintilis, or the seventh of July, was the day on which, according to tradition, he departed from the earth.

Such was the glorified end of Romulus in the genuine legend. But as it staggered the faith of a later age, a tale was invented to account for his mysterious disappearance. It was related that the senators, discontented with the tyrannical rule of their king, murdered him during the gloom of a tempest, cut up his body, and carried home the mangled pieces under their robes. But the forgers of this tale forgot that Romulus is nowhere represented in the ancient legend as a tyrant, but as a mild and merciful monarch, whose rule became still more gentle after the death of Tatius, whom it branded as a tyrant.

The genuine features of the old legend about Romulus may still be seen in the accounts of Livy (i. 3—16), Dionysius (i. 76—ii. 50), and Plutarch (Romul.), notwithstanding the numerous falsifications and interpolations by which it is obscured, especially in the two latter writers. It is given in its most perfect form in the Roman Histories of Niebuhr (vol. i. p. 220, &c.) and Malden (p. 6, &c.).

As Romulus was regarded as the founder of Rome, its most ancient political institutions and the organisation of the people were ascribed to him by the popular belief. Thus he is said to have divided the people into three tribes, which bore the names Ramnes, Titites, and Luceres. The Ramnes were supposed to have derived their name from Romulus, the Titites from Titus Tatius the Sabine king, and the Luceres from Lucumo, an Etruscan chief who had assisted Romulus in the war against the Sabines. Each tribe contained ten curiae, which received their names from the thirty Sabine women who had brought about the peace between the Romans and their own people. Further, each curia contained ten gentes, and each gens a hundred men. Thus the people, according to the general belief, were divided originally into three tribes, thirty curiae, and three hundred gentes, which mustered 3000 men, who fought on foot, and were called a legion. Besides those there were three hundred horsemen, called celares, the same body as the equites of a later time; but the legend neglects to tell us from what quarter these horsemen came. To assist him in the government of the people Romulus is said to have selected a number of the aged men in the state, who were called patres, or senators. The council itself, which was called the senatus, originally consisted of one hundred members; but this number was increased to two hundred when the Sabines were incorporated in the state. In addition to the senate, there was another assembly, consisting of the members of the gentes, which bore the name of comitia curiata, because they voted in it according to their division into curiae. To this assembly was committed the election of the kings in subsequent times.

That part of the legend of Romulus which relates to the political institutions which he is said to have founded, represents undoubted historical facts. For we have certain evidence of the existence of such institutions in the earliest times, and many traces endured to the imperial period; and the popular belief only attempted to explain the origin of existing phenomena by ascribing their first establishment to the heroic founder of the state. Thus, while no competent scholar would attempt in the present day to give a history of Romulus; because, even on the supposition that the legend still retained some real facts, we have no criteria to separate what is true from what is false; yet, on the other hand, it is no presumption to endeavour to form a conception of the political organisation of Rome in the earliest times, because we can take our start from actually existing institutions, and trace them back, in many cases step by step, to remote times. We are thus able to prove that the legend is for the most part only an explanation of facts which had a real existence. It would be out of place here to attempt an explanation of the early Roman constitution, but a few remarks are necessary in explanation of the legendary account of the constitution which has been given above.

The original site of Rome was on the Palatine hill. On this there was a Latian colony established at the earliest times, which formed an independent state. On the neighbouring hills there appear to have been also settlements of Sabines and Etruscans, the former probably on the Quirinal and Ca-
2. Petitus, one of those artists of Roman Gaul, whose names have become known to us by means of the inscriptions preserved in the Museum at Lyons. This artist is designated in the inscription ARTIS ARG EXCLUSUON, which, there is little doubt, means a maker of silver vases, as R. Rochette has shown, following the Abbé Greppo, from the use of the word excluorion in this sense, in a passage of Augustine. (Ad Psalm. lxvii. 31; Du Cange, s. v. Exclusor; R. Rochette, Lettre à M. 3. A son of Emathion. (Plut. Romul. 2; comp. Romulus.)

ROŚCIIUS. L. A. ROSCIUS, a Roman ambassador sent to Fidenae in n. c. 438. He and his three colleagues were killed by the inhabitants of Fidenae, at the instigation of Lar Tolumnius, king of the Veientes. The statues of all four were erected in the Rostra at Rome. (Liv. iv. 17; Cic. Phil. ix. 2; Plin. H. N. xxxiv. 6. s. 11.)

2. Sex. Roscius, of America, a town in Umbria, near Amelia, was accused of the murder of his father in n. c. 80, and was defended by Cicero in an oration which is still extant, and which was the first that the orator delivered in a criminal cause. The following are the circumstances under which the prosecution arose. Sex. Roscius had a father of the same name, who was one of the most wealthy citizens of America. The father bore an unblemished character, but had for certain reasons incurred the enmity of two of his relations and fellow-townsmen, T. Roscius Magnus and T. Roscius Capito, who not only hated the person, but coveted the wealth of their neighbour. Sextus frequently visited Rome, where he lived on terms of intimacy with Metellus Servillius, and other Roman nobles. On one of these visits to the capital he was assassinated near the Palatine baths, as he was returning in the evening from a banquet. His enemy, Magnus, who was at Rome at the time, and who had doubtless hired the assassins, immediately despatched a messenger with the news to Capito at America, but without informing the younger Sextus, who was likewise at America, of the death of his father. Four days afterwards Chrysogonus, the freedman and favourite of Sulla, who was at Volaterrae in Etruria, was likewise acquainted with the event. He learnt that the property which Roscius had left behind him was considerable, consisting of not less than thirteen farms, lying for the most part on the Tiber, as well as of ready money and other valuables. Forthwith a bargain was struck between Chrysogonus and the two Rosci; and the name of Sextus was placed on the proscription list, notwithstanding an edict of Sulla, that none of the proscribed should be pursued after the first of June, n. c. 81. But as the name of Sextus was now on the list, his property was confiscated; Capito obtained three of the farms, and the remaining ten were purchased by Chrysogonus for 2000 denarius, though they were worth in reality 250 talents; and Magnus was likewise well rewarded for his share in the business. Such a barefaced act of villany excited the utmost indignation at America. The decurions of the town accordingly sent ten of the principal citizens to Sulla to acquaint him with the real state of the case, and to beg that the name of Roscius might be erased from the proscription list, in order that his son might thus regain possession of his hereditary property. Alarmed at the turn matters were taking, Chrysogonus had an interview with the deputation, and pledged his word that their request should be complied with; and they, probably more than half-afraid of facing the dictator, were contented to receive the promise, and returned home without seeing Sulla. These half-measures, however, only exposed the younger Roscius to still greater peril. The robbers saw that they had no security for their property as long as he was alive. They therefore laid snares for his life, and he only escaped the fate of his father by flying to Rome and taking refuge in the house of Cæcilia, the daughter of Metellus Balearicus. Here he was quite safe from private assassination. Disappointed of getting rid of him secretly, his enemies resolved to murder him judicially. They accordingly hired a certain C. Eruicus to accuse him of the murder of his father, and they paid a sufficient number of witnesses to swear to the fact. They felt sure of a verdict against the accused, as they did not believe that any person of influence would undertake his defence; and even if he could obtain an advocate, they were convinced that his counsel would not dare, by speaking of the sale of the property, to bring any accusation against the powerful freedman of Sulla. In this, however, they were disappointed. Cicero, who was burning for distinction, saw that this was a most favourable opportunity for gaining glory, and readily undertook the defence. He did not hesitate to attack Chrysogonus with the utmost severity, and so evident was the guilt of the accusers, and so clear the innocence of the accused, that the judges had no alternative left but the acquittal of Roscius. It was the first trial for murder that had come before the judges since the juridic had been taken from the equites and restored to the senators by Sulla; and they were unwilling to give to the popular party such a handle against them as the condemnation of Roscius would have supplied. Besides which Sulla allowed the court to exercise an unbiased judgment, and did not interfere for the sake of gratifying the wishes of his favourite. Cicero's speech was greatly admired at the time, and though at a later period he found fault with it himself, as bearing marks of youthful exaggeration, it displays abundant evidence of his great oratorical powers. (Comp. Cic. Orat. 30, de Off. ii. 14; Plut. Cic. 3; Drumm, Geschichte Roms, vol. v. pp. 234—234.)

3. Q. ROŚCIIUS, the most celebrated comic actor.
ROSCIUS.

at Rome, was a native of Solonim, a small place in the neighbourhood of Lanuvium. His sister was married to Quintius, whom Cicero defended in b.c. 81. (Cic. pro Quin. 24, 25.) A tale was told, that in his infancy he was found in the folds of a serpent, and that this foreshadowed his future eminence. His extraordinary skill in acting procured him the favour of many of the most distinguished Roman nobles, and, among others, of the dictator Sulla, who presented him with a gold ring, the symbol of equestrian rank. Like his celebrated contemporary, the tragic actor Aesopus, Roscius enjoyed the friendship of Cicero, who constantly speaks of him in terms of both admiration and affection, and on one occasion calls him his amores et delictae. Roscius paid the greatest attention to his art, and obtained excellence in it by the most careful and elaborate study. It is to this that Horace alludes, when he says (Ep. ii. 1. 82):

So careful and assiduous was he in his preparations, that even in the height of his reputation, he did not venture upon a single gesture in public which he had not previously well considered and practised at home. But notwithstanding all this study, no mannerism or affectation appeared in his acting; every thing he did was perfectly natural to the character he represented; and he himself used to say that decoro was the highest excellence of the art. He was considered by the Romans to have reached such perfection in his own profession, that it became the fashion to call every one who became particularly distinguished in his own art, by the name of Roscius. In his younger years Cicero received instruction from him, and at a later time he and Roscius often used to try which of them could express a thought with the greatest effect, the orator by his eloquence, or the actor by his gestures. Macrobius, who relates this anecdote, goes on to say that these exercises gave Roscius so high an opinion of his art, that he wrote a work in which he compared eloquence and acting. Like Aesopus, Roscius realized an immense fortune by his profession. Macrobius says that he made a thousand denarii a day, and Pliny relates that his yearly profits were fifty millions of sesterces. He died in b.c. 62, as Cicero, in his oration for Archias (c. 8), which was delivered in that year, speaks of his death as a recent event. (Cic. de Div. i. 36, ii. 81, de Orat. i. 27—29, 59, 60, ii. 57, 59, iii. 26, 59, de Leg. i. 4, Brut. 84; Plut. Cic. 5; Macrobi. Sat. ii. 10; Val. Max. vii. 7, § 7; Plin. H. N. vii. 39, a. 40.) A scholaristic on Cicero gives the cognomen Gallus to Q. Roscius, but it does not occur elsewhere, as far as we know. (Schol. Boh. pro Arch. p. 357, ed. Orelli.)

In b.c. 68 Cicero pleaded the cause of his friend in a civil suit before the judex C. Piso. It appears that a certain C. Fannius Chorea had a slave of the name of Panurgus, whom he entrusted to Roscius for instruction in his art, on the agreement that whatever profits the slave might acquire should be divided between them. Panurgus was murdered by one Q. Flavius of Tarquinii, and accordingly an action was brought against him for damages, by Fannius and Roscius. Before the case came on for trial, Roscius received from Flavius a farm, which Fannius valued at 100,000 sesterces; Roscius maintained that this farm was simply a compensation for his own loss; but Fannius asserted that Roscius had no right to make terms for himself alone, and that according to the original agreement he was entitled to half of the compensation. The dispute was referred for arbitration to C. Piso, who did not give any formal decision, but at his recommendation Roscius consented to pay Fannius a certain sum of money for the trouble he had had, and Fannius, on the other hand, promised to give Roscius the half of whatever he might receive from Flavius. Fannius now sued Flavius; the case came on before the judex C. Cluvius, a Roman eques, who sentenced Flavius to pay 100,000 sesterces. According to the statement of Roscius he himself never received any part of this sum although he was entitled to half of it. Some years afterwards, when Flavius was dead, Fannius sued Roscius for 50,000 sesterces, as the half of the value of the estate given to Roscius on the death of Panurgus, and appealed to the agreement made before C. Piso, in support of his claim. The case came on for trial before the same C. Piso, who now acted as judex, and Cicero defended his friend in an oration, which has come down to us, though with the loss of the opening part. The date of the oration is doubtful; we have adopted the one given by Drumm, who discusses the matter at length (Geschichte Roms, vol. v. pp. 346—348). The subject of the oration has afforded matter for considerable discussion to modern jurists and scholars. (See Unterholzer, Über die Rolle des Cicero für den Schauspieler Q. Roscius, in Savigny's Zeitschrift, vol. i. p. 248, &c.; München, Oratio M. T. C. pro Q. R. C. juridice exposita, Coloniae, 1829; and Schmidt, in his edition of the oration, Lipsiae, 1838.)

5. Roscius, two brothers, who accompanied Crassus on his Parthian expedition. (Plut. Crass. 31.)

6. Roscius, a legate of Q. Cornificius in Africa, perished along with his commander, in b.c. 43. (Appian, B. C. iv. 56.) [CORNPICIUS, No. 3.]

ROSCIUS, L. AELIUS. 1. Consul a. d. 100 (Fasti).

2. Consul a. d. 223, with L. Marius Maximus, in the reign of the emperor Severus (Fasti).

ROSCIUS, CAELIUS, the legatus of the twentieth legion, which was stationed in Britain at the time of Nero's death, a. d. 68. (Tac. Hist. i. 60.)

ROSCIUS REGULUS. [REGULUS.]

ROSIA'NUS GEMINUS, quaestor of the younger Pliny in his consulship, a. d. 100, is recommended by the latter in one of his letters to Trajan (Ep. x. 11, a. 16). ROXANE (Rox'ana, Roxana), a daughter of Oxyartes of the Bactrian. According to Arrian, she fell into the hands of Alexander on his capture of the hill-fort in Sogdianna, named "the rock," where the wife and daughters of Oxyartes had been placed for security; and the conqueror was so captivated by the charms of Roxana (who appeared to the Macedonians the most beautiful of all the Asiatic women they had seen, except the wife of Dareius), that he resolved to marry her—a design which induced Oxyartes, when he heard of it, to come and submit himself to Alexander, b.c. 327 (Arr. Anab. iv. 18—20). The statements of Curtius (vii. 4), and of Plutarch (Aem. 47), differ in some points from the above account; but see Droysen, Alexander, p. 85. At the time of Alexander's death, in b.c. 323, Roxana was far advanced in pregnancy, and within a few months she was delivered of a son (Alexander Aegus), who was admitted to share the nominal sovereignty with Arrhidaeus, under the regency of Perdiccas. Some time before the boy was born she had, with the knowledge and concurrence of the regent, drawn Stateira, or Baraine, and her sister Drypetis to Babylon by a friendly letter, and then caused them to be murdered [Barsine, No. 2]. In B.C. 321, Roxana and her infant son accompanied Perdiccas in his expedition against Egypt; and on his death in the same year, she became subject to the guardianship of Pithon and Arrhidæus. [Arrhidæus, No. 2.] In B.C. 320, she was removed over to Macedonia by Antipater. In B.C. 318, fearing probably the hostility of Eurydice, she fled with her son to Aeacides, king of Epeirus, by whom they were restored to Macedonia, together with Olympus, in the following year. It was not long, however, before Olympus, hard pressed by Cassander, was obliged to throw herself into Psydra, whither Roxana and the young prince accompanied her; and, when Psydra was taken, and Olympus put to death, Cassander, only in accordance, they were placed by him in Amphipolis, with a command that they should no longer be treated as royal persons. Here they were detained under the charge of Glauces till B.C. 311, in which year, soon after the general peace then concluded, they were murdered by their keeper, and their bodies were secretly disposed of, in accordance with orders from Cassander. (Plut. Alex. 77, de Alex. Port. ii. 6; Arr. Anab. vii. 27; Curt. x. 3, 6; Dio. xviii. 3, 39, xix. 11, 52, 103; Strab. xi. p. 517, xvii. p. 794; Just. xii. 15, xiii. 2, xiv. 5, 6, xv. 2; Paus. i. 6, 11, ix. 7.) [E. E.]

RUBELLIUS BLANDUS. [Blandus.]
RUBELLIUS GEMINUS. [Geminus.]
RUBELLIUS PLAUTUS. [Plautus.]
RUBRE'NUS LAPP'A, a tragic poet and a contemporary of Juvenal, was compelled by poverty to pledge his cloak, while writing a tragedy on Atreus. (Juv. Sat. vii. 71—73.)

RUBENUS. The second of one Carbo, a friend of Cicero. (Cic. ad Fann. ix. 21, § 3.)

2. A woman of Mediolanum in the time of Augustus, of whom Valerius Maximus (ix. 15. ext. 1) relates a story.

3. A Vestal virgin, with whom Nero committed incest. (Suet. Ner. 28.)

RUBRIA GENS, plebeian, is mentioned for the first time in the tribunate of C. Gracchus, but it never attained much importance during the republic. In the imperial period the Rubrii became more distinguished; and one of them, namely C. Rubrius Gallus, obtained the consulship in A.D. 101. The surname of the Rubrii in the time of the republic are Ruba, Varro, and Dossenus, the latter of which occurs only on coins [Dossenus]. Under the empire we meet with a few more surnames, which are given below.

RUBRIUS. 1. Rubrius, tribune of the plebs along with Marius in B.C. 88, is mentioned by Cicero (Brut. 45) as an energetic and passionate accuser.

2. Q. Rubrius Varro, who was declared a public enemy along with Marius in B.C. 88, is mentioned by Cicero (Brut. 45) as an energetic and passionate accuser.

3. Rubrius, one of the companions of C. Verres in his iniquities (Cic. Ver. i. 25). He seems to have been a different person from Q. Rubrius, who is also mentioned in connection with Verres. (Ferr. iii. 80.)

4. L. Rubrius, a Roman eques at Syracuse, when Verres was governor of Sicily. (Cic. Ferr. iii. 57.)

5. Rubrius, was propraetor in Macedonia about B.C. 67, in which year M. Cató served under him as tribune of the soldiers. (Plut. Cat. min. 9.)

6. L. Rubrius, a senator, was taken prisoner by Caesar at the capture of Corinum, at the beginning of B.C. 49, and was dismissed by him unjured. (Caes. B. C. i. 23.)

7. M. Rubrius, was with M. Cató in Utica at the time of his death. (Plut. Cat. min. 62, 63.)

8. Rubrius Rugga, was one of Caesar's assasins, B.C. 44. (Appian, B. C. i. 115, with the note of Schweighäuser.) He may have been the same as either No. 6 or 7, both of whom belonged to the Pompean party.

9. L. Rubrius, of Casinum, made M. Antonius his heir. (Cic. Phil. ii. 16.)

10. Rubrius, a Roman eques, accused at the beginning of the reign of Tiberius. (Tac. Ann. i. 73.)

RUBRIUS, a physician at Rome, who lived probably about the beginning or middle of the first century after Christ, and is mentioned by Pliny (H. N. xxix. 5) as having gained by his practice the annual income of two hundred and fifty thousand sesterces (about 1953l. 2s. 6d.). As this is considered by Pliny to be a very large sum, it may give us some notion of the fortunes made by physicians at Rome about the beginning of the empire. [W. A. G.]

RUBRIUS FABATUS, was apprehended in attempting to fly to the Parthians in A.D. 32, but escaped punishment from the forgetfulness rather than the mercy of Tiberius. (Tac. Ann. vi. 14.)

RUBRIUS GALLUS. [Gallus.]
RUBRIUS POILIO. [Pollio.]
RUILLA, A'NNA, spoken of in the reign of Tiberius. (Tac. Ann. iii. 36.)

RUFILLUS, a person ridiculed by Horace on account of the perfumes he carried about his person. (Hor. Sat. i. 2. 27, i. 4. 92.)

RUF'INA, POM'PONIA. [Pomponia.]

RUFINIA'NUS, JULIUS, a Latin rhetorician of uncertain date, the author of a treatise De Figurar Sententiarum et Eloctionis, first published, along with several other pieces of a similar description, by Beatus Rhenanus, 4to. Basel, 1521. It will be found in the "Rhetores Antiqui Latini" of Pitheus, 4to. Paris, 1599, p. 24, in the collection of Capponerius, 4to. Argent. 1756, p. 29, and is generally included in the editions of the work by Rutilius Luptus [Lupus], which bears the same title. [W. R.]

RUF'INUS, prime minister of Theodosius the Great, one of the most able, but also most intriguing, treacherous, and dangerous men of his time. See also him Βασίλισσας ἰδέας καὶ κρίσεως. He was a native of Flavian, the capital of Nummenopusia, a portion of Aquitania, in Gaul, now Ense in Gascony. Although of low birth, he succeeded in working his way up to the imperial court, and early attached himself to the fortune of Theodosius, with whom he became a great favourite. He employed his ascendancy over the emperor to abuse his confidence, and The-

... dosius seemed to have been struck with a blind- ness which prevented him from seeing the odious vices and public crimes of this dangerous man. At the time of the great troubles at Thessalonica, in A.D. 390, Rufinus held the important post of magister officiorum, and having great influence in the imperial cabinet, excited the vindictive Theo- dosius to those cruel measures which brought ruin upon that flourishing city. In 392 Rufinus was consul, and raised himself to the dignity of praefectus praetorio by depositing the then prefect Tidianus, sending him into exile, and putting to death his son Proculus, the praefect of Constantin- nople. In consequence of these proceedings, and his boundless rapacity through which the eastern provinces were nearly ruined, Rufinus incurred, the general hatred; and the empire was surprised when, after the death of Theodosius in the same year, 392, he continued his former influence over the weak Arcadius. There were, however, men in the empire able to cope with him, and little dredd- ing his power. Among these Stilicho and Eutro- pius were the principal, and they consequently became objects of fear and hatred to Rufinus. In order to divert the attention of these powerful men from his own person, and prevent them from joining in Constantinople for his destruction, Rufinus persuaded the Huns and the Goths to make an inroad into the empire. The former came from Scythia by sea, landed in Asia Minor, and carried destruction as far as Antioch, where their farther progress was arrested. The Goths were met by the brave Stilicho who, owing to the machinations of Rufinus, sustained more defeats than he obtained victories, and was deposed and utterly ruined, as they deserved. They retreated, however, and now Stilicho entered with Gainas, the Gothic ally of Arcadius, into a plan for ruining Rufinus. Gainas soon gained the assistance of his officers, and approached Constantinople under the pretext of having his troops reviewed by the emperor. Rufinus had meanwhile prevailed upon Arcadius to make him co-emperor, and they set out from Constantinople to meet the returning army, and have the proclamation made in presence of Gainas and his men, whom they thought devoted to the all-powerful minister. Rufinus was so sure of his nomination, that he had already money coined with his effigy, destined to be distributed among the soldiers. Arcadius and Rufinus arrived in the camp of Gainas on the 27th of November 395, and the solemnity was on the point of taking place, when suddenly one of Gainas’ men rushed upon Rufinus, who stood close to the emperor, and plunged his sword in his breast. Others soon fol- lowed his example, and in a moment Rufinus fell a victim to their fury. His head was cut off, stuck upon a spear, and paraded through the camp. His right hand was likewise cut off, and a soldier carried it about among his comrades, cry- ing in mockery, “Charity, charity to the hand that could never get enough!” Arcadius fell in con- sternation from the scene of murder, but his fears were soon removed, and he agreed to confiscate the immense property of Rufinus. Of this Eu- tropius, who was secretly privy to the murder, got the lion’s share. Others, who had been robbed by Rufinus, tried to obtain an indemnity by seizing whatever they could find belonging to him, till at last Arcadius issued an edict, at the instigation of Eutropius, by which the whole residue of the pro- perty of Rufinus was declared to be imperial, or more properly speaking Eutropian, property. The wife and daughter of Rufinus were exiled to Jeru- salem, and there died in peace many years after. Rufinus was the brother of Saint Sylvin. (Claud- ian. Rufinus; Suidas, s. v. Poëvius; Sozom. vii. 24, &c.; Zosim. lib. iv. v.; Theodoret. v. 17, &c.; Philostorg. xi. 1, &c.) [W. P.]

RUFINUS. M. ANTONIUS, consul a. d 131, with Ser. Octavius Laenas Pontianus. (Fasti.)

RUFINUS, CAECCILIUS, a man of quas- torian rank, was expelled by Domitian, when censor, from the senate because he danced. (Dion Cass. iv. vii. 17; Suet. Dom. 8.)

RUFINUS, CORNELIUS. Rufinus was the name an ancient family of the Cornelia gens, from which family the dictator Sulla was de- scended.

1. P. CORNELIUS RUFINUS, dictator b. c. 334, was obliged to lay down his office on account of a fault in the auspices at his election. (Liv. vii. 17.)

2. P. CORNELIUS P. F. RUFINUS, probably son of the preceding, was twice consul and once dic- tator. He was consul for the first time in b. c. 290, with M. Curius Dentatus, and in conjunction with his colleague brought the Samnite war to a conclusion, and obtained a triumph in consequence. [Dentatus.] He was consul a second time in b. c. 277, with C. Junius Brutus Bubulcus, and carried on the war against the Samnites and the Greeks in Southern Italy, who were now deprived of the powerful protection of Pyrrhus. The chief event of his second consulship was the capture of the imperial residence at Capua. Rufinus bore a great character on account of his avarice and dis- honesty, but he was at the same time one of the most distinguished generals of his time; and accord- ingly C. Fabrius, his personal enemy, is said to have supported his application for his second consulship in b. c. 277, because the Romans stood in need of a general of experience and skill on account of their war with Pyrrhus. But as Pyrrhus had left Italy in the middle of the preceding year, Niebuhr remarks (Hist. of Rome, vol. iii. note 903) that the support of Fabricius must refer to his first consulship, or perhaps with even more probability to his dictatorship, the year of which is not mentioned, but which Niebuhr refers to b. c. 260, after the defeat of the Romans at the Sirta. In b. c. 275, Rufinus was expelled from the senate by the censors C. Fabricius and Q. Aemilius Papus, on account of his possessing ten pounds of silver plate. (Liv. Epit. i.; Eutrop. ii. 9; Cic. de Orat. ii. 66; Quintil. xii. 1 § 43; Gel. iv. 8; Dion Cass. Frugam. 37; Veil. Pat. ii. 17; Frontin. Strat. iii. 6, § 4; Zonar. viii. 6; Liv. Epit. 14; Gall. xvii. 21; Val. Max. ii. 9, § 4; Macrobr. Sat. i. 17; Plut. Sull. 1.) Rufinus is said to have lost his sight in sleep, while dreaming of this misfor- tune. (Plin. H. N. vii. 50, s. 51.) His grandson was the first of the family who assumed the sur- name of Sulla. [Sulla.]

RUFINUS, JUNIUS. 1. A. JUNIUS RU- FINUS, consul a. d. 153 with C. Brutius Praesens. (Fasti.)

2. M. JUNIUS RUFINUS SABINIUS, consul a. d. 155 with C. Julius Severus. (Fasti.)

RUFINUS, LICINIUS, a jurist, who lived under Alexander Severus, which appears from his consulting Paulus (Dig. 40. tit. 13. s. 4). There are in the Digest seventeen excerpts from twelve books of Regulariae by Rufinus, according to the Florentine Index; but one excerpt (Dig. 42. tit. 1. s. 34) is superscribed Lib. XIII, which, however, proves nothing, as error easily occurs in such a numeral. The name of Lecinicus Rufinus appears in the Geneva edition of the Collatio Legum Mosiacarum et Romanaarum, as the compiler; but this Rufinus cannot be the contemporary of Paulus, for the Collatio was compiled after the publication of the Code of Theodosius; not to mention other arguments. (Zimmern, Geschichte des Rom. Privatrechts, vol. i.)

RUFINUS, TREBONIUS, a friend of the younger Pliny, had been decemvir, or one of the chief magistrates, of the Roman colony of Vienna in Gaul. (Plin. Ep. iv. 22.) He is probably the same person as the Rufinus to whom one of Pliny's letters is addressed. (Ep. viii. 18.)

RUFINUS, TRIANUS, consul in A.D. 210 with M. Acilius Fanusinus. (Fasti.)

RUFINUS, C. VIBIUS, consul succetus in A.D. 52. (Fasti.)

RUFINUS, literary. 1. TYRANNIUS OR TURANUS, or TURANUS, as the name is variously written, must have been born about the middle of the fourth century, but neither the precise date nor the place of his nativity can be determined with certainty, although some of his biographers have confidently fixed upon A.D. 345, for the former, and Concordia, near the head of the Adriatic, as the latter. After he had attained to manhood he became an inmate of the monastery at Aquileia, where, upon acquiring a knowledge of the principles and rites of Christianity, he received the sacrament of baptism, in 371 or 372, from the hands of the presbyter Chromatius. At this epoch also he formed that close intimacy with Hieronymus which was long maintained with great mutual warmth, but eventually most rudely dissolved. Having conceived an eager desire to visit Palestine, Rufinus set out, almost immediately after his admission into the Church, for Syria, in the train of Melania, a noble, wealthy, and devout Roman matron, and remained in the East for about twenty-six years, passing a portion of his time at Alexandria, where he enjoyed the instructions of Didymus and other learned fathers; and the rest at Jerusalem, where he took up his abode with the monks on the Mount of Olives, making frequent excursions, however, in different directions, in company with Melania, to whom he seems to have acted as spiritual adviser and almoner. During the earlier part of the above period he maintained a most affectionate correspondence with Jerome, who had retired to the desert between Antioch and the Euphrates, and although they met once only (in 385), their friendship continued uninterrupted up to 393, when bitter strife arose. Both had been warm admirers of Origen, and this admiration had been expressed in the most enthusiastic terms by Jerome, in the preface to his translation of the Homilies upon the Song of Solomon. But when the doubtful tendency of many of the theories involved in the imaginative orientalisms of Origen began by degrees to be more clearly discerned, and when the theory of heresy, first raised by Theophilus, became loud and strong, Jerome, eager to escape all suspicion of adherence to such errors, vehemently supported Epiphanius, bishop of Salamis, in his attack upon John of Jerusalem, by whom Rufinus had been ordained a presbyter, and to whom he was warmly attached. The seeds of enmity planted by this controversy were cherished into vigour by the characteristic heat of Jerome, whose denunciations of his former companion became, by quick degrees, more and more fierce and unsparing; but before the quarrel had ripened into inextinguishable hatred, its progress was checked by the interposition and explanations of honest friends, and a solemn reconciliation took place at Jerusalem, on Easter day, a.d. 397.

In the autumn of the same year Rufinus embarked for Italy, along with Melania, and having been hospitably entertained by Paulinus [Paulinus], at Nola, betook himself from thence, without visiting the metropolis, to the monastery of Plenetum. Hither multitudes flocked for the purpose of making inquiries with regard to the ceremonies and liturgies of the sister Churches of the East, the rules of the most celebrated coenobitical fraternities, the Greek ecclesiastical writers, and various other points upon which one who had been so long resident in Asia and Egypt would be capable of imparting information. The intelligence thus obtained proved so interesting, that the learned traveller was earnestly solicited to gratify curiosity still further, by translating into Latin some of those productions to which he had been in the habit of referring most frequently. With this request, not foreseeing the storm he was about to excite, he willingly complied, and accordingly published translations of the Apology for Origen by Pamphilus, and of the books of Origén Επιστολής, together with an original tract De Adulteratione Librorum Origenis, while in the preface to the De Principiis, either from a wish to avoid any misconception of his own views, or from some feeling of lurking malice, he quoted the panegyric pronounced by Jerome upon Origen, of which we have made mention above. The appearance of these works produced a violent ferment. Pammachius and Oceanus represented the transaction in the most unfavourable light to Jerome, whose wrath blazed forth more hotly than ever; all attempts to bring about a better understanding served only, from the bad faith of the negotiators, to feed the flame; a bitter correspondence followed, which was crowned by the Apologia of the one adversoris Hieronymum, and the Apologia of the other adversus Rufinum.

Soon after the commencement of the dispute Rufinus retired to Aquileia, and during the life of Siricius, was steadily supported by the pontifical court. But, upon the elevation of Anastasius, he was summoned by the new pope to repair to Rome, for the purpose of answering the charges preferred against his orthodoxy: this mandate, however, he evaded, and, instead of appearing in person, transmitted an Apologia, in which he explains his real views, and altogether disavows any participation in the dangerous doctrines imputed to him by his enemies. Anastasius replied by an epistle, in which he condemned, most unequivocally, the tenets of Origen, and censured indirectly the rashness of his translator, without, however, seeking further to disturb his present retreat. After the death of Anastasius in 402, the flames which had raged furiously for upwards of three years, gradually became more faint, and at length expired altogether, Rufi-
RUFINUS.

B. TRANSLATIONS FROM THE GREEK.—I. Basili Magni Homilia VIII. These will be found in the edition of St. Basil, published at Paris by Garnier, in 1722, vol. ii. p. 713.

III. Panaphes Apologia pro Origene, to be found in all the best editions of Origen and Jerome.

IV. Origenis de Principis Libri IV. V. Origensus Homiliae, VII. in Genesis, XIII. in Exodus, XVI. in Leviticus, XXVIII. in Numeros, XXVI. in Josue, IX. in Judges, I. in I. Librum Regnum, IV. in Cantico Canticorum, X. Libri in Epistolas Post quatuor ad Romanos. The whole of the above translations will be found in all the editions of Origen.

VI. Gregorii Nazianzenis Opuscula X., first published by Johannes Adelphus, at Strasburg, 4to., 1508, and included in the Latin translation of the whole works of Gregory, by Mosellanus and Pircheimer, printed at Leipzig, 8vo. 1522.

VII. Stati Sententiae s. Euchiriudium s. Annulii, a series of moral Apotrophems, the author of which was altogether uncertain, even in the age of Rufinus, since by some they were supposed to be the production of Sextius the Stoic, named by Seneca, by others of a Pythagorean, by others of Sisistrus II., who was bishop of Rome, and suffered martyrdom in a.d. 258. A collection of this nature is peculiarly open to interpolation, and hence it is little surprising that the MSS. should present variations quite irreconcilable. It is not improbable that the reflections of some heathen philosopher may have formed the groundwork, that these were modified and adapted to Christianity by Rufinus and others, and that transcribers from time to time made such alterations and additions as suited their own views and tastes. The best edition is that of Urbanus Godofredus Siberus, 4to. Lips. 1725.

VIII. Evagrii Sententiae ad Monachaex, Evagrii Liber ad Virgines. These three tracts, which will be found in the appendix to the Codex Regularam, &c., of Holstenius, 4to. Rom. 1661, are generally believed to be the "Opuscula" of Evagrius which Jerome, in his letter to Ctesiphon, mentions as having been translated by Rufinus, and to which Gennadius also makes allusions (cf. xi. and xvii.), although doubtfully and indistinctly.

IX. Clemens Romani Recogniciones, of which the original was attributed to Clemens Romanus. [Clemens Romanus]

X. Anastolos Alexandrinus Canon Paschalis, first published, from a MS., by Aegidius Bucherius, in his De Doctrina Temporum, fol. Antv. 1634.

The following translationsfrom Origen frequently ascribed to Rufinus, are of doubtful authenticity:

—Homiliae VII. in Mathaeum; Homilia in Johanneum; De Maria Magdalena; De Epiphania Domini.

The following works have been erroneously ascribed to Rufinus:—Versio Origenis Homiliarum in Lucam, which belongs to Jerome; Versio Josephi Operum, which belongs to Ambrose; Commentarii in LXXV. priores Davidis Psalmos; in Osanna, Jodelem, Amos; Vita S. Eugenii; Legibus de Putei breviore; Legibus de Fide Jisius. The following works by Rufinus have been lost: Epistola ad Hieronymum, in reply to the first part of Jerome's Apologia; Epistola ad Anicium Felonium Proban; some translations from Latin into Greek.

The style of Rufinus is remarkably perspicuous, and, although tinged with the corruptions of his age, is far removed from barbarism. His original works do not indicate commanding genius, nor indeed are the subjects such as to admit of much display, while his merits as a translator rank very low, since all his efforts in this department are characterised by extreme inaccuracy. Indeed his object seems to have been rather to convey a general idea of the meaning of an author than faithfully to represent his words, and he does not hesitate to expand, condense, correct, or omit such passages as seemed to him obscure, diffuse, inaccurate or unnecessary, although we cannot with justice accuse him of wilful distortion or suppression. Into the merits of the controversy with Jerome, to which perhaps he owes his chief celebrity, it is unnecessary to enter. It redounded to the praise of Rufinus, but the latter was undoubtedly the aggressor, the motives of the attack were probably unworthy, and the coarse invective in which it was couched excites no feeling except disgust, especially when contrasted with the hyperbolical praises lavished by him not long before upon the same individual.

No complete impression of the works of Rufinus having ever been published, we have noticed the best edition of each piece separately.

(Th events connected with the life of Rufinus have been investigated, with great industry and learning, by Giusto Fontanini, archbishop of Ancyr, in his Historia Literaria Aquileni, 4to. Rom. 1742, and by J. F. B. Maria de Rubeis, in his Dissertationes Ducæ, 4to. Venet. 1745; to which we may add the notices prefixed to the edition by Cacciaro of the Historia Ecclesiasstica, and the recent dissertation by J. H. Marzutti, entitled De Turanii Rufani Presbyteri Aquileni Fide et Religione, 8vo, but the latter was not discernibly the aggressor, the motives of the attack were probably unworthy, and the coarse invective in which it was couched excites no feeling except disgust, especially when contrasted with the hyperbolical praises lavished by him not long before upon the same individual.

2. Rufinus, the name attached to a little poem in twenty-two lines, Pasiphæa Fabula ex omniis Metris Horatianis, which, as the name import, contains an example of each of the different metres employed by Horace. It was first published by Cruquiis (1579), by which it was found in the Blandini MSS. attached to an ancient reconstruction of the Horatian metres. It has been printed by Burmann, in his Anthol. Lat. ill. 323, or No. 997, ed. Meyer, by Wernsdorff, Poet. Lat. Min. vol. ill. p. 393, comp. p. 339, and is usually appended to the later editions of Horace. The author is altogether unknown, and even the name is uncertain, but he may be the same person with

3. Rufinus, a grammarian of Antioch, whose treatise De Metris Conspecto, or rather extracts from it, composed partly in prose and partly in verse, is contained in the "Grammatici Latine Ancora Antiqui" of Putschius, 4to., Hannov. 1605, pp. 2706-2727. He was probably not earlier than Theodosius, since he quotes Firmianus, Victorinus, Albinus, and Donatus.

4. Rufinus, the author of thirty-eight epigrams in the Greek Anthology, and probably of one more, which is ascribed in the Planudean Anthology to an otherwise unknown Rufus Do-RUFUS.

2. Rufus Ephesius, so called from the place of his birth, is said by Abu-l-fara (Hist. Dynast. p. 59) to have lived in the time of Plato; and called by John Tzetzes (Clit. vi. Hist. 44, 300, p. 194) physician to Cleopatra. Suidas places him in the reign of Trajan. A.D. 98-117, which date is adopted by most modern authors, and is probably correct, as Rufus quotes Zeuxis (ap. Gal. Comment. in Hippocr., "Prorhet. I." ii. 56, vol. xvi. p. 636) and Dioscorides (ap. Mai, Class. Auct. e Vatic. Codic. edit., vol. iv. p. 11), and is himself quoted by Galen. He wrote several medical works, some of which are still extant. The principal of these is entitled Περί Ουμοσας τῶν του Ανδρομαχο Μο-ρίου, "De Appellationibus Partium Corporis Humani," which consists of two unequal parts, viz. the original treatise, and an extract from it: but whether both parts belong to Rufus, is doubtful. The first and fourth books together form the original work; and the second and third books, the extract, by help of which several passages might be corrected. They are generally reckoned as only three books, as the second is merely the alter primus. The work itself is chiefly interesting for the information it contains concerning the state of anatomical science at Alexandria, and before the time of Galen. Rufus considers the spleen to be absolutely useless (p. 59, ed. Clinch). He intimates that the nerves now called recurrent, were then recently discovered. "The ancients," says he (p. 42), "called the arteries of the neck καρπατίας or καρπο-τικοί, because they believed, that, when they were pressed hard, the animal became sleepy and lost its voice; but in our age it has been discovered that this accident does not proceed from pressing upon these arteries, but upon the nerves contiguous to them." He shows that the nerves proceed from the brain, and he divides them into two classes, those of sensibility and those of motion (p. 36). He considers the heart to be the seat of life, and notices that the left ventricle is smaller and thicker than the right (p. 37). This work was first published in a Latin translation by J. P. Crassus, together with Aretæus, Venet. 1552, 4to. The other extant works of Rufus are an incomplete treatise, Περί τῶν εν Νέρως και Κόστει Παθών, "De Remediis et Suisicis Morbis," and a fragment, Περί τῶν Φαινόμενων Καθημέριων, "De Medicamentis Paragignontes." These three works were first published in Greek by J. Goupil, Paris, 8vo. 1554; and there is an edition (which is not of much critical value,) by J. Clinch, Greek and Latin, Lond. 1726, 4to. The last two were published in Greek, by C. F. de Mathaei, Mosq. 1806, 8vo., who supplied, from a MS. at Moscow, several passages that had never before been published; this edition is now become excessively scarce. The

he was the author of the medical prescription which he quotes, but that he made use of it.

Latin translation by J. P. Crassus of these three works is inserted in the "Medicæe Artis Principes," by H. Stephens, 1567, fol. Paris.

Besides these three works, an old Latin version of a treatise on the Gout, consisting of thirty-seven short chapters, has lately been published under the name of Rufus from a MS. in the Royal Library at Paris, by M. E. Littre, in the "Recueil de Philologie," vol. i. (1845). The work appears to be quite genuine, as it contains two chapters (30, 31) which agree very closely with a passage attributed to Rufus by Aetius (iii. 4, 24, p. 593). A short treatise on the Pulsæ, Περί Σφυγμῶν, has been lately published in Greek, with a French translation, by M. Ch. Darenberg, 1846, 8vo. Paris, from a MS. in the Royal Library, which attributes it to Rufus, but probably without sufficient reason. It seems to be the same work which has appeared in an old Latin translation, among Galen's writings, and is called "Compendium Pulsumvendis Præscriptum" [Galen, p. 214, § 69], and which Ackermann attributes to one of the Arabicæ ('Hist. Liter. Gal. p. clxvi.). The real author's name is unknown, and with respect to his date it can only be stated that he lived certainly after Herophilus, and probably before Galen (see M. Darenberg's Introduct.).

Some Greek fragments of the lost works of Rufus are to be found in Angelo Mai's collection of "Classici Auctores et Vaticinia Codicibus editi" (vol. iv. Rom. 1831), one of the most interesting of which is a passage respecting the plague, which appears to prove, beyond all doubt, that the glandular (or true) plague was known to the ancients some centuries earlier than was commonly supposed (see Littre, Oeuvres d'Hippocr. vol. iii. p. 4). There are also several fragments of his lost works preserved by Galen, Oribasius, Aetius, Rhazes, Ibn Baitar, &c. There is a dissertation by C. G. Kühn, containing "Rufi Ephesii, De Medicamentis Paragignontes Compendiis," appeared in 1846, being prepared by Dr. C. Darenberg of Paris.

Haller is inclined (Biblioth. Botan. vol. i. p. 108) to attribute to Rufus an anonymous fragment of one hundred and ninety Greek hexameter verses, Πεῖλ Βοτανίων, De Viribus Herbarum, which was first published in the Aldine edition of Dioscorides, Venet. 1518, 4to. p. 231, &c. and which is inserted by Fabricius in his Bibliotheca Graeca (vol. ii. p. 629, ed. vel.), with Greek scholia, and a Latin translation and notes by J. Renfort. Fabricius and others have been of the same opinion, Haller himself (Orpheeus, Lips. 1805, 8vo. pp. 717, 750, 761, &c.) on metrical grounds, determines the writer to have lived some time between Manetho, the author of the Αποστελεσματικα, and Nonnus, the author of the Dionysiacæ; a date sufficiently indeterminate. Rufus certainly wrote a Greek hexameter poem, in four books, Πεῖλ Βοτανίων, which is mentioned by Galen (De Simplici Medic. Temper. ac Facult. vi. prem. vol. xi. p. 796), who quotes a few verses (De Compos. Medicam. sec. Loc. i. 1, vol. xii. p. 425) but this is supposed by Choulant to have been quite a different work from the fragment in question, chiefly on the ground that so scientific and sensible a physician as Rufus would not have written anything so full of popular superstitions and absurdities. The fragment treated of thirteen different plants, and to have translated almost all of them into their language (see Wernsdorf, Ad AELTE'RIUS, Auctor. Comp. 4, § 43 and Vellius Longus (p. 2237, ed. Putsch.). The Scholar Cricunus (ad Hor. Ar. Poët. 289) speaks of an Antonius Rufus who wrote plays both prose-tetate and togate, but whether he is the same as the grammarian, must be left uncertain. Glandor, in his Onomasticon (p. 99), states on the authority of Acron that Antonius Rufus translated both Homer and Pindar, but there is no passage in Acron in which the name of Antonius Rufus occurs. Glandor probably had in his mind the statement of the Scholar Cricunus referred to, and connected it with a line in Ovid (ex Pont. iv. 16, 20), in which Rufus is spoken of as a lyric poet; but who this Rufus was, whether the same as Antonius Rufus or not, cannot be determined. (Wernsdorf, Poëtae Latinii Minores, vol. iii. p. 30, vol. iv. p. 505.)

RUFUS, AS'NIUS, a friend of Tacitus and the younger Pliny, the latter of whom recommends Asinius Bassus, the son of Rufus, to Fundamns. (Plin. Ep. iv. 15.)

RUFUS, ATER'RIUS, a Roman eques, was murdered in the theatre, as had been foreseen him in a dream during the preceding night. (Val. Max. i. 7. § 8.)

RUFUS, ATTILIUS, a man of consular rank, was governor of Syria during the reign of Domitian, and died just before the return of Agricola from Britain, A.D. 84. (Tac. Agric. 40.)

RUFUS, A'TIUS, one of the officers in Pompey's army in Greece, in n.c. 48, accused Afranius of treachery on account of his defeat in Spain in the preceding year. (Caes. B. C. iii. 83.)

RUFUS, AUFIDIE'NIUS, praefectus of the camp at Naupactus, whom the formidable insurrection of the Pannonian legions broke out on the death of Augustus, was an especial object of the wrath of the soldiers. (Tac. Ann. i. 20.)

RUFUS, AUR'PIIUS, a name which occurs only on coins, of which a specimen is annexed. It has on the obverse the head of Pallas, and on the reverse Jupiter driving a quadriga, with the legend AV. RVP. (Eckhel, vol. v. p. 148.)

The titles of twenty or thirty other treatises are enumerated in Wernsdorf, but many of them (as indeed some of those mentioned above,) appear to have been only the different chapters of some extensive work. Rufus was also one of those who commented on some of the works of Hippocrates, and he is said by Galen (Comment. in Hippocr. ‘Epid. VI.’ i. 10, vol. xxvii. pt. i. p. 849) to have been a diligent student of the ancient writings and have always aimed to preserve the ancient readings of the text. (Comment. in Hippocr. ‘Prophet. I.’ ii. 58, vol. xvi. p. 639.) Further information respecting Rufus and his writings may be found in Fabricius, Bibl. Grac. vol. iii. p. 102, xiii. 385, ed. vet.; Haller's Bibl. Botan., Anatomi, Med. Pract.; Sprengel's Hist. de la Méd.; Choulant's Handb. der Bücherkunde für die Ältere Medicin; and the Penny Cyclopaedia, from which some of the preceding remarks are taken. [W. A. GI.]

RUFUS. 1. A lyric poet, and a contemporary of Ovid. [RUFUS, ANTONIUS.] 2. A friend of Pliny the younger, who addresses two letters to him (Ep. v. 21, vii. 25). His gentle name is not mentioned by Pliny. There were four other correspondents of Pliny who bear the cognomen of Rufus; namely, Calvisius, Cunianus, Octavius, and Sempronius, all of whom are mentioned below in alphabetic order. 3. Of Perinthos, a Greek soothsayer, an account of him is given by Philostratus. (Philostr. Hist. ii. 17, pp. 597, 598, ed. Olivaris; comp. Westermann, Gesch. der Griech. Beredtsamkeit, § 92, n. 5.)

4. A Greek writer, the author of a work on Music, in three books, in which he treated of the origin of tragedy and comedy. Sophon availed himself to a considerable extent of this work of Rufus. (Phel. Cod. 161; Fabric. Bibl. Grac. vol. ii. p. 320.)

5. The author of a short treatise on rhetoric, published for the first time along with a work of Tiberius on the same subject, by Boisancard, London, 1815. (Westermann, Gesch. der Griech. Beredtsamkeit, § 104, n. 2.)

RUFUS, AC'ILIUS, a contemporary of the younger Pliny, was consul designate in A.D. 102, in which year he spoke in the senate respecting the accusation of Varenus Rufus by the Bithynians. (Plin. Ep. v. 20. § 6, vi. 13.)

RUFUS, AEMILIUS, served as praefectus of the cavalry under Domitian Corbulo in Armenia, and, on account of his misconduct, was degraded and punished by Corbulo. (Frontin. Strut. iv. § 26.)

RUFUS, AN'NIUS LUSCUS. [LUSCUS, ANNIUS, No. 3.]

RUFUS, AN'NIUS, procurator of Judaea at the death of the emperor Augustus, A.D. 14 (Joseph. Ant. xviii. 2. § 2). He was succeeded in the government by Valerius Gratus. [GRATUS.]

RUFUS, ANTONIUS, the name of a Latin grammarian, quoted by Quintilian (i. § 43) and Vellius Longus (p. 2237, ed. Putsch.). The Scholar Cricunus (ad Hor. Ar. Poët. 289) speaks of an Antonius Rufus who wrote plays both prose-tetate and togate, but whether he is the same as the grammarian, must be left uncertain. Glandor, in his Onomasticon (p. 99), states on the authority of Acron that Antonius Rufus translated both Homer and Pindar, but there is no passage in Acron in which the name of Antonius Rufus occurs. Glandor probably had in his mind the statement of the Scholar Cricunus referred to, and connected it with a line in Ovid (ex Pont. iv. 16, 20), in which Rufus is spoken of as a lyric poet; but who this Rufus was, whether the same as Antonius Rufus or not, cannot be determined. (Wernsdorf, Poëtae Latinii Minores, vol. iii. p. 30, vol. iv. p. 505.)

RUFUS, AS'NIUS, a friend of Tacitus and the younger Pliny, the latter of whom recommends Asinius Bassus, the son of Rufus, to Fundamns. (Plin. Ep. iv. 15.)

RUFUS, ATER'RIUS, a Roman eques, was murdered in the theatre, as had been foreseen him in a dream during the preceding night. (Val. Max. i. 7. § 8.)
RUFUS, BASSAEUS, praefectus praetorio under the emperor M. Aurelius, was raised to this dignity on account of his virtues, though he had received no education in consequence of his rustic origin. (Dion Cass. lxi. 5.) He is alluded to in a letter of Avidius Cassius, preserved by Valesius Gallicanus ("audisti praefectum praetorio nostri philosophi, ante triduum quam fieret, mendicium et puererum, sed subito divitem factum," c. 14). The name of Bassaeus Rufus occurs in inscriptions. (See Reimarus, ad Dion. Cass. lxi. 3. § 25, p. 1179.)

RUFUS, CA'DIUS, was condemned on the charge of repentanda, at the accusation of the Bithynians in a. d. 49, but was restored by Otho in a. d. 69 to his rank as senator. (Tac. Ann. xii. 22, Hist. i. 77.)

RUFUS, CAECILIUS. 1. L. CAECILIUS RUFUS, the brother of P. Sulla by the same mother, but not by the same father, was tribune of the plebs, b. c. 63, and proposed soon after he had entered upon the office that his brother P. Sulla and Antonius Paetus, both of whom had been condemned on account of bribery in the consulship of b. c. 66, should be allowed to become candidates again for the highest offices of the state, but dismissed the proposal at the suggestion of his brother. In the course of his tribunate he rendered warm support to Cicero and the aristocratic party, and in particular opposed the agrarian law of Servilius Rullus. In his praetorship, b. c. 57, he joined most of the other magnates in propounding the recall of Cicero from banishment, and incurred in consequence the hostility of P. Clodius, whose hired mob attacked his house in the course of the same year. In b. c. 54, he supported the accusation against Gabinius. (Cic. pro Sull. 22, 23; comp. Dion Cass. xxxvii. 25; Cic. post Red. in Sen. 9, pro Mil. 14; Ascon. in Mil. p. 48, ed. Orelli; Cic. ad Q. Fr. iii. 3. § 2.)

RUFUS, M. CAELIUS, was the son of a wealthy Roman eques of the same name, who appears to have obtained his property as a negotiator in Africa. He was accused of parsimony, especially in reference to his son, but the extravagant habits of the latter required some degree of restraint. He was alive at the trial of his son in b. c. 56 (Cic. pro Caec. 2, 15, 30, 32.) The younger Cælius was born at Puteoli on the 28th of May, b. c. 82, on the same day and the same year as the orator C. Licinius Calvis, in conjunction with whom his name frequently occurs (Plin. H. N. vii. 49. s. 50; Quintil. x. 1. § 115, x. 2. § 25, xii. 10. § 11). His father was enabled to procure him introductions to M. Crassus and Cicero, who gave him the advantage of their advice in the prosecution of his studies, especially in the cultivation of oratory. During Cicero's praetorship (b. c. 69), and the two following years, Cælius was almost always at his side; but in the consulship of the great orator (b. c. 63), he became intimate with Catiline, whose society had such extraordinary fascinations for all the wealthy Roman youths; although he took no part in the conspiracy, if we may trust Cicero's positive assurance. In b. c. 61, he accompanied the proconsul Q. Pompeius Rufus to Africa, partly to become acquainted with the mode of administering a province, but probably still more in order to look after his father's property in that country. On his return to Rome he accused in b. c. 59 C. Antonius, Cicero's colleague in the consulship, of having been one of Catiline's conspirators; and notwithstanding Cicero spoke in his behalf, Cælius was condemned. The oration which Cicero delivered against Antonius possessed considerable merit, and was read in the time of Quintilian (Quintil. iv. 2, § 123, ix. 3. § 58). Not long afterwards he obtained the questorship, and was charged with having purchased the votes at his election, an accusation from which Cicero endeavoured to clear him when he defended him in b. c. 56.

In b. c. 57, Cælius accused L. Sempronius Atratinus of bribery, and when the latter, who was defended by Cicero, was acquitted, he accused him again of the same crime in b. c. 56. But while the second suit was in progress, and had not yet come on for trial, Cælius himself was accused of vis by Sempronius Atratinus the younger. Cælius had for some time been living in the house of P. Clodius on the Aventine, and was one of the avowed paramours of his notorious sister Clodia Quadrantaria. He had, however, lately deserted her; and she, in revenge, induced Sempronius Atratinus to bring him to trial. The two most important charges in the accusation arose from Clodius's own statements; she charged him in the first place with having borrowed money from her in order to murder Dion, the head of the embassy sent by Tolemy Auletes to Rome; and declared, in the second place, that he had made an attempt to carry her off by poison. Cælius spoke on his own behalf, and was also defended by M. Crassus and Cicero; the speech of the latter is still extant. Cælius had done great damage to his character, not only by his intrigue with Clodia, but still more by the open part he had taken both at Baiae as well as at Rome in the extravagant debaucheries of herself and her friends; and Cicero therefore exerts himself to show that the reports respecting the character of his client were unfounded, or at least grossly exaggerated; that he was not the extravagant spendthrift and luxurious debaucher that he had been represented, but had devoted much of his time to serious occupations, especially to the study of oratory. The judges acquitted him; and a second accusation, which the Claudii brought against him two years afterwards (Cic. ad Q. Fr. ii. 13), appears likewise to have failed.

In b. c. 52, Cælius was tribune of the plebs. He warmly supported Milo, who murdered P. Clodius at the beginning of this year, and he opposed the measures brought forward by Pompey. But his efforts were all in vain, and Milo was condemned. (Comp. Cic. pro Mil. 33.) In the same year he proposed a bill in conjunction with his nine colleagues to allow Caesar to become a candidate for a second consulship in his absence. To this measure no serious opposition was offered.
as Pompey did not venture to refuse to it his sanction. No sooner had his year of office expired off than he accused his colleague Q. Pompeius Rufus of vis under the provisions of the very law which the latter had taken so active a part in passing. The triumvir, who had no further occasion for his services, rendered him but faint support. He was condemned, and retired to Bauli in Campania, where he was in great pecuniary difficulties, till Cælius generously compelled Cornelius, the mother of Pompeius, to surrender to him his paternal property. (Val. Max. iv. 2 § 7.)

In b.c. 51, Cicero went to Cilicia as proconsul, much against his will, and before leaving Italy he requested Cælius, who accompanied him on his journey as far as Cumae, to send him from time to time a detailed account of all the news of the city. Cælius readily complied with his request, and his correspondence with his friend is still preserved in the collection of Cicero's letters. In the same year Cælius became a candidate for the curule aedileship, which he gained along with Octavius. As he was anxious to exhibit the games with becoming splendour, he applied to Cicero for money and for panthers, as his command of an Asiatic province would enable him to obtain a large supply of both without much difficulty. Cicero, with all his faults, did not plunder the provincials. He therefore refused the money at once; and does not seem to have put himself to much trouble to procure the panthers, although Cælius reminds him of them in almost every letter. During his aedileship in the following year (b.c. 50), Cælius still carried on his correspondence with Cicero; and his letters contain some interesting accounts of the proceedings of the different parties at Rome immediately before the breaking out of the civil war. In the same year he became involved in a personal quarrel with the censor Ap. Claudius Pulecher, and with L. Domitius Ahemobarbus, who had been the colleague of Claudius in the consulship; but we must refer the reader for particular details to the correspondence with Cicero (ad Fam. vii. 12, 14). Having thus become a personal enemy of two of the most distinguished leaders of the aristocracy, his connection with this party, of which he had hitherto been a warm supporter, was naturally weakened. He felt no confidence in Pompey and the senate in the impending civil war; he saw that Caesar was the stronger; and avowing the principle that the more powerful party is to be joined when the struggle in a state comes to arms, he resolved to espouse the side of Caesar.

In the discussions in the senate at the beginning of January, b.c. 49, Cælius supported the opinion of M. Calidius that Pompey ought to betake himself to his Spanish provinces in order to remove every pretext for war. By this declaration he openly broke with the aristocratical party, and in a few days afterwards he fled from Rome with M. Antonius, Q. Cassius, and C. Cassius, and joined the camp at Ravenna (Caes. B. C. i. 2; Dion Cass. xii. 3). Caesar sent him into Liguria to suppress an insurrection at Intemelium (ad Fam. viii. 15); and in April he accompanied Caesar in his campaign in Spain (ad Fam. viii. 16 § 4, 17 § 1). It is supposed by some modern writers that he also served under Curio in Africa in the course of the same year, as we read of a M. Rufus who was the quaestor of Curio in Africa (Caes. B. C. ii. 43); but this M. Rufus must in all probability have been a different person.

He was rewarded for his services by the praetorship, which he held in b.c. 48. But various causes had already alienated the mind of Cælius from his new patron, and these at length led him to engage in desperate enterprises which ended in his ruin and death. He was mortified that Caesar had entrusted the honourable duties of the city praetorship to C. Trebonius rather than to himself, a distinction, however, to which Trebonius had much greater claims, as he had in his tribuneship in b.c. 55 proposed the law for prolonging the proconsular government of Caesar. But his chief dissatisfaction with the existing state of things arose from his enormous debts. It seems that he had looked forward to a prescription for the payment of his creditors; but as Caesar's generous conduct towards his opponents deprived him of this resource, he saw no remedy for his ruined fortunes but a general commotion. Accordingly, when Trebonius was, in the exercise of his judicial duties, carrying into execution the law which had been lately passed by Caesar for the settlement of debts, Cælius set up his tribunal by the side of his colleague and promised his assistance to all who might appeal to him against the decision of the latter. But as no one availed himself of his proffered aid, he brought forward a law according to which debts were to be paid without interest in six instalments, probably at the interval of six months from one another. * When this measure was opposed by Servilius Isauricus, Caesar's colleague in the consulship, and by the other magistrates, he dropt it and brought forward two others in its place, which were in fact equivalent to a general confiscation of property. By one of these new laws the proprietors of houses had to give up a year's rent to their tenants, and by another creditors were to forgive debtors all their debts. After such sweeping measures as these, the decisions of Trebonius, however lenient, would seem harsh towards debtors. A mob attacked him as he was administering justice; several persons were wounded, and Trebonius himself driven from his tribunal. Then upon the senate resolved to deprive Cælius of his office, and Servilius carried the decree into execution by breaking himself the curule seat of the praetor. Cælius saw that he could effect nothing more at Rome, and accordingly left the city, giving out that he intended to repair to Caesar. But his real intention was to join Milo in Campania, whom he had secretly sent for from Massilia, and along with him to raise an insurrection in favour of Pompey. Milo, however, was killed in an attack upon an obscure fort near Thurii before Cælius could join him [Milo]; and Cælius himself was put to death shortly afterwards at Thurii by some Spanish and Gallic horsemen whom he was endeavouring to bribe to surrender the place. (Caes. B. C. iii. 20—22; Dion Cass. xiii. 25—28; Appian, B. C. ii. 22; Liv. Epit. vii. 20; Val. Pat. ii. 68; Oros. vi. 15; Quintil. vi. 3 § 25.)

Caelius had paid considerable attention to literature, and with no small success. He was an elegant writer and an eloquent speaker; he possessed an excitable temperament, and a lively imagination; the speeches in which he accused others were considered his master-pieces (Cic. Brut. 79; orator tracumdsimus, Senec. de Ira, ii. 3). He was a friend of Catullus, who has addressed two of his poems to him (Carm. viii. c.), and he also lived, as has appeared from the above account, on the most intimate terms with Cicero. It was the latter circumstance apparently that led Niebuhr to extenuate the faults of Caelius, and to ascribe to him virtues that he never possessed; but Cicero's intimacy with the young prodigate speaks rather to the prejudice of his own character than in favour of his friend's morals. All the ancient writers, with the exception of Cicero, who have occasion to mention Caelius, agree in an unfavourable estimate of his character; and independent of their testimony, his letters to Cicero, and the speech of the latter on his behalf, in which he attempts to clear his friend of the charges brought against him, are sufficient of themselves to convince any attentive reader of the worthlessness of his moral character. (Niebuhr, Kleine Schriften, vol. ii. p. 252; Mayer, Oratorum Romanorum Fragmenta, p. 458, &c., 2d ed.; Dru mann, Geschichte Rom., vol. ii. p. 411, &c.; and especially Suringar, M. Caelii Rufi et M. Tullii Ciceronis Epistolae Epistolare mutuae, Lugd. Batav. 1846, in which all the authorities for the life of Caelius, both ancient and modern, are printed at length.)

RUFUS, CAEsE'TIUS, proscribed by Antony in a. c. 43, and killed. He owed his fate to a beautiful insula or detached mansion which he had in the city, and which had taken the fancy of Fulvia, the wife of Antony. When his head was brought to Antony, he sent it to his wife, saying that it did not belong to him. (Appian, B. C. iv. 29; Val. Max. ix. 5. § 4.)

RUFUS, C. CALVI'SIUS, an intimate friend of the younger Pliny (Plin. Ep. i. 12. § 12, iv. 4), who has addressed several of his letters to him. (Ep. ii. 20, iii. 19, v. 7, vii. 2, ix. 6.)

RUFUS, CAMONIUS, of Bononia, a friend of Martial, died at an early age in Capadocia. (Mart. vi. 83.)

RUFUS CANI'NIUS, a native of Comum, and a friend and neighbour of the younger Pliny, was well versed in literature, and especially poetry. He appears also to have possessed some talent for the composition of poetry, and mediated writing a poem on the Dacian war (Plin. Ep. viii. 4). But as most of his time was taken up in the personal management of his estates, Pliny begs him to leave them to his bailiffs, and to devote his own time to the prosecution of his studies (Plin. Ep. i. 3). There are also several other letters of Pliny addressed to him, which all more or less urge him to prosecute his literary pursuits, and undertake the composition of his works. (Ep. ii. 8, iii. 7, vi. 21, vii. 18, viii. 4, ix. 33.)

RUFUS, CA'NIUS, a Roman poet, to whom Martial has addressed one of his epigrams. (Ep. iii. 20.)

RUFUS, CLAU'DIUS CRASSUS. [CLAU-DIUS, No. 12.]

RUFUS, CLU'VIUS. [CLUVIUS, No. 7.]

RUFUS, M'. COR'DIUS, a name known to us only from coins, of which a specimen is annexed, vol. iii.

It has on the obverse the head of the Dioscuri with RVFVS III VIR (that is, of the mint), and on the reverse a female figure with MAN. CORDIUS. (Eckhel, vol. v. p. 170.)

COIN OF M'. CORDIUS RUFUS.

RUFUS, CORE'LLIUS, a friend of the younger Pliny, whom he looked up to as a father, and of whom he always speaks with the highest veneration and respect. Corellius had been a martyr to hereditary gout for 33 years; and at length, in order to escape from the incessant pain which he suffered, he put an end to his life by voluntary starvation at the age of 67, at the commencement of Trajan's reign. His virtues and his death form the subject of one of the letters of Pliny (Ep. i. 12), who also mentions him on many other occasions. (Ep. iv. 17, § 4, v. 1, § 5, vii. 11, § 3, ix. 13, § 6.)

RUFUS, C. CURTIUS, said to have been the son of a gladiator by some, followed in the train of one of the quaestors to Africa for the purpose of gain, and, while at Adrumetum, is reported to have seen a female of superhuman size, who prophesied to him that he would one day visit Africa as consul. Urged on by this vision, he repaired to Rome and obtained the quaestorship and praetorship in the reign of Tiberius, at a later period the consular imperium and triumphal ornaments, and at length the government of Africa, as had been predicted (Tac. Ann. xi. 20, 21; Plin. Ep. vii. 27). Some modern writers suppose that this Curtius Rufus was the father of Q. Curtius Rufus, the historian.

RUFUS, Q. CURTIUS, the historian. [CUR-TIUS.]

RUFUS, DomESTICUS. [RUFUSinus, literary, No. 4.]

RUFUS, EGNA'TIUS. 1. L. Egnatius RUfus, a friend of Cicero, was a Roman equus, who appears to have carried on an extensive business in the provinces as a money-lender, and a farmer of the taxes. Cicero frequently recommends him to the governors of the provinces; as, for instance, to Q. Philippus (ad Fam, xiii. 73, 74), to Quintius Gallius (ad Fam, xiii. 43, 44), to Appuleius (ad Fam, xiii. 45), and to Silius (ad Fam, xiii. 47). Both Cicero and his brother Quintus had pecuniary dealings with him (ad Att. vili. 18, § 4, v. 15, § 4, xi. 3, § 3, xii. 18, § 5).

2. M. Egnatius Rufus, probably son of the preceding, was aedile in B. C. 20, and gained so much popularity in this office, principally through extinguishing the fires by means of his own servants, that he obtained the praetorship for the following year in opposition to the laws, which enacted that a certain time should intervene between the offices of aedile and praetor. Encouraged by this success, he endeavoured to secure the consulship for the following year, B. C. 18; but as the consul C. Sentius Saturninus refused to receive his name as one of the candidates, he entered into a plot with persons who were, like himself, bankrupts in character and fortune, to murder Augustus. Being detected in these treasonable designs, he was thrown into prison and executed. (Vell. Pat. ii. 91—93; Dion Cass. liii. 24; Suet. Aug. vii. 19.)

RUFUS. EPHESIUS. [Rufus, physicians, No. 2, p. 669.]

RUFUS, FAENIUS or FE'NIUS, was appointed by Nero prefectus annonae in A. D. 65, and gained the favour of the people by his discharging the duties of this office without any view to private emolument. He was in consequence appointed praefect of the praetorian cohorts along with Sosonius Tigellinus, in A. D. 62, as Nero wished, by the elevation of Rufus, to counterbalance the unpopularity of the latter appointment. But Rufus never obtained much influence with the emperor, and all the real power was in the hands of his colleague Tigellinus, whose depraved mind was more akin to Nero's own. In addition to this, his friendship with Agrippina had rendered him an object of suspicion to Nero; and he was therefore the more easily induced to take part in the conspiracy of Piso, A. D. 65. On the detection of the conspiracy he was compelled to put an end to his own life, which he did not do with the same firmness as most of his accomplices. His friends shared in his fall, and one was banished simply on account of his intimacy with him. (Tac. Ann. xill. 22, xiv. 51, 57, xv. 50, 53, 61, 66, 68, xvi. 12; Dion Cass. lxi. 24.)

RUFUS FESTUS AVIE'NUS. [AVIENUS.]

RUFUS, GEMI'NIUS, was accused of the crime of majestas towards the end of A. D. 32, in consequence of his intimacy with Sejanus. He put an end to his own life, and his wife Publia Priscia followed his example. (Dion Cass. lvii. 4; Tac. Ann. vi. 14.)

RUFUS, HELVIIUS, a common soldier, saved the life of a Roman citizen in the war with Tacfarinas in Africa in A. D. 20. (Tac. Ann. iii. 21.)

RUFUS, JULI'A'NUS, consul A. D. 178 with Gavius Orfitus. (Lamprid. Commod. 12.)

RUFUS, JULIUS. 1. Consul A. D. 67 with L. Fonteius Capito. He died of a carbuncle, as is related by the elder Pliny. (H. N. xxvi. 1 s. 4.)

2. A contemporary of Martial, was apparently a writer of satires. (Mart. x. 99.)

3. One of the Roman nobles slain by the emperor Severus. (Spar.ine. Sever. 13.)

RUFUS, M. LUCI'LIUS, known to us only from coins, a specimen of which is annexed. The obverse represents the head of Pallas; the reverse Victory driving a biga, with M. LVILL RVP. (Eckhel, vol. v. p. 239.)

COIN OF M. LUCILIUS RUFUS.

RUFUS, MEN'NIUS. [Rufus, physicians, No. 1, p. 668.]

RUFUS, L. MESCI'NIUS, Cicero's quaestor in Cicilia, n. c. 51, of whose official conduct Cicero complains to Atticus in the strongest terms (ad Att. vi. 3, 4). On his departure from the province Cicero left Tiro at Laodiceia to settle his accounts with him; and in consequence of the difficulties and misunderstandings which arose out of this settlement, Cicero wrote to him a long letter which is extant (ad Fam. v. 20). But though Cicero had found so much fault with Rufus in his letter to Atticus, he bestows the highest praises upon him in a letter in which he urges him to join the side of Pompey on the breaking out of the civil war (ad Fam. v. 19). At a later time, n. c. 46; Cicero writes Rufus a letter of consolation, as he seems to have been discontented with his position (ad Fam. v. 21). In the same year Cicero recommended him to Serv. Sulpicius, the governor of Achaea, in which province Rufus had some business which required his presence (ad Fam. xii. 26, 28). After the death of Caesar he joined the republican party, and served under Cassius Longinus, by whom he was sent against Tarsus. (Dion Cass. xvi. 31.)

The name of L. Mesciniius Rufus frequently occurs on coins as triumvir of the mint under Augustus; and it appears from these coins that he must have held this office in the years n. c. 17 and 16. The following is an interesting specimen of one of these coins. On the obverse is a cippus with IMP. CAES. AVGV. COMM. CONSS., that is, Imperator Caesar Augustus communis consensu, and round the cippus L. MESCI'NIUS RUFUS III VIR: on the reverse we have inscribed in a chaript of oak, L. O. M. S. P. R. Q. R. S. P. S. IMP. CAES. QUOD PER EV. R. P. IN AMP. AFQ. TRAN. S. E., that is, Jovi Optimo Maximo S. P. Q. R. votum susceptum pro salute Imperatoris Caesaris, quod per eum res publica in amplitore atque tranquilliore statu est. This interpretation is confirmed by the fact that, after the defeat of Varus some years afterwards, we read that games were vowed by Augustus to Jupiter Optimus Maximus, si respublica in meliore statum vertisset (Suet. Aug. 23). (Eckhel, vol. v. p. 252, vol. vi. pp. 102—105.)

COIN OF L. MESCINIIUS RUFUS.

RUFUS, MIN'CIUS. 1. M. MINCIUS RUFUS, was consul n. c. 221, with P. Cornelius Scipio Asina, and carried on war, in conjunction with his colleague, against the Istrians, whom he subdued (Eutrop. iii. 7; Oros. iv. 13; Zonar. viii. 20). In n. c. 217 Rufus was appointed magister equitum to the dictator Q. Fabius Maximus, who had been called to this office after the disastrous defeat of the Romans at the battle of the lake Trasimeneus. The cautious policy of Fabius displeased the impetuous temper of Rufus, who excided the discontent of the soldiers and the people against the slow and defensive system of the dictator. Certain religious rites called Fabius to Rome, but before his departure he charged Rufus on no account
This inscription has been frequently printed. It is given by Orelli (Inscr. No. 3121), and has been also published by Rudorff, with important elucidations, under the title of "Q. et M. Minuciorum Sententia inter Gennates et Viturios dicta, ed. et illustr. A. A. P. Rudorff," Berol. 1842, 4to.

5. Q. MINUCIUS Q. F. RUFUS, consul b.c. 110, with Sp. Postumius Albinus, obtained Macedonia as his province. He carried on war with success against the barbarians in Thrace, and on his return to Rome in the following year, obtained a triumph for his victories over the Scordisci and Triballi (Sall. Jug. 35, where his praenomen is Marcus; Liv. Epit. 65; Eutrop. iv. 27; Flor. iii. 4 § 5; Frontin. Strat. ii. 4 § 8; Vell. Pat. ii. 8.). He perpetuated the memory of his triumph by building the Porticus Minucia, near the Circus Flaminius. In the Notitia we have mention of a Minucia Vetus et Frumentaria, whence it is doubtful whether two different porticus or only one is intended. It appears that the tesserace, or tickets, which entitled persons to a share in the public distributions of corn, were given to the citizens in the Portus Minucia. Hence it has been conjectured that the Porticus built by the consul originally served for that purpose, but that afterwards a new Porticus Frumentaria was erected, and that accordingly the name of Vetus was given to the other one. In an inscription we read of a Procurator Minuciae, (Vell. Pat. i. c.; Cic. Phil. ii. 34; Lamprid. Comm. 16; Appul. de Mund. p. 74. 14. Elém.; Gruter, ecceli. 4; Becker, Römisch. Alterth. vol. i. p. 621.)

6. MINUCIUS RUFUS, one of the commanders of the Roman fleet in the war against Mithridates. (Appian, Mithr. 17.)

7. Q. MINUCIUS RUFUS, a Roman eques of high character, who lived at Syracuse, and, on more than one occasion, offered opposition to Verres. At the trial of the latter he appeared as one of the witnesses against him. (Cic. Verr. ii. 28, 30, 35, iii. 64, iv. 27, 31.)

8. MINUCIUS RUFUS, espoused the side of Pompey in the civil war, and commanded, along with Lucretius Vespillo, a squadron of eighteen ships, at Orience, in b.c. 48 (Cæs. B. G. iii. 7; Appian, B. C. ii. 54.). He is probably the same as the Minucius who was at Tarentum in b.c. 49, and of whom Cicero speaks (ad Att. xi. 14, 15, ad Q. Fr. iii. 1 § 6.). He may also be the same as the Minucius who was praetor in b.c. 43, and was one of the victims of the proscription in that year. (Appian, B. C. iv. 17.)

9. Q. MINUCIUS RUFUS, whose name occurs on the following coin, cannot be identified with certainty with any of the above-mentioned persons. He may perhaps be the same as No. 2. On the obverse is the head of Pallas, with ryf, on the reverse the Dioscuri, with q. minv., and underneath roma. (Eckhel, vol. v. p. 225.)
10. L. MINUCIUS RUFUS, consul A. D. 83, with the emperor Domitian (Fasti.).

RUFUS, MUNA'TIUS, one of the most intimate friends of the younger Cato, wrote a work on his friend, which is referred to by Plutarch. In b. c. 58 Rufus accompanied Cato to Cyprus, who was charged with the task of uniting the island to the Roman dominion; but he quarrelled with his friend, and returned to Italy in disgust, because Cato would not allow him any opportunity of enriching himself. Rufus, however, in his work on Cato, gave a different account of their quarrel. They were afterwards reconciled by the intervention of Marcius, Cato's wife. (Plut. Cat. Min. 9, 30, 36, 37; Val. Max. iv. 3. § 2.)

RUFUS, C. MUSO'NIUS, a celebrated Stoic philosopher. Vitellius, having ascended the Christian era, was the son of a Roman eques of the name of Capito, and was born at Volusinii in Etruria, either at the end of the reign of Augustus, or the beginning of that of Tiberius. In consequence of his practising and inculcating the principles of the Porch, he became an object of suspicion and dislike at Nero's court, and was accordingly banished to the island of Gyaros, in A. D. 66, under the pretext of his having been privy to the conspiracy of Piso. The statement of Suidas (ξ. v.), that he was put to death by Nero, is unquestionably erroneous. He returned from exile on the accession of Galba, and when Antonius Primus, the general of Vespasian, was marched upon Rome, he joined the ambassadors that were sent by Vitellius to the victorious general, and going among the soldiers of the latter, descanted upon the blessings of peace and the dangers of war, but was soon compelled to put an end to his unseasonable eloquence. When the peace of Vitellius gained the upper hand, Musonian distinguished himself by accusing Publius Celor, by whose means Boren Soranus had been condemned, and he obtained the conviction of Publius. Musonianus seems to have been held in high estimation by Vespasian, as he was allowed to remain at Rome when the other philosophers were banished from the city. The time of his death is not mentioned, but he was not alive in the reign of Trajan, when Pliny speaks of his son-in-law Artemidorus. (Tac. Ann. xiv. 59, xv. 71, Hist. iii. 81, iv. 10, 40; Dion Cass. lxi. 27, lxvi. 13; Plin. Ep. iii. 11; Philostr. Vit. Apoll. iv. 35, 46, viii. 16; Theol. Orat. xiii. p. 175, ed. Hard.) The poet Rufus Festus Avienus was probably a descendant of Musonianus. [See Vol. i. p. 433, a.]

Musonianus wrote various philosophical works, which are spoken of by Suidas as λόγοι διδασκόντων φιλοσοφίας εξίμους. Besides these Suidas mentions letters of his to Apollonius Tyanaeus, which were extant. His opinions on philosophical subjects were also given in a work entitled, Αποκαλυπται Μούσουνιον τοῦ φιλοσοφοῦς, which Suidas attributes to Asinius Pollio of Tralles (v. πολίων), but which must have been the work of a later writer of this name, as Asinius Pollio was a contemporary of Pompey. [See Vol. iii. p. 439, b.] The work of Pollio seems to have been an imitation of the Memorabilia of Xenophon, and it was probably this work that Stobaeus (Floril. xxix. 78, lv. 18), A. Gellius (v. 1, ix. 2, xvi. 1), Arrian, and other writers made use of, when they quote the opinions of Musonianus. All the extant fragments of his writings and opinions are carefully collected by Peerlkamp, in the work referred to below.

RUFUS, NASIDIE'NUS. [NASIDENUS.]

RUFUS, Q. NUME'RIUS, tribune of the plebs b. c. 57, opposed Cicero's return from banishment, and is said to have been bought by the enemies of the orator. Cicero says that Numerus was in ridicule called Gracchus, and that in one of the tumults of that year he was very nearly put to death by his own party, that they might bring the odium of the deed upon the friends of Cicero. (Cic. Proc. Sec. 32, 38; Ascon. in Pis. p. 11, ed. Orelli; Schol. Rob. pro Sec. p. 30, ed. Orelli.)

RUFUS, NUMI'SIUS, a Roman legate, assisted Mummianus Lepercus in the defence of Vetrica Castra against Civilis, A. D. 69—70 [LUPERCUS], but before that camp was taken he had left it, and joined Voluta at Novesium, where he was made prisoner by Classicus and Tutor [CLASSICIUS; VOLUMA], and taken to Treviri, where he was afterwards put to death by Valentineus and Tutor [VALENTINUS]. (Tac. Hist. iv. 22, 55, 70, 77.)

RUFUS, OCTAVIUS, a contemporary of the younger Pliny and a poet, to whom Pliny addresses two of his letters (Ep. i. 7, ii. 10.)

RUFUS, PASSIE'NUS, consul b. c. 4, with C. Calvisius Sabinus (Monum. Anuy.), is probably the same as the Passienus who obtained the honour of the triumphal ornaments on account of his victories in Africa. (Vell. Pat. ii. 116.)

RUFUS, PETILIUS. One of the accused of Titius Sabinus in A. D. 28, because the latter had been a friend of Germanicus. Petilius had already been a praetor, and he undertook that accusation in hopes of gaining the consulship (Tac. Ann. vi. 68). The modern editions of Tacitus have Petilius, but we prefer the reading Petilus, as there was a consul of the name of Petilus Rufus in the reign of Domitian [No. 2].

2. Consul A. D. 83, with the emperor Domitian (Fasti.)

RUFUS, PINA'RIUS MAMERCINUS. [MAMERCINUS.]

RUFUS, PLAUTIUS, one of the conspirators against Augustus (Suet. Aug. 19). He is perhaps the same as the C. Plutius Rufus whose name occurs on the coins of Augustus as one of the triumvirs of the mint. (Eckhel, vol. v. p. 276.)

COIN OF C. PLOTIUS RUFUS.

RUFUS, POMPEIUS. [POMPEIUS, No. 6. 8, 9, 13.]
RUFLS.

RUFLS, M. POMPO'NlUS, one of the consular tribunes b.c. 399. (Liv. v. 13; Fasti Capit.)

RUFLS, POMPO'NlUS, mentioned by Pliny (Ep. iv. 9. § 3), as Pomponius Rufus Varenus. [Varendus.]

RUFLS, A. PUP'IUS, occurs on the coins of Cyrene, with the legend TAMlAC, from which it appears that he was quaeestor in the province. Most of the coins have on them POT'FOC, as well as HOT'TIOC, but the former name is omitted in the specimen annexed. (Eckhel, vol. iv. p. 126.)

COIN OF A. PUP'IUS RUFLS.

RUFLS, RUTI'LIUS. [Rutilius.]
RUFLS, SALVI'DIE/NUS. [Salvidienus.]
RUFLS, SAT'RIUS, a Roman orator, and a contemporary of the younger Pliny. (Plin. Ep. i. 5. § 11, ix. 13. § 17.)

RUFLS, SCRIBO'NlUS. [Proculus, Scribonius, No. 2.]

RUFLS, SEMPRO'NlUS. 1. C. SEMPRO'NUS RUFLS, a friend of Cicero, was accused by M. Tuccius in b.c. 51. Shortly before Caesar's death he had received some injury from Q. Cornificius, in consequence of which Rufus proposed a senatusconsultum after Caesar's death, which contained certain things to the prejudice of Cornificius. (Caes. ad Fam. viii. 8; Cic. ad Att. vi. 2. § 10, ad Fam. xii. 25, 29.) [Comp. Rufio.]

2. A friend of the younger Pliny, who addresses one of his letters to him. (Ep. iv. 22.)

3. An eunuch, and a Scythian by birth, had been guilty of various crimes, but possessed unbounded influence with the emperor Caracalla. (Dion Cass. lxxvii. 17.)

RUFLS, L. SE/RVlUS, a name which occurs only on coins, a specimen of which is annexed.

COIN OF L. SERVlUS RUFLS.

RUFLS, SEXTI'LIUS. 1. P., succeeded to the property of Q. Fadius Gallius in a dishonourable manner. (Cic. de Fusc. ii. 17.)

2. C., was quaesitor in Cyprus in b.c. 47, at which time Cicero wrote a letter to him, which is extant (ad Fam. xiii. 48). In the wars which followed the death of Caesar, Rufus joined the republican party and commanded the fleet of C. Cassius (ad Fam. xii. 13. § 4.)

RUFLS, SEXTUS. [Sextus Rufus.]

RUFLS, F. SYLllIUS, had been formerly the quaesitor of Germanicus, and having been convicted, in the reign of Tiberius, of receiving bribes in the discharge of his judicial duties, was sentenced by that emperor to be banished to an island. He was subsequently allowed to return to Rome, and gained great influence with the emperor Claudius, by whom he was promoted to the consulship in a.d. 46. But he prostituted his power and talents to base and unworthy purposes. He possessed considerable powers of oratory, but these were employed in bringing accusations against his wealthy contemporaries; and his services were only to be obtained by large sums of money. In the reign of Nero, a.d. 58, he was accused of various crimes, was condemned, and was banished to the Balearic islands (Tac. Ann. iv. 31, xi. 1, 4, 5, xiii. 42, 43). Suillius married the daughter of Ovid's third wife; and one of the poet's letters from Pontus is addressed to Suillius, in which he begs the latter to reconcile Germanicus to him (ex Pont. iv. 30). Suillius was also the half-brother of Domitius Corbulo, the celebrated general in the reign of Nerva, the son of their mother was Vestilia. (Plin. Hist. vii. 4. s. 5.)

RUFLS, SULPI'CIUS. [Sulpicius.]

RUFLS, TA'RlUS, was appointed, in a.d. 23, to succeed Atius Capito, in the important office of "curator aquarum publicarum," but was himself succeeded, in the following year, by M. Cocceius Nerva, the grandfather of the emperor (Pront. de Aquaeol. 102). He is probably the same as the L. Tarius Rufus who was consul successively in b.c. 16.

RUFLS, TI'TIUS, was put to death in the reign of Caligula, for saying that the senate thought differently from what it said. (Dion Cass. lxxix. 18.)

RUFLS, TREBBELlIUS, who had previously been praetor, was appointed by Tiberius, in a.d. 19, to govern Thrace on behalf of the children of Cotes. He put an end to his own life in a.d. 35. (Tac. Ann. ii. 67, iii. 38, vi. 39.)

RUFLS, VALGIIUS. [Valgius.]

RUFLS, VERGII/NUS, was consul for the first time in a.d. 63, with C. Memmius Regulus, and received afterwards the government of Germany. He commanded in this country in the last year of Nero's reign (a.d. 68), when Julius Vindex, the propraetor of Gaul, revolted from Nero, and offered the sovereignty to Galba, who was then in Spain. The soldiers of Rufus wished their own commander to assume the supreme power, but he steadily refused it himself, and would not allow any one else to obtain it, except the person upon whom it might be conferred by the senate. He accordingly marched against Vindex, who was defeated by him in a bloody battle, and put an end to his life. When the news of this disaster reached Galba, he was so alarmed that he was also on the point of destroying himself. The soldiers of Rufus were now more anxious than ever to raise him to the imperial dignity, and as he would not yield to their entreaties they proceeded to use threats, which he equally disregarded. Soon afterwards Nero perished, and Galba was recognised as emperor by the senate.

The new emperor, afraid of the intentions of Rufus, eagerly solicited him to accompany him to Rome; and Rufus, who had no wish for the sovereignty, complied with his request. Galba, however, still jealous of his fame with the German troops, conferred no mark of favour upon him; and this neglect of their former general gave no small umbrage to the soldiers who had served under him. On the death of Galba, Otho, anxious to conciliate the favour of the soldiers, raised Rufus to the consulship for the second time. Otho perished by his own hand soon afterwards, and the soldiers determined that Rufus should now, at all events, accept the empire. He remained, however, firm in his resolution; and when the soldiers blockaded him in his house, he escaped from them by a back-door. But this continued opposition to their desires almost proved his ruin. Thinking themselves insulted by him, they began to hate him as much as they had formerly loved him; and accordingly when he was accused of taking part in a conspiracy against Vitellius, they flocked to the emperor, and eagerly demanded the death of their former favourite. But Rufus escaped this peril, and lived for many years afterwards, honoured and beloved by all classes in the city. At length, in a.d. 97, when he was eighty-three years of age, the emperor Nerva made him consul for the third time, along with himself. During his consulship he broke his leg, and this accident occasioned his death. He was buried without public rites, and the paenugory over him was pronounced by Cornelius Tacitus, who was then consul. His praises were also celebrated by the younger Pliny, of whom he had formerly been the tutor or guardian, and who has preserved the epitaph which Rufus composed for his own tomb:

Hic situs est Rufus pulso qui Vindice quondam
Imperium adseruit non sibi sed patriae.

(Dion Cass. lixii. 24, 25, 27, lxiv. 4, lxvii. 2; Plut. Gall. 4, 6, 10; Tac. Hist. i. 8, 9, 77, ii. 49, 51, 68; Plin. Ep. ii. 1, v. 3, 8, vi. 10, ix. 19.)

The praenomen of Virginius Rufus is doubtful, as we find in inscriptions, in which his different consulsships are recorded, both Luctus and Titus. But since he is expressly stated to have been three times consul (Plin. Ep. ii. 1), it is more likely that there is an error in one of the inscriptions than that they refer to different persons. Some modern writers, indeed, assign a fourth consulship to him, but this opinion is untenantable. (See Tillemont, Histoire des Empereurs, vol. ii. p. 208, ed. Bruxelles.)

RUFUS, VIBIUS, lived in the reign of Tiberius, and prided himself on two things; namely, that he possessed the curule chair which the dictator Caesar was accustomed to use, and that he had married the widow of Cicero. But his boasting gave no offence, and he was raised by Tiberius to the consulship. His name, however, does not appear in the Fasti (Dion Cass. lxvii. 15). The widow of Cicero has been usually supposed to be Terentia, but Drummann has remarked, with justice, that it was far more likely Publilia, the second wife of Cicero (Geschichte Romes, vol. vi. p. 690). Vibius Rufus frequently appears as one of the declaimers in the Controversiae of the elder Seneca. (Contr. 2, 4, 5, 7—9, et alibi.)

RULLIA/NUS, or RULLUS, a surname of Q. Fabius Maximus. [MAXIMUS, FABRIUS, No. 1.]

RULLUS, P. SERVILIUS, tribune of the plebs, n. c. 63, proposed an agrarian law, which Cicero attacked in three orations which have come down to us. We know scarcely any thing of the family or the life of Rullus. Pliny relates that his father was the first Roman who brought a boar whole upon the table (II. N. viii. 51, n. 78), and Cicero describes the son as a debauchee (c. Rull.

i. 1). This agrarian law, called as usual after the name of its proposer the Servilia Lex, was the most extensive that had ever been brought forward. The execution of it was entrusted to ten commissioners (decemviri), whose election was to be conducted in the same manner as that of the pontifex maximus. Seventeen of the tribes were to be selected by lot, and nine of these were to give their votes in favour of each candidate. The ten commissioners thus elected were to have extraordinary powers. Their office was to last five years, and the imperium was to be conferred upon them by a lex curiata. They were authorised to sell all the lands out of Italy, which had become part of the public domain since the consulship of Sulla and Q. Pompeius (n. c. 88), with the exception of those which had been guaranteed by treaty to the Roman allies; and likewise all the public domains in Italy, with the exception of the Campanian and Stellatian districts, and of the lands which had been assigned by the state, or had been a possessor since the consulsip of Caio and the younger Marius (n. c. 82). The object of the latter enactment was to avert any opposition that might be made by the numerous persons who had received grants of public lands from Sulla. Further, all the proconsuls and other magistrates in the provinces, who had not yet paid into the treasury the monies which they had obtained from the booty of the enemy or in any other way, were commanded to give the whole of such monies to the decemvirs; but an exception was made in favour of Pompey, whom it was thought prudent to exempt from the operation of the law. All the sums thus received by the decemvirs, both from the sale of the public lands and from the Roman generals, were to be devoted by them to the purchase of lands in Italy, which were then to be assigned to the poor Roman citizens as their property. They were to settle a colony of 5000 citizens on the rich public lands in the Campanian and Stellatian districts, each of the colonists receiving ten jugera in the former and twelve in the latter district. These were the chief objects of the Servilia Lex, but it contained besides many other provisions relating to the public land. Thus for instance the decemvirs were authorised to decide, in all cases, whether the land belonged to the public domains or to a private person, and also to impose taxes on all the public lands which still remained in the hands of the possessors.

It is impossible to believe that Rullus would have ventured to bring forward this law without the sanction and approval of Caesar, who was then the leader of the popular party; but it is equally impossible to believe that Caesar could have desired or thought that it was practicable to carry such an unconstitutional and extravagant measure. It is not, however, difficult to divine the probable motives which actuated him in rendering it his support. Any advantage, however, to an agrarian law, was always unpopular among the lower classes at Rome. The aristocratical party, by resisting and defeating the proposition of Rullus, would be looked upon by the people with greater dislike than ever; and their disappointment in not obtaining the grants they had anticipated would render still more welcome an agrarian law proposed by Caesar himself. Besides this consideration, Caesar was probably anxious to unmask Cicero, who had risen to the consulship by favour of the people, but who now exhibited unequivocal signs of having deserted his former friends and united himself to the aristocracy. The latter would expect their new champion, as consul, to show the sincerity of his conversion by opposing the popular measure with all the powers of his oratory; and thus he would of necessity lose much of the influence which he still possessed with the people.

Rutilius entered upon his office with the other tribunes on the 10th of December, B. C. 64, and immediately brought forward his agrarian law, in order that the people might vote upon it in the following January. Cicero, who entered upon his consulship on the 1st of January, B. C. 63, lost no time in showing his zeal for his new party, and accordingly on the first day of the year opposed the law in the senate in the first of the orations which have come down to us. But as his eloquence did not deter Rutilius from persevering in his design, Cicero addressed the people a few days afterwards in the second of the speeches which are extant. Rutilius did not venture upon a public reply, but he spread the report that Cicero opposed the law in order to gratify those who had received grants of land from Sulla. To justify himself from this aspersion, Cicero again called the people together, and delivered the third oration which we have, in which he retorts the charge upon Rutilius, and shows that his law, far from depriving the Sullan colonists of their lands, expressly confirmed them in their possessions. Meantime the aristocracy had gained the tribune L. Caecilius Rutilus to put his veto upon the rotation, if it should be put to the vote; but there was no occasion for this last resort; for Rutilius, probably on the advice of Caesar, thought it more prudent to withdraw the measure altogether. (Drummann, Geschichte Romes, vol. iii. pp. 147—159.)

From this time the name of Rutilius does not occur again till B. C. 41, in which year we read of L. Servilius Rutilus as one of the generals of Octavian in the Parthian war (Dion Cass. xlviii. 29 ; Appian, B. C. v. 58). He may have been the same person as the tribune mentioned above, but was more probably his son.

RUMILIA, RUMINA, or RUMIA, are all connected with the old Latin word rumina, the breast, and are names for a divinity worshipped by the Romans as the protectress of infants (Varro. ap. Nonius, p. 167; Donat. ad Terr. Phorm. i. 1. 14; Plut. Romul. 4). The sacrifices offered to her and Cunina consisted of libations of milk, and not of wine. Ruminus, "the nourishing," was also a surname of Jupiter. (August. de Civ. Dei. vii. 11.) [L. S.]

RUMINA. [CURA.] RUNCINA was probably only a surname of Ops, by which he was invoked by the people of Italy, to prevent the growth of weeds among the corn, and promote the harvest. (August. de Civ. Dei. iv. 8; Arnob. iv. 7.) [L. S.]

Rupa, a freedman of C. Curio (Cic. ad Fam. ii. 3).

RUPILIA GENS, plebeian, is barely mentioned. It produced only one person of importance, namely, P. Rupilius, consul B. C. 132. None of the Rupii bear any surnames, and the name does not occur on coins. Instead of Rupilius, we frequently find the better known name of Rutilius in many editions of the ancient writers. Accordingly Giandorp, in his Omomasticon, does not admit the Rupili at all, but inserts all the persons of the name under Rutilius.

RUPILIIUS. P. RUPILIIUS, P. F. P. N., was consul B. C. 132 with C. Popilius Laenas, the year after the murder of Tiberius Gracchus. In conjunction with his colleague, he prosecuted with the utmost cruelty all the adherents and friends of the fallen tribune. In the same year he was sent into Sicily against the slaves, and brought the servile war to a conclusion, for which he obtained a triumph on his return to Rome. He remained in the island as proconsul in the following year, B. C. 131; and, with ten commissioners appointed by the senate, he made various regulations for the government of the province, which were known by the name of Lex Rupilia, though it was not a lex proper. (Vell. Pat. ii. 7; Cic. Lael. 11; Liv. Epit. 59; Oros. v. 9; Val. Max. iii. 7, vi. 9, 8, ix. 12, § 1; Cic. Verr. iii. 54, iv. 50, ad Atti. xiii. 32, Verr. ii. 13, 15, 16.) Rupilius was condemned, along with his colleague in the tribunate of C. Gracchus, B. C. 123, on account of his illegal and cruel acts in the prosecution of the friends of Tiberius Gracchus (Vell. Pat. l. c.). He was an intimate friend of Scipio Africanus the younger, who obtained the consulship for him, but who failed in gaining the same honour for his brother Lucius. He is said to have taken his brother's failure so much to heart as to have died in consequence; but as it probably happened about the same time as his own condemnation, the latter indignity may have had more share in causing his death. (Cic. Lael. 19, 20, 27, Tusc. iv. 17.)

3. RUPILIIUS, the brother of the preceding, already spoken of.

4. A. RUPILIIUS, a physician employed by Oppianus (Cic. pro Cluent. 63).

5. P. RUPILIIUS MENENIA, a Roman eques, the magister of the company of the publicani, who farmed the public revenues in Bithynia (Cic. ad Fam. xiii. 38, ed. Glandorp). C. RUPILIIUS, an artist in silver (argentarius) whose name occurs in a Latin inscription. (Reines. cl. xi. No. lxxxv. p. 639; R. Rachette, Lettre à M. Schors, p. 399, 2d ed.) [P. S.]

RUPIONS. [P. Rupius.]

RUS, M. AUFI DIUS, occurs only on coins, a specimen of which is annexed. On the obverse is a head of Pallas, and on the reverse Jupiter in a quadriga. Rus does not occur elsewhere as a cognomen, and it may therefore probably be a contraction of Rusticus. (Eckhel, vol. v. p. 147.)

COIN OF AUFI DIUS RUS.

RUSCA, PINA RIUS. [Porsca.]

RUSCIUS CAEPIO, a contemporary of Domitian (Suet. Dom. 9).

C. RUSIUS, an accuser mentioned by Cicero (Brut. 74).
RUSTICUS.

RUSO, ABU'DIUS, condemned and banished from Rome in the reign of Tiberius, A. D. 34 (Tac. Ann. vi. 30).

RUSO, CREMUTIUS, a friend of the younger Pliny (Ep. vi. 23).

RUSOR, a Roman divinity, was worshipped as one of the companions of Tellum (Tellus), though the name was probably nothing but an attribute of Tellum, by which it was personified the power of nature (the earth) of bringing forth to light the seeds entrusted to her (Varro, ap. August. de Civ. Del, vii. 23). Rusor seems to be a contraction for varior or revorror. [L.S.]

RUSTIANUS, PLAETORIUS. [PLAE- TORIUS RUSTICIUS 7.]

C. RUSTICEILLIUS FELIX, an African, and a maker of small figures, is known by his epitaph, which was found at Rieti, according to Fabretti (Inscr. p. 243, No. 669), or at Borghetto, near Orticolli, according to Gruter, who also gives the artist’s name in a different form, Tacidellius (Gruter, p. mxxxv. No. 3; Orelli, Inscr. Letr. Sol. No. 4279). It is remarkable that the inscription describes the artist as Sigillarius, which R. Rochette explains as derived from Sigillum, a word synonymous with sigillum; but perhaps it is only a mistake of the stone-cutter. (R. Rochette, Lettre à M. Schorn, p. 399, 2d ed.) [P. S.]

C. RUSTICELLUS, of Bononia, an orator of considerable skill mentioned by Cicero (Brut. 46).

RUSTICUS, a Roman architect of unknown age, who was a freedman of the imperial family, since he is designated Avg. L. on the sepulchral monument by which his name is known. (Spon, Miscellan. p. 225; R. Rochette, Lettre à M. Schorn, p. 400, 2d ed.)

RUSTICUS, to whom Pliny addresses one of his letters (Ep. ix. 29), is supposed by many commentators to be the son of the Antistius Rusticus mentioned below, but this is quite uncertain.

RUSTICUS, ANTI-STIU, perished in Cappadocia. The piety of his wife Nigrina is celebrated by Martial (ix. 31).

RUSTICUS ARULENIUS. [RUSTICUS, JUNIUS, No. 2.]

RUSTICUS, FABIUS, a Roman historian, quoted on several occasions by Tacitus, who couples his name with that of Livy ("Lives veterum, Fabius Rusticus recentium eloquentissimi auctores," Agr. 10). He was a contemporary of Claudius and Nero, but we know nothing of the extent of his work, except that it related at all events the history of the latter emperor. (Comp. Tac. Ann. xiii. 26, xiv. 2, xv. 61.)

RUSTICUS, JUNIUS. 1. JUNIUS RUSTI- CIUS, No. 7. in the reign of Tiberius, a. d. 29, to draw up the acta of the senate (Tac. Ann. v. 4).

2. L. JUNIUS ARULENIUS RUSTICUS, more usually called Arulenus Rusticus, but sometimes also Junius Rusticus. Lipsius, however, has shown that his full name was L. Junius Arulenus Rusticus (ad Tac. Agr. 45). Rusticus was a friend and pupil of Paetus Tarasae, and, like the latter, an ardent admirer of the Stoic philosophy. He was tribune of the plebs b. c. 66, in which year Tarasae was condemned to death by the senate; and he would have placed his veto upon the senatusconsultum, had not Thrasae prevented him, as he would only have brought certain destruction upon himself without saving the life of his master. He was praetor in the civil wars after the death of Nero, a. d. 69, and was subsequently put to death by Domitian, because he wrote a panegyric upon Thrasae. Suetonius attributes to him a panegyric upon Helvidius Priscus likewise; but the latter work was composed by Herennius Senecio, as we learn both from Tacitus and Pliny [Senecio]. (Tac. Ann. xvi. 25, Hist. iii. 80, Agr. 2; Suet. Dom. 10; Dion Cass. lxvii. 13; Plin. Ep. i. 5, 14, 11; Plut. de Car. p. 522, d.)

3. Q. JUNIUS RUSTICUS, probably a son of No. 2, was consul a. d. 119 with the emperor Hadrian (Fasti). He is supposed by many commentators to be the consul Junius, of whom Ju- venal speaks (Juv. xv. 27).

4. Q. JUNIUS RUSTICUS, probably a son of No. 3, and grandson of No. 2, was one of the teachers of the emperor M. Aurelius, and the most distinguished Stoic philosopher of his time. He received the greatest marks of honour from Aurelius, who constantly consulted him on all public and private matters, raised him twice to the consulship, and obtained from the senate after his death the erection of statues to his honour. His name, however, appears only once in the consular Fasti, namely, in a. d. 162. (Dion Cass. lxxi. 35; Capitol. M. Antonin. Phil. 3; Antonin. i. 7, with the note of Gataker.)

L. RUSTIUS, occurs on coins, a specimen of which is annexed. On the obverse is the head of Mars, and on the reverse a ram. The name of Q. Rustius is also found on coins (Eckhel, vol. v. pp. 297, 290). Rustius occurs in Plutarch as the name of one of the Roman officers who accompanied Crassus in his expedition against the Parthians (Plut. Crass. 52); and there is no occasion to change it into Rustius or any other name, as modern editors have proposed, since we have the decisive evidence of coins that Rustius was a Roman name. On the contrary, we are inclined, on the authority of these coins, to change Rustius in Cicero (Brut. 74), and Rusticius in Suetonius (Dom. 8), into Rustius. We also find a T. Rus- tius Nummius Gallus, one of the consules suffecti in a. d. 26.

RUTILIA.

RUTILIA, the mother of C. Cotta, the orator, accompanied him soon into exile in b. c. 91, and remained with him abroad till his return some years afterwards. [COTTA, No. 8.] She bore his death with the heroism of a genuine Roman matron. (Sen. Consol. ad Helv. 16; comp. Cic. ad Att. xii. 20, 22.)

RUTILIA GENS, plebeian. No persons of this name are mentioned till the second century before the Christian era; for instead of Sp. Rut- tilius Crassus, who occurs in many editions of Livy (iv. 47) as one of the tribunes of the plebs in b. c. 417, we ought undoubtedly to read Sp. Vettiius Crassus. (See Alscheiske, ad Lio. l. c.) The first member of the gens who obtained the consulship was P. Rutilius Lupus, who perished during his consulship, b.c. 90, in the Social war. Under the republic the Rutilii appear with the cognomens CALVUS, LUPUS, and RUFUS; but in the imperial period we find several other surnames, of which a list is given below. The persons of this name who are mentioned without a cognomen are spoken of under RUTILIUS, under which head the Rutilii with the cognomens of Calvus and Rufus are also given. The only coins of this gens extant bear on them the cognomen FLAVIUS, which does not occur in writers. [Flaccus, p. 157, a.]

RUTILIUS. 1. P. RUTILIUS, tribune of the plebs, b.c. 169, opposed the cowards of that year in the execution of one of their orders, and was in consequence removed by them from his tribe, and reduced to the condition of an aerarian. (Liv. xiii. 16, xiv. 16.)

2. P. RUTILIUS CALVUS, praetor b.c. 166. (Liv. xiv. 44.)

3. P. RUTILIUS, tribune of the plebs, b.c. 136, commanded Hostilius Mancinus to leave the senate, on the ground that he had lost his citizenship by having been surrendered to the Numantines. (Cic. de Or. i. 40.) [Comp. Mancinus, No. 3.]

4. P. RUTILIUS RUFUS, consul b.c. 105, celebrated as an orator and an historian. See below.

5. C. RUTILIUS RUFUS, probably a brother of the preceding, undersigned the accusation of P. Lentulus of Acerrae against M. Aquillius, about b.c. 126. This C. Rutilius was, like Publicius, a friend of Scaevola. (Cic. Div. in Caecil. 21, Brut. 40.)

6. RUTILIUS, an officer in the army of Sulla in Asia, was sent by the latter to Firmia, when he solicited an interview in b.c. 84. (Appian, Mithr. 60.) [Firmilia, No. 1.]

7. C. RUTILIUS, accused by C. Rucius and defended by Sicenna. (Cic. Brut. 74.)

8. P. RUTILIUS, a witness in the case of Cae cina. (Cic. pro Caecon. 10.)

9. P. RUTILIUS, employed by Caesar in assigning grants of land to his veterans, b.c. 45. (Cic. ad Fam. xiii. 8.)

RUTILIUS GALILLICUS, praefectus urbi under Domitian. (Juv. xiii. 157; Stat. Silv. i. 4.)

RUTILIUS GERMINUS, a Latin writer of uncertain age, was the author of a tragedy called "Asyntanax," and of "Libri Pontificales," according to the suspicious testimony of the grammarians Furniatus and Plaucideus. (Both, Proe. Lat. Scen. Fragm. p. 270.)

RUTILIUS LUPUS. [Lupes.]

RUTILIUS MA'XIMUS. [Maximus.]

RUTILIUS NUMATIANUS, CLAU
dius, a Roman poet, and a native of Gaul, lived at the beginning of the fifth century of the Christian era. He resided at Rome a considerable time, where he attained the high dignity of praefectus urbi, probably about a.d. 413 or 414. He returned, however, to his native country after it had been laid waste by the barbarians of the north, and appears to have passed there the remainder of his life in peace. His re turn to Gaul he described in an elegiac poem, which bears the title of Itinerarium, or De Reitilia, but which Wernsdorf thinks may have been ent titled originally Rutilii de Reitilia surn Itinerarium. Of this poem the first book, consisting of 644 lines, and a small portion of the second, have come down to us. It appears from internal evidence (i. 133) that it was composed in a.d. 417, in the reign of Honorius. It is superior both in poetical colouring and purity of language to most of the productions of the age; and the passage in which he celebrates the praises of Rome is not unworthy of the pen of Claudian. Rutilius was a heathen, and attacks the Jews and monks with no small severity.

The edition princeps of the poem was printed at Bologna (Bononia) in 1529, 4to., with a dedication to Leo X. The work has since been frequently reprinted, and is appearing in its best form in the edition of A. W. Zumpt, Berlin, 1840. The other editions most worthy of mention are by Kappius, Erlen. 1786; by Gruber, Nürnberg, 1804; and in the Poetae Latinini Minores, edited by Burmann, vol. ii.; and by Wernsdorf, vol. v. pt. 1. The latter writer, in his Prolegomena, discusses at great length every point respecting the life and poem of Rutilius.

RUTILIUS, PALLADIUS, or, with his full name, Palladius Rutilius Taurus Aemilianus, the writer on agriculture, is spoken of under PAL diUS.

P. RUTILIUS RUFUS, a Roman statesman and orator. He was a military tribune under Scipio in the Numantine war, was praetor b.c. 111, was consul b.c. 103, having been defeated when he first stood for the office in b.c. 107, and in b.c. 95 was legatus under Q. Mucius Scaevola, proconsul of Asia. While acting in this capacity he displayed so much honesty and firmness in repressing the extortions of the publicani, that he became an object of fear and hatred to the whole body. Accordingly, on his return to Rome, he was impeached, by a certain Apicius, of malversation (de repetundis), found guilty, and compelled to withdraw into banishment b.c. 92. Cicero (pro Font. 18, Brut. 30), Livy (Epit. lib. lx.), Velleius (ii. 13), and Valerius Maximus (ii. 10. § 5), agree in asserting that Rutilius was a man of the most spotless integrity, and in representing his condemnation as the result of a foul and unprincipled conspiracy on the part of the equestrian order, who not only farmed the public revenues, but at that period enjoyed also the exclusive privilege of acting as judges upon criminal trials. He retired first to Mytilene, and from thence to Smyrna, where he fixed his abode, and passed the remainder of his days in tranquillity, having refused to return to Rome, although recalled by Sulla. (Senec. de Benef. vi. 37; comp. Cic. Brut. 22, pro Balb. 11; Ov. ex Ponto, i. 3. 63; Sucton. de Ill. Gramm. 6; Oros. v. 17.)

The orations of Rutilius were of a stern, harsh caste (tristi ac severe genere), containing much valuable matter upon civil law, but dry and meagre (fianace) in form, and imbued with the keen but cold character of the Stoical philosophy, in which their author was deeply versed. He is classed in the Bruttus (c. 29) along with Scaurus, both being described as men of much industry, extensive practice, and good abilities, but destitute of or torical talent of a high order. They were twice fairly pitted against each other, for Rutilius, when defeated in his suit for the consularship, impeached Scaurus, his successful competitor, of bribery, and Scaurus, being acquitted, in turn charged his accuser with the same offence. We are acquainted with the titles of seven speeches by Rutilius, but of these scarcely a word has been preserved.

1. Adversus Scaurum. 2. Pro se contra Scourum. Both delivered b.c. 107 (Cic. Brut. 30, RUTILUS.

3. Pro lege tua de tribunis militibus, delivered when consul, b.c. 105. (See Fest. s. v. Rufili tribuni.) 4. De modo aedificiorum. On setting bounds to the extravagance displayed in rearing sumptuous dwellings. Probably delivered in his consulship. (Suet. Aug. 89.) 5. Pro L. Caecucio ad populum. Time and subject unknown. 6. Pro se contra publicanos. Delivered b.c. 93 or 92. 7. Oratio fita ad Mithridatem regem (Plut. Pomp. 57). He wrote also an autobiography in five books at least (Tac. Agric. 1), quoted by Charisius (pp. 96, 100, 105, 112, 119, 176, ed. Putsch), by Diodores (pp. 371, 372), and by Isidorus (Orig. xxii. 11); and a history of Rome, Greek, Latin, and Roman, which was published under the account of the Numantine war, in which he had served; but we know not what period it embraced. (In addition to the authorities quoted above see likewise Athen. iv. p. 168, vi. p. 274, xii. p. 543; Plut. Mor. 28; Liv. xxxix. 52; Macrobi. Sat. i. 16; Pinn. H. RUTILUS, CORNELIUS COSsus. [Cos., No. 7.]

RUTILUS, HOSTILYUS, praefect of the camp in the army of Drusus in Germany, b.c. 11. (Obsequ. 132.)

RUTILUS, C. MARCIUS, L. F. C. N., one of the distinguished plebeians, who obtained the highest offices of the state soon after the enactment of the Lex Licinian law. He was consul for the first time in b.c. 337 with Cn. Manlius Capitolinus, and carried on the war against the inhabitants of Prinernum. He took the town, and obtained a triumph in consequence. In the following year, b.c. 336, he was appointed dictator in order to carry on the war against the Etruscans. This was the first time that a plebeian had attained this dignity; and the patricians were so indignant at what they chose to regard as a desecration of the office, that, notwithstanding the public danger, they threw every obstacle in the way of the preparations for the war. The people, however, eagerly supplied Rufius with every thing that was needed, and enabled him to take the field with a well appointed army. Their expectations of success were fully realised. The plebeian dictator defeated the Etruscans with great slaughter; but as the senate refused him a triumph, notwithstanding his brilliant victory, he celebrated one by command of the people. In b.c. 352 he obtained the consulsiph a second time with P. Valerius Publicola; and in the following year, b.c. 351, he was the first plebeian censor. He was consul for the third time in b.c. 344 with T. Manlius Torquatus, and for the fourth time in b.c. 342 with Q. Servilius Ahala. In the latter year, which was the second of the Samnite war, Rufius was stationed in Campania, and there discovered a formidable conspiracy among the Roman troops, which he quelled before it broke out by his wise and prudent measures. (Liv. vii. 16, 17, 21, 22, 23, 38, 39.) The son of this Rufius took the surname of Censorinus, which in the next generation entirely supplantcd that of Rufitus, and became the name of the family. [Censorinus.]

RUTILUS, NAUTIUS. 1. SP. NAUTIUS Rufitus, is first mentioned by Dionysius in b.c. 493, as one of the most distinguished of the younger patricians at the time of the secession of the plebeians to the Sacred Mount. He was consul in b.c. 488 with Sex. Furius Medullinus Fuscus, in which year Coriolanus marched against Rome. (Dionys. vi. 69, viii. 16, &c.; Liv. ii. 39.)

2. C. NAUTIUS SP. F. SP. N. RUTILUS, probably brother of No. 1, was consul for the first time b.c. 475, with P. Valerius Publicola, and laid waste the territory of the Volsciains, but was unable to bring them to a battle. He was consul a second time in b.c. 458, with L. Mummius Augustus. While Rufitus carried on the war with success against the Sabines, his colleague Mummius was defeated by the Aequians; and Rufitus had to return to Rome to appoint L. Quintius Cincinnatus dictator. (Liv. ii. 52, iii. 25, 26, 29; Dionys. ix. 28, 35, x. 22, 23, 25.)

3. SP. NAUTIUS RUTILUS, consul tribune, b.c. 424. (Liv. iv. 35.)

4. SP. NAUTIUS SP. F. SP. N. RUTILUS, three times consul tribune, namely in b.c. 419, 416, 404. Livy says that Rufitus held the office a second time in 404, but the Capitoline Fasti make it a third time; and this is more consistent with Livy's own account, who had mentioned previously two tribunates of Rufitus. (Liv. iv. 44, 47, 61; Fasti Capitol.)

5. C. NAUTIUS RUTILUS, consul b.c. 411, with M. Papirius Mugillanus. (Liv. iv. 52.)

6. SP. NAUTIUS SP. F. SP. N. RUTILUS, consul b.c. 316 with M. Popillius Laenas. (Liv. ix. 21; Fasti Capitol.)

7. SP. NAUTIUS (RUTILUS), an officer in the army of the consul L. Papirius Cursor, b.c. 293, distinguished himself greatly in the battle against the Sammites, and was rewarded in consequence by the consul. (Liv. x. 41, 44.)

8. C. NAUTIUS RUTILUS, consul b.c. 287 with M. Claudius Marcellus. (Fasti.)

RUTILUS SEMPRONIUS. 1. C. SEMPRONIUS RUTILUS, tribune of the plebs b.c. 169, joined his colleague P. SemproniusGraceus in a public prosecution of M'. Acilius Glabrio. (Liv. xxxvii. 57.)

2. SEMPRONIUS RUTILUS, one of Caesar's legates in Gaul. (Caes. B. G. vii. 90.)

RUTILUS, VIRGILIUS TRICOSTUS. [Tricostus.]

SABA or SABAS (Σαβας), a celebrated Greek ecclesiastic of the fifth century. He was a native of Mutulasa, a village in Cappadocia, where he was born, as his biographer, Cyril of Scythopolis, records, in the seventeenth consulship of the emperor Theodosius II., a.d. 439. His parents, named Joannes and Sophia, were Christians, and persons of rank. His father being engaged in military service at Alexandria, he was left at Mutulasa, under the care of Hermes, his maternal uncle; but the depraved character of his uncle's wife led to his removal and his being placed under the care of another uncle, Gregorius, his father's brother, who resided in the village of Scandus, in the same neighbourhood. His two uncles having a dispute about the guardianship of the boy, and the management of his absent father's property, he was placed in a monastery, called Flavianae, about twenty miles from Mutalaesa, where he was trained up in the strictness of monastic observance, to which he so heartily devoted himself, that when, upon his uncle's reconciliation, he was invited to leave the monastery and take the charge of his father's property, he refused, quoting the declaration of Jesus Christ, that "no man putting his hand to the plough, and looking back, is fit for the Kingdom of Heaven." His biographer, Cyril represents his removal to his uncle Gregory's house, and afterwards to the monastery, as his own acts, which, from his tender age (he being only five years old at his father's departure), is hardly probable, though it may have been the consequence of his own wish. In the monastery of Flavianae he spent ten years. When in his eighteenth year Saba was seized with the desire of visiting Jerusalem, and of leading a solitary life in the wilderness near that city; and having obtained permission, though with difficulty, from his archimandrite or abbot, he set out and reached Jerusalem in a.d. 457, toward the close of the reign of the Eastern emperor Marcianus. After rejecting the invitations of several monastic communities to settle among them, he withdrew to the wilderness east of the city, and would have placed himself in the monastery of which Euthymius, the most eminent of the monks of Palestine, was the abbot; but Euthymius rejected him, as too young, and recommended him to the care of another abbot, Theoctistus, to be by him further trained in monastic severities. While under the care of Theoctistus, he was allowed to accompany one of the monks who had private business at Alexandria; and in that city he was recognised by his parents, who appear to have been strangely ignorant, if not regardless of their child. They would have had him engage in military service, in which his father, who had assumed the name of Conon, had risen to an important command. Saba, as might have been expected, refused to comply with their wishes, and returned to his monastery. After a time he accompanied Euthymius into the wilderness of Ruba, near the Jordan, and then into the wilderness south of the Dead Sea, and appears to have been present with him at his death, in or about a.d. 572. After the death of this eminent person, Saba withdrew altogether from his monastery into the wilderness near the Jordan; and from thence removed to a cave near "the brook that flows from the fountain of Siloam," where in his forty-fifth year (a.d. 483 or 484) he began to form a community from those who now resorted to him, and founded the "Laura" or monastery, known afterwards as Magna Laura, the inmates of which soon amounted to a hundred and fifty. In his fifty-third year, a.d. 491 or 492 (Cyrill. Scythop. Sabae Vita, c. 19), not his forty-fifth, as Cave affirms, he received ordination as presbyter. He was the founder of some other monastic societies beside that of Magna Laura; and was appointed by the Patriarch of Jerusalem archimandrite of the anarchists of Palestine. But the peace of these societies was disturbed by the seditions proceeding from some of them, and by the disputes occasioned by the revival and progress of Origenistic and other opinions [Origenes] regarded by Saba as heretical. In his seventy-third year (a.d. 512) Saba was sent, with some other heads of the anchorites of Palestine, by Elias I, patriarch of Jerusalem, to avert the displeasure of the Eastern emperor Anastasius, who, in consequence of the great monophysite schism, was at variance with the patriarch. The great reputation of Saba secured for him a gracious reception at court, and several gifts and favours from the emperor; the gold he distributed among the monasteries of which he was the founder or the virtual superior. His interposition, however, did not avert the imperial patronage from the Monophysites, or prevent an ultimatum and deposition (a.d. 513) of the patriarch Elias, who strenuously opposed them. Saba, who supported the same party (that of the Council of Chalcedon) as Elias, in conjunction with Theodosius, another eminent archimandrite of Palestine, superior of the Coenobites, persuaded Joannes, the successor of Elias, to break the engagement to support the Monophysite party, which had been the condition of his elevation: they also supported him in defying the imperial mandate. For this contumacy, Joannes, Saba, and Theodosius, would probably all have suffered banishment, had not the troubles excited by Vitalianus the Goth (a.d. 514) diverted the emperor's attention. [Anastasius I.] In a.d. 518, Saba, now in his eightieth year, visited the ex-patriarch Elias, in his place of exile, Aiia, the modern Akaba, at the head of the gulf of Akaba, an arm of the Red Sea. Soon after this, the accession of Justinianus I., who had overthrown the ascendency of the Monophysites, Saba was sent by the patriarch Joannes, to publish in the cities of Palestine the imperial letter, recognizing the Council of Chalcedon. In his ninety-first year (a.d. 529 or 530) he undertook another journey to Constantinople, where he obtained from Justinianus I., now emperor [Justinianus I.], a remission of taxes for Palestine, in consideration of the ravages occasioned by a revolt of the Samaritans, an incident worthy of notice, as furnishing one of the few links in the obscure history of that remarkable people. He received also many gifts for his monasteries. Saba died in his monastery, the Magna Laura (a.d. 532), in his ninety-fourth year. Saba was a man of great energy. He acted an important part in that turbid period of ecclesiastical history, and fearlessly threw himself into the agitation arising from the great Monophysite schism; nor does age seem either to have diminished his ardour or restricted his exertions. Early in the seventeenth century (a.d. 1603, also in 1613 and 1643) there was printed at Venice, in folio, an office book, or Liturgy of the Greek Church, entitled, Τυπίκον τον θεοβίο την παμφιείν πανάν την διαταυς της ἑκκλησιαστικῆς ἀκολουθίας τοῦ χρόνου ήλιον, Typicum, fonte Deo, continuus Ingressum Officii Ecclesiastici Ordinum per totum Annum. It is a compilation, the first work in which is described by Cave as, "Typicum τῆς ἑκκλησιαστικῆς ἀκολουθίας, Sanctae Laurae in Hieropolinum, quod et ad utile Monastiris Hierosolimitanae aliisque Ecclesiae orienti ex Proserscripto S. Sabae Capite iuxta complacem." [Hist. Lit. Desert. Secunda de Libris Eccles. Graecor.-This Typicum elsewhere describes as written by S. Saba, and used in all the monasteries of Jerusalem; and states that having been corrupted and almost lost in the various invasions and disturbances of Palestine, it was restored by Joannes Damascus. But Oudin considers that the work is at any rate much interpolated, and that it probably is not the work of Saba.
All; but has received his name, because conformed to the usage of his monastery. His supposition that the Typhon was a forgery of Marcus, surnamed Harmatolus (Pecator, the Sinner), is improbable [Marcus, No. 16]. The title of the work in Greek, as given in a Vienna MS. cited by Oudin, \\n

There were some other persons of the name of Saba (Phot. Biblioth. cod. 52; Fabric. l.c.), but they do not require notice. [J. C. M.]

SABACON (Sabaecys), a Persian, was satrap of Egypt under Dareius III., and was slain at the battle of Issus, in B.C. 333 (Arr. Anab. ii. 11; Curt. iii. 8, iv. 1). The name is otherwise written Sataces and Sathaces, and it occurs as Tasiaces in Diod. xvi. 34, according to the common reading. (Wess. ad loc.; Freimsh. ad Curt. ii. cc.; E. E.)

SABACON (Sabacon), a king of Ethiopia, who invaded Egypt in the reign of the blind king Any- sis, whom he dethroned and drove into the marshes. The Ethiopian conqueror then reigned over Egypt for 50 years, but at length quitted the country in consequence of a dream, whereupon Anyss regained his kingdom. This is the account which Herodotus received from the priests (ii. 137—140; comp. Diod. i. 65); but it appears from Manetho, that there were three Ethiopian kings who reigned over Egypt, named Sabacon, Scibichus, and Taracus, and who form the twenty-fifth dynasty of that writer. According to his account Sabacon reigned eight years, Scibichus fourteen, and Taracus eighteen; or, according to the conjecture of Bunsen, twenty-eight; their collective reigns being thus 40 or 50 years. The account of Manetho, which is in itself more probable than that of Herodotus, is also confirmed by the fact that Taracus is mentioned by Isaiah (xxxvii. 9), under the name of Tirhakah. The time at which this dynasty of Ethiopian kings governed Egypt has occasioned some dispute, in consequence of the statement of Herodotus (ii. 140), that it was more than 700 years from the time of Anyss to that of Amyrtasus. Now as Amyrtasus reigned over Egypt about B.C. 455, it would follow from this account of Manetho that the acquisition of the Ethiopians took place about B.C. 1150. But this high date is not only in opposition to the statements of all other writers, but is at variance with the narrative of Herodotus himself, who says that Psammitichus fled into Syria when his father Necho was put to death by Sabacon (ii. 152), and who represents Sabacon as followed in close succession by Sethon, Sethon by the Dodecarchia and Psammitichus, the latter of whom began to reign about B.C. 671. There is, therefore, probably some corruption in the numbers in the passage of Herodotus. There can be little doubt that the Ethiopian dynasty reigned over Egypt in the latter half of the eighth century before the Christian era. They are mentioned in the Jewish records. The Soi, king of Egypt, with whom Hosen, king of Israel, made an alliance about B.C. 722 (2 Kings, xvii. 4), was in all probability the same as the second king of the dynasty, Sebicbus*; and the Tirhakah, king of the Ethiopians, who was preparing to make war against Sennacherib, in B.C. 711 (Is. xxxvii. 9), is evidently the same as the Taracus of Manetho, as has been already remarked. Herodotus speaks of Sethon as king of Egypt at the time of Sennacherib's invasion [SETHON]; but it is evident that the Ethiopian dynasty must have ruled at least over Upper Egypt at this time, for we can hardly refer the statement of Isaiah to an Ethiopian king at Memoe.

The name of Sabacon is not found on monuments, as Lepsius has shown, though the contrary is stated by most modern writers. We find, however, on monuments, the name of Shebek and Tbrak. Shebek is the Sebicbus of Manetho, and Bunsen has conjectured, with some probability, that the two first kings of the dynasty both bore this name, and that Manetho only gave the name of Sabacon to the first, as it was so well known through the history of Herodotus. Sabacon and Sebicbus, however, bear so great a resemblance to one another, that they are probably merely different forms of the same name. (Bunsen, Aegypten Stelle in der Weltgeschichte, vol. iii. pp. 137, 138.)

SABAZIOUS (Sabaistros), a Phrygian divinity, commonly described as a son of Rhea or Cybele; but in later times he was identified with the mystic Dionysus, who is sometimes called Dionysus Sabazius. (Aristoph. Av. 673; Hesych. s. v.) For the same reason Sabazius is called a son of Zeus by Persephone, and is said to have been reared by nymphs at Eleusis. Though other than philosophical speculations, were led to consider him a son of Cabeirus, Dionysus, or Cronos. He was torn by the Titans into seven pieces. (Jean. Lydus, De Mens. p. 82; Orph. Fragm. viii. 46, p. 469, ed. Herm., Hymn. 47; Cic. de Nat. Deor. iii. 23.)

The connection of Sabazius with the Phrygian mother of the gods accounts for the fact that he was identified, to a certain extent, with Zeus himself, who is mentioned as Zeus Sabazius, both Zeus and Dionysus having been brought up by Cybele or Rhea. (Val. Max. i. 3. § 4.) His worship and festivals (Sabazia) were also introduced into Greece; but, at least in the time of Demostenes, it was not thought reputable to take part in them, for they were celebrated at night by both sexes with purifications, initiations, and immorality. (Diod. iv. 4; Demosth. de Coron. p. 313; Strab. x. p. 471; Aristoph. Vesp. 9, Lystr. 369.) Serpents, which were sacred to him, acted a prominent part at the Sabazia and in the pro- cessions (Clemens Alex. Prolog. p. 6; Theophrast. Char. 16); the god himself was represented with horns, because, it is said, he was the first that yoked oxen to the plough for agriculture. (Diod. iv. 4.)

L. SABELLIUS, accused by L. Caesilinus.

(Cic. Brut. 34.)

SABELLIUS, an heresiarcb of the third century.

Of this man, who has given name to one of the most enduring modifications of belief in the Christian Church, hardly anything is known. Phila

istrinus (De Haeres. c. 26) and Aserius of Amasia

e (apud Phot. Bibl. cod. 271), call him a Libyan, and Theodoret repeats the statement, with the addition that he was a native of the Libyan Pentapolis (Hauretac. Fulal. Compend. lib. ii. 9). Dionysius of Alexandria (apud Euseb. H. E. vii. 6) speaks of the Sabellian doctrine as originating in the Pentopolitan Ptolemais, of which town, therefore, we may conclude that Sabellius was a resident, if not a native. Timotheus, the presbyter of Con stantinople, in his work De Triplici Receptione Haereticorum (apud Cotler. Eccles. Graec. Monum. vol. iii. p. 365), distinguishes Sabellius the Libyan from Sabellius of the Pentapolis, but without reason: and his inaccuracy in this respect throws doubt on his unsupported assertion that Sabellius was the bishop of the Pentapolis. Abalaphargius (Hist. Dynamast. p. 81, vers. Pocock) calls him a presbyter of Byzantium, and places him in the Church of Egypt in Voltaus and Theodoret (ibid. p. 252, 253). That he was of Byzantium is confirmed by all other accounts; but the date assigned is sufficiently in accordance with other authorities to be received. Phila istrinus (ibid.) calls him a disciple of Noetus, but it does not appear that this means anything more than that he embraced views similar to those of Noetus, who was of Asia Minor; either of Smyrna (Theodoret. ibid. iii. 3) or of Ephesus (Epiph. Haeres. vii.), and flourished about the middle of the third century. When Sabellius broached his doctrines they excited great commotions among the Christians of the Pentapolis; and both parties appealed to Dionysius of Alexandria, and endeavoured to secure him to their side. Dionysius wrote letters to them, which are not extant. There can be no doubt that he embraced the side of the opponents of Sabellianism, which he brands as "an impious and very blasphemous dogma;" but it does not appear that he wrote to Sabellius himself, nor do we even know whether Sabellius was then living (Basil. H. E. vii. 6). From the manner in which Athanasius (Epistol. de Sententia Dionysii. c. 5) relates the matter, Dionysius was not engaged in controversy with Sabellius himself, but with some bishops of his party; from which it is not improbable that Sabellius was already dead. The intervention of Dionysius is placed by Tillemont in a.d. 257, and by the Benedictine editors of Athanasius (l.c.) in a.d. 263. Indeed it is proba ble, from the scanty notices we have of Sabellius, that his heresy was not broached till just before his death. His opinions were widely diffused, and Epiphanius (Haeres. lix.) found many who held them both in the East and West, in the plains of Mesopotamia, and in the busy population of Rome.

The characteristic dogma of Sabellius related to the Divine Nature, in which he conceived that there was only one hypostasis or person identifying with each other the Father, the Son, and the Spirit, "so that in one hypostasis there are three designations," εἰς ἐνα καὶ υἱος τρεῖς ἑπιστάσεις (Epiph. Haeres. lix. 1). Epiphanius further illustrates the Sabellian hypostasis by comparing it to the union of body, soul, and spirit, in man, "so that the Father, so to speak, was the body, the Son the soul, and the Spirit the spirit, of man." He appears not to give this as an illustration of his own, but as one employed by the Sabellians themselves, who also compared the Deity to the Sun, "which is one hypostasis, but has three operations (ὑποστάσεις):—that of imparting light (τὸ φωτιστικόν), which the Father gives to the Son; of imparting warmth (τὸ Θάλασσαν), which they compared to the Spirit; and its orbicular form, the form of its whole substance (τὸ ἑδον ὑποστάσεως), which they compared to the Father. And that the Son has been once on a time (κατὰ ποτέ) sent forth as a ray, and having wrought in the world all things needful to the Gospel economy and the salvation of men, had been received up again into heaven, like a ray emitted from the sun, and returning again to the sun. And that the Holy Spirit is sent into the world successively and severally to each one who is worthy (καὶ καθὲς καὶ καθ' ἑκάστως εἰς ἑκα stὸν τῶν καταζωοῦντων), to impart to such a one a new birth and fervour (μοιράζοντες δὲ τὸν τοιοῦτον καὶ ἀναβίων), and to cherish and warm him, so to speak, by the power and co-operation (συμβολὰς) of the Holy Spirit" (ibid.). According to Basil (Ep. 214), Sabellius spoke of persons of God, as if there were only the sense of characters or representations—"that God was one in hypostasis, but was represented in Scripture under different persons;" έν μὲν εἶναι τῇ ὑποσ tάσει τοῦ Θεοῦ, προσωποποιηθεῖσα δὲ τῇ τοῦ θεοῦ γορφῇ διάφορως. Epiphanius charges them with deriving their opinions from Apocryphal writings, and especially from the spurious Gospel of the Egyptians; and Neander (Church Hist. by Rose, vol. ii. p. 276) thinks this statement is by no means to be rejected. However this may be (and we think the authority of Epiphanius in such a case of little moment), their main reliance in argument was upon passages in the Canonical Scrip tures, especially on that in Deut. vii. 4, "Hear O Israel, the Lord thy God is one Lord," and on Ex. xx. 3, Is. xiv. 6, John, x. 30, 36, and xiv. 10. They dwelt also on the obvious difficulties in the popular view of the Godhead, asking the simpler and less-informed believers, "What shall we say then, have we one God or three?" And thus says Epiphanius, they led the perturbed Christian "unconsciously to deny God, that is, unconsciously to deny the existence of the Son and the Holy Spirit." It is evident, however, that this denial was only the denial of their existence as distinct hypostases from the Father. The heresy of Sa bellius approximated very nearly to that of Noetus, so that Augustin wonders that Epiphanius should have distinguished the Sabellian heresy from the Noetian: but Sabellius did not affirm that the Father suffered, though the name of Pariappassions was given to his followers (Athanas. De Symolos. c. 7; Augustin, De Haeres. xii.): and Mosheim has well observed that Sabellius did not, like Noetus, hold that the divine hypostasis was absolutely one, and that it was assumed and united to itself the human nature of Christ; but contended that "a certain energy (vivium) emitted from the Father of all, or, if you choose, a part of the person and nature of the Father, was united to the man Christ." (Basil, Epistol. 210, 214, ed. Benedictin, 64, 349, edit. prior.; comp. Epiph. l.c.; Augustin, De Haeres, s. l.)

From the manner in which Athanasius argues against the Sabellians (Orat. contra Arianos, c. 11, 29), it appears that they considered the emission of the divine energy, the Son, to have been antecedent to creation, and needful to effect it: "That we might be created the Word proceeded forth, and from his proceeding forth we exist" (τον Ἰησοῦν κτισθέντος πρὸ γὰρ ἐν ζωή καὶ προελθόντος αὐτῷ ζωῆς), is the form in which Athanasius (c. 25) stands in the doctrine of the Sabellians. The return of the Son into the Father appears also to have been regarded as subsequent to the consummation of all things (comp. Greg. Thaumaturgi Epist., apud Mai, and therefore as yet to come. Neander (l. c.)

says that Sabellius considered "human souls to be a revelation or partial out-beaming of the divine

Logos," but gives no authority for the statement.

SABICCTAS. [ABSTAMMENES.]

SABI'A, the wife of the emperor Hadrian was the grand-niece of Trajan, being the daughter of Matidia, who was the daughter of Marcus, the sister of Trajan. Sabina was married to Hadrian about A.D. 100 through the influence of Plotina, the wife of Trajan, but not with the full approbation of the latter. The marriage did not prove a happy one. Hadrian complained of his wife's temper, and said that he would have divorced her if he had been in a private station; while she used to boast that she had taken care not to pro-gate the race of such a tyrant. But, although Hadrian treated her almost like a slave, he would not allow others to fall in their respect towards the empress; and, accordingly, when Septicius Clarus, the prefect of the praetorian cohorts, Suetonius

Tranquillus, and many other high officers, at the court behaved with respect to her during the expedition into Britain, Hadrian dismissed them all from their employments. Worn out by his ill-treatment

Sabina at length put an end to her life. There was a report that she had even been poisoned by her husband. Spartanus speaks as if she had died about two years before Hadrian, and it appears from a coin of Amias, that she was alive in A.D.

136. Tillemont supposes that she did not die till after the adoption of Antoninus, since the latter calls her his mother in an inscription. This, however, is scarcely sufficient evidence. Antoninus was adopted in February, A.D. 138, and Hadrian died in July in the same year. (Spartian, Hadr. 1, 2, 11, 23; Aurel. Vict. Epit. 14.) Sabina was honoured with the title of Augusta, as appears from her medals. She received her title at the same time as Hadrian was called Pater Patr[iae]. (Oros. vii. 13.)

Orosius supposes that this took place at the beginning of the reign of Hadrian, but Eckhel has shown that it must be referred to A.D. 128. Sabina was enrolled among the gods after her death, as we see from medals which bear Deae Sabinae. She is frequently called Julia Sabina by modern writers;

but the name of Julia is found only on the forged coins of Goltzins. (Eckhel, vol. vi. pp. 519—523.)

COIN OF SABINA, THE WIFE OF HADRIAN.

SABI'NA, POPPAEA, first the mistress and and afterwards the wife of Nero, belonged to a noble family at Rome, and was one of the most beautiful women of her age. Her father was T. Ollius, who perished at the fall of his patron Sejanus; and her maternal grandfather was Poppaeus Sabinius, who had been consul in A.D. 9, and whose name

she assumed as more illustrious than that of her father. Poppaea herself, says Tacitus, possessed everything except a virtuous mind. From her mother she inherited surpassing beauty; her fortune was sufficient to support the splendour of her birth; her conversation was distinguished by sprightliness and vivacity; and her modest appearance only gave a greater zest to her favours. She rarely appeared in public; and whenever she did so, her face was partially concealed by a veil. She was careless of her reputation; but in her amours she always consulted her interest, and did not gratify blindly either her own passions or those of others. She had been originally married to Rufius Crispinus, praefect of the praetorian troops under Claudius, by whom she had a son, but she afterwards became the mistress of Otho, who was one of the boon companions of Nero, and by whose means she hoped to attract the notice of the emperor. Having obtained a divorce from Rufius, she married Otho. Her husband extolled her charms with such rapture to the emperor, that he soon became anxious to see the lovely wife of his friend. Poppaea, who was a perfect coquette, first employed all her blandishments to win the prince, and when she saw that she had secured her prize she affected modesty, and pleaded that it would reflect on her husband would not get her yield to the emperor's wishes. Such conduct had the desired effect. Nero became more ardent in his passion, and to remove Otho out of the way sent him to govern the province of Lusitania. This was in A.D. 58. (Tac. Ann. xiii. 45, 46.) Other writers give rather a different account of Poppaea's first acquaintance with Nero. They relate that Otho married Poppaea at the request of Nero, who was anxious to conceal the intrigue from his mother, and that the two friends enjoyed her together, till the emperor became jealous of Otho and sent him into Lusitania. This was the account which Tacitus appears to have received when he was composing his Histories (Hist. i. 13); but as he relates the circumstances at greater length in his SABINA.

Annals, which were written subsequently, he had no doubt obtained satisfactory authority for the account which he there gives.

Poppea now became the acknowledged mistress of Nero, but this did not satisfy her ambition. She was anxious to be his wife. But as long as Agrippina, the mother of Nero, was alive, she could scarcely hope to obtain this honour. She therefore dropped all her influence with Nero to excite his resentment against his mother; and by her arts, seconded as they were by the numerous enemies of Agrippina, Nero was induced to put his mother to death in A.D. 59. Still she did not immediately obtain the great object of her desires; for although Nero hated his wife Octavia, he yielded for a time to the advice of his best counsellors, not to divorce the woman who had brought him the empire. At length, however, Poppea, who still continued to exercise a complete sway over the emperor, induced him to put away Octavia, in A.D. 62, on the plea of barrenness, and to marry her a few days afterwards. But Poppea did not feel secure as long as Octavia was alive, and by working alternately upon the fears and passions of her husband, she prevailed upon him to put the unhappy girl to death in the course of the same year. [Octavia, No. 5.] Thus two of the greatest misfortunes of Nero's life, the murder of his mother and of his wife, were committed at the instigation of Poppea.

In the following year, A.D. 63, Poppea was delivered of a daughter at Antium. This event caused Nero the most extravagant joy, and was celebrated with public games and other rejoicings. Poppea received on the occasion the title of Augusta. The infant, however, died at the age of four months, and was enrolled among the gods. In A.D. 65 Poppea was pregnant again, but was killed by a kick from her brutal husband in a fit of passion. It was reported by some that he had poisoned her; but Tacitus gave no credit to this account, since Nero was desirous of offspring, and continued to the last enamoured of his wife. Her body was not burnt, according to the Roman custom, but embalmed, and was deposited in the sepulchre of the Juli. She received the honour of a public funeral, and her funerary urn was pronounced by Nero himself. She was enrolled among the gods, and a magnificent temple was dedicated to her by Nero, which bore the inscription Sabinae desive banon matronae fecerunt. Nero continued to cherish her memory, and subsequently married a youth of the name of Sforus, on account of his likeness to Poppea. [Storius.] But though the emperor lamented her death, the people rejoiced at it on account of her cruelty and licentiousness; and the only class in the empire who regretted her may have been the Jews, whose cause she had defended. It is rather curious to find Josephus (Ant. xx. 8, § 11) calling this adulterer and murderess a pious woman. Poppea was inordinately fond of luxury and pomp, and took immense pains to preserve the beautiful of her person. Thus we are told that all her miles were shod with gold, and that five hundred asses were daily milked to supply her with a bath.

COIN OF POPPEA SABINA, THE WIFE OF NERO.

SABINUS, FURIA, or SABINA TRANQUILLINA, daughter of Mithaenus [MISTHEUS], and wife of the third Gordian. From numbers exhibited upon coins of Alexandria and of Cappadocian Caesarea numismatologists have concluded that the marriage took place, A.D. 241, but it is not known whether they had any progeny, nor have any indications been preserved of her fate after the death of her father and her husband, A.D. 241. (Capitolin. Gordian, tres, 23; Eutrop. ix. 2.; Eckhel, vol. vii. p. 316.) [W. R.]

SABINIANUS, a friend of the younger Pliny who addressed two letters to him (Ep. i. 24, 25).

SABINIANUS, a Roman general in the reign of Constans, who appointed him in A.D. 359 to supersede the brave Ursicinus in the command of the army employed against the Persian king Sapor or Shapur. The choice was a very bad one, for Sabinius was not only an incompetent general, though he had seen many campaigns, but was a traitor and a coward. He had scarcely taken the command, when Ursicinus was ordered to serve under him, that he might do the work, while Sabinius enjoyed the honour. But Sabinius could not even secure to himself the anticipated success. Through his cowardice Amida, the bulwark of the empire in Mesopotamia, was lost, and its garrison massacred. Among the few who escaped the fury of the Persians was Amianus Marcellinus, who served in the staff of Ursicinus. The reason why Sabinius did not relieve Amida as he was urged to do by Ursicinus, was a secret order of the court council, to cause as much disgrace to Ursicinus as possible, in order to prevent him from regaining his former influence and power. In this they succeeded completely, for after his return to Constantinople in 360, Ursicinus was banished from the court and ended his days in obscurity. A similar though better-deserved fate was destined for Sabinius, for on the accession of Julian, he shrank back from public life, and was no longer heard of. There was another Roman general, Sabinius, a worthy man and distinguished captain, who was worsted by Theodoric the Great, in the decisive battle of Margas. (Amm. Marc. xviii. 4, &c., xix. 1, &c.; Zonar. vol. ii. p. 20, &c. ed. Paris.)

SABINUS. 1. A contemporary poet and a friend of Ovid, known to us only from two passages of the works of the latter. From one of these (Am. ii. 18, 27—34) we learn that Sabinus had written answers to six of the Epistolae Heroïdum of Ovid. Three answers enumerated by Ovid in this passage are printed in many editions of the poet's works as the genuine poems of Sabinus. It is remarked in the life of Ovid [Vol. III. p. 72, a.] that their genuineness is doubtful; but we may go
It has been conjectured by Gläser that the Troeven here spoken of was an epic poem, containing a history of the birth and adventures of Theseus till his arrival at his father’s court at Athens, so called from Troeven being the birth-place of Theseus, and that the Dierum Opus was a continuation of Ovid’s Fasti. As the letter from Pontus in which the death of Sabinus is mentioned was written in A.D. 15, he probably died shortly before this year. For further discussion respecting this poet, see an essay by Gläser, entitled Der Dichter Sabinus in the Rhetorisches Institut for 1842, p. 437, &c.

2. P. SABINUS, was appointed by Vitellius, on his accession to the empire in A.D. 69, praefect of the praetorian troops, although he was at the time only prefect of a cohort. (Tac. Hist. ii. 92, iii. 36.) He must not be confounded with his contemporary Flavius Sabinus, the praefect of the city [SABINUS, FLAVIUS,].

SABINUS, a consularis under Antoninus. Hollogabalus, on whose writings Ulpiians commented according to Aelius Lampridius (Anton. Heliothegab, c. 16). Hollogabalus, in a low tone of voice, ordered a centurion to put Sabinus to death for staying in the city; but the centurion, who was rather deaf, thought that the order was to drive him out of Rome, which he did, and thus saved the life of Sabinus. The statement of Ulpians commenting on a work of this Sabinus, is apparently a blunder of Lampridius. In his life of Alexander Severus (c. 68) Lampridius mentions among the consiliarii of Alexander, Fabius Sabinus, a son of Sabinus, an illustrious man, the Cato of his time. Fabius may have been a jurist, but nothing is known of him. There is no reason for calling Sabinus one, for Lampridius is no authority, and there is no other. (Grotius, Vita Jurisconsultorum, p. 130.) [G. L.]

SABINUS, a consularis and praefect of the city, under Maximinus I., was slain while endeavouring to quell the insurrection which burst forth when intelligence arrived of the elevation of the Gordians in Africa. (Capitolin. Maximin. duo, 14, Gordian. tres, 13; Herodian, vii. 15.) [W. K.]

SABINUS (Sabinus), Greek, literary. 1. A sophist and rhetorician, who flourished under Hadrian, and wrote a work in four books, entitled Εὐσύγγωγος καὶ ὑποτάσις μελετητικῆς θεάς, and also Commentaries on Theocridus, Aesclaius, and some other authors, as well as other exegetical works. (Suid. s. v.) He seems to have been a native of Zeugma, as Suidas tells us that Sergius of Zeugma wrote an epitaph for his brother, Sabinus the sophist. (Suid. s. v. Ζευγμος.)

2. The author of a single epigram in the Greek Anthology, in imitation of Leonidas of Tarentum. It is not known with certainty whether he was the same person as the sophist. (Bruneck, Anot. vol. vii. p. 304; Jacobs, Anth. Graece. vol. iii. p. 18, vol. xiii. p. 948; Fabric. Bibl. Graece. vol. iv. p. 494.)

SABINUS, a bishop of Heraclea in Thrace, and a follower of the heresy of Macedonians, was one of the earliest writers on ecclesiastical councils. His work, entitled Συναγωγή τῶν Συνολων, is frequently quoted by Socrates and other ecclesiastical historians. (Soz. H. E. i. 5, ii. 11, 13, 16; Zeugma. H. E. Pref. ii. Niseph. Coll. xii. Epiph. Hser. ii. 8, 9, 17.) He appears to have lived about the time of the accession of Theodosius II., who reigned from A.D. 424 to 450. (Vossius, de Hist. Graece. pp. 307, 314, 494; Fabric. Bibl. Graece. vol. xii. pp. 182, 183.) [P.S.]

SABINUS (Sabinus), a physician, and one of the most eminent of the ancient commentators on Hippocrates, who lived before Julianus (Galen, Adv. Julian. c. 3. vol. xvii. pt. i. p. 255), and was tutor to Mardonius (id. Comment. in Hippocr. “Epid. III.” i. 4. vol. xvii. pt. i. p. 507, 8), and Stratonicus (id. de Atra Bile. c. 4. vol. v. p. 119), and must therefore have lived about the end of the first century after Christ. Galen frequently quotes him, and contovers his some of his opinions, but at the same time allows that he and Rufus Ephesius (who is commonly mentioned in conjunction with him) comprised the meaning of Hippocrates better than most of the other commentators (Galen, de Ord. Libror. suor. vol. xix. p. 58: comp. Comment. in Hippocr. “Epid. VI.” ii. 10. vol. xviii. pt. i. p. 842). It is certain that whether Sabinus commented on the whole of the Hippocratic Collection; the quotations, id. in Galen only relate to the Apherorius, Epidemics, de Natura Hominis, and de Humoribus; and Aulus Gallus has preserved a fragment of his commentary on the treatise de Alimento (iii. 16). See Littre’s Oeuvres d’Hippocr. vol. i. p. 101, &c. [W. A. G.]

SABINUS, A. LBIUS, was a coheres with Cicero. It is in reference to him that Cicero speaks of the Albanum negotium. (Cic. ad Att. xiii. 14, xiv. 18, 20.)

SABINUS, ASETLIUS, received a magnificent reward from Tiberius for a dialogue, in which he had introduced a contest between a mushroom, a fiddleca, an oyster, and a thirst. (Suet. Tib. 42.)

SABINUS, ASYDIUS, a rhetorician mentioned by the elder Seneca (Snas. 2.)

SABINUS, M. CAELIUS, a Roman jurist, who succeeded Cassius Longinus. He was not the Sabinus from whom the Sabiniotics took their name. Caelian Sabinus was named consul by Otho; and Vitellius, on his accession to power, did not rescind the appointment. His consulship belonged to A.D. 69, in which year Vitellius was succeeded by Vespasianus. He wrote a work, Ad Edictum Aedilium Carullum (Gell. iv. 2, vii. 4). In the first of these two passages Gallus mentions the work of Caels (in libro quem de Edicto Aedilium Carullum composuit); and Caels here quotes Laboe. Nearly the same words are given by Ulpian (De Aedilicio Edicto, Dig. 21. tit. 1. s. 1. §7), but he quotes only Sabinus, and omits Laboe’s name. In the second passage Gallus quotes the words of Caels as to the practice of slaves being sold with the pilaus on the head, when the vendor would not warrant them; and though the work on the Edict is not quoted there, it seems certain that this extract must be taken from this book of Caels. It appears that Caels must also have written other works. (Dig. 35. tit. 1. s. 72. § 7.) There are no extracts from Caels in the Digest, but he is often cited, sometimes as Caecilius Sabinus, sometimes by the name of Sabinus only. [G. L.]

SABINUS, CALVIUS, commanded the twelfth legion under Caesennius Paetus in his unfortunate campaign in Armenia, a. d. 62. (Tac. Ann. x. 7.)

SABINUS, CALVIUSIUS. 1. C. CALVIUS SABINUS, one of the legates of Caesar in the civil war, was sent by him into Aetolia in n. c. 48, and obtained possession of the whole of the country. (Cae. B. C. iii. 34, 35.) It is related by Appian (B. C. ii. 69) that he was defeated by Metellus Scipio in Macedonia, but this statement is hardly consistent with Caesar's account. In n. c. 45 he received the province of Africa from Caesar. Having been elected praetor in n. c. 44, he obtained from Antony the province of Africa again. It was pretended that the lot had assigned him this province; on which Cicerro remarks that nothing could be more lucky, seeing that he had just come from Africa, leaving two legates behind him in Ursinia, and had divined that he should soon return. He did not, however, return to Africa as the senate, after the departure of Antony for Mutila, conferred upon Q. Cornificius (Cic. Phil. iii. 10, ad Fam. xii. 25). Sabinus was consul in n. c. 39 with L. Marcus Censorinus, and in the following year he commanded the fleet of Octavian in the war with Sext. Pompey. In conjunction with Menas, who had deserted Pompey, he fought against Mecrates, Pompey's admiral, and sustained a defeat off Cumae. When Menas went over to Pompey again, just before the breaking out of hostilities in n. c. 36, Sabinus was deprived of the command of the fleet, because he had not kept a sufficient watch over the renegades. This, at least, is the reason assigned by Appian; but Octavian had for other reasons determined to entrust the conduct of the war to Agrippa. It is evident moreover that Sabinus was not looked upon with suspicion by Octavian, for at the close of the war the latter gave him the task of clearing the Italy of robbers. He is mentioned too at a later time, shortly before the battle of Actium, as one of the friends of Octavian. (Dion Cass. xlviii. 34, 46; Appian, B. C. v. 81, 96, 132; Plut. Ant. 58.)

2. C. CALVIUS SABINUS, probably son of No. 1, was consul in n. c. 4 with L. Passienus Rufus (Monum. Ancyr.).

3. C. CALVIUS SABINUS, probably son of No. 2, and grandson of No. 1, was consul under Tiberius in a. d. 26 with Cn. Cornelius Lentulus Gaetulicus. In a. d. 32 he was accused of majestas, but was saved by Celsus, tribune of a city cohort, who was one of the informers. He was governor of Pannonia under Caligula, and was accused with his wife Cornelia; but as their condemnation was certain, they put an end to their own lives before the trial commenced. (Tac. Ann. iv. 46, vi. 9, Hist. i. 48; Dion Cass. lx. 18.)

4. CALVIUS SABINUS, a wealthy contemporary of Seneca, was of servile origin, and, though ignobly, affected to be a man of learning (Sen. Ep. 27).

SABINUS, CATIUS, was consul under Caracalla in a. d. 216 with Cornelius Anulinus. This was the second consulship of Sabinus; but his first does not occur in the Fasti. (Cod. Just. 2. tit. 19. a. 7; 9. tit. 32. s. 3, et alibi.)

SABINUS, CLAUDIUS. [CLAUDIUS, Nos. 1, 2, 3.]

SABINUS, CORNELIUS, a tribune of the praetorian troops, was, after Cassius Chaeron, the principal conspirator against Caligula, and gave him one of the fatal blows. Upon the execution of Chaeron by Claudius, Sabinus voluntarily put an end to his own life, disdaining to survive the associate of his glorious deed (Dion Cass. lxi. 29, lx. 3; Suet. Calig. 58; Joseph. Ant. xix. 1, 4).

SABINUS, DOMITIUS, is mentioned as one of the principal centurions (principipales) in Galba's army at Rome in a. d. 69 (Tac. Hist. i. 31). We find mention of a Domitius Sabinus, a tribune of the soldiers, who served under Vespasian and Titus in the Jewish war. (Joseph. B. J. iii. 7. § 34, v. 8. § 1.)

SABINUS, FLAVIUS. 1. T. FLAVIUS SABINUS, the father of the emperor Vespasian, was himself the son of T. Flavius Petro, who had served as a centurion in the army of Pompey at Pharsalus. Sabinus had been one of the farmers of the tax of the horrea at Alexandria which he collected with so much fairness that many cities erected statues to his honour with the inscription καλεως τελεωσατοι. He afterwards carried on business as a money-lender among the Helvetians, and died in their country, leaving two sons, Sabinus and Vespasian, afterwards emperor. (Suet. Vesp. 1.)

2. FLAVIUS SABINUS, the elder son of the preceding, and the brother of the emperor Vespasian. He is first mentioned in the reign of Claudius, a. d. 45, when he served under Plautius in Britain, along with his brother Vespasian (Dion Cass. lx. 20). He afterwards governed Moesia for seven years, and held the important office of praefectus urbis during the last eleven years of Nero's reign. He was removed from this office by Otho, but was replaced in it on the accession of Otho, who was anxious to conciliate Vespasian, who commanded the Roman legions in the East. He continued to retain the dignity under Vespasian, and was assigned the province of Africa, and the command of the troops in the province of Africa, and the command of the legions in the East, and Antonius Primus and his other generals in the West, after the defeat of the troops of Vitellius, were marching upon Rome, Vitellius, despairing of success, offered to surrender the empire, and to place the supreme power in the hands of Sabinus till the arrival of his brother. The German soldiers of Vitellius, however, refused submission to this arrangement, and resolved to support their sovereign by arms. Sabinus had now gone too far to retreat; and, as he had not sufficient forces to oppose the troops of Vitellius, he took refuge in the Capitol. In the following night he caused his own children and Domitius, his brother's son, to be brought into the Capitol, and despatched a messenger to Vespasian's generals, begging for immediate assistance. On the following day the soldiers of Vitellius advanced to attack the Capitol. In the assault the houses next the Capitol were set on fire, whether by the besiegers or the besieged, is uncertain. The flames spread to the Capitol, which was eventually burnt to the ground (December, a. d. 69). Sabinus, who was worn out by old age, and who had lost his presence of mind in the danger, was taken prisoner, and dragged before Vitellius, who in vain endeavoured to save him from the fury of the soldiers. While Vitellius was standing before the steps of the palace, they... stabb'd Sabinus, mangled his body, cut off his head, and dragged his remains to the place where the corpses of malefactors were thrown (in Genni- nias). His children and his nephew Domitian made their escape. When the generals of Vespasian obtained possession of the city, the remains of Sabinus were interred with the honour of a cen- sor's funeral. Sabinus was a man of distinguished reputation, and of unsullied character. He had been engaged in military service for thirty-five years; he had ruled Italy in peace and in war. During the seven years that he had governed Moesia, and the twelve years he had held the praefecture of the city, the only charge ever brought against him was a too great copious- ness of speech. It was universally agreed, that before Vespasian became emperor, the dignity of the family centred in Sabinus. He left two sons, Flavius Sabinus [No. 4], and Flavius Clemens [Clemens]. (Plut. Oth. 5; Tac. Hist. i. 46, ii. 55, iii. 64-74, iv. 47; Dion Cass. liv. 17; Suet. Vesp. 1, Vitell. 15; Joseph. B. J. iv. 10, § 3, iv. 11, § 4; Eutrop. vii. 12; Aurel. Vict. Caez. 6.)

3. T. Flavius Sabinus, was consul suffectus with M. Caelius Sabinus in May and June, a. d. 69. He was one of the generals appointed by Otho to oppose the forces of Vitellius, but after the victory of the latter he made his submission to the conqueror (Tac. Hist. i. 77, ii. 90, 91). We have followed Tillemon (Histoire des Empereurs, § 1 sur Othon) in making this T. Flavius Sabinus a different person from the praefect of the city mentioned above. Tacitus nowhere speaks of them as the same person, and it is moreover un- likely that the praefect of the city would have been sent away from Rome. Besides which, we find that after the death of Otho, the consul Flavius Sabinus caused his troops in the north of Italy to submit to the generals of Vitellius (Tac. Hist. ii. 51), while the praefect of the city at the same time made the city cohorts at Rome swear allegiance to Vitellius (Tac. Hist. ii. 55). In addition to which we learn from inscriptions that the praefect of the city was Titus. The prae- nomen of the praefect of the city is not mentioned by Tacitus, but it could not have been Titus, as that was the praenomen of Vespasian. A diffi- culty, however, still remains, namely, why the younger brother Vespasian bore the surname of his father contrary to the general usage. But to this we reply, that it may have happened in this case, as in others, that there was a brother older than the other two, named Titus, who died after the birth of the future praefect of the city, but before the birth of Vespasian, and that the praenomen of the father was then given to the child born next.

4. Flavius Sabinus, the son of the praefect of the city [No. 2], was besieged with his father in the Capitol, but escaped when it was burnt down. He married Julia, the daughter of his cousin Titus. He was consul a. d. 82, with his cousin Domitian, but was afterwards slain by the emperor, on the frivolous pretext that the herald in proclaiming his consulship had called him Imperator instead of consul. Domitian's love for his wife was perhaps the real reason of his death. (Dion Cass. xix. 17; Philostr. Apollon. Tyman. vii. 3; Suet. Dom. 10.)

Sabinus, JUlius, a Lingon, joined in the revolt of Classicus, a. d. 70, his ambition being excited not only by his natural vanity, but by a false idea that he was descended from Julius Caesar. He ordered his followers to salute him as Caesar; and with a large irregular body of Lingons he attacked the Sequani, and was defeated. He fled to a villa belonging to him, which he burnt, that he might be supposed to have perished in the flames, and hid himself in some subterranean chambers, where he was kept concealed for nine years by his friends and his wife Epodina, or Peponilla. He was at length captured, taken to Rome, and there put to death by order of Vespasian. (Tac. Hist. iv. 55, 67; Dion. Cass. xi. 3, 16; Plut. Eutro. 25, pp. 770, 771; Classi-icus.)

Sabinus, Massuarius, a hearer of Atellius Capito, was a distinguished jurist in the time of Tiberius, and he lived under Nero also, for the passage in Gaius (ii. 218) must certainly refer to this Sabinus, and not to Caelius. This is the Sabinus from whom the school of the Subiniani took its name. [Capito.] Massuarius was nearly fifty years of age before he was admitted into the Equestrian Order, and he is said to have been poor enough to require pecuniary assistance from his hearers. He obtained under Tiberius the Jus Respondendi, which is a proof of his reputation as a jurist; and it is further evidence of this, that the Subiniani took their name not from Capito, but from his more distinguished pupil. There is no direct excerpt from Sabinus in the Digest, but he is often cited by other jurists, who commented upon his Libri tres Juris Civilis. Pomponius wrote at least thirty-six Libri ad Sabinum, Ulpianus at least fifty-one, and Paulinus at least forty-seven books. This fact in itself shows that the work of Massuarius must have been considered to be a great authority. It is conjectured, but it is pure conjecture, that the arrangement was the same as that of the Libri XVIII. Juris Civilis of Q. Mucius Scaevola.

A passage from Massuarius is quoted by Gellius (x. 15), who, in another passage (iii. 16), quotes a passage of Plinius (H. N. vii. 5), in which Plinius quotes Massuarius for a case in which a woman declared that she had gone thirteen months with child. Gellius (iv. 1, 2) quotes the second book of Massuarius on the Jus Civile. In another pas- sage (v. 13) Gellius quotes the third book of the same work. In the fourteenth book (c. 2) he alludes to the same work, under the name of Com- mentarius. It is conjectured that Persius means to refer to the same work (Sat. v. 90), when he says—

On which see the note of Heinrich. Massuarius is also mentioned by Arrian (Epist. iv. 3, Μασσουριου φόνοισ). If Athenaeus (i. p. 1, c) means this Massuarius, his chronology is in great confusion.

Numerous other works of Massuarius are cited by name in the Digest: Commentarii de indigenis, Libri Memorialis, Fasti in two books at least (Macroh. Sat. i. 4), at least two books of Responsa (Dig. 14. tit. 2. s. 4), apparently a commentary Ad Edictum (Dig. 38. tit. 1. s. 18), and Libri ad Vi- tellantium. The fragments of the Libri Memorialis and of the Fasti are collected in Frotscher's Sallust. (Grotius, Vitae Jurisconsult. ; Zimmer, Geschichte des Röm. Privatrechts, i. § 84 ; Puchta, Instit. i. § 99, and § 116, on the Jus Respondendi.) [G. L.]

SABINUS.

SABINUS, NYMPHIDIUS. [NYMPHIDIUS.]
SABINUS, OBULTRONIUS. [OBULTRONIUS.]
SABINUS, OPPIUS. [OPPIUS, No. 18.]
SABINUS, OSTORIUS, a Roman eques, accused Burea Soranus and his daughter Servilia in a. d. 66, and was rewarded by Nero with a large sum of money, and the insignia of the quaestorship. (Tac. Ann. xvi. 25, 30, 33.) [BARRA SORANUS.]
SABINUS, L. PLOTIUS, a Roman artist, who is only known by an inscription, in which he is described as a carver in ivory, Eborarius. (Reines. cl. xi. No. cxzixii.; R. Rochette, Lettre à M. Schorza, p. 400, 2d ed.) [P. S.]
SABINUS, POMONIUS, or with his full name JULIUS POMPONIUS SABINUS, is sometimes quoted as an ancient grammarian, but is the same as Pompomius Laetus, who lived at the revival of learning.
SABINUS, POPPAEUS, consul in a. d. 9, with Q. Sulpicius Camerinus. He was appointed in the life-time of Augustus, governor of Moesia; and Tiberius in the year after his accession, a. d. 15, not only confirmed him in his government of Moesia, but gave him in addition the provinces of Achaea and Macedonia. He continued to hold these provinces till his death in a. d. 35, having ruled over Moesia for twenty-four years. In a. d. 26, he obtained the triumphal ornaments on account of a victory which he had gained over some Thracian tribes. He did not belong to a distinguished family, and was indebted for his long continuance in his government to his possessing respectable, but not striking abilities. He was the maternal grandfather of Poppaea Sabina, the mistress, and afterwards the wife of Nero. (Dion Cass. Index, lib. lvi.; Suet. Vesp. 2; Tac. Ann. i. 80, iv. 46, v. 10, vi. 39, xiii. 45; Dion Cass. liiiii. 25.)
SABINUS, T. SICIUS, consul r. c. 487, with C. Aquilius Tusca, carried on war against the Volsci, and obtained a triumph, as we learn from the Capitoline Fasti and Dionysius, though Livy says "cum Volsci aequo Marte discessum est." Dionysius calls him T. Siccius. (Fasti Capit.; Dionys. viii. 64, 67; Liv. ii. 40.) Sicinius served afterwards, as legatus, under the consul M. Fabius Vabalanus in b. c. 490. (Dionys. ix. 12, 13.)
SABINUS, TITTIUS, a distinguished Roman eques, was a friend of Germanicus, and was consequently hated by Sejanus. To please this powerful favourite, Latinus Latiaris, who was a friend of Sabinus, induced the latter to speak in unguarded terms both of Sejanus and Tiberius, and then betrayed his confidence. Sabinus was executed in prison, and his body thrown out upon the Gemonian steps, and cast into the Tiber. The ancient writers mention the fidelity of the dog of Sabinus, which would not desert his master, and which tried to bear up his corpse when thrown into the Tiber. (Tac. Ann. iv. 18, 19, 68, 70, vi. 4; Dion Cass. liiiii. 1; Plin. H. N. viii. 40. s. 61.)
SABINUS, Q. TITTIUS, one of Caesar's legates in Gaul, is first mentioned in Caesar's campaign against the Remi, in b. c. 57. In the following year, b. c. 56, he was sent by Caesar with three legions against the Unelli, Curiosolitae, and Lexovii (in Normandy), who were led by Viridovix. He gained a great victory over the forces of Viridovix, and all the insurgent states submitted to his authority. In b. c. 54 Q. Titi-rius Sabinus and L. Aurunculeius Cotta were stationed for the winter in the territory of the Elu-rones with a legion and five cohorts. They had not been more than fifteen days in the country before they were attacked by Ambiorix and Cati- voces. On this occasion Sabinus did not show the same resolution as Cotta, and it was owing to his fatal resolution to trust himself to the safe con- duct of Ambiorix that the Roman troops, as well as Sabinus and Cotta, were destroyed, as is related more fully in the life of Cotta. [Vol. i. p. 869.]

The annexed coin was struck by a Titurius Sabinus, but it is uncertain who he was.

COIN OF TITURIUS SABINUS.

SABYNUX TYRO, the author of a treatise on horticulture, which he dedicated to Maccenas. All that we know with regard to this writer and his work is to be found in the notice of Pliny (H. N. xix. 10). "Ferroque non expedite tangi rutam, cunilam, mentam, oicum, auctor est Sabinus (al. Sabinus) Tyro in libro Cepuricón quem Macce-nati dicavit." [W. R.]
SABINUS, VEKTIIUS, of the Ulpian family, was the senator upon whose motion, according to Capitolinus, Baibinius and Maximus were nominated joint emperors. Upon their elevation he was appointed Praefectus Urb. (Capitolin. Max. et Balb. 2, 4.)
SABULA, L. COSSUTIUS, mentioned only on coins, a specimen of which is annexed. The obverse represents the head of Medusa, with SAVVLA, the reverse Bellerophon riding on Pe-gasus with L. COSSUTI. c. f. (Eckhel, vol. v. p. 197.)

COIN OF L. COSSUTIUS SABULA.

SABURA or SABURRA, the commander of Julia's forces in Africa, defeated C. Curio, Caesar's general, in b. c. 49. He was destroyed with all his forces in b. c. 46 by P. Sittius. (Caes. B. C. ii. 38, xc.; Hirt. B. Afr. 48, 93; Appian, B. C. ii. 45, iv. 54.)

SACADAS (Sacadas), of Argos, one of the SACADAS.

most eminent of the ancient Greek musicians, is mentioned by Plutarch (de Mus. 9, p. 1134, b.) as one of the masters who established at Sparta the second great school or style (κατάρτασις) of music, of which Thalætas was the founder, as Terpander had been of the first. His age is marked and his eminence is attested by the statement of Pausanias (x. 7, § 3), that he gained the prize for flute-playing at the first of the musical contests which the Amphicyons established in connection with the Pythian games (Ol. 47, 3, b. c. 590), and also at the next two festivals in succession (Ol. 48, 3, 49, 3, b. c. 586, 582). From the manner, however, in which his name is connected with those of Polymnestus and Alcman, in several passages, and perhaps too from the cessation of his Pythian victories, we may infer that these victories were among the latest events of his life. Pausanias elsewhere (ii. 22. § 9) speaks of these Pythian victories as having appeased the anger against the masters or the public, which Apollonius had conceived on account of his contest with Silenus (comp. Mar. Saxas). Plutarch, relating the same fact, adds that Sacadas was the author of a new name, in which the three modes of music were combined; the first strophe sung by the chorus being in the Dorian mode, the second in the Phrygian, and the third in the Lydian, whence the name was called the tripartite (τριμερής); but that another authority ascribed its invention to Cionas. (Plut. de Mus. 8, p. 1134, a.) Pollux (iv. 79) speaks expressly of a Pythian name as the composition of Sacadas. Plutarch also informs us that, in his rhythms, Sacadas, like Polymnestus, adhered to the pure and beautiful style which had been introduced by Terpander. (Ib. 12, p. 1135, c.)

In the time of Sacadas most of the musicians were poets also, though the connection between the two arts had not become so close as it was afterwards. The kind of poetry in which these masters cultivated the flute, Apollonius had conceived on the elegy. Accordingly we find Sacadas mentioned as a good poet, and a composer of elegies (Plut. L.c.). It was, however, in the music of the flute alone, unaccompanied by the voice, that he gained his Pythian victories. At the same games there was another and a different prize for elegies sung to the music of the flute; and this was gained by Echecratus of Arcadia. The music of Sacadas was auletic, that of Echecratus aulodic. Pausanias names the contest in which Sacadas gained his victories, ἀλήθεια τὸ πυθικὸν (ii. 22. § 9). From the same passage we learn that a monument was erected to Sacadas in his native city. His statue also had a place among those of the poets and musicians on Mount Helicon; and, from a statement made by Pausanias in connection with this statue, we learn that Pindar composed a proea in praise of Sacadas and his flute-playing. (Paus. ix. 30. § 2.) Plutarch (de Mus. 6, p. 1134, a.) refers to the mention of this by Pindar. Athenaeus (xii. p. 610, c.) ascribes to Sacadas a poem on the taking of Troy (Παλαιαῖ πέρας), at least if the emendation of Schweighäuser on the various corrupt forms of the name in that passage be correct, which is not universally admitted. If Sacadas really composed such a poem, it must have resembled the epic-lyric poems of Stesichorus; but the account given of it by Athenaeus can hardly be understood as applying to the work of a flute-player and elegiac poet. (Müller, Gesch.

SADALIES.

SACCUS, an agnomen of L. Titinius Pansa. [Pansa]

SACERDOS, CARSIDIUS, was accused in A. D. 23 of having assisted Tacfarinas with corn, but was acquitted. He was condemned in A. D. 37 to deportatio in insulam, as one of the accomplices of the adulteries of Alucilla, at which time he is spoken of as a man of praetorian rank. His name occurs in some editions of Tacitus, under the form of Grasidius. (Tac. Ann. iv. 13, vi. 48.)

SACERDOS, C. LICIUS. 1. A Roman eques. When he appeared with his horse before the censors in B. C. 142, Scipio Africanus the younger, who was one of the censors, said that he knew that Saceros had committed perjury, but as no one came forward to accuse him, Scipio allowed him to pass on, as he would not act as accuser, witness, and judge. (Cic. pro Cluent. 48; Val. Max. iv. l. § 10.)

2. The grandson of the preceding, bore an unblemished character. He was pretor B. C. 75, and in the following year had the government of Sicily, in which he was succeeded by Verres. He subsequently served as legate under Q. Metellus in Crete, and was a candidate for the consulship at the same comitia in which Cicero and Antonius were elected. Cicero frequently mentions him in his orations against Verres, and contrasts his upright administration of Sicily with the corrupt and unjust proceedings of his successor. (Cic. Verr. l. 10, 46, 50, ii. 28, iii. 50, 92, pro Planc. 11; Ascon. in Top. Canid. p. 82, ed. Orelli.)

SACERDOS, MARIUS PLOTIUS. [PLOTIUS.]

SACERDOS, TINEIUS. 1. C., consul under Antonius Pius in A. D. 156 with Sex. Sulpicius Tertullus. (Fasti.)

2. Q., consul in A. D. 219 with the emperor Elagabalus. (Fasti.)

M. SACRATIVIR, of Capua, a Roman eques, who fell fighting on Caesar's side at the battle of Dyrrehachium, B. C. 48. (Cass. B. C. iii. 71.)

SACRORIR, JU/LIUS, and JU/LIUS FLO-RUS, two Gauls, the former an Aeduan and the latter a Trevirian, were both of noble family, and had received the Roman citizenship on account of their services. These chiefs in the reign of TibERIUS, A. D. 21, determined to excite an insurrection of the Gauls, who were burdened with debts, and ripe for revolt. Florus, who had undertaken to stir up the Belgae, collected a force consisting of debtors and clients, and was making for the wood Arduenna, when he was surrounded by the Roman legions, and seeing no way of escape, put an end to himself. Florus was at first more successful; he collected a large army among the Aedu and the surrounding people, but was defeated by the Roman legate Silius, in the neighbourhood of Augustodunum (Antun), and thereupon he likewise destroyed himself. (Tac. Ann. iii. 40—46, iv. 18, Hist. iv. 57.)

SADALES, the son of Cotys, king of Thrace, was sent by his father to the assistance of Pompey, and fought on his side against Caesar, in B. C. 48. In conjunction with Scipio, he defeated L.
Cassius Longinus, one of Caesar's legates. He was pardoned by Caesar after the battle of Pharsalus, and appears to have succeeded his father in the sovereignty about this time. He died in B.C. 42, leaving his dominions to the Romans (Caes. B. C. iii. 4; Lucan, v. 54; Dion Cass. xii. 51, 63, xlvii. 25). Cicero, in his orations against Verres, B.C. 70, speaks of a king Sadala (Ferr. Act. i. 24). This Sadala was in all probability the father of Cotys, and the grandfather of the Sadales mentioned above.

SADOCUS (Σάδωκος), son of Sitalces, king of Thrace, was made a citizen of Athens, in B.C. 431, when the Athenians formed an alliance with his father. In the following year, the Athenians sent as envoys to the court of Sitalces persuaded Sadoe to deliver up to them Aristenus and the other ambassadors, who were passing through Thrace on their way to Asia, to ask the aid of the Persian king against Athens (Thucyd. ii. 29, 67; comp. Herod. vii. 137; Arist. Ach. 145, &c.). The name occurs as Σάδωκος in the Scholast on Aristophanes (l.c.)

SADYATTES (Σαδύαττης), a king of Lydia, succeeded his father Ariys, and reigned from B.C. 630 to 618. He carried on war with the Milesians for six years, and at his death bequeathed the war to his son and successor, Alyattes. [Alyattes.] (Herod. i. 16, 18). Nicolaus Damascenus relates (p. 52, ed. Orelli) a tale of this king, calling him by mistake a son of Alyattes.

L. SAE'NIUS, a senator at the time of the Catilinarian conspiracy, B.C. 63 (Sall. Cat. 50). We find in the Fasti one of the consules suffecti for B.C. 30, with the name of L. Senuius, who was probably the same person as the consule Appian says (B.C. iv. 50), that a certain Ballinus was consul in B.C. 30, in which year the conspiracy of the younger Lepidus was detected by Mæceenas. Now as the Fasti do not mention a consul of the name of Ballinus, it has been conjectured with much probability that Ballinus was the cognomen of L. SaeNIUS. Appian further states (l.c.) that Ballinus was proscribed by the triumvirs in B.C. 45, and restored with Sex. Pompey. The senatus-consultum, by which Augustus made a number of persons patricians, is called Lex Saevnia by Tacitus (Ann. xi. 25). Dion Cassius (lii. 42) speaks of the addition to the patricians as taking place in B.C. 29, but the name of the Lex Saevnia shows that the authority of the senate was obtained at the latter end of the preceding year in the consulship of Sestius.

SAEVIUS NICANOR. [Nicaiior].

SAFINNIUS ATELLA, a person for whom Statius bribed the judges, as he subsequently did in the case of Quintius. (Cic. pro Cluent. 25, 36.)

SAGRIT'TIS, a nymph in whose embraces Attis became faithless to Cybele; the goddess avenged the wrong done to her by causing the tree with which the nymph's life was connected, to be cut down. (Or. Fast. iv. 229.) [L. S.]

SAGITTA, CLAUDIUS, pretor of an ala, hurried to L. Piso in Africa, at the beginning of A. D. 70, to inform him that his death was resolved upon. (Tac. Hist. iv. 49.) [Piso, No. 26.]

SAGITTA, OCTAVIANUS, tribune of the plebs, A. D. 58, murdered his mistress, Pontia Postumia, because she had refused to marry him after promising to do so. He was accused by the father of Pontia, and condemned to deportatio in insulam. In the civil wars which followed Nero's death he returned to Rome, but was again condemned by the senate to his former punishment, A. D. 70. (Tac. Ann. xiii. 44, Hist. iv. 44.)

SAIT'TIS (Σαίττης), a surname of Athena, under which she had a sanctuary on Mount Pontinus, near Lerna in Argolis. (Paus. ii. 36 in fin.; comp. Herod. ii. 175; Tzetz. ad Lyceoph. 111.) The name was traced by the Greeks to the Egyptians, among whom Athena was said to have been called Sinit.

[LS.]

SALACIA, the female divinity of the sea among the Romans, and the wife of Neptune. (Varro, L. Linguar. Lat. v. 72; op. August. De Cic. vili. 22; Serv. ad Aen. iv. 770.) The name is evidently connected with sal (sea), and accordingly denotes the wide, open sea. Servius (ad Aen. i. 720) declares the name Salacia to be only a surname of Venus, while in another passage (ad Georg. i. 31) he observes, that Cicerio, in his Timaeus, applied the name to the Greek Tethys, which we cannot wonder at, since the natural tendency was to identify Salacia with some Greek marine divinity. (Comp. Cic. de Universal. 11; Gellius, xiii. 22; August. L. c. iv. 10.) [L.S.

SALACON, a name given by Cicero to Tigellius. It is not a proper name, as some editors think, but the Greek word σαλάκων, a swaggerer.

SALAE'THUS (Σαλαϊθος), a Lacedaemonian, who, early in B.C. 427, when Mytilene had revolted from Athens, and had been received into the Spartan alliance, was sent thither to give promise of aid, and contrived to make his way into the Peloponnesus through the Athenian lines, where they were interrupted by the bed of a torrent. The expected succour, however, was so long in coming, that Salaethus himself at last despaired of it; and in order to increase the effective force of the besieged, he ventured to entrust the commons with the full armour of the regular infantry. The consequence was that they broke out into insurrection, and the oligarchical party, fearing lest they should capitulate apart for themselves, saw no resource but in the surrender of the city to the Athenians. Salaethus concealed himself, but was taken; and, together with the chief instigators of the revolt, was sent to Athens. Here he tried to save his life by making great offers, engaging in particular to prevail on the Lacedaemonians to abandon the siege of Platea. The people, however, paid no regard to his promises, and sentenced him to immediate execution. (Thucyd. iii. 25, 27, 28, 35, 36.) [L. S.

SALAMIS (Σαλαμίς), a daughter of Asop, and by Poseidon the mother of Cenchreus or Cychreus. (Paus. i. 35. § 2; Apollo. iii. 12. § 7; Dio. iv. 72.) From her the island of Salamis was believed by the ancients to have received its name.

Q. SALASSUS, a frater of the P. Curtius who was put to death in Spain, in B.C. 45, by order of Cn. Pompeius, the son of Magnus. (Curtius, No. 4.) (Cic. ad Pau. vi. 18.) He is probably the same person as the Vettius Salassus, who was proscribed by the triumvirs in B.C. 43, and threw himself headlong from the roof of a house, when he saw his own guilt concurring the assassins to him. (Appian, Civ. xi. 245; Val. Max. ii. 13. § 7.)

SALINATOR.

After, derived from the town of Salganeus in Boeotia. ( Steph. Byz. s. e.; comp. Strab. ix. p. 403.)

SA/LIA, FLA/VIUS, consul under Constantius II., in a. p. 349, with Flavius Philippus. The poet Prudentius was born in their consulship, as we learn from the introduction to his works.

T. SALIENUS, a centurion in Caesar's army in Africa, in a. c. 46, induced the two Titii to surrender their ship to C. Virgilius, the Pompeian leader. He was subsequently dismissed from the army by Caesar with disgrace. (Hirt. B. Afr. 28, 54.)

SALINATOR, LIVIUS. 1. M. LIVIUS M. F. M. N. SALINATOR, was consul b. c. 219, with L. Aemilius Paulus. Both consuls were sent against the Illyrians, who had risen in arms under Demetrios of the island of Pharsas in the Adriatic. The consuls soon brought the war to an end, subdued the strongholds of Demetrios, and compelled the latter to fly for refuge to Philip, king of Macedonia. Polybius attributes these exploits to Paulus alone, but we learn from other writers that Livius carried on the war together with his colleague, though it is probable that he took only a subordinate part in the campaign. He triumphed, however, with Paulus on his return to Rome; but immediately afterwards both consuls were brought to trial on the charge of having unfairly divided the booty among the soldiers. Paulus escaped with difficulty, but Livius was condemned by all the thirty-five tribes, with the exception of the Maecian. The sentence seems to have been an unjust one, and Livius took his disgrace so much to heart that he left the city and retired to his estate in the country, where he lived some years without taking any part in public affairs. (Polyb. iii. 19; Zonar. viii. 20; Appian, Illyr. s. Aurel. Vict. de Vir. Ill. 50; Liv. xxii. 33, xxvii. 34, xxix. 57.) But the disasters which Rome experienced during the next few years would not allow her to dispense with the services of any of her citizens, and accordingly the consuls brought him back to the city in b. c. 210, after he had been absent nearly eight years. He had, however, neither forgotten nor forgiven his last sentence; he returned to the city in a manner which showed that his disgrace still rankled in his breast; his garments were mean, and his hair and beard long and uncombed; but the censors compelled him to lay aside his squalor, and resume his seat in the senate. Even then he would not speak, and he remained silent for two years, till the attacks made upon his kinsman, M. Livius Macatus, induced him, in b. c. 203, to open his lips in his defence. In the same year the exigencies of the republic led to his election to the consulship for the following year, b. c. 207, with C. Claudius Nero.

The apprehended invasion of Northern Italy by Hasdrubal, made it more necessary than ever to have generals of experience at the head of the Roman legions. One of the consuls was obliged to be a plebeian; and the deaths of Gracchi, Flaminius, and Marcellus, left Livius almost the only man the republic dared to commit its fortunes. But at first Livius sternly refused to be chosen. His misanthropy increased rather than diminished. "If they considered him a good man, why had they condemned him as a bad man? if they had condemned him justly, why did they deem him worthy of a second consulship?"

At length he yielded to the entreaties of the senate, and allowed himself to be elected consul. But a difficulty still remained. Livius was a personal enemy of Nero; and, as it was of the first importance that the republic should act with unanimity, the senate endeavoured to reconcile them. "To what purpose?" said Livius: "we shall act with all the more vigour, if we are each afraid of giving one another an opportunity of obtaining renown by our disasters!" The authority of the senate, however, again prevailed, and Livius consented with difficulty to be reconciled to his colleague. Still he went forth to the war with bitter feelings against his countrymen. When Fabius urged him not to fight till he had become well acquainted with the forces of the enemy, the consul replied, that he should fight as soon as possible, in order that he might gain glory from the victory, or have the satisfaction of seeing the defeat of his countrymen. His conduct, however, was not as rash as his words. The lot decided that he should oppose Hasdrubal in Northern Italy, and that Nero should fight against Hannibal in the south. Hasdrubal made his appearance in Northern Italy sooner than was expected by either the friends or the enemies of Rome. His object was to effect a junction with Hannibal, but some horsemen, whom he had sent to his brother, to carry intelligence of his movements and to procure their meeting in Umbria, were intercepted by Nero. The latter instantly set out with a light detachment of 7000 men, and succeeded in joining Livius in his camp at Sona. The two consuls resolved upon an immediate battle; but Hasdrubal, perceiving the arrival of the other consul with his forces, declined the combat, and retreated towards Ariminum. The Romans pursued him, and compelled him to fight on the Metaurus. The Carthaginian army was completely defeated, and Hasdrubal himself fell in the combat. Further details of this battle, which was decisive of the fate of Italy, are given in the life of Hasdrubal [Hasdrubal, No. 6]. The consuls entered the city in triumph at the end of the summer. Livius in the triumphal car and Nero riding by his side, the greater distinction being granted to the former, as the battle had been fought in his provinces and he had had the auspices on the day of the engagement, though the general voice ascribed the honour of the victory to Nero (Liv. xxvii. 34, 35, 40, 46—49, xxviii. 9; Polyb. xi. 1—3; Zonar. ix. 9; Appian, Annib. 52, 53; Orois. iv. 18; Etrop. iii. 18; Val. Max. iv. 2, § 2, vii. 2, § 6, viii. 4, § 4, ix. 3, § 1). In the battle Livius vowed a temple to Jupiter, which was dedicated sixteen years after wards. (Cic. Brut. 18; Liv. xxxvi. 36.)

In the same year, b. c. 207, Livius was appointed dictator for the purpose of holding the consular comitia. Next year, b. c. 206, he was stationed in Etruria, as proconsul, with an army of two legions of veterans, and his imperium was prolonged for two successive years. Towards the end of the b. c. 203 he advanced from Etruria into Cisalpine Gaul, in order to support the praetor Sp. Lucretius, who had crossed the river Mago, who had landed in Liguria. They succeeded in shutting Mago up in Liguria, where he remained for two or three years [Mago, No. 7]. (Liv. xxviii. 10, 46, xxix. 5, 12.)

and former colleague in the consulship, C. Claudius Nero. The long-amothered resentments of these proud and haughty men burst forth again in their censorship, and occasioned no small scandal in the state. Nero appears, however, to have been the aggressor. It so happened that both censors possessed a public house (opus publicum); and accordingly, in the master of the equites, which was one part of the censors' duties, when the herald came to the Tribus Pollia to which Livius belonged, and hesitated to summon the censor, Nero called out "Summon M. Livius," and thereupon ordered his colleague to sell his horse, because he had been condemned by the people. Livius, in retaliation, deprived Nero likewise of his horse. At the close of the census, when the censors had to take the customary oaths and deposit the records of their office in the aedilium, each left the name of his colleague among the aediles, and Livius, besides, left as aerrarius the citizens of all the tribes, with the exception of the Macedonians, because they had condemned him after he had been elected him to the consulship and censorship. The indignation of the people at the proceedings of the censors led Cn. Baebius, the tribune of the plebs, to bring an accusation against them both; but the prosecution was dropped through the influence of the senate, who thought it more advisable to uphold the principle of the irresponsibility of the censorship than to inflict upon the delinquents the punishment they deserved. Livius, in his censorship, imposed a tax upon salt, in consequence of which he received the surname of Salinator, which seems to have been given him in derision, but which became, notwithstanding, hereditary in his family. (Liv. xxix. 37; Aurel. Vict. de Vir. Ill. 59; Val. Max. iii. 9. § 6, vii. 2. § 6.)

2. C. Livius Salinator, curule aedile b.c. 203, and praetor b.c. 202, in which year he obtained Bruttii as his province. In b.c. 193 he fought under the consul against the Boii, and in that year was an unsuccessful candidate for the consulship (Liv. xxix. 38, xxx. 26, 27, xxxv. 5, 10). He was elected pontifex in b.c. 211, in the place of M. Pomponius Matho, and died in b.c. 170. (Liv. xxvi. 23, xiii. 11.)

3. C. Livius Salinator, was praetor b.c. 191, and had the command of the fleet in the war against Antiochus. He defeated Polyxenidas, the king's admiral, off Corycus, and in the following year prosecuted the war with activity till he was succeeded by L. Aemilius Regillus [Polyxenidas]. He was not, however, left unemployed, for in the same year, b.c. 190, he was sent to Lycia, and also to Prusias, king of Bithynia. He was consul b.c. 186, with M. Valerius Messalla, and obtained Gaul as his province, but performed nothing worthy of note. (Liv. xxxv. 24, xxxvi. 2, 42—44, xxxvii. 9—14, 16, 25, xxxviii. 53; Appian, Syr. 22—25.)

1. Cn. Sallustius, whose name frequently occurs, appears to have been a client of Cicero, and was a person of considerable literary attainments (Cic. ad Att. i. 3, 11, xi. 11, 17, ad Fam. xiv. 4. § 6, xiv. 11, ad Q. Fr. iii. 4. § 2, iii. 5. § 1.).

SALLINATOR, OPP. PIUS. [OPPIUS, No. 6.] SALLUSTIUS or SALLUSTIUS, the name of two or three persons mentioned in Cicero's correspondence.

1. Cn. Sallustius, whose name frequently occurs, appears to have been a client of Cicero, and was a person of considerable literary attainments (Cic. ad Att. i. 3, 11, xi. 11, 17, ad Fam. xiv. 4. § 6, xiv. 11, ad Q. Fr. iii. 4. § 2, iii. 5. § 1.).

Brucker, but sometimes without sufficient reason, been attributed to this Sallustius. (Suidas, l. c.; Phot. l. c.; Brucker, Hist. Crit. Philosop. vol. ii. p. 523, &c.)

C. SALLUSTIUS CRISPUS, b. SALLUSTIUS, the elder, belonging to a plebeian family, and was born B. C. 86, the year in which C. Marius died, at Amatierum, in the country of the Sabines. About the age of twenty-seven, as some say, though the time is uncertain, he obtained the quaestorship, and in B. C. 52 he was elected tribune of the plebs, in the year in which Clodius was killed by Milo in a brawl. In B. C. 50 the censors Appius Claudius Pulcher and L. Calpurnius Piso ejected Sallustius from the senate (Dion Cass. xii. 63, and the note of Reimarvs), on the ground, as some say, of his having been caught in the act of adultery with Fausta, the daughter of the dictator Sulla, and the wife of T. Annius Milo. It is said that the husband soundly whipped Sallustius, and only let him off on payment of a sum of money (Varro, quoted by Gellius, xviii. 18). Sallustius belonged to the faction of Caesar, and party spirit may have had some effect with the censors, for the imputations of adulterous connexions, even if true, would hardly have been a sufficient ground at that time for a Nota Censoria. Sallustius, in his tribunate, made a violent attack upon Milo as to the affair of Clodius, but there may have been other grounds for his enmity, besides the supposed thrashing that he had received from Milo. The adulterous act, of course, was committed before B. C. 52; and Sallustius was elected a tribune after the affair. However this may be, upon his ejection from the senate, we hear no more of him for some time. The unknown author of the Declaratio in Sallustium (c. 5, 6) merely hints that he may have gone to Caesar, who was then in Gallia; but such a hint from an unknown person is worth nothing.

In B. C. 47 Sallustius was praetor elect, and was thus restored to his rank. (Dion Cass. xiii. 32.) He nearly lost his life in a mutiny of some of Caesar's troops in Campania, who had been led thither to pass over into Africa. (Appian, Bell. Civ. ii. 92.) Sallustius carried the news of the up roar to Caesar at Rome, and was followed thither by the mutinous soldiers, whom Caesar pacified. Sallustius accompanied Caesar in his African war, B. C. 46 (Bell. Afr. c. 8, 34), and he was sent to the island Cercina (the Karkenna islands, on the coast of Tunisia), to get supplies for Caesar, which he accomplished. Caesar left him in Africa as the governor of Numidia, in which capacity he is charged with having oppressed the people, and enriched himself by unjust means (Dion Cass. xiii. 9, and the note of Reimarus.) He was accused of maladministration before Caesar, but it does not appear that he was brought to trial. The charge is somewhat confirmed by the fact of his becoming immensely rich, as was shown by the expensive gardens which he formed (horti Sallustiani) on the Quirinal. It is conjectured that the abusive attack of Lænæus, a freedman of Pompeius Magnus, is the authority for the scandalous tales against Sallustius (Sueton. De Illust. Grammat. 15); but it is not the only authority. Sallustius retired into privacy after he returned from Africa, and he passed quietly through the troublesome period after Caesar's death. He died B. C. 34, about four years before the battle of Actium. The story of his marrying Cicero's wife, Terentia, is improbable. (Drumann, Geschichte Roms, vol. vi. p. 693.)

The character of Sallustius has been the subject of much discussion among scholars, some of whom attempt to clear him of the scandalous imputations upon his memory. That a partizan, like Sallustius, and a rich man too, must have had many enemies, is agreeable to all experience; and of course he may have had detractors. But to attempt to decide on the real merits of his character, or the degree of his demerits, with such evidence as we have, is puerile industry. It is enough to remark that Dion Cassius always makes a man as bad as he can. That he devoted himself so busily to literature in his retirement is an argument in favour of the latter part of his life at least.

It was probably not till after his return from Africa that Sallustius wrote his historical works. The Catilina, or Bellum Catilinæum, is a history of the conspiracy of Catilina during the consulship of Cicero, B. C. 63. The introduction to this history, which some critics admire, is only a feeble and rhetorical attempt to act the philosopher and moralist. The history, however, is valuable; and the charge that the history has underrated the service of Cicero, is not maintainable. He would have damaged Cicero more in the opinion of the admirers of Cicero, at least, by not writing the history at all. Sallustius was a living spectator of the events which he describes, and considering that he was not a friend of Cicero, and was a partizan of Caesar, he wrote with fairness. The speeches which he has inserted in his history are certainly his own composition; but we may assume that Caesar's speech was extant, and that he gave the substance of it. If he wrote the history after Caesar's death, which is probable, that may explain why he had the bad taste to put his own composition in the place of Caesar's genuine oration. Cato's speech on the same occasion was taken down by short-hand writers (Plut. Cato Minor, c. 23); and Sallustius of course had it in his hands; but still he wrote one himself (Drumann, Geschichte Roms, vol. iii. p. 174). He showed his ignorance of the true value of history, and the vanity too in not recording a speech of Cato. Constantius Felicius Durantius, in his Historia Conjurationis Catilinae, has stated the facts which Sallustius either purposely or carelessly omitted in his history.

The Jugurtha, or Bellum Jugurthinum, contains the history of the war of the Romans against Jugurtha, king of Numidia, which began B. C. 111, and continued until B. C. 106. It is likely enough that Sallustius was led to write this work from having resided in Africa, and that he collected some materials there. He cites the Punic Books of King Hempsal, as authority for his general geographical description (Jug. c. 17). The Jugurthine war has a philosophical introduction of the same stamp as that to the Catilina. As a history of the campaign, the Jugurthine war is of no value: there is a total neglect of geographical precision, and apparently not a very strict regard to chronology. There is an oration in the Jugur-thine war (c. 30) of C. Memmius, tribunus plebis, against L. Calpurnius Bestia, which Sallustius declares to be the genuine speech of Memmius; and it is, in fact, very different from those which he composed himself.

Sallustius, also, is said to have written Historizarum Libri Quinque, which were dedicated to Lucullus, a son of L. Licinius Lucullus. The work is supposed to have comprised the period from the consulship of M. Aemilius Lepidus and Q. Lutatius Catulus, b.c. 78, the year of Sulla’s death, to the consulship of L. Vellecius Tullus and L. Aem-ilius Lepidus, b.c. 66, the year in which Cicero was praetor. If this is so, Sallust began his history where that of Sisenna on the Civil Wars of Sulla ended. This work is lost, with the exception of fragments which have been collected and arranged. The fragments contain, among other things, several orations and letters. Some fragments belonging to the third book, and relating to the war with Spartacus, have been published from a Vatican MS. in the present century. (C. Sallustii Cr. Histor. lib. iii. Fragmenta e Cod. Vat.
ed. ab Angelo Maio; edit. auctori et emendator, curante J. Th. Kreysig. Misn. 1830, 8vo.)

The ground for stating that the history of Sallustius began with b.c. 78, is the authority of the fragment in Donatus. (Res Populi Romani, ëe.) But Ausonius (Id. iv. ad Nepotem), seems to speak of some historical work which, as Le Clerc supposes, comprised a period of twelve years before the Tumultus Lepidi in b.c. 78. The commencement of such a work would coincide with b.c. 90, or the outbreak of the Social War, but the twelve years may be referred with equal probability to the period from b.c. 78 to b.c. 66. However, Sallust seems to have treated of the period of Sulla (Plutarch, Comparation of Sulla and Ly-sander, c. 3); though it is possible that this was done only by way of introduction to his historical work. The opusculum of Julius Exsuperantius may, with great probability, be assumed to be an epitome from the works of Sallustius. It commences with speaking of Metellus, the proconsul, taking C. Marius with him to the Jugurthine war; and it terminates with the capture of Calagurris in Spain (Calahorm) by Pompeius, the elevation of his trophies on the Pyrenees, and his return to Rome from Spain, b.c. 72. It does not, therefore, comprise the whole of the period comprehended in the historical works of Sallustius; but Exuperantius certainly followed some work which treated of the wars of Marius and Sulla.

It is, then, a probable conjecture that Sallustius treated of the foregoing subjects in their chronological order, which may not have been the order in in which they were written:—the war of Jugurtha;
the period from the commencement of the Marsic war, b.c. 90, to the death of Sulla, b.c. 78; the tumults caused by the consul M. Aemilius Lepidus upon the death of Sulla; the war of Ser-torius, which ended b.c. 72; the Mithridatic war, which ended b.c. 63; and the conspiracy of Catiline. It was the fashion of Sallust to choose striking periods and events, and to write in piecmeal. Some grammarian probably arranged into the form of a history the works which comprised the period from b.c. 90 to b.c. 66, and this arrangement may have been made at a very early period. Plutarch (Lacullus, 10, 33) twice refers to Sallustius in his history of the campaigns of Lucullus in Asia. A passage in the Pompeius of Plutarch (c. 2) is apparently founded on a fragment, which is arranged in the third book.
The fragments themselves are too meagre to allow the plan of the supposed history of Sallust to be reconstructed, though this has been attempted several times. But the more probable conclusion is that he did not write one history, but wrote several histories, all of which, except the Catili-us and Jugurtha, were arranged either by himself or others, under the title of Histories. Gellius frequently quotes the Histories of Sallustius.

Duæ Epistolas de Re Publica Ordinanda, which appear to be addressed to Caesar at the time when he was engaged in his Spanish campaign (b.c. 49) against Petreius and Afranius, and are attributed to Sallustius; but the opinions of critics on their authenticity are divided. The rhetorical character of them is in itself no ground for supposing that they are not by Sallustius.

The Declamatio in Sallustium, which is attributed to Cicero, is generally admitted to be the work of some rhetorician, the matter of which is the well-known hostility between the orator and the historian. The same opinion is generally maintained as to the Declamatio in Ciceronem, which is attributed to Sallustius; but Quintilianus (Inst. Or. iv. 1. 68) quotes the very words of the commencement of this declamatio; and (ix.
3, 89) the words “O Romule Arpinas.”

Declam. in Cíc. c. 4.

Some of the Roman writers considered that Sallustius imitated the style of Thucydides. (Vell. Pat.
ii. 36.) His language is generally concise and perspicuous: perhaps his love of brevity may have caused the ambiguity that is sometimes found in his sentences. He also affected archaic words. Though he has considerable merit as a writer, his art is always apparent. The terms in which some critics speak of him as a writer seem to be very extravagant. Sallustius had no pretensions to great research or precision about facts; and probably the grammarian Atteius Philologus (Sueton. de Ilist. Gram, 10) may have helped his indolence by collecting materials for him. His reflections have often something of the same artificial and constrained character as his expressions. One may judge that his object was to obtain distinction as a writer; that style was what he thought of more than matter. We have no means of judging how far Sallustius was superior as a writer to Sulla, L. Lucullus, and Sisenna; but he has probably the merit of being the first Roman who wrote what is usually called history. He was not above his contemporaries as a politician: he was a patriotic man, and there are no indications of any comprehensive views, which had a whole nation for their object. He hated the nobility, as a man may do, without loving the people.

The editions of Sallustius are very numerous.
The Editio Princeps was that of Rome, 1470, fol.

lach, Basel, 1823—1831, 3 vols. 4to; and of Kritz, Leipzig, 1826—1834, 2 vols. 8vo., are the principal.
An edition of the text was published by Orelli, Zürich, 1840. The translations are very numerous. The Italian version of Alferi is as close and compact as the original. There are many ENGLISH VERSIONS.

The oldest is Barberly's translation of the "Jugurtha." The latest are by H. Stewart, London, 1806, 2 vols. 4to, and by Arthur Murphy, London, 1807. The Index Editionum Sallustii and Index Versionum, prefixed to Frotscher's edition, show the prodigious labour that has been expended on the works of Sallustius. [698.]

2. SALIUSTIUS CRISPUS, the grandson of the sister of the historian, was adopted by the latter, and inherited his great wealth. In imitation of Macenas, he preferred remaining a Roman eques; and without the dignity of a senator, he possessed more influence in the state than those who had been distinguished by consulships and triumphs. Though given to luxury, and affecting to care only for his personal enjoyments, he possessed great vigour of mind, and capacity for public business. For many years he was second only to Macenas in the confidence of Augustus, and on the fall of that favourite he became the principal adviser of the emperor. He enjoyed the same distinction at first under Tibrius, and having been privy to the murder of Agrippa Postumus, he recommended Livia, when the matter was mentioned in the senate, not to allow the imperial secrets to be discussed in that body. In a. d. 16, he was employed by Tibrius, the successor of Augustus, in a d. 20, at an advanced age, having lost the real confidence of the emperor some time previously, though he continued nominally to be one of his friends (Tac. Ann. i. 6, ii. 40, iii. 30; Senece. de Clem. 10). He possessed valuable copper mines in the Alpine country of the Centrones (Plin. H. N. xxxiv. 2). The Sallustiius, whom Horace attacked in one of his Satires (Sat. 2. 48), is probably the same person as the preceding; but at a later period, when the poet became acquainted with the imperial court, he addressed one of his odes to him. (Corn. ii. 2.)

SALIUSTIUS LUCULLUS, legatus of Britain under Domitian, was slain by that emperor because he had called some names of a new shape Lucullaeis, after his own name. (Suet. Dom. 10.)

SALMO'NEUS (Σαμωνεύς), a son of Aeolus by Enarete, and a brother of Sisyphus. (Apollod. i. 7; § 3; Schol. ad Pind. Pyth. iv. 252.) He was first married to Akridice and afterwards to Sidere; by the former wife he was the father of Tyro. (Hom. Od. xi. 235; Apollod. i. 9, § 8; Dion. iv. 68.) He originally lived in Thessaly, but emigrated to Elis, where he built the town of Salome. (Strab. viii. p. 356.) He there went so far in his presumption and arrogance, that he deemed himself equal to Zeus, and ordered sacrifices to be offered to himself; nay, he even imitated the thunder and lightning of Zeus; but the father of the gods kept the presumptuous man with his thunderbolt, destroyed his town, and punished him in the lower world. (Apollod. i. 9, § 7; Lucian, Tim. 2; Virg. Aen. vi. 585, &c.; Hygin. Fab. 60, 61, 250; Claudian, in Rufus. 514.) [L. S.]

SALO'ME (Σαλομή). 1. Also called Alexandra, was the wife of Aristobulus I., king of the Jews, on whose death, in B.C. 106, she released his brothers, who had been thrown into prison, and advanced the eldest of them (Alexander Jannaeus) to the throne (Joseph. Ant. xiii. 12. § 1, Bell. Jud. i. 4. § 1). By some she has been identified with Alexandra, the wife of Alexander Jannaeus, who, according to this hypothesis, married her, in obedience to the Jewish law, to raise up seed to his brother. Such a conjecture, however, is disproved by the fact, that Hyrcanus II., son of Alexander Jannaeus and Alexandra, was past 80 when he died, in B.C. 30, and therefore must have been born several years before the death of Aristobulus I. (See Joseph. Ant. xiv. 6. § 3.)

2. Daughter of Antipater, the Idumean, by his wife Cypros, and sister to Herod the Great. Salome and her mother conceived the bitterest hatred against Herod's wife Mariamme, who, proud of her Asmonean blood, had overbearing and imprudently contrasted it with theirs; and accordingly, in B.C. 34, on the return of Herod from Laodiceia, whither he had been summoned by Antony to answer for the murder of his brother-in-law, the young Aristobulus (Aristobulus, No. 3), they accused Mariamme of adultery with Josephus (the uncle and husband of Salome), to whose care Herod had committed his wife on his departure, and who consequently fell a victim to the jealousy of the king. Nor did many years elapse before, in B.C. 29, the life of Mariamme herself also was sacrificed to the anger of Herod, instigated by the calumnious representations of Salome and Cypros. (Mariamme, No. 1.) On the death of Josephus, Salome married Costobarus, a noble Idumean, whom Herod had made governor of Idumaea and Gaza. Soon after his marriage, Costobarus was detected in a treasonable negotiation with Cleopatra, queen of Egypt, to whom he offered to transfer his allegiance, if she could prevail on Antony to add Idumaea to her dominions; and it was only by the entreaties of Cypros and Salome that Herod was induced to spare his life. It was not long, however, before dissensions arose between Salome and her husband, whereupon she divorced him, in defiance of the Jewish law, which gave no such power to the wife, and effected his death by representing to her brother that she had repudiated him because she had discovered that he had abused the royal clemency, and was still guilty of treasonable practices. This occurred in B.C. 26. Against the sons of Mariamme, Alexander and Aristobulus (Aristobulus, No. 4), Salome continued to cherish the same hatred with which she had persecuted their mother to her fate; and with this feeling she also strove successfully to infect her own daughter, Berenice, whom Aristobulus, about B.C. 16, had received in marriage from Herod. The hostility was cordially reciprocated by the princes, who, however, were no match for the arts of Salome, aided too as she was by her brother Pheroras, and her nephew Antipater, and who only played into the hands of their enemies by their indirect violence of language. Salome did indeed herself incur for a time the displeasure of Herod, who suspected her, with good reason, of having calumniated him to his son Alexander, as harbouring evil designs towards Gephyra, the wife of the latter, while his anger against her was further provoked by her undisguised passion for Sylaeus, the minister of Obodas, king of the Nabataeans, and his ambassador at the Jewish court. Again, when Herod, lending a ready ear to the calumnies against his son Alexander, had thrown him into prison, the young man retaliated with charges of treason against Pheroras and Salome, whereby the king's perplexity and tormenting suspicion were greatly increased. At length, however, the machinations of Salonie and her accomplices prevailed against the princes, and succeeded in effecting their death, in A.D. 6. Nor was the favour of Herod ever afterwards withdrawn from his sister, who was prudent enough, indeed, to cultivate it assiduously. Thus, listening to the advice of the empress Livia, she obeyed her brother in marrying Alexas, his confidant, though sorely against her will; and she detected and put him on his guard against the treasurously designs of Antipater and Pherezas. It was to her accordingly, and to her husband Alexas, as those upon whom he could best depend, that Herod, on his death-bed at Jericho, gave the atrocious order, that the Jewish nobles, whom he had sent for and shut up in the Hippodrome, should all be murdered there as soon as he breathed his last, so that his death might excite at any rate lamentations of some kind. This command, however, they did not obey. On the decease of Herod, Salome received as a bequest from him the towns of Jamnia and Phasaelis, and Phalezis, besides a large quantity of money, to which Augustus added a palace at Ascalon; and Josephus tells us that her annual income amounted altogether to 60 talents. She died during the time that M. Ambivius was procurator of Judea; i.e. between 10 and 13 A.D., leaving the bulk of her possessions to the empress Livia. (Strab. xvi. p. 765; Joseph. Ant. xiv. 7, xv. 3, 7, xvi. 1, 3, 4, 7—11, xvii. 1, 2—9, 11, xvii. 2. Bell. Jud. i. 8, 22—25, 28, 29, 32, 33, ii. 6, 9; Euseb. Hist. Eccl. i. 8.)

3. A daughter of Herod the Great by Elpis. In addition to what her father bequeathed to her, Augustus gave her a considerable dowry, and married her to one of the sons of Pherezas, Herod's brother. (Joseph. Ant. xvii. 1. § 3, 8, § 11, § 5. Bell. Jud. i. 28, § 4, 29, § 1. ii. 6. § 3.)

4. Daughter of Herodias by Herod Philip, son of Herod the Great, was the mother, who pleased Herod Antipas by her dancing, and obtained from him the execution of John the Baptist. She was twice married—1st to her uncle Philip, the tetrarch of Ituraea and Trachoniotes, who died childless; and 2d, to her cousin Aristobulus, son of Herod king of Chalcis [Aristobulus, No. 6.], by whom she had three sons (Matt. xiv. 8—12; Mark, vi. 17—29; Joseph. Ant. xviii. 5. §§ 2, 4). The legendary account of her death, as given by Nicophonus in his Ecclesiastical History (i. 20), is a very clumsy invention. [E. E.]

SALONIA, the second wife of Cato the Censor, was the daughter of a scribe, and client of the latter, and bore the vigorous old man a son when he had completed his eightieth year. This son, who was called M. Cato Salonius, was the grandfather of Cato Uticensis. (Plut. Cat. Mag. 24; Gell. xii. 19.) It is stated in Heronymus (in Jovian. vol. iv. p. 190, ed. Paris) that the name of Cato's second wife was Actoria Paula, but the name is probably a mistake of the copyist for Aemilia Paula, who was the wife of the Censor's eldest son. (Drummann, Geschichte Roms, vol. v. p. 148, &c.)

SALONI'NA, the wife of Caecina, the general of Vitellius. (Tac. Hist. ii. 20.)

SALONI'NA, CORNE'LIUS, Augusta, the wife of Gallienus and mother of Salonius. Since her son perished at the age of seventeen [Saloni-}

SALONI'NUS, upon the capture of Colonie Agrippina by Postumus, in A.D. 259, she must have been married before A.D. 242, that is, upwards of ten years before the elevation of Valerian. Zonaras asserts that she witnessed with her own eye the death of her husband before the walls of Milan, in A.D. 268, a statement fully confirmed, as far as dates are concerned, by the numismatics found on Alexandrian medals. Hence it is evident that Gibbon is mistaken in supposing that Pipara or Pipa, the daughter of the Suevic Attalus, had any claim to be regarded as the lawful spouse of Gallienus.

The Roman medals of Salonie, which are very common, exhibit those names only which are placed at the head of this article, but on the productions of the Greek mint we find also the appellations Julia (IOT. KOP. CAADGNINA), Publia Licinia (PIO. AIK. KOP. CAADGNINA), and Chrysogona (CAADGN. XPTCOfONH. CEB.). From the last some have concluded that she was of Grecian origin, but of her family we know nothing. (For authorities see Gallienus; Salonius; Valerianus.) [W. E.]

COIN OF SALONI'NA.

SALONI'NUS, was given by Asinius Pollio, as an agnomen to his son C. Asinius Gallus [Gallus, Asinius, No. 2.]. Asinius Gallus seems not to have employed the name himself, but he gave it as a cognomen to one of his sons by Vipsania, the former wife of the emperor Tiberius. This C. Asinius Salonius, died in A.D. 28. (Tac. Ann. iii. 75.)

SALONI'NUS, P. LIC'IUNIUS CORNE'LIUS VALERIANI'US, son of Gallienus and Salonina, grandson of the emperor Valerian. When his father and grandfather assumed the title of Augustus, in A.D. 253, the youth received the designation of Caesar. Some years afterwards he was left in Gaul, under the charge of Silvanus, at the period when Gallienus was hastily summoned to encounter the rebel Ingenuus, in Pannonia. The insurrection headed by Postumus soon after broke out, and Saloninus was driven to take refuge in Colonie Agrippina, where he was put to death by the conqueror, upon the capture of the city in A.D. 259 [see Postumus], being at that time about seventeen years old. In addition to the names placed at the head of this article, we find Gallienus upon a coin of Perinthus (see also Zonaras, xii. 24), and Equitatus upon one of Samos. The appellations Cornelius Saloninus appear to have been inherited from his mother, the remainder from his paternal ancestors. Great embarrassment has been caused to historians and archaeologists by the circumstance that, upon many of the numerous medals, both Greek and Roman, struck in his honour, while he was yet alive, he is styled Augustus; while on those which commemorate his apothesis, he appears as Caesar only. Among the various explanations proposed of this anomaly, the most plausible is founded upon the supposition that, when left alone in Gaul, he was invested for the time being with the rank of Augustus, in order that he might command more respect during the absence of his father, but that the rank thus conferred being intended to serve a temporary purpose only, was extinguished by his death. Zonaras (xili. 24), when speaking of Gallienus, remarks, in passing, that his son, who was besieged by Postumus, bore the same name with his father, was regarded as heir to the empire, and was a comely and talented youth. (Trebell. Poll. Salonin. Galli- on.; Zosim. i. 38; Gruter, Corp. Iusc. col. xxv. 5; Breugnigny, in the Mémoires de l'Académie de Sciences et Belles Lettres, vol. xxxii. p. 262; Eckhel, vol. vii. p. 421.)

COIN OF SALONIUS.

SALONIUS. 1. P. Salonius, had been tribune of the soldiers, and first centurion for several alternate years, and was hated by the soldiers because he had been opposed to their mutinous projects in B.c. 342. (Liv. vii. 41.)

2. C. Salonius, one of the triumvirs who founded the colony at Tempsa in B.c. 194. He was appointed in B.c. 173 one of the deccmvirs for dividing certain lands in Liguria and Cisalpine Gaul among the Roman citizens and the Latins. (Liv. xxxiv. 45, xili. 4.)

3. Q. Salonius Sarrha, praetor B.c. 192, obtained Sicily as his province. (Liv. xxxv. 10, 20.)

4. M. Salonius, the father of the second wife of Cato the Censor. (Salonia.)

SALONIUS, bishop of Genua about the middle of the fifth century, was the son of Eucherius, bishop of Lyons, and the pupil of Salvianus [SALVIANUS], who dedicated him to his two works, De Avaritia and De Providentia. He is supposed to have died before A.D. 473, because in the acts of the Council of Arles, held during that year, a certain Theophilius is spoken of as presiding over the see of Genua.

There is still extant a work by Salonius, Expositio Mysticæ in Parabolæ Salomonis et Ecclesiasten, otherwise entitled In Parabolæ Solomonis Dialogi II., or In Parabolæ et Ecclesiasten Solomonis Dialogi, in the form of a conversation between himself and his brother, Veranus. We have also an Epistola, written in his own name, in that of his brother, and of Ceres, addressed to Leo the Great.

The Expositio was first printed at Haguenau (Hagenow), 4to. 1532. It will be found in the Orthographia of Heliodrus, Basel, 1550; in the similar collection of Grynaeus, Basel, 1569; and in the Bibliotheca Patrum Maxima, vol. viii. p. 401, fol. Lugd. 1677.

The letter to Leo is included in the editions of that pontiff's works by Quenel, and by the brothers Balderini, being numbered lxvi. in the former, and lxviii. in the latter. (Schömemann, Bibl. Patrum Lat. vol. ii. § 53.)

SALVIANUS, an Athenian sculptor, of unknown date, whose name is inscribed upon a large vase of Parian marble, beautifully sculptured with figures in high relief, representing—Hermes giving the infant Dionysus to the Nymphs to educate. This vase was found at Corinna, on the Gulf of Gaeta, and was applied to use as a font in the cathedral of Gaeta, but was afterwards removed to the Neapolitan Museum, where it now is. (Gruter. Thes. Inscr. p. lxxvii. No. 7; Spon, Miscell. vol. ii. p. 25; Mus. Borlton.; Nagler, Künstler-Lexicon, s. v.)

SALVIA GENS, was properly speaking no Roman gens. A few insignificant persons of this name are mentioned towards the end of the republic, but the name became of importance in the imperial period from the emperor, M. Salvius Otbo, who was descended from an ancient and noble family of the town of Fenetrum in Etruria.

SALVIA TITISCENIA, a Roman female mentioned by M. Antoninus in a letter to Octavian. (Suet. Aug. 69.)

SALVIANUS, an accomplished ecclesiastical writer of the fifth century, who, although never raised to the episcopal dignity, is styled by Gen- nadius, "the master of bishops." He was born somewhere in the vicinity of Trèves, a city with which he was evidently well acquainted. It is uncertain whether he was educated in the true faith, but he certainly was a Christian at the period of his marriage with Palladina, a pagan lady of Cologne, the daughter of Hypatius and Queta; for he not only speedily convinced his wife of her errors, but after the birth of a daughter, Auspicola, persuaded her to adopt some of the leading observances of a monastic life. Having, in consequence of this step, incurred the displeasure of his father-in-law, whom, however, after a lapse of seven years, he succeeded in appeasing, and eventually in converting, he removed to the south of France, and became a presbyter of the Church at Marseilles. Here he passed the remainder of his life, enjoying the friendship of the most distinguished among the holy men of that country, among others of Eucherius, bishop of Lyons, to whose sons, Salonius and Ve- ranus, he acted as preceptor. The period of his death is uncertain, but he was still alive when Gen- nadius compiled his biographies, that is, about A.D. 490.

The following works by this author are still extant:—

1. Adversus Avaritiam Libri IV, ad Ecclesiæ Catholicae, published under the name of Timotheus, about A.D. 440. It was first printed in the Anti- dotum contra diversa omnium fere Sacculorum Haereses of Io. Richardus, fol. Basel, 1528, under the title Timothei Episcopi ad Ecclesiæ Catholicae totu Orbe diffusum et Salviani Episcopi Massiliensis in Librum Timothei ad Salvionem Episcopum praebuit.

11. De Providentia s. De Gubernatione Dei et de Justo Dei praesentique Judicio Libri. Written during the inroads by the barbarians upon the Roman empire, A.D. 451—453. It was first printed by Fraschini, Basel, fol. 1550, under the title D. Salviani Massiliensis Episcopi de vero Judicio et Providentia Dei ad S. Saloniam Episcopo...
SALVIDIENUS.

SALVIUS. 701

received from Octavian, who had even promised him the consulship, he wrote to M. Antonius, offering to induce the troops in his province to desert from Octavian. His proposal came too late. Antonius, who had just been reconciled to Octavian, betrayed the treachery of Salvidiennus. The latter was forthwith summoned to Rome on some pretext, and on his arrival was accused by Augustus in the senate, and condemned to death, B.c. 40. Livy relates that he put an end to his own life. (Appian, B. C. iv. 85, v. 29, 24, 27, 31—35, 66; Dion Cass. xvi. 13, 18, 33; Liv. Epit. 123, 127; Vell. Pat. ii. 76; Suet. Oct. 66.)

The annexed coin was probably struck by Salvidiennus. It bears on the obverse the head of Octavianus, with C. CAESAR IVL. R. P. C., and on the reverse Q. SALVIUS IMP. COS. DESIG. The only difficulty in referring it to the preceding person is that he is here called Q. Salvius, while in the writers his name is always Q. Salvidiennus. But, on the other hand, there is no Q. Salvius mentioned by any ancient writer to whom it can belong, while the consul designatus applies to Q. Salvidiennus, as well as at the time at which the coin was struck, namely, while Octavianus was triumvir. (Eckhel, vol. v. p. 299.)

COIN OF Q. SALVIDIENIUS RUFUS.

SALVIUS. 1. A literary slave of Atticus, is frequently mentioned in Cicero's correspondence. (Cic. ad Att. ix. 7, xii. 44, § 3, xvi. 2, § 6, ad Fam. ix. 10, ad Q. Fr. iii. 1. § 6, iii. 2.)

2. A freedman, who corrupted the son of Hortensius. (Cic. ad Att. iii. 13, 15.)

3. Tribune of the plebs, B.c. 43, first put his veto upon the decree of the senate, which declared M. Antonius a public enemy, but was afterwards induced not only to withdraw his opposition, but to become a warm supporter of all the measures of Cicero. He was, in consequence, proscribed by the triumvirs towards the close of the year, and was put to death while he was entertaining some friends at a banquet. (Appian, B. C. iii. 50, &c., iv. 17.)

SALVIUS, the leader of the revolted slaves in Sicily, is better known by the name of Tryphon, which he assumed. [TRYPHON.]

SALVIUS, artists. 1. A statuary, whose name is inscribed on the edge of the colossal bronze pine-apple, 16 Roman palms high, which stands in the great niche erected by Bramante, in the gardens of the Vatican, and which was found at the foot of the Mausoleum of Hadrian, when the foundations of the church of S. Maria della Trasmondata were being prepared. Hence it is inferred, with great probability, that this pine-apple formed originally the ornamental apex of the Mausoleum of Hadrian. If this conjecture be true, we have of course the date of the artist. The inscription is, P. CINCI. P. L. SALVIUS, which shows that the artist was a freedman. (Gruter, vol. i. p. clxxvi.)

SALVIUS, the author of the Hervormde Kerkboek, a very popular work in the Netherlands. (Oud. en Nieuw. 1663.)

SALVIUS, a citizen of Rome, and a poet, B.c. 204—B.c. 167. He was appointed by Augustus to direct the celebration of the 10th anniversary of his victory over Tiberius, B.c. 19, and was rewarded with the praetorship. (Appian, B. C. iv. 108.)

SALVIUS, a senator, and a poet, B.c. 97—B.c. 65. He was an enemy of Marcus Lollius, and having been defeated by himself, fled to the Britons. (Appian, B. C. iv. 108.)
SA'LUS.

SALUS, the personification of health, prosperity, and the public welfare, among the Romans. In the first of these three senses she answers very closely to the Greek Hygeia, and her likeness is often represented in works of art with the same attributes as the Greek goddess.

In the second sense she represents prosperity in general. (Plaut, Cist. iv. 2, 76; Terent,Adelph. iv. 7, in fin.; Cic. pro Font. 6), and was invoked by the husbandmen at seed-time. (Ov. Fast. iii. 889; Macrobi. Sat. i. 16.)

In the third sense Salus is the goddess of the public welfare (Salus publica or Romana). In this capacity a temple had been vowed to her in the year B.C. 307, by the censor C. Junius Bubulcus on the Quirinal hill (Liv. iv. 43, x. 1), which was afterwards decorated with paintings by C. Fabius Pictor. (Val. Max. viii. 14. § 6; Plin. H. N. xxxv. 4; Tacit. Ann. xv. 74.) She was worshipped publicly on the 30th of April, in conjunction with Pax, Concordia, and Janus. (Ov. Fast. iii. 681; Zonar. x. 34.) It had been customary at Rome every year, about the time when the consuls entered upon their office, for the augurs and other high-ranked officers, and for the senators, to consecrate the fortunes of the republic during the coming year; this observation of the signs was called augurium Salutis. In the time of Cicero, this ceremony had become a mere matter of form, and neglected; but Augustus restored it, and the custom afterwards remained as long as paganism was the religion of the state. (Sueton. Aug. 31; Tacit. Ann. xii. 23; Lydus, de Mens. iv. 10; comp. Cic. de Leg. ii. 8.) This solemnity was conducted with prayers and vows for the good of the people, and the success of the generals and magistrates, and took place on some day on which there was no disturbance, discord, or any thing else which, as a bad omen, might have interfered with the prayers. (Cic. de Div. i. 47; Dion Cass. xxxvii. 24; Fest. s. v. Maximum proctorem.) Hence it was regarded as a favourable sign when the people were cheerful and joyous, even in time of war; and for this reason the magistrates even allowed themselves to be ridiculed by the people. (Lydus, l. c.)

Salus was represented, like Fortuna, with a rudder, a globe at her feet, and sometimes in a sitting posture, pouring from a patera a libation upon an altar, around which a serpent is winding itself. (Hirt, Mythol. Bilderb. p. 109.)

[LYS.]

SALUS.

SALUSTIUS. [SALUSTIUS.]

SALV/NTHIUS (Σαλυνθιος), a king of the Aeraeans, gave a hospitable reception to the Pela-ponnesians, who, after the battle of Olyae (c. 246), had abandoned their Ambracian allies and secured their own safety by a secret agreement with Demosthenes, the Athenian general. In B. C. 424, Demosthenes invaded the territory of Saliuntius, and reduced him to subjection. (Thuc. iii. 111, iv. 77.)

[Ε.Ε.]

SA/'MIA (Σαμία), a daughter of the river-god Maeander, and wife of Aeneas, by whom she became the mother of Samos. (Paus. vii. 4. § 2) Samia also occurs as a surname of Hera, which is derived from her temple and worship in the island of Samos. (Herod. iii. 60; Paus. vii. 4. § 4; Tacit. Ann. iv. 14; comp. Hera.) There was also a tradition that Hera was born or at least brought up in Samos. (Paus. l. c.; Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. i. 187.)

[SAMIAN, a surname of Poseidon, derived from his temples in Samos and Samikon in Euboea. (Strab. xiv. p. 657; comp. xvi. pp. 343, 347; Paus. v. 25. § 5.)

SAMUS, a Roman eunuch in the reign of Claudius, put an end to his own life, a.d. 47. (Tac. Ann. xi. 5.)

SAMUS, or SAMUS (Σαμος, Σαμώ), a lyric and epigrammatic poet, was a Macedonian, and was brought up with Philip V., the son of Demetrius, by whom also he was put to death, but for what reason we are not informed. (Polyb. v. 9, xxiv. 6.) He therefore flourished at the end of the third century, B.C. Polybius (v. 9) has preserved one of his iambic lines; and two epigrams by him are contained in the Greek Anthology, both on the subject of Philip's exploit in killing the wild bull on Mount Orbelus, on which we have also an epigram by Antipater of Sidon. (Brunck, Anal. vol. ii. p. 10, No. 18.) The name is written in both the above ways, and in the Planidean Anthology both epigrams are ascribed to Siamius, doubtless by the common error of substituting a well-known name for one less known. (Brunck, Anal. vol. ii. comp. Siamius, Anth. Graec. vol. i. p. 236, vol. xii. pp. 948, 949.)

SAMMONICUS SERENUS. [Serenus.]

SAM'OLAS (Σαμολας), an Achaean, was one of the three commissioners who were sent by the Cyrean Greeks from Cotyra to Sinope, in B.C. 400, for ships to convey the army to Heraclea. (Xen. Anab. v. 6. § 14, vi. 1. § 14.) Not long after, when the Greeks were at Calpe, we find Samolas commanding a division of the reserve in the successful engagement with the allied troops of the Bithynians and Pharnabazus. (Xen. Anab. vi. 5. § 11.)

[SAMOLES, a surname of Poseidon, derived from his temples in Samos and Samikon in Euboea. (Strab. xiv. p. 657; comp. xvi. pp. 343, 347; Paus. v. 25. § 5.)

and "Hospitum Exceptum," was born at Rome of a rich and noble family in the fifth century after Christ. He studied medicine, not as a profession, but as a means of being useful to the poor, whom he attended gratuitously and with great success. While still young he removed to Constantinople, where he continued his charitable ministrations by converting his house into a hospital for the sick poor; and where he was ordained priest at about the age of thirty. Here he became acquainted with the emperor Justinian, whom he cured of a painful and obstinate disease; and whom he persuaded to build a hospital instead of conferring any reward upon himself. Sampson did not live long after this event, but died about the year 530 or 531. Numerous miracles are said to have been wrought by him after his death, on account of which he has been canonized by the Romish and Greek churches. His hospital, which was near the church of St. Sophia, was twice destroyed by fire, but was rebuilt, and existed in full usefulness long after his death. His memory is celebrated on June 27. There is a long and interesting life of St. Sampson by Simeon Metaphrastes, which is inserted in the "Acta Sanctorum" (June, vol. v. p. 261, &c.). See also Monolog. Grœac. June 247, vol. ii. p. 144; Bzovius, Nomenclatar Sanctor. Professionis Medicor. An account of St. Sampson's hospital may be found in Du Cange's C Polis Christiana, iv. 9. 9. [W. A. G.]

SANACHARIBUS. [SETON.]

SANATROCES, a king of Parthia. [AR.-
SACIÆ, p. 363, a.]

SANCHUNIATHION (Σανκχυνιαθίων), an ancient Phoenician writer, whose works were translated into Greek by Philon Byblius, who lived in the latter half of the first century of the Christian erg. A considerable fragment of the translation of Philon is preserved by Eusebius in the first book of his Præparatio Evangelii. The most opposite opinions have been held by the learned respecting the authenticity and value of the writings of Sanchuniathon. The scholars of the seventeenth century, Scaliger, Grotti, Bochart, Selden, and others, regarded them as genuine remains of the most remote antiquity, and expended, or rather wasted, no small amount of learning in attempting to reconcile them with the statements in the old Testament. Their views were carried out to the fullest extent by Richard Cumberland, bishop of Peterborough, who translated into Enlish the extracts in Eusebius (London, 1729), with historical and chronological remarks, in which he asserts that all the antediluvian patriarchs of the Old Testament are to be found in Sanchuni-athon! Modern scholars, however, have seen a very different view of Sanchuniathon and his writings;
but before we state their opinions, it will be advisable to see what the ancient writers themselves say respecting him. The first author who mentions him is Athenaeus, who speaks (iii. p.
126) of Kunianth (of which variation in the name more will be said presently), and Mochus, as writers on Phoenician matters (Φοινικίκα). The next writer who mentions him is Porphryus (de Abatn. ii. 56, p. 94, ed. Holsten.), who says that Sanchuniathon wrote a Phoenician history (Φοιnikik lntopki), in the Phoenician language, which was translated into Greek in eight books by Philon Byblius. We likewise learn from Eusebius that Porphyryus had made great use of the writings of Sanchuniathon (of course the translation by Philon) in his work against the Christians, which has not come down to us. In that work he called Sanchuniathon a native of Berytus (Euseb.
Præpar. Ev. i. 6, x. 11). Next comes Eusebius himself, whose attention seems to have been first drawn to Sanchuniathon by the quotations in Porphyryus. It is evident from the language of Eusebius that he had consulted the translation of Philon himself, and that his acquaintance with the writer was not confined to the extracts in Porphry-rus, as some modern scholars have asserted.
Eusebius also calls Sanchuniathon a native of Berytus, but he says that his Phoenician history was divided into nine (not eight) books by Philon.
This is all the independent testimony we possess respecting Sanchuniathon and the Greek translation by Philon, for it is pretty clear that subsequent writers who speak of both borrow their accounts either from Porphyryus or Eusebius.
The most important later testimonies are those of The-doretus and Suidas. The former writer says (de Car. Graec. Affect. Serm. ii.): "Sanchuniathon, from Berytus, wrote the Theologia (Thεολογία) of the Phoenicians, which was translated into Greek by Philon, not the Hebrew but the Bybian." The-doretus calls the work of Sanchuniathon a Theo-logia, on account of the nature of its contents.
Suidas (s. v.) describes Sanchuniathon as a Tyran philosopher, who lived at the time of the Trojan war, and gives the following list of his works:
Περί τοῦ Ἑρμοῦ φυσιολογίας, τῆς μεταφασθῆ to, (namely, by Philon). Πάτρια Ταυρίων τῇ Φωνικῶν διάλεκτῳ, Ἀγνωστικὴ Θεολογίαν καὶ ἄλλα τινά.
But such an enumeration of different works is of little value from an inaccurate compiler like Suidas.
They are probably only different titles of the same work.

Now it is quite clear from the preceding account that we have no evidence even for the existence of Sanchuniathon except the testimony of Philon Byblius himself. He is not mentioned by any writer before Philon Byblius, not even by Josephus or by Philon Judaeus, who might have been expected to have heard at least of his name. This is suspicious at first sight. The discovery of old books written by an author, of whom no one has ever heard, and in a language which few can read, is a kind of imposture known to modern as well as ancient times. The genuineness and authenticity of the work must rest entirely on the nature of its contents; and even a superficial perusal of the extracts in Eusebius will convince almost every scholar of the present day that the work was a forger)' of Philon. Nor is it difficult to see what object the forgery was executed. Philon was evidently one of the many adherents of the doctrine of Euhemerus, that all the gods were originally men, who had distinguished themselves in their lives as kings, warriors, or benefactors of man, and became worshipped as divinities after their death. This doctrine Philon applied to the religious system of the Oriental nations, and especially of the Phoenicians; and in order to gain more credit for his statements, he pretended that they were taken from an ancient Phoenician writer. This writer he says was a native of Ber-tyus, lived in the time of Semiramis, and dedicated his work to Abibalus, king of Berytus. Having thus invented a high antiquity for his Phoenician authority; he pretended that his writer had taken the greatest pains to obtain information, that he had received some of his accounts from Hierom-balus, the priest of the god Jevo, and had collected others from inscriptions in the temples and the public records preserved in each city. This is all pure invention, to impose more effectually upon the public. The general nature of the work is in itself sufficient to prove it to be a forgery; but in addition to this we find an evident attempt to show that the Greek religion and mythology were derived from the Phoenician, and a confusion between the Phoenician and Hebrew religions, which are of themselves sufficient to convince any one that the work was not of genuine Phoenician origin. But though the work is thus clearly a forgery, the question still remains, whether the name Sanchuniathon was a pure invention of Philon or not.

Movers, who has discussed the whole subject with ability, thinks that Philon availed himself of a name already in use, though it was not the name of a person. He supposes that Sanchuniathon was the name of the sacred books of the Phoenicians, and that its original form was Σαν-Χων-ιαθ, which might be represented in the Hebrew characters by סנכynthia. Dionys. iv. 59; Varro, De Ling. Lat. v. 66. Sancus is said to have been the father of the Sabine hero Sabinus. (Dionys. ii. 49; August. de Civ. Dei, xviii. 19; Lactant. i. c.)

SANCTUS, St., is said by C. B. Carpzovius (De Medicis ab Eccles. pro Sanctis habitis), who copies Bzovius (Nomenclator Sanctor. Profession Medicorum), to have been a physician, and a native of Otriculum (or Oreculum), a city of central Italy, who was put to death with cruel torments in the reign of M. Aurelius Antoninus, and whose memory is celebrated on June 26. Both these writers quote as their authority for this statement, "Monimenta Ecclesiae Otriciuanae in Sabinis." It seems probable that there is some error or confusion in this account, which the writer is not able at present to clear up quite satisfactorily. In the Menologium Graecum (vol. iii. p. 132) St. Sanctus (Σαντκυτος) is called a native of Ravenna, and is said to have suffered martyrdom under M. Antoninus. His memory is celebrated on July 26, and he is not stated to have been a physician. In Ugheili, Italia Sacra (vol. x. p. 151), no mention is made of St. Sanctus, but St. Medicus is said to have been one of the patron saints of Otriculum. And in the Acta Sanctorum no mention is made of St. Sanctus under June 26 or July 26; but St. Medicus, a native of Otriculum, but not a physician, whose history is not unlike that of St. Sanctus in Bzovius and the Menologium Graecum, is commemorated under the date of June 25. [W. A. G.]

SANCUS, SANGUS or SEMO SANCUS, a Roman divinity, is said to have been originally a Sabine god, and identical with Hercules and Deus Fidius. (Lactant. i. 15; Ov. Fast. vi. 216; Propert. iv. 9, 74; Sil. Ital. viii. 421.) The name which is etymologically the same as Sanctus, and connected with Sancure, seems to justify this belief, and characterises Sancus as a divinity presiding over oaths. Sancus also had a temple at Rome, on the Quirinal, opposite that of Quirinus, and close by the gate which derived from him the name of Sanguis porta. This sanctuary was the same as that of Deus Fidius, which had been consecrated in the year b.c. 465 by Sp. Postumius, but was said to have been founded by Tarquinius Superbus (Liv. vii. 20, xxxii. 1; Dionys. i. 60; Ov. Fast. vi. 213, &c.), and the ancients thoroughly identified their Deus Fidius with Sancus. He is accordingly regarded as the protector of the marriage oath, of the law of nations, and the law of hospitality. (Dionys. iv. 59; Varro, De Ling. Lat. v. 66.) Sancus is said to have been the father of the Sabine hero Sabinus. (Dionys. ii. 49; August. de Civ. Dei, xviii. 19; Lactant. i. c.)

SA'ANDACUS (Σάνδακος), a son of Aystynos, and a grandson of Phaethon. He is said to have migrated from Syria to Cilicia, to have founded the town of Celenderis, and to have become the father of Cinyras by Pharnace. (Apollod. iii. 14. § 3.) [L. S.]

SANDOCES (Σανδοκες), a Persian, son of Thomsonus, was one of the royal judges under Dareius Hydraspis, and having given an unjust sentence under the influence of a bribe, was condemned by the king to crucifixion. But after he had been placed on the cross, Dareius called to mind that his services outweighed his offences, and he was accordingly taken down and pardoned. In b.c. 480, he was a viceroy ofume in Aelia, and, in the invasion of Greece by Xerxes in that year, commanded a squadron of 15 ships, which were detained behind when the main body left Sepia, and, sailing on afterwards to the south by themselves, were captured by the Greeks off Artemisium. (Herod. vii. 194.) [E. E.]

SANDROCOTTUS (Σανδρόκοττος), an Indian king at the time of Seleucus Nicator, ruled over the powerful nation of the Gangaridæ and Prasi on the banks of the Ganges. The Gangaridæ, also written Gandaridae, and the Prasi, are probably the same people as the Curtius and Judaeus, known in the neighbourhood of the Ganges, and the latter being of Hindu origin, and the same as the Praedi, the eastern country of Sanscrit writers. The capital of Sandrocottus was Palibothra, called by the Sanscrit writers Pataliputra, probably in the neighbourhood of the modern Patna. The Greek writers relate that the father of Sandrocottus was a man of low origin, being the son of a barber, whom the queen had married after putting her husband the king to death. He is called by Di- dorus Siculus (xvi. 93, 94) Sandramae, and by Q. Curtius (ix. 2) Agrarmes, the latter name being probably only a corruption of the former. This king sent his son Sandrocottus to Alexander the Great, who was then at the Hyphasis, and he is reported to have said that Alexander might easily have conquered the eastern parts of India, since the king was hated on account of his wickedness, and the treachery of his brother. Justin, who states that Alexander, likewise relations, that Sandrocottus saw Alexander, and that having offended him, he was ordered to be put to death, and escaped only by flight. Justin says nothing about his being the king's son, but simply relates that he was of obscure origin, and that after he escaped from Alexander he became the leader of a band of robbers, and finally obtained the supreme power. So much seems certain, that in the troubles which followed the death of Alexander, Sandrocottus or his father extended his dominions over the greater part of northern India, and conquered the Macedonians, who had been left by Alexander in the Panjab. After the general peace between the successors of Alexander in B.C. 311, Seleucus was left for ten years in the undisturbed possession of his dominions, and at some period during this time he made an effort to recover the Indian conquests of Alexander. The year in which he undertook the expedition is not stated, but from the account of Justin it would appear to have been only a short time before the war with Antigonus, that is, B.C. 302. It is unknown how far Seleucus penetrated in India; according to some accounts he advanced as far as Palibothra. At all events, he did not succeed in the object of his expedition; for, in the peace concluded between the two monarchs, Seleucus ceded to Sandrocottus not only his conquests in the Panjab, but also the country of the Paropamisuses. Seleucus in return received five hundred war elephants, which had then become an object of so much importance as perhaps to be almost an equivalent for the loss of the dominions which he sustained. The peace was cemented by a matrimonial alliance between the nearest of his kinsmen, Justin. Megasthenes subsequently resided for many years at the court of Sandrocottus as the ambassador of Seleucus; and to the work which Megasthenes wrote on India, later writers were chiefly indebted for their accounts of the country. [MEGASTHENES.] The name of Sandrocottus is written both by Plutarch and Appian Androcottus without the sibilant; and Athenaeus gives us the form Sandroctopus.
porary with Alexander, to a degree of approximation that cannot possibly be the work of accident.” (See also Sir W. Jones, in Asiat. Researches, vol. iv. p. 11; Schlegel, Indische Bibliothek, vol. i. p. 243, &c.; Lassen, De l'entopotamia, p. 61; Droysen, Hellenismus, vol. i. p. 519, &c., vol. ii. p. 68.)

Sanga, Q. FA'BIUS, the patronus of the Allobroges, was the person to whom the ambassadors of the Allobroges disclosed the treasonable designs of the Catinian conspirators. Sanga acquainted the litigants of Allobroges, Cicero, who was thus enabled to obtain the evidence which led to the apprehension and execution of Lentulus and his associates, b. c. 63. Q. Sanga is mentioned as one of the friends of Cicero who besought the consul L. Piso, in b. c. 58, not to support Clodius in his measures against Cicero. (Sall. Cat. 41; Appian, B. C. ii. 4; Cic. in Piso. 31.)

Sangarius (Σαγγαριός), a river-god, is described as the son of Oceannus and Tethys, and as the husband of Metope, by whom he became the father of Hecabe. (Hes. Thesp. 344; Apollod. iii. 12. § 5.) The river Sangarius (in Phrygia) itself is said to have derived its name from one Sangas, who had offended Rhea, and was punished by her, being changed into water. (Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. ii. 722.)

Sannio, a name of the buoy in the mimes (Cic. de Oret. ii. 61, ad Fam. ix. 16. § 10), is described by Diodorus (Excerpta Var. p. 129, ed. Dindorf), as the birthplace of a Latin who bore this name. This, however, is inadmissible: it comes from Sannus (Juv. vi. 306; Pers. i. 62, v. 91). The Italian Sanniti (hence our Sannio) probably comes from Sannio.

Sanny'rión (Sannýrion), an Athenian comic poet, belonging to the latter years of the Old Comedy, and the beginning of the Middle. He was contemporary with Diocles and Phyllillus (Suid. s. v. Διοκλής). Since he ridiculed the pronunciation of Hecleolus, the actor of the Orestes of Euripides, which was brought out in b. c. 408, he must have been exhibiting comedies soon after that year (Schol. ad Eurip. Orest. 279; Schol. ad Aristoph. Ran. 305; Clinton, F. H. vol. ii. s. a. 407, and Preface, p. xxix.). On the other hand, if the comedy entitled Io, which is mentioned in the didascalic monument (Böckh, Corp. Insr. vol. i. p. 353) be the Io of Sannya, his age would be brought down to b. c. 574.

Diodorus) from nothing of his personal history, except that his excessive leanness was ridiculed by Strattis in his Cinesias and Psychostas (Pollux. x. 189; Ath. xii. p. 551, c; for explanations of the passages, see Meineke, Frag. Com. Graec. vol. ii. pp. 769, 795; and also by Aristophanes in the Gorgyales, where he and Meletus and Cinesias are chosen as ambassadors from the poets to the shades below, because, being shades themselves, they were frequent visitants of that region (δισποταί, Ath. l. c. a; comp. the editions of the Fragments by Bekker, Dindorf, and Bergk ap. Meineke). It is a proof of how lightly and good-humouredly such jests were thrown about by the comic poets, that Sannynion himself ridiculed Meletus on precisely the same ground in his Τέλων, calling him τὸν ἄρα Μελέτου νερόν (Ath. l. c.). He also returned the compliment to Aristophanes, by ridiculing him for spending his life in working for others; referring doubtless to his habit of Sao'terus.

The following are mentioned as his dramas by Suidas (s. r.):—Τέλων, Δαινών, Ιδωρ, Ψυχρατρί; but the reference which Suidas proceeds to make to Athenaeus, as his authority, proves that he has got the last title by a careless reading of the passage above quoted, in which Athenaeus says that Sanynion was ridiculed in the Psychastae of Strattis. Eutocia (p. 382) omits the Δαινών, and adds the Ιδων and Ψυχρατρί, of which there is no other mention made. A few scattered lines are preserved from the Τέλων, and a fragment of five lines from the Δαινών, in which he ridicules, as Aristophanes also does in the Frogs (305), Hecleolus' pronunciation of the word παντα, in a line of the Orestes of Euripides (Schol. ad Eurip. et Aristoph. ß. cc.). There are a few words from the Io in Athenaeus (vi. p. 261, f). The Idaiai and Ιό evidently belong, in subject, to the Middle Comedy, although, from the circumstance just mentioned, the date of the former cannot be placed much lower than b. c. 407. (Meineke, Frag. Com. Graec. vol. i. pp. 263, 264, vol. ii. pp. 875—875; Bergk, Relig. Commed. Ant. Ant. p. 430; Bode, Gesch. d. Hellen. Dichtkunst, vol. iii. pt. 2, p. 367.) [P.S.]

M. San'quinius, a triumvir of the mint under Augustus, whose name occurs only on coins, a specimen of which is annexed. The head on the obverse with a star over it is supposed to be Julius Caesar's, though it does not bear much resemblance to the heads of Caesar on other coins. The head of Augustus is on the reverse. This Sanquinius was probably the father or grandfather of the Sanquinius Maximus, who is mentioned in the reigns of Tiberius, Caligula, and Claudius. [Maximus, Sanquinius.] (Eckhel, vol. v. p. 299.)

M. Sanquinius.

Santra, a Roman grammarians, of whom nothing is known, but whose opinions are frequently cited by later grammarians, especially by Festus and his epigonius Paulus. The title of one of Santra's works was, De Verborum Antiquitate, (Charisius, p. 112; Scarscn, p. 2236; Festus, pp. 68, 170, 173, 194, 254, 277, 393, ed. Miller.)

Sancon'darius, the son-in-law of Deiotarus. (Cic. pro Deiot. 11.) [Deiotares, No. 1.]

Saon (Σαών), a mythical lawgiver of Samothrace, is said to have been a son of Zeus by a nymph, or of Hermes by Rhene; he united the scattered inhabitants of Samothrace into one state, which he regulated by laws. (Diod. v. 48.) Another mythical personage of the same name is mentioned by Pausanias (ix. 40. § 2) as the discoverer of the oracle of Trophonius. [L.S.]

Sao'terus, of Nicopolidea, chamberlain to Commodus, and at one time so great a favourite, that he entered Rome sharing the triumphal chariot with the emperor. He was eventually put to death through the machinations of Cleander [Cleander].
SAPPHO.

(Dion Cass. lxxii. 13; Lamprid. Comm. 3, where the name Aterus is probably, as Salmasius has pointed out, a corruption of Soterus.) [W. R.]

SAPOR. [SASSANIDÆ.]

SA'PIENS, LAELIUS. [LAElius.]

SAPPHO (Σαπφώ, or, in her own Aeolic dialect, Σαφώ, one of the two great leaders of the Aeolian school of lyric poetry (Alcaeus being the other), was a native of Mytilene, or, as some said, of Eresos, in Lesbos. Different authorities gave several different names as that of her father, Simon, Eunomius, Ergiynus, Ecrutus, Semus, Scammon, Larichus, and Scamandronymus (Suid. s. v.). The last is probably the correct form of the name (Herod. ii. 135; Aelian, V. H. xii. 19; Schol. ad Plat. Phaedr. p. 512, Bekker). If we may believe Ovid, she lost her father when she was only six years old. (Ovid. Herod. xii. 61: this celebrated epitaph on the supposed love of Sappho for Phaon, contains allusions to most of the few known events of Sappho’s life.) Cleis (Κλείς) is mentioned as her mother’s name, but only by late writers (Suid. s. v.; Eudoc. p. 392). She herself addresses her mother as living (Fr. 22*). She had a daughter named Cleis, whom she herself mentions with the greatest affection (Fr. 76, comp. 28). Her husband’s name was Cercolas or Cercylas (Κερκόλας, Κερκύλας), of Andros (Suid.). She had three brothers, Charaxus, Larichus, and Eurigius, according to Suidas, but only the two former are mentioned by writers of authority. Of Larichus we only know that in his youth he held a distinguished place among the Mytielenaeans, for Sappho praised the grace with which he acted as cup-bearer in the pytaneion, an honourable office, which was assigned to beautiful youths of noble birth (Larichus is mentioned in his sister’s poetry in a different manner. Having arrived at Naucratis in Egypt, in pursuit of his occupation as a merchant, he became so enamoured of the courtezan Rhodopis, that he ransomed her from slavery at an immense price; but on his return to Mytilene he was violently upbraided by Sappho in a poem (Herod. ii. 135; Strab. xvii. p. 808; Ath. xiii. p. 596, b.). According to Suidas (s. e. v. Αλσωτος, Τάλαμος), Charaxus married Rhodopis and had children by her; but Herodotus says that she remained in Cyprus. Atheneaenus charges Herodotus with a mistake, for that the courtezan’s name was Doricha (comp. Strab., Suid. l. c. and Phot. s. v. Πολύνας άνθρωπα). Both may be right, the true name being Doricha, and Rhodopis an appellation of endearment. (See Neue, p. 2.)

The period at which Sappho flourished is determined by the concurrent statements of various writers, and by allusions in the fragments of her own works. Atheneaenus (xii. p. 599, c.) places her in the time of the Lydian king Alyattes, who reigned from Ol. 38. 1 to Ol. 52. 2, n. c. 628—570; Eusebius (Chron.) mentions her at Ol. 44, n. c. 604; and Suidas (s. e. v. Πολύνας άνθρωπα) makes her contemporary with Alcaeus, Stesichorus, and Pittacus in Ol. 42, n. c. 611 (comp. Strab. xiii. p. 617). That she was not only contemporary, but lived in friendly intercourse, with Alcaeus, is shown by existing fragments of the poetry of both. Alcaeus addressed her "Violet-crowned, pure, sweetly-smiling Sappho, I wish to tell thee something, but shame prevents me" (Fr. 54, Içberg; 41, 42, Matthiae); and Sappho in reply, with modest indignation, taking up his words, upbraids him for the want of honourable directness (Fr. 61). Passages may also be quoted from the works of the Athenian comic poets, in which Sappho appears to be contemporary with Anacreon and other lyric poets, but, as will presently be seen, such passages have nothing to do with her date. It is not known how long she lived.

The story about her brother Charaxus and Rhodopis would bring her down to at least Ol. 52. 1, n. c. 572, the year of the accession of Anamis, king of Egypt, for, according to Herodotus, it was under this king that Rhodopis flourished. It is always, however, unsafe to draw very strict inferences from such combinations. Aelian (V. H. xiii. 33) assigns the adventures of Rhodopis to the reign of Psammitichus; and perhaps the only safe conclusion as to the date of those events is that so much of them as may be true happened soon after the establishment of commercial intercourse between Greece and Egypt. That Sappho did not die young, is pretty clear from the general tenor of the statements respecting her, and from her application to herself of the epithet γεραίρια. (Fr. 20.)

Of the events of her life we have no other information than an obscure allusion in the Parian Marble (Ep. 36) and in Ovid (Her. xvii. 51), to her flight from Mytilene to Sicily, to escape some unknown danger, between Ol. 44. 1 and 47. 2, n. c. 604 and 592; but it is not difficult to come to a conclusion respecting the position she occupied and the life she led at Mytilene; a subject interesting in itself, and on account of the gross perverstions of the truth respecting it which have been current both in ancient and modern times.

Like all the early lyric poets, Sappho sang the praises of Eros and of Hymen. She sang them with primitive simplicity, with virtuous directness, and with a fervour in which poetic inspiration was blended with the warmth of the Aeolic temperament. Not only is there in her fragments no line which, rightly understood, can cast a cloud upon her fair fame, but they contain passages in which, as in the one already referred to concerning Alcaeus, she repels with dignity the least transgression of those bounds of social intercourse, which, among the Aeolian Greeks, were much wider than in the states of Ionian origin. And this last point is just that to which we are doubtless to look for the main source of the calumnies against the poetess. In the Dorian and Aeolian states of Greece, Asia Minor, and Magna Graecia, among the Greeks, as among the Ionians, kept in rigid seclusion, as the protectors of all the arts of their lords and masters. They had their place not only in society, but in philosophy and literature; and they were at full liberty to express their feelings as well as their opinions. This state of things the Attic comic poets could not understand, any more than they could understand the simplicity with which emotions were recorded at a period when, as Müller well observes, "that complete separation between sensual and sentimental love had not yet taken place, which we find in the writings of later times." Nor indeed could it well be expected, considering the history of Greek morals in the intervening period, and the social state of Athens at the end of the fifth century, that those writers should be able to distinguish between the fervour of Sappho and the voluptnousness of Anacreon, or even that they should refrain from bringing down all poets who ever wrote on love to one level, and from estimating them by their own debased standard. Accordingly we find that Sappho became, in the hands of the Attic comic poets, a sort of stock character in their licentious dramas, in short a mere courtezane. Her name appears as the title of plays by Ameipsias, Amphipolis, Antiphanes, Diphilus, Epitippus, and Timocrates, in which, as well as in the Phaon of Plato, and other works of other comedians, not only was the fable of her passion for Phaon dramatised, but love passages were freely introduced between her and the distinguished poets, not only of her own, but of other periods and countries; such, for example, as Archilochus, Hipponax, and Anacreon (respecting these comedies, see Meineke, Frang. Com. Græc.). The writers of later times found the calumniy so congenial to their moral tastes, or its refutation so much above their critical skill, that they readily adopted it; except that one or two of the grammarians resort to their vulgar critical expedient of multiplying persons of the same name, and distinguish between Sappho the Sann, and Sappho the courtier of Eresus, the latter being evidently a creature of their own imagination (Ath. xiii. p. 596, e.; Aelian, V. H. xii. 19; Suid. s. v. Φαίας; Phot. s. v. Λεκυτής and Φάιας; Apostol. Pro- verb. xx. 15). It is not surprising that the early Christian writers against heathenism should have accepted a misrepresentation which the Greeks themselves had invented (Tatian, adv. Graec. 52, 53, pp. 113, 114, ed. Worth). It was reserved for a distinguished living scholar to give a final and complete refutation to the calumniy (Welecker, Sappho von einem herrschenden Vorurtheil befreit, Göttingen, 1816, in his Kleine Schriften, vol. ii. p. 80; comp. Müller, Lit. of Anc. Greece, pp. 175, &c.). The well-known fable of Sappho’s love for Phaon, and her despairing leap from the Leucadian rock, vanishes at the first approach of criticism. The name of Phaon does not occur in one of Sappho’s fragments, and there is no evidence that it was once mentioned in her poems. It first appears in the Attic comedies, and is probably derived from the story of the love of Aphrodite for Adonis, who in the Greek version of the myth was called Phaethon or Phaon. How this name came to be connected with that of Sappho, it is now impossible to trace. There are passages in her poems referring to her love for a beautiful youth, whom she endeavoured to conciliate by her poetry; and these passages may perhaps be the foundation of the legend. As for the leap from the Leucadian rock, it is a mere metaphor, which is taken from an expiatory rite connected with the worship of Apollo, which seems to have been a frequent poetical image: it occurs in Stesichorus and Anacreon, and may have been used by Sappho, though it is not to be found in any of her extant fragments. A remarkable confirmation of the unreal nature of the whole legend is the fact that none of the writers who tell it go so far as positively to assert that Sappho died in consequence of her frantic leap. (See Welecker, Müller, Neumüller, Ulrici, Bode, and other writers on Greek literature.)

Another matter of great interest is concerning the relations of Sappho to those of her own sex. She appears to have been the centre of a female literary society, most of the members of which were her pupils in the technical portion of her art. For the Greeks were never guilty of the enormous error of confounding genius with its instruments, or of supposing that, because they cannot of themselves produce its fruit, therefore it can perform its work equally well without them. The female companions and pupils of Sappho, her ἑταῖραι and μαθήτριαι, are mentioned by various ancient writers (Suid. s. v. and especially Max. Tyr. Diss. xxiv.); and she herself refers to her household as devoted to the service of the Muses (μουσατῶν οἰκίαν, Fr. 28). This subject cannot be pursued further here, but much interesting information about similar female societies will be found in Müller’s Dorians (b. i. c. 4. § 8, c. 5. § 2).

She had also, however, rivals of her own sex, the heads, probably, of other associations of the same kind. Among these Gorgo and Andromeda, especially, were often mentioned in her poems (Max. Tyr. l. c.). She is found indulging in personal sarcasm against the latter (Fr. 23), and upbraiding a pupil for resorting to her (Fr. 37). In some instances she reproached her companions for faults of conduct or of temper (Fr. 42), and satirized those who endeavoured to compare the muses of Sappho to the service of the Muses (Fr. 19). Among the women mentioned as her companions, are Anactoria of Miletus, Gongyla of Colophon, Euника of Salamis, Gyrinia, Athis, and Manisida. Those of them who obtained the highest celebrity for their own poetical works were, Αἰμοφώλη the Pamphylian, and Ερίννα of Telos.

It is almost superfluous to refer to the numerous passages in which the ancient writers have expressed their unbounded admiration of the poetry of Sappho. In true poetical genius, unfettered by the conventionalities and littlenesses of later times, she appears to have been equal to Alcaeus; and superior to him in grace and sweetness. Of course we are not to look in her productions for the fierce strains of patriotism which her great countryman poured forth; for they would have been little becoming in a woman; but they find their counterpart in those addresses to Aphrodite, in which the contest of passion in the female heart is most vividly portrayed. Certainly to find a woman even to Pindar himself, can we assign the honour of disputing the lyric throne with Sappho. Already in her own age, if we may believe an interesting tradition, the recitation of one of her poems so affected Solon, that he expressed an earnest desire to learn it before he died (Iva μαθῶν αὐτὸ ιδών, Aelian. op. Stob. Serm. xxiv. 58). Strabo speaks of her as Σαμαστῶν τι ξρήμα (xiii. p. 617), and the praises and imitations of her by Horace and Catullus are too well known to require mention.

It may safely be affirmed that the loss of Sappho’s poems is the greatest over which we have to mourn in the whole range of Greek literature, at least of the imaginative species. The fragments that survive, though some of them are exquisite, barely furnish a sample of the surpassing beauty of the whole. They are chiefly of an erotic and the most exquisitely splendid ode to Aphrodite, of which we perhaps possess the whole (Fr. 1), and which, as well as the shorter ode which follows it (Fr. 2), should be read with the remarks of Müller (Lit. of Anc. Greece, pp. 175, 178). She appears also to have composed a large number of hymneads, from which we possess some fragments.
SAPPHO.

of great beauty, and of one of which the celebrated Epithalamium of Catullus,

" Vesper adest, juvenes consurgite," is doubtless an imitation. In that imitation, as well as in several of Sappho's own fragments, we perceive the exquisite taste with which she employed images drawn from nature, the best example of which is perhaps the often quoted line (Ps. 68),

'Féπépere, πάντα φέρεις, ὡσα φαινόλας ἵκνεοδος αὐνος'
in comparison with which even Byron's beautiful imitation,

"O Hesperus, thou bringest all things," not only sounds tame, but fails to express the latter, and perhaps the better, portion of the image. Those of her poems, which are addressed to herself and her friends are so fervid, that they ought almost to be classed with her erotic poems.

Her hymns invoking the gods (οἱ αληθικοὶ δανόι) are mentioned by the rhetorician Menander (Ecocom. I. 2), who tells us that among them were many to Artemis, and to Aphrodite, in which the various qualities of the worship were referred to.
A hymn of hers to Artemis was imitated by Damophila (Philol. Viti. Soph. i. 30). According to Suidas, her lyric poems formed nine books, which were probably arranged merely according to the metres of the poems. (See Neue, p. 11, fol.)
The same compiler ascribes to her epigrams, elegies, iamb, and monodies. The last of these terms designates poems which were intended to be sung, not by a chorus, but by a single voice, a distinction which is simply a characteristic of the greater portion of the lyric poetry of the Aeolians; that of the Dorians, on the contrary, was chiefly choral. As to the iamb mentioned by Suidas, it is true that iambic lines are introduced into her strophes, but the species of poetry called iamb, such as that of Archilochus, is altogether alien to her genius. With respect to the elegies and epigrams, she had a place in the Melanger's Garland, which compiler tells us,
"few flowers of Sappho, but those roses" (v. 6);
but it does not follow that these pieces were in elegiac verse. The Greek Anthology contains three epigrams under her name, the genuineness of which is doubtful. Jacobs accepts them, as "reticam simplicitatem rodolentia." (Irvack, AnaL
vol. i. p. 59; Jacobs, Anth. Graec. vol. i. p. 49, vol. xiii. p. 949.) Her poems were all in her native Aeolic dialect, and form with those of Alcaeus the standard of the Aeolic dialect of Lesbos. (Arens, de Graecis Linguis Dialectis, vol. i.) Dionysius (v. 23) selects her diction as the best example of polished and flowery composition (γλαυφάς καὶ αὐθάρας συνθεωσι). Among the grammarians who wrote upon Sappho and her works were Chamaeleon (Ath. xiii. p.
599, c.) and Callias, who was also a commentator on Alcaeus. (Strab. xiii. p. 616.) Drace of Stratenia wrote on her metres (Suid. s. Αὐδώκων); and Alexander the Sophist lectured on her poetry (Aristid. Episth. p. 55). There were also some anonymous ϒνυμηγορα. Portions of her eighth book were transferred by a certain Sopater into his Elogiae. (Phot. Bibl. Cod. 161.)
It remains to speak of the musical and rhythmical forms, in which the poetry of Sappho was embodied. Herodotus (l. c.) calls her generically μουσικοῖσι: Suidas uses the specific terms λυρικ and φάλτρα. Her instrument was the harp, which she seems to have used both in the form of the Aeolian barbiton and the Lydian pectis. The invention of the latter was ascribed to her by some of the ancients (Ath. xiv. p. 635, b. c.); and it is probably by a confusion of terms that Suidas assigns to her the invention of the plectrum, which instrument was only used for striking the old lyre (φόρμυγξ), and not for the pectis, which was played with the fingers only. (See Neue,
p. 11.) Her chief mode of music was the Mixolydian, the tender and plaintive character of which was admirably adapted to her amatory poems, and the invention of which was ascribed to her by Aristoxenus, although others assigned it to Pythocleides, and others to Terpander.
(Plut. de Mus. 16, 28, pp. 1136, e. 1140, f.)

Of the metres of Sappho, the most important is that which bears her name, and which only differ from the Alcian by the position of a short syllable, which ends the Sapphic and begins the Alcaic verse, for example

[Grάνδίνις μιατ ητόρ ητ ροήν υτε]
Vilde's ät alla stétt nivé candidum.

From the resemblance between the two forms, and from the frequent occurrence of each of them in the fragments of Sappho and Alcaeus, and in the Odes of Horace and Catullus, we may barely conclude that in these two verses we have the most characteristic rhythm of the Aeolian lyric poetry. A thorough discussion of this Sapphic verse would involve the examination of the whole subject of the early Greek metres. Some investigation of it is, however, necessary, both on account of the importance of the metre in itself, and of the prevailing errors with regard to its structure and rhythm. The gross and absurd blunder of what we believe is still the ordinary mode of reading the Sapphic verses in Horace, has been of late exposed and corrected more than one, especially by Professor Key (Journal of Education, vol. iv. p. 336; Penny Cyclopaedia, art.
Arsis). The true accentuation* is:

\[ \text{z z z z z z z z z z} \]

as is clearly seen even in Latin Alcaic verse, and without the possibility of a doubt in the genuine Greek Sapphic and Alcaic. There is, however, we think, still some doubt which of the accented syllables ought to have the stronger accent and which the weaker.

With regard to the division of the feet, we assume (not having the space here to prove) that the fundamental element of the greater part of the earlier Greek metrical systems, epic as well as lyric, was the Choriambus \[ \text{z z z z z z z z z z} \] used either alone or doubled \[ \text{z z z z z z z z z z z z z z z z} \] as in the so-called Pentameter), and either with or without an unaccented introductory or terminal syllable,

* As a mere matter of convenience the word accent is used in its English sense, designating the stress of the voice on a syllable, and not in its proper sense, which it has when used in Greek grammars, namely the musical pitch of a syllable.

SAPPHO, and Jindo and choriambus, double time the together.

Thus, in the Sapphic line, we have the time of three of the elementary parts, or metres, the choriambus occupying the middle place, with a double trochee for an introduction (or base) and a double iamb for a termination, but this last metre wants one syllable, the time of which is made up by the pause at the end of the line

Or the line might be divided so as to make the middle and principal part a choriambus with its catalectic (identical, in fact, with the short final verse), and the termination a single trochee

In the Alcaic, we have precisely the same time; only the line, instead of beginning with an accented syllable and ending with an unaccented one, begins with an unaccented syllable and ends with an accent, the difference being effected by prefixing an unaccented syllable to the base and taking it away from the termination; and then the base and termination taken together, allowance being made for the rest at the end of the line, fill up the time of two metres,

The difference is precisely analogous to that between the trochaic and iambic metres.

The Sapphic strophe or stanza is composed of three Sapphic verses, of which the third is prolonged by the addition of another metre, which must be a pure choriambus, to which is appended a final unaccented syllable. This is commonly treated as a separate line, and is called by the grammarians the Versus Adonis, but how essentially it is a prolongation of the third line is evident from the fact that a word often runs over from the one into the other, for example, and, in Horace,

Labitur ripa Jove non probante ux- orius annis.

This remark, however, applies only to the genuine original structure, for in Horace sometimes the short verse is separated from its own stanza, either by an hiatus in the prosody or by a full stop in the sense, and is read as continuous with the next stanza, as (Carm. i. 2. 47):

Neve te nostris vitis iniquum
Ocior aura Tellar.

(Comp. i. 12, 7, 31, 22. 15.) But this is never found in Sappho, nor even in Catullus,

The whole system of the Sapphic stanza then runs thus:

where we have not indicated the division of the feet in the latter part of the third line, for the following reason: the completion of the double iamb (which is not here catalectic, because the line does not really end here like the first two) and the commencement of the additional metre overlap one another, or, in other words, the long syllable is common to both.

It still remains to notice the caesura, an element of metrical poetry quite as important as time and accent. By caesura we mean, not precisely what the grammarians define it, namely, the division of a foot between two words, because, among other objections to this definition, it requires the previous settlement of the question, what the feet of the verse really are; but what we call caesura is a pause in a verse, dividing the verse into parts, just as the stronger pause at the end of the verse, divides a poem or strophe into verses. Nothing is more common in lyric poetry than for the principal caesura in a verse to fall at the end of a foot, as in

or

Nullām | Vārē ērēn | vītē prīus | sēvēris ārōbēm.

Now, in the Sapphic line, there are no less than six modes of introducing the caesural pause:

(1.) In the middle of the choriambus, as

(2.) After its first syllable, as

(3.) After the ditrochaic base, as

(4.) After the third syllable of the base, as

(5.) Before the diastic termination, as

(6.) Before the last syllable of the choriambus, as

Now, it will be seen, by a glance at these examples, that several of the verses have two, or even more, of these caesural pauses. In fact, in the last four of the six, this is almost demanded by the first principles of rhythm, on account of the inequality which the division would otherwise give. We must, therefore, regard, not only the caesurae, but their combinations; and it will then be seen that the Sapphic verse is divided by its caesural pauses sometimes into two members, and sometimes into three; and since the verse contains six accented syllables (counting as one of them the pause at the end, which, if filled up, as it was in the music, would be accented), these two chief modes of division give respectively two members, each containing three accented syllables, and three members, each containing two. In the first case, there are two subdivisions (Nos. 1 and 2, above), the difference being merely that between the feminine and masculine caesura, and its effect simply the use of a single or a double unaccented syllable as an introduction to the second half of the verse. In the second mode of division, we get various subdivisions, resulting from the various combinations of the caesurae in the examples (3), (4), (5), and (6). When (3) and (5) are combined, the result is a line divided into three parts perfectly equal in time, and which are in fact the three primary elements of the verse, as
SAPPHO.

When (4) and (5) are combined, the line only differs from the above by having the last syllable of the base converted into an introductory syllable for the centre, as in the example in No. 5. Verses of this form generally have also the principal central caesura, which must be regarded as overpowering the others; as in the example. When (3) and (6) are combined, the effect is that the line consists, rhythmically, of a ditrochaic base and a ditrochaic termination, the central member being imperfect; as in both the examples (3) and (6). The combination of (4) and (6) produces a verse evidently almost the same as the last; as in the example (4).

The several effects produced by the caesurae in the third prolonged line of the stanza are too varied to be discussed further: the reader who has not entered into what has been already said, can easily deduce them for himself. Enough has been said to show the true structure of the verse, and the immense variety of rhythm of which it is susceptible. How skilfully Sappho avail herself of these varieties is evident from the mere fact, that all the above examples are taken from her first fragment, which only contains seven stanzas. The subject of Latins Sapphics cannot be entered upon here: it must suffice to lay down the principle, that their laws must be deduced from those of the Greek metre; and to state the fact, that Horace confines himself almost entirely to the forms (1) and (2), as in using the former very sparingly indeed in his earlier odes, but more frequently in his later ones; his taste, it may be presumed, having been improved by practice. The other metres used by Sappho are fully discussed by Neve, pp. 12, &c.

The first edition of any part of Sappho's fragments was that of the hymn to Aphrodite, by H. Stephanius, in his edition of Anacreon, 1554, &c. The subsequent editions of Anacreon, in 1556, 1660, 1681, 1684, 1690, 1699, 1700, 1710, 1712, 1716, 1733, 1735, 1740, 1742, 1744, 1751, 1754, &c., contained also the fragments of Sappho in a form more or less complete. (See Hoffmann, _Lex. Bibliog. Script. Graec. art. Anacreon._) They were also contained in the _Carmina Novem Illustria Foeminarum, Sapphas_, &c., with the _Scholia of Fulvia Urianus, Anwerp. 1568, 8vo_, and in the Cologne collection of the Greek poets, 1614, P.L. Vossius published an amended text of the two principal fragments in his edition of Catullus, pp. 113, &c. Louvain, 1684, 4to. Jo. Chr. Wolf edited the fragments, with notes, indices, and a life of Sappho, separately in 1753, 4to. Hanb., and again in his _Novum Illustrium Foeminarum, Sapphus_, &c., _Fragmenta et Elogia, Gr. et Lat. Hamb. 1735, 4to_. They again appeared in Brunck's _Analecct_, vol. i. pp. 51, &c., vol. iii. p. 8, &c., 1773, 8vo. The two chief odes were inserted by G. C. Harless, in his _Anthol. Poes. Graec._ 1792, 8vo; and the whole fragments by A. Schneider, in his _Novus Arvul_, Giesie, 1802, 8vo. Since that period there have been numerous collections and critical editions of the fragments, of which some of the greatest pretensions are the two following: _Sapphus Lesbicae Carmina et Fragmenta recepta, commentario illustravit, sachelis musica adiect et indices confictit II. F. Magnus Volger, Lips. 1810, 8vo_; and _Sapphonia Mythologiae Fragmenta, Specimen Opera in omnibus Artis Graecorum Lyricae Reliquiis, excepto Pindaro, collocandae_, propositus D. Christianus Fridericus Neue, Berol, 1827, 4to. Of these two editions, that of Volger stands at the head of the modern editions in point of date and of cumbrous elaboration; that of Neue is by far the first in point of excellence. An important supplement to the edition of Neue is Welcker's review of it in Jahn's _Jahrbücher_ for 1828, and in Welcker's _Kleine Schriften_, vol. i. p. 110. The fragments of Sappho have also been edited by Bp. Blomfield, in the _Museum Criticum_, vol. i.; by Gaisford, in his _Poetiae Minorae Graecae_; by Schenieder, in his _Delectus Poësos Graecorum_; by Bergk, in his _Poetica Lyrica Graecae_; by Ahrens, in his treatise _de Graecae Linguae Historia_, vol. i.; and also separately by A. L. Moebius, in Greek and German, Hannov. 1815, 8vo.; not to mention some other editions of the two chief fragments. There are numerous translations both of these two fragments, and of the whole, into English, German, French, Italian, and Spanish. (See Hoffmann, _Lex. Bibliogr. Script. Graec._)

Some of the principal modern works upon Sappho have been incidentally referred to in the course of this article. To these should be added Plehn's _Lesbiaca_, Bode and Ulrici, _Gesch. d. Hellen. Dichtk._, and Bernhardy, _Gesch. d. Griech. Literatur_, vol. ii. pp. 483-490. [P. S.]

SARDANAPALUS (Σαρδανάπαλος), the last king of the Assyrian empire of Ninus or Nineveh, according to Ctesias. This writer related that the Assyrian empire lasted 1306 years; * that the first king was Ninus, who was succeeded by his wife Semiramis, and she by her son Ninayas, and that he was followed by thirty kings, son succeeding father in uninterrupted order. All these kings, from Ninayas downwards, were sunk in luxury and

* In the present copies of Diiodorus (ii. 21) we have 1300 years, but it appears that Synceius (p. 359, c.) and Agathias (ii. 25, p. 120) read 1306, and this number is confirmed by Augustus (de Civ. Di. xvi. 21), who has 1305 years. (See Clinton, _F. H._ vol. i. p. 263, note d.)
SARDANAPALUS.

We have seen that Ctesias makes the Assyrian empire to have lasted 1306 years; but Herodotus says (I. 95) that the Assyrians had ruled over Upper Asia for 520 years, when the Medes revolted from them. This statement is in accordance with that in the Armenian translation of Eusebius, in which it is recorded that Assyrian kings ruled over Babylonia for 526 years. Herodotus says, in the passage already referred to, that other nations imitated the example of the Medes, and revolted from the Assyrians, and among these other nations we are doubtless to understand the Babylonians. This revolt of the Medes occurred in the latter half of the eighth century, probably about B.C. 710. According to Herodotus, however, an Assyrian kingdom, of which Nineveh was the capital, still continued to exist, and was not destroyed till the capture of Nineveh by the Median king Cyaxares, about B.C. 616, that is, nearly three hundred years after the date assigned to its overthrow by Ctesias (Herod. i. 106; Clinton, F. H. vol. i. p. 218).

Furfur, whose city of the Old Testament represents the Assyrian empire in its glory in the eighth century before the Christian era. It was during this period that Pul, Tiglath-pileser, Shalmaneser, and Sennacherib, appear as powerful kings of Assyria, who, not contented with their previous dominions, subdued Israel, Phoenicia, and the surrounding countries. In order to reconcile these statements with those of Ctesias, modern writers have invented two Assyrian kingdoms at Nineveh, one which was destroyed on the death of Sardanapalus, and another which was established after that event, and fell on the capture of Nineveh by Cyaxares. But this is a purely gratuitous assumption, unsupported by any evidence. We have only records of one Assyrian empire, and of one destruction of Nineveh. On this point some good remarks are made by Loebell, Weltgeschichte, vol. i. pp. 152, 555—556.

SARON (Zepon), a mythical king of Troæzenæ, who built a sanctuary of Artemis Saronica on the sea-coast. Once while chasing a stag into the sea he was drowned, and his body, which was washed on shore in the grove of Artemis, was buried there, and the gulf between Attica and Argolis was, from this circumstance, called the Saronic Gulf. (Paus. ii. 30. § 7.) Near Troæzenæ there was a little town called Saron (Steph. Byz. z. e.), and Troæzenæ itself is said at one time to have been called Saronæ (Estath. ad Hym. p. 207; comp. lostr. Her. 14; Ov. Met. xiii. 235.) He was slain at Troy by Patroclus. (Uli. xvi. 480, &c.) Apollo, by the command of Zeus, cleansed Sarpedon's body from blood and dust, anointed it with ambrosia, and wrapped it up in an ambrosian garment. Sleep and Death then carried it into Lycia, to be honourably buried. (U. xvi. 667, &c.; comp. Virg. Aen. i. 100.) Eustathius (ad Hom.
p. 894) gives the following tradition to account for Sarpedon being king of the Lycians, since Glaucon, being the son of Hippolochus, and grandson of Bellerophontes, ought to have been king: when the two brothers Isandrus and Hippolochus were disputing about the government, it was proposed that they should shoot through a ring placed on the breast of a child, and Laodameia, the sister of the two rivals, gave up her own son Sarpedon for this purpose, who was thereupon honoured by his uncles with the kingdom, to show their gratitude to their sister for her generosity. This Sarpedon is sometimes confounded with No. 1, as in Eurip.
Iphig. 29, comp. Eustath. ad Hom. pp. 369, 636, &c. There was a sanctuary of Sarpedon (probably the one we are here speaking of) at Xanthus in Lycia. (Appian, B. C. iv. 78.)

3. A son of Poseidon, and a brother of Polyx Thrace, was slain by Heracles. (Apollod. ii. 5.

SARPEDONIA (Σαρπηδώνια), a surname of Artemis, derived from cape Sarpedon in Cilicia, where she had a temple with an oracle. (Strab. xiv.
p. 676.) The masculine Sarpedonius occurs as a surname of Apollo in Cilicia. (Zosim. i. 57.)

SARRA, SALONIUS. [SALONIUS, No. 3.]

SARUS (Σαρος), a Gothic commander in the Roman army, in the time of Arcadius and Hono-rus. He enjoyed great popularity among the soldiers on account of his bodily strength and his undaunted courage, and in higher quarters he was esteeemed as a general of skill and determination, whose assistance in time of danger was considered to be of great moment. During several years Sarus stood in close connection with Stilicho, but rose against him when the latter wavered in the hour of danger preceding his fall in A.D. 408. Sarus along with other generals was so indignant against Stilicho for his timid conduct, that he resolved upon taking him dead or alive. He therefore, with a body of Goths, surprised the camp of Stilicho, routed his Hunnic warriors, and, penetrating to the camp of the commander, would have seized or killed him, but for his timely flight.
Stilicho fled to Ravenna, and there perished in the manner related in his life. Sarus was henceforth a favourite at the court of Ravenna, was made magister militum, and consequently caused great jealousy to Alaric and Ataulphus or Adolphus, the Gothic king of the house of the Balti, whose hereditary enemy he was. When Alaric approached Ravenna with hostile intentions, the reckless Sarus sallied out with a body of only three hundred warriors, cut many of the enemy to pieces, and, on his return within the walls of the capital, had Alaric proclaimed, by a herald, as a truant to the emperor and the Roman nation. Infiltrated at this public insult, Alaric marched upon Rome, and took revenge by sacking it in 410. Sarus left the service of Honorius soon afterwards, and joined the usurper Jovinian in Gaul. Ataulphus followed him thither, still meditating revenge, and having been informed that Sarus scoured the country with only a few followers, surprised him with a superior body, and slew him after an heroic resistance.

(Zosim. v. p. 337, &c. ed. Oxon. 1679; Olympi-diator. apud Photium, p. 177; Philostorg, xii. 3.
Fragn.; Sozom. ix. 4.) [W. P.]

SASERNA. 1, 2. The name of two writers, father and son, on agriculture, who lived in the time between Cato and Varro. (Plin. H. N. xvi 21. s. 55. § 22; Varr. R. R. 1. 2. § 22, i. 16.
§ 5, i. 18. § 2; Colum. i. 1. § 12.)

3. 4. C. SASERNA and P. SASERNA, the name of two brothers who served under Julius Caesar in the African war, n. c. 46, and one of whom is mentioned by Cicero as a friend of Antonius and Octavianus after the death of Caesar. (Hirt. B.
Afr. 9, 10, 57; Cic. Philipp. xiii. 13, ad Att. xv.
2. § 3.)

The gentle name of the preceding Sasernea is not mentioned, but they probably belonged to the Hostilia gens, since we find on coins the name of
5. L. HOSTILIUS SASERNA. Eckehl conjectures that this L. Hostilius Saserina is the same as the C. Saserina previously mentioned, overlooking the passage of Hirtius (B. Afr. 57), in which his praenomen Calius occurs. The following are the most important coins belonging to L. Hostilius Saserina. On the obverse of the first is the head of Pallor, and on the reverse a standing figure of Diana in a foreign dress, holding in the right hand a stag by its horns, and in the left a spear. The obverse of the second represents the head of Pavor, and the reverse a biga, which one man drives at full speed, while the other is fighting from behind. On the obverse of the third is the head of Venus, and on the reverse Victory. The heads of Pallor and Pavor are introduced, because the Hostili claimed descent from Tullus Hostilius, the third king of Rome, who is said to have vowed temples to Pallor and Pavor in his battle with the Velentae (Liv. i. 27). Hence Lactantius says (i. 20) that this king was the first who figured Pallor and Pavor, and introduced their worship. (Eckel, vol. v. p. 226.)

SASSANIDAE, the name of a dynasty which reigned in Persia from A.D. 226 to 631.

I. Ardashir I. or Ardashir, the Artaxerxes (Արծեքիշ) of the Romans and Greeks, the founder of the dynasty of the Sassanidae, reigned from A.D. 226—240. He was a son of one Babek, an inferior officer, who was the son of Sassan, perhaps a person of some consequence, since his royal descendants chose to call themselves after him. The Persian Zintit-al-Taurik makes Sassan a descendant from Bahman, who was in his turn descended from one Iasendar, who lived many centuries before Ardashir; but these statements cannot be regarded as historical. Some assign a very low origin to Ardashir, but it seems that his family was rather above than below the middle classes. They were natives of, and settled in the province of Fars, or Persia Proper, and they professed the ancient faith of Zoroaster and his priests, the Magi. These circumstances are of great importance in the life of Ardishir, as will be seen hereafter. Ardishir served with distinction in the army of Artaxerxes, the king of Parthia, and having been placed with ingratitude and took revenge in revolt. He obtained assistance from several grandees, and having met with success, claimed the throne on the plea of being descended from the ancient kings of Persia, the progeny of the great Cyrus. His lofty scheme became popular, and deserved to be so. During the long rule of the Arsacidae, and in consequence of their intimate connections with the West, Greek customs, principles, art, literature, and fashion, in short a Greek civilization had gradually spread over the Persian, or, as it was then called from the ruling tribe, the Parthian empire. This new spirit introduced itself even into the religion, for although the Arsacidae of Parthia publicly confessed the creed of Zoroaster, their faith, and that of the court party was mixed up with the principles of the Greek religion and philosophy. The people, however, were still firm adherents of the faith, the laws, and the customs of their forefathers, and the king was not placed with ingratitude, etc. which came from the West was looked upon by them with the same dislike and hatred as, in modern times, European civilization is detested and despised by the modern Orientals. Ardishir appealed to the sympathy of the people, and he gained his great object. It seems that he spent many years in warlike efforts against Artabanus, till at last his progress became so alarming that the king took the field against him with all his forces. In A.D. 226 Artabanus was defeated, in a decisive battle, in the plain of Hormuz, not far from the Persian Gulf; and Ardishir thereupon assumed the pompous, but national title of Shahinshah, or "King of Kings." That year is consequently considered as the beginning of the new Sassanian dynasty. Defeated in two other battles, Artabanus surrendered to his rival, and was put to death; whereupon the authority of Ardishir was acknowledged throughout the whole extent of the Parthian, now again the Persian, empire. One of his first legislative acts was the restoration of the pure religion of Zoroaster and the worship of fire, in consequence of which the numerous Christians in Persia had to suffer many vexations, but the real persecutions against them began only at a later period. The reigning branch of the Parthian Arsacidae was exterminated, but some collateral branches were suffered to live and to enjoy the privileges of Persian grandees, who, along with the Magi, formed a sort of senate; and the Arsacidae who ruled Armenia remained for some time in the undisturbed possession of their sovereign power. Ardishir having thus succeeded in establishing his authority at home, turned his views abroad, and began with a display of overbearing insolence almost unparalleled in history. He sent a menacing embassy to Constantinople, demanding from the emperor Alexander Severus the immediate cession of all those portions of the Roman empire that had belonged to Persia in the time of Cyrus and Xerxes, that is, the whole of the Roman possessions in Asia, as well as Egypt. Modesty, perhaps, prevented him from claiming the plain of Marathon and the sea of Salamis also. This absurd demand is remarkable, in so far as it showed the national pride of the Persians, and the power of their historical recollections. An immediate war between the two empires was the direct consequence. As the leading events of this war are related in the life of Alexander Severus [SEVERUS] we need only mention here that, notwithstanding the immense force opposed, in addition to infantry, of 170,000 horsemen, clad in armour, 700 elephants, with towers and archers, and 1800 war-chariots, bristling with spears, the great king was unable to subdue the Romans; nor could Alexander Severus do more than preserve his own dominions. After a severe contest and much bloodshed and devastation, peace was restored, shortly after the murder of Alexander in 237, each nation retaining the possessions which they held before the breaking out of the war. However, the war against king Chosroes of Armenia, the ally of the Romans, was carried on as before, till the death of Ardishir in 240. Eastern and Western writers coincide in stating that Ardishir was an extraordinary man, and much could be said of his wisdom and kingly qualities, were it consistent with the plan of this work to give more than condensed sketches of the lives of the Persian kings. His reign of new spirit, which came from the West was looked upon by them with the same dislike and hatred as, in modern times, European civilization is detested and despised by the modern Orientals. Ardishir appealed to the sympathy of the people, and he gained his great object. It seems that he spent many years in warlike efforts against Artabanus, till at last his progress became so alarming that the king took the field against him with all his forces. In A.D. 226 Artabanus was defeated, in a decisive battle, in the plain of Hormuz, not far from the Persian Gulf; and Ardishir thereupon assumed the pompous, but national title of Shahinshah, or "King of Kings." That year is consequently considered as the beginning of the new cessors, became conspicuous among the Parthians and those kindred nations which they had subdued, and at the court as well as among the nobles, the Greek language seems to have been cultivated with success, and became, in some degree, the official language of the country. The fact of so many Parthian princes and nobles having been educated, or having lived for a long time among the Greeks and at Rome, where Greek was cultivated by all educated men, likewise contributed to the introduction of Greek civilisation in Parthia during the reign of the Arsacidae. The Parthian coins of the Arsacidae have all Greek inscriptions with nailed letters, and the design is evidently after Greek models. With the accession of the first Sassanid the Greek influence was stopped; the new dynasty was in every respect a Persian dynasty. The Sassanid, in their proof of this, had the Greek inscriptions disappear and give place to Persian inscriptions in Arianian characters, as Wilson calls them; the design also becomes gradually more barbarous, and the costume of the kings is different from that on the coins of the Arsacidae. The change of the alphabet, however, which was used for the inscription, was not sudden. Some coins which have portraits of a Sassanian character have names and titles in Nagari letters; some have bilingual inscriptions. Great numbers of Sassanian coins of different periods, though very few only of the earliest period, have been, and are still found, at Kabul and at other places in Afghanistan."

2. Shapur I. (Σασανάζ or Χατράβαν), the son and successor of Ardishir I., reigned from A.D. 240—273. Soon after his succession a war broke out with the Romans, which was occasioned by the hostile conduct of Shapur against Armenia. The Romans, commanded by the able emperor Gordian, were at first successful, but afterwards suffered some defeats, and the murder of Gordian, in 244, put a check to their further progress. On the other hand the Persians were unable to subdue Armenia, which was nobly defended by king Chosroes, who, however, was assassinated after a resistance of nearly thirty years. Shapur had contrived this murder. His son, Tiridates, being an infant, the Armenians implored the assistance of the emperor Valerian; but before the Romans appeared in the field, Armenia was subdued, and Shapur conquered Mesopotamia (258). Upon this Valerian put himself at the head of his army. He met Shapur near Edessa, on the Euphrates, and a pitched battle was fought, in which, owing to the perfidy or insincerity of the Roman minister Macrianus, the Persians carried the day. Valerian sought refuge within his fortified camp, but was finally obliged to surrender with his army, Shapur having refused to accept the encomiums of the emperor to the conqueror (260). The conduct of Shapur against Valerian, who died in captivity, is not to be discussed here; but his political conduct offers a bold stroke of policy. He caused one Cyriades, a miserable fugitive of Antioch, to be proclaimed Roman emperor, and acknowledged him as such, for the purpose, as it seems, of having a proper person to sign a treaty of peace, through which he hoped to gain legal possession of the provinces beyond the Taurus. He consequently pushed on to obtain possession of them, destroyed Antioch, conquered Syria, and having made himself master of the passes in the Taurus, laid Tarsus in ashes, and took Caesarea in Cappadocia through the treachery of a physician, and after a long and gallant resistance from its commander, the brave Demosthenes, who succeeded in cutting his way through the enemy. But Shapur did not keep his conquests long. A hero and a heroine, Odenathus and Zenobia, arose in the very desert, drove the king back beyond the Euphrates, and founded a new empire, over which they ruled at Palmyra. Rome was thus saved; and the last years of the reign of Shapur offer nothing of importance for Roman history. An event, however, took place in Persia at this period which must not be passed over in silence here. We allude to the new doctrine of the celebrated Mani, who, endeavouring to amalgamate the Christian and Zoroastrian religions, gave rise to the famous sect of the Manichees. Mani was, at the time, in the East, exposing themselves to most sanguinary persecutions from both Christians and fire-worshippers. Shapur I. died in 273.

3. Hormuz or Hormisdas I. (Ορμυζας or Ορμυζανδη), the son of the preceding, an excellent man, reigned only one year, and died in a.d. 274.

4. Bahram of Baharam, Varanes I. or Varanes I. (Οβαράντας or Οβαράνταν), the son of Hormuz I., reigned from A.D. 274—277. He carried on unprofitable wars against Zenobia, and, after her captivity, was involved in a contest with the victorious emperor Aurelian, which, however, was not attended with any serious results on account of the sudden death of Aurelian in 275. Under him the celebrated Mani (who, be it said here, was also a distinguished painter) was put to death, and both Manicheans and Christians were cruelly persecuted. He was succeeded by his son

5. Bahram of Varanes II., who reigned from A.D. 277—294. Bahram was engaged in a war with his turbulent neighbours in the north-east, towards the sources of the Indus, when he was called to the west by a formidable invasion of the emperor Carus. It was near the river Euphrates that the old hero received a Persian embassy, to whom he gave audience whilst sitting on the turf and dressed in the garb of a common soldier. His language, however, soon convinced the luxurious Orientals that this mean-looking person, who was making his dinner upon some pease and a piece of bacon, was a monarch of no less power than their own Shahinshah. He told them that if the king did not recognise the superiority of the Roman empire, he would make Persia as naked of trees as his own head was destitute of hair; and the Persians being little inclined to make peace on such conditions, he began in earnest to show the goodness of his word. Seleucia and Ctesiphon both yielded to him, and Bahram being compelled to keep most of his troops on the Indian frontier was only saved by the sudden death of Carus (283). The sons and successors of Carus, Carinus and Numerianus, retreated in consternation, and Diocletian, who soon wrested the power from them, was too busily engaged in the north to follow up the success of Carus. Bahram II. died in 294.

6. Bahram of Varanes III., the elder son and successor of the preceding, died after a reign of eight months only, a.d. 294, and was succeeded by his younger brother.

7. Narses of Narses (Ναρσης), who reigned from a.d. 294—303. He carried on a formidable war against the emperor Diocletian, which arose out of the state of Armenian affairs. As early as 296, in the reign of Bahram II. Diocletian had put Tiridates, the fugitive son of King Chosroes, of Armenia, on the throne of his forefathers, and kept him there by his assistance, although not without an obstinate resistance on the part of the Persians. Nurses succeeded in expelling Tiridates, and re-united his kingdom with Persia. This led to an immediate war with Diocletian, who took proper measures to put a final check on Persian ambition. Considerable forces, the ceded to the abled sador and without a continuation of the Persian king, a triumph which the Western arms had perhaps not obtained over the Persians since the victory of Alexander over Darius at Issus. In his conduct to his female captives, Galerius acted as nobly as Alexander. At Nisibis Diocleti- tan and Galerius received Apharban, the ambas- sador of Nurses, who sued for peace with a dignity becoming the representative of a great, though vanquished monarch, and the Romans sent Sicorius Probus to the camp of Nurses with power to con- clude a final peace, of which they dictated the conditions. Probus was not immediately admitted to the presence of Nurses, who obliged the ambas- sador to follow his own measure, and this caused a considerable delay to the negotiations for the evident purpose of collecting his dispersed forces, and either avoiding the peace altogether, or obtaining more favourable conditions. At last, how- ever, that famous treaty was made in which Nurses ceded to Diocletian Mesopotamia (the northern and north-western portions as far down as Cir- cesium at the junction of the Chaboras and Eu- phrates), five small provinces beyond the Tigris on the Persian side, the kingdom of Armenia, and some adjacent Median districts, over which Tiridates was re-established as king, and lastly, the supremacy over Iberia, the kings of which were hence- forth under the protection of Rome. Nurses, dis- abled from thinking of further conquests west of the Tigris, seems to have occupied himself during the last year of his reign with domestic affairs, and in 303 he abdicated in favour of his son. It is a strange coincidence of circumstances that both Nurses and Diocletian, the vanquished and the victor, were, through quite opposite causes, filled with dis- gust at absolute power, and retreated into private life. Nurses, who, notwithstanding his defeats and the inglorious peace of 297, was a man of no common means and character, died soon after his abdication in the same year, 303.

8. HORMUZ or HORMISDAIS II, the son of Nurses, reigned from A.D. 302—310. During his reign nothing of importance happened regarding Rome. His successor was his son.

9. SHAPUR or Sapor II. POSTUMUS, who reigned from A.D. 310—381, and was crowned in his mother’s womb. His father dying without issue, but leaving his queen pregnant, the princes of the collateral branches of the royal house were elated with hopes of the succession. The Magi, however, discovered by means only known to them, that the queen was pregnant with a male child, and they prevailed upon the graces to acknowledge the unborn child as their lawful sovereign, and the diadem destined to adorn the future king was placed with great solemnity upon the body of his mother. This is a strange story, yet we cannot but admit it as an historical fact. Agathias, the only Western historian who mentions it (iv. p. 135, ed. Paris), took it from Eastern sources; and those Persian historians who are known to us, relate the story with all its details (see Malcolm, quoted below). Zosimus (ii. p. 100, &c. ed. Oxon, 1679) does not mention the coronation of an unborn child, but mentions a younger son of Hormuz, the elder, who bore his father’s name Hormuz, or Hor- misdas, having been excluded from the succession. Now this Hormuz is again a well-known historical person, but we must presume that he was a prince of royal blood, and not the elder brother of the infant Shapur. Hormisdas was one of the causes of the great struggle that took place afterwards between Sapor and the emperor Constantius, and the matter came to pass in the following way. Zosimus is here a valuable source, and he is corro- borated by the Persian historians. Once, long before the birth of Sapor, and during the reign of Hormisdas II, Prince Hormizdas, then heir-ap- parent as it seems, spoke of some grandees in a very contemptuous manner, menacing them with the fate of Marsyas when he should be their king. Unacquainted with Greek mythology, the nobles inquired who Marsyas was, and were greatly alarmed when they heard that they might expect to be treated like the Muses’ lute-player, which King Timotheus had put to death, and with what severity. The greater part of the criminal law in Persia. This explains the election of an unborn baby, and also the fate of Prince Hor- misdas, who was thrown into a dungeon as soon as King Hormisdas was dead. After a captivity of many years, he gained his liberty through a stratagem of his wife, who sent him a fish in which she had hidden a file, the most welcome present to any prisoner who finds nothing between himself and liberty but a couple of iron bars. Hormisdas accordingly escaped and fled to the court of the emperor Constantius, whither young Sapor generously sent his wife after him. Con- stants received him well, and he afterwards appears as an important person on the stage of events. (Suida, s. v. Mopsaia, relates the same story, and speaks of it as a well-known fact: τοῦ λόγου σαφὲς.) The minority of Sapor passed without any remark- able event regarding Rome. We may presume that the Persian attorneys employed their time well in augmenting their power during that mi- nority. In this time also falls the pretended con- quest of Ctesiphon by Thair, an Arabic or Himy- artic king of Yemen; and the minister of Sapor issued cruel edicts against the Christians, who, tired of the state of oppression in which they lived, sought for an amelioration of their condition by addressing themselves to Constantius. For this step they were punished by Sapor, who, however, contented himself with imposing a heavy tax upon them. Symeon, bishop of Seleucia, complained of this additional burden in so haughty and offensive a manner as to arouse the king’s anger, and orders were accordingly given to shut up the Christian churches, consecrate the ecclesiastical property, and put the priest to death. Some years afterwards, in 344, the choice was left to the Christians be- tween fire worship and death, and during fifty years the cross lay prostrate in blood and ashes till it was once more erected by the Nestorians. After the death of King Tiridates and the conquest of his kingdom by Sapor in 342, the same cruelties were perpetrated against the Christians in that country also; and the hostility which had existed between Rome and Persia ever since the death of Constantine, was now changed into a war of extermination. An account of these wars has been given in the lives of the emperors Constantius II. and his successors. We shall therefore only mention a few additional facts. Prince Hormisdas mentioned above was in the Roman army, and fought valiantly against his countrymen, whence we may conclude that, had Constantius reaped laurels instead of thistles in this war, he would have put the presumptuous prince on the throne of Persia. Sapor, although victorious in the open field, could do nothing against the strong bulwarks of Nisibis and other fortresses, and consequently derived no advantages from his victories. The conquest of Armenia was his only trophy; in his bloody zeal against the Christians in that country, he went so far as to order all Armenian and Greek books to be burnt, but even the barbarous murder of his (only?) son, who had accidentally been made a prisoner by the Romans, and was put to death by order of Constantius, could not justify the still more savage conduct of Sapor against so many innocent and defenceless Christians.

In 358, Constantius sued for peace, but was startled when the Persian ambassador, Nares, delivered in Constantinople the conditions of Sapor, who demanded only Mesopotamia. Armenia, and the five provinces beyond the Tigris, although as the legitimate successor of Cyrus, he said that he had a right to all Asia and Europe as far as the river Strymon in Macedonia. Constantius endeavoured to obtain better terms; but the negotiations of his ambassadors in Persia were frustrated through intrigue and perfidy; and the war was continued as before, and with the same disadvantage to the Romans. In 359, Sapor took Amida by storm, and Singara, Berhade, and other places yielded to him in the following year. The death of Constantius and the accession of Julian made no change. The fate of Julian is known. He might have avoided it by accepting the proposals of peace which Sapor had made him immediately after his accession, but he nobly rejected them, and caused his ruin although he did not deserve it. Jovian, to secure his own accession, made that famous treaty with Sapor for which he has been blamed so much, and ceded to him the five provinces beyond the Tigris, and the fortresses of Nisibis, Singara, &c. Iberia and Armenia were left to their fate; and were completely reduced by Sapor in 363, and the following year. A war with the Caucasian nations, occasioned through the subjugation of Armenia, and another with the Arsacidae in distant Bactria, which might have had its cause in the same circumstances, filled the year of the reign of Sapor, who died in 361. Sapor has been surmised the Great, and no Persian king had ever caused such terror to Rome as this monarch.

10. ARDSIRH OF ARTAXERXES II., the successor of Sapor the Great, reigned from A.D. 381—385. He was a prince of royal blood, but his descent is doubtful, and he was decidedly no son of Sapor. The peace of 363 being strictly kept by the Romans, he had no pretext for making war upon them, if he felt inclined to do so, and we pass on to

11. SHAPUR OF Sapor III., who reigned from A.D. 385—390. According to Agathias (iv. p. 136, ed. Paris) he was the son of Sapor the Great; but according to the Persian historians, who, in matters of genealogy, desire full credit, he was the son of one Shapur Zuluktaf, a royal prince. Shapur was anxious to be on good terms with the emperor Theodosius the Great, and sent a solemn embassy with splendid presents to him at Constantinople, which was returned by a Greek embassy headed by Stilicho going to Persia. Owing to these diplomatic transactions, an arrangement was made in 384, according to which Armenia and Iberia recovered their independence.

12. BAHRAM OF VARANES IV., reigned from A.D. 390—404, or perhaps not so long. He was the brother of Sapor III., and founded Kerman-shah, still a flourishing town. This is recorded in an inscription on a monument near Kerman-shah, which has been copied by European travellers, and translated by Silvestre de Sacy.

13. YESDIDJORD, or YESIDGERD I. (†devyēqini), surnamed ULATTHIM, or the SINNER, the son or brother of the preceding, reigned from A.D. 404, or earlier, to 420 or 421. He is commonly called Yesdigerd. He stood on friendly terms with the emperor Arcadius, who, it is said, appointed him the guardian of his infant son and successor, Theodosius the Younger. We refer to the life of Arcadius for more information respecting this strange story. Yesdigerd is described by the Eastern writers as a cruel and extravagant man, whose death was hailed by his subjects as a blessing, but the Western writers speak of him as a model of wisdom and moderation. If the latter are right, they had perhaps in view the peace of a hundred years, which, through the instrumentality of the empress Pulcheria, Arcadius is said to have concluded with him. But if we admit the correctness of the former opinion, we are at a loss to explain it, unless we presume that the Persian friendship of the emperor. His punishment was death, and one or two (Sozom. ix. 4) persecutions ensued against the Christians.

14. BAHRAM OF VARANES V., surnamed GOUR, or the "Wild Ass," on account of his passion for the chase of that animal, reigned from A.D. 420 or 421 till 440. He was the eldest son of Yesdigerd I., and inherited from him the hatred of the aristocracy, who, tried, but in vain, to fix the diadem on the head of Chosroes or Khosrow, a royal prince, after their civil contest Bahram was victorious. The persecutions against the Christians were continued by him to such an extent, that thousands of his subjects took refuge within the Roman dominions. He showed the same intolerant and fanatical spirit towards the Arsacid Ardsirh or Artaxerxes, whom he had put on the throne of Armenia, and whom he endeavoured to convert by compulsion. Seeing his dominions de-populated by a constant tide of emigration, he claimed his fugitive subjects back from Constantinople, a demand which Theodosius nobly declined to comply with. The consequence was a war, which broke out in 421, or at least shortly after the accession of Bahram. In the province of Arzaren the Persian army under Nareses was completely routed, and the courier (Paladius) brought the joyful tidings in three (?) days from the Tigris to the Bosphorus. The Greeks, however, failed in the siege of Nisibis, and the Persians in their turn were driven back from the walls of Amida, whose bishop, Arcadius, set a generous example to the patriotism of its inhabitants. The chief source for the history of this war is an ecclesiastical writer, Sozocrates, whence we naturally find it mixed up with a great number of wondrous and marvellous tales, so that we at once proceed to its termination, by the famous peace of one hundred years, which lasted till the twelfth year of the reign of the emperor Anastasius. This peace was negotiated by Maximinus and Procopius on the part of the Greeks, and Bahram bound himself to molest the Christians no further, but his promise was not strictly kept by his successors. During his reign Armenia was divided between the Romans and the Persians, whose portion received the name of Persarmenia. The latter years of the reign of this king were occupied by great wars against the Huns, Turks, and Indians, in which Bahram is said to have achieved those valorous deeds for which he has ever since continued to be a favourite hero in Persian poetry. The Eastern writers relate several stories of him, some of which are contained in Malcolm's work quoted below, to whom we refer the student, for they are well worth reading. Bahram was accidentally drowned in a deep well together with his horse, and neither man nor beast ever rose again from the fathomless pit. This is historical, and the well was visited by Sir John Malcolm, and proved fatal to a soldier of his retinue.

15. YEDEJIRD II., the son of the preceding, reigned from A. D. 448 till 458. He was surnamed "SIPAHDOST," or "The Soldier's Friend." The persecutions against the Christians were renewed by him with unheard of cruelty, especially in Persarmenia, where 700 Magi discharged the duties of missionaries with sword in hand. The Armenians nevertheless resisted bravely, and Christianity, though persecuted, was never rooted out. Under his rule the whole of the land of Armenia was pleasant and peaceful.

16. HORMUZ, or HORMISDAS III., reigned 458-472. He was the son of Peroeses (Ψεροσης, Περοσές, or Περοσέτης), sons of the preceding, claimed the succession, and rose in arms against each other. Peroeses gained the throne by the assistance of the White Huns, against whom he turned his sword in after years. He perished in a great battle with them in 484, or as late as 488, together with all of his sons except Kobad, or, perhaps, only some of them. Peroeses was accompanied on this expedition by an ambassador of the emperor Zeno. (Procop. Bel. Pers. i. 3-6.)

18. PALASH OR PALLAS (Πάλας), who reigned from A. D. 484 till 488, was, according to the Eastern writers, a son of Peroeses, and had to contest the throne with Cobades, who was a son of Peroeses, according to both Eastern and Western sources. Terrible internal revolutions took place during his short reign. The Christians were no longer persecuted because they were not fire-worshippers. However, the Nestorians only were protected, and the other Christians were compelled to become Nestorians if they would live in peace. Pallas perished in a battle with his brother Cobades in 488.

19. KOBAD, or COBADES (Κοβάδης), reigned from A. D. 488 to 498, and again from 501 or 502 till 531. The years from 498 till 502 were filled up by the short reign of 20. Jamaspes or Zames. According to the Eastern authorities, he was the brother of Cobades, whom he dethroned, and compelled to fly to the Huns, with whose assistance Cobades recovered his throne about 503. Kobad divided his kingdom in four great divisions: an eastern, a western, an eastern and a southern, and made many wise regulations. Under him rose the religious-political sect of the Mazdakites, so named from Mazdar, their founder, and whom we may compare to the modern Communists, or Socialists. Their principles were democratic, and their rise may be considered as a re-action against the overwhelming influence of the aristocracy. Cobades was for some time an adherent of Mazdak, but he afterwards turned against him, in order to gain the aristocratical party. The Mazdakites accordingly rose in arms, and offered the diadem to Phitasurus, a son of Cobades, but the king seized their leaders by a stratagem, and great numbers of the sectarians were massacred. Procopius (Bell. Pers. i. 11) says, that Cobades entreated the emperor Justin to adopt his son Khosrew or Choresoeus, afterwards Nushirwan, in order thus to secure the succession to him through the assistance of the Romans. But this snatched very much of the tale of Arzarene was having appointed king Yesdigerd the guardian of his son Theodosius. The same author relates that Cobades had four sons, Cuases, Zames, Choresoeus, and Phitasurus, whence it would seem as if the above Jamaspes or Zames had rebelled against his father, and not against his brother. But as Cobades reigned forty-three years, it seems incredible that he should have had an adult son at the beginning of his reign, and this is an additional reason to put greater confidence in the Eastern writers in matters of genealogy. We now proceed to the great war between Cobades and the emperor Anastasius. It appears that according to the terms of the peace of one hundred years concluded between Theodosius the Younger and Bahram V., the Romans were obliged to pay annually a certain sum of money to the Persian king, and Cobades had in answer to the request for the purpose, was answered by Anastasius, that he would find him money, but would not pay any. Cobades declared war, and his arms were victorious. The Roman generals Hypacius and Patriucus Phrygius were defeated, the fortified towns in Mesopotamia were conquered by the Persians, and even the great fortress of Amida was carried by storm, its inhabitants becoming the victims to the fury of the besiegers. Arabic and Hunnic hordes served under the Persian banner. The Huns, however, turned against Cobades, and made so powerful a diversion in the North, that he listened to the proposals of Anastasius, to whom he granted peace in 565, on receiving 11,000 pounds of gold as an indemnity. He also restored Mesopotamia and his other conquests to the Romans, being unable to maintain his authority there on account of the protracted war with the Huns. About this time the Romans constructed the fortress of Dura, the strongest bulwark against Persia, and situated in the very face of Ctesiphon, on the spot where the traveller descends from the mountainous portion of Mesopotamia into the plains of the South. Cobades in his turn, seized upon the great defiles of the Caucasus and fortified them, although less as a precaution against the Romans than the Huns and other northern barbarians. These are the celebrated Iberian and Albanian gates, the latter of which are now called Demir Kapu, "the Iron Gates," or the gates of Derbend. The war with Constantineople was renewed in 521, in the reign of the emperor Justin I, and success was rather on the side of the Persians, till Narses and his brothers, all of whom were among the most distinguished generals of Cobades, deserted their master for political motives which it is not the place here to discuss, and joined the army of Justin. The great Belisarius happened in these wars as it was in his successful general. Cobades left several sons, but bequeathed his empire to his favourite son Chosroes.

21. KHOSRU, or KHOSROW I., called CHOSROES I. (Χοσρούγι) by the Greeks, surnamed ANUSHIRWAN (Nushirwan), or "the generous mind," one of the greatest monarchs of Persia, reigned from A.D. 531 till 579. He inherited the war against the Greeks. We have spoken above of the strange story that Khosrow was to be adopted by Justin. "He was already on his way to Constantineople, when he was informed that the quaestor Proclus had raised objections of so grave a nature against the adoption that the ceremony could not take place. Khosrow consequently returned, and it is said that he felt the insult so deeply as to seek revenge in carrying destruction over the Roman empire. The first war was finished in 532 or 533; Justinian having purchased peace by an annual tribute of 30,000 pieces of gold. One of the conditions of Khosrow was, that seven Greek, but Pagan, sages or philosophers who had stayed some time at the Persian court, should be allowed to live in the Roman empire without being subject to the imperial laws against Paganism. This reflects great credit upon the king. The conquests of Belisarius excited the jealousy of Khosrow, and although he received a considerable portion of the treasures which the Greek found at Carthage, he thought it prudent to draw the Greek arms into a field where laurels were not so easily gained as in Africa. To this effect he roused the Arab Almondar, king of Him, to make an inroad into the empire, and as he supported him, hostilities soon broke out between Constantineople and Ctesiphon also. The details of this war, which lasted from 540 to 561, have been given in the life of Justinian I. The emperor promised an annual tribute of 40,000 pieces of gold, and received of the Persian claims upon Colchis and Lazica. The third war arose out of the conquest of Yemen and other parts of Arabia, from which country the Persians drove out a Abyssinian usurper, and placed a king of the ancient royal family on the Homeric throne, who remained consequently a vassal of Khosrow. The power of the Persian king was already sufficiently great to inspire fear to the emperor Justin II, and as the conquest of Arabia afforded Khosrow an opportunity of continually annoying Syria and Mesopotamia by means of the roving tribes on the northern borders of Arabia, the emperor resolved upon war. Turks of Central Asia, and Abyssinians from the sources of the Nile, were his allies. At the same time (569) the Persarmenians drove their Persian governors out, and put themselves under the authority of the emperor, so that Khosrow also had a fair pretext for war. This war, of which Khosrow did not see the end, broke out in 571, and as its details are given in the lives of the emperors Justin II, Tiberius II., Mauritius, and of Justinian, the second son of Germans, we shall not dwell further upon these topics.

We must consider Khosrow as one of the greatest kings of Persia. In his protracted wars with the Romans he disputed the field with the conquerors of Africa and Italy, and with those very Generalis, Tiberius and Mauritius, who brought Persia to the brink of ruin but a few years after his death. His empire extended from the Indus to the Red Sea, and large tracts in Central Asia, perhaps a portion of eastern Europe, recognised him for a time as their sovereign. He received embassies and presents from the remotest kings of Asia and Africa. His internal government was despotic and cruel, but of that firm description which pleases Orientals, so that he still lives in the memory of the Persians as a model of justice. The communist Mazdak was put to death by his order, after his doctrines had caused a dangerous revolution in the habits and minds of the people, as is shown by the fact that his doctrine of community of women, so utterly adverse to the views of the Oriental nations, had taken a firm root among the Persians. His heart bled when Nushirad, his son by a Christian woman, and a Christian himself, rose in arms against him, but he quelled the rebellion vigorously, and Nushirad perished.

The administration of Khosrow provided for all the wants of the subject; agriculture, trade, and learning were equally protected by him. He bestowed the greatest care upon re-populating ravaged provinces, and rebuilding destroyed cities and villages; so that every body could be happy in Persia, provided he obeyed the king's will without opposition. At Gondi Sapor, near Susa, he founded an academy apparently on the model of the Greek schools at Athens, Alexandria, &c. He caused the best Greek, Latin, and Indian works to be translated into Persian; and had he been an Aesopic instead of a Sasanid, Persia might have become under him an Eastern Greece.

22. HORMEZ or HORMISDAS IV., the son of Khosrow, reigned from A.D. 579 till 590. He carried on his father's war with the Greeks, to the disadvantage, though not to the disgrace, of Persia. Some time before Khosrow died, the general Justinian had advanced as far as the Caspian, which he explored by means of a Greek navy, the first that was seen on those waters; since the time of Sceulcus Nicator and Antonius I. Soter, kings of Syria, whose admiral Patrocles first displayed the Greek flag on the Caspian. Seventy thousand prisoners were sent by Justinian to Cyprus, where they settled. Upon this Justinian penetrated into Assyria. In consequence of a defeat sustained by the Persian Tamchaveores, Justinian was recalled, and replaced by Mauritius, who soon retrieved the fortune of the Greek arms, and in the very year when Chosroes died (579) he took up his winter-quarters in Mesopotamia, from whence, in the following year, he penetrated into lower Mesopotamia and routed a Persian army. He gained another victory in 581, and Tamchaveores perished in the battle. But Maurice having succeeded the emperor Tiberius in that year, his general in the East, SASSANIDAE.

Mystacon, was twice worsted, and the armies of Hormidas were victorious till 596, when Philippus destroyed the Persian host at Solacon near Dara. His successor Heraclius was still more successful. In the great battle of Sisarbone, in 596, the Persians were annihilated, and their camp was taken. Hormuz now concluded an alliance with the Turks, who, however, turned suddenly against him, after having been admitted into Media, and Persia would have been lost but for the splendid achievements of Bahram, who drove the barbarians back into their steps, and compelled them to pay themselves the tribute which they had demanded from Persia. Bahram was rewarded with ingratitude, and being supported by the aristocracy turned against the king, who now reaped the fruits of his former conduct against the grandees. While Bahram advanced upon the royal residence, Hormuz was seized by Bindoes, a royal prince; and a nation that knew no other form of government than the most absolute despotism, now beheld the anomalous sight of their king being tried by the grandees, sentenced to lose his throne, to be deprived of his sight, and to end his days in captivity. Hormuz persuaded the grandees to place the diadem on his second son, but he was too much detested to meet with the slightest compliance, and his eldest son Chosroes was chosen in his stead. Bahram protested against this election with sword in hand, and Chosroes, unable to cope with him, fled to the camp of the emperor. During these troubles the blinded Hormuz was murdered by Bindoes (590). The events have been more fully related in the life of the emperor Mauricius. King Hormuz would have met with a better fate had his father's excellent minister, Abu-zurg-a-mihir, commonly called Buzurg, continued to live at his court, from which old age obliged him to retire soon after the accession of Hormuz. According to some writers, Buzurg had been minister to king Cobades (502—531); but we can hardly believe that he discharged his eminence functions during so long a period as sixty years. However, the thing is possible. This Buzurg still lives in the memory of the people as one of the greatest sages. He introduced the study of Indian literature Persia, and thence also he imported the most noble of games, chess.

23. BAHRAM OR VARANES VI. SHURIN, a royal prince, reigned from A.D. 590 till 591. This is the great general mentioned in the preceding article. Unable to maintain the throne against Khosreuw, who was supported by the emperor Mauricius, he fled to the Turks, once his enemies, by whom he was well received and raised to the highest dignities. It is said that he was poisoned (by the Persian king ?). Bahram was one of the greatest heroes of Persia, and his life is very interesting.

24. KHOSREW OR CHOSROES II. PURWIZ, reigned from A.D. 590 or 591 till 628, and was the son of Hormuz IV. It has been related in the preceding article how he ascended the throne, lost it against Bahram, and recovered it with the assistance of the emperor Mauricius. In this expedition the Greek army was commanded by Narses, a general scarcely less eminent than the great euxmach, and who destroyed the hopes of the usurper Bahram in two great battles on the river Zab. The adherents of Bahram were severely punished by Chosroes, who continued to live in peace with Constantinople as long as Mauricius lived, and even kept a Greek body guard, so that Persia was entirely under Greek influence. But when the murderer and successor of Mauricius, the tyrant Phocas, announced his accession to Chosroes by Lilius, the same person who had spilt the blood of Mauricius, the Persian king, threw the ambassador into a dungeon and declared war to avenge the death of his benefactor (603). Owing to the prowess of the Persians, and the bad choice Phocas made of his generals after he had removed Nurses from the command, the arms of Chosroes met with extraordinary success. He conquered Mesopotamia and its great bulwarks Dara, Amidia, Edessa, and overran all Asia Minor, making the inhabitants of Constantinople tremble for their safety. Nor was his progress checked through the accession of Heraclius, in 610, who sued in vain for peace. Syria yielded to Chosroes in 611, Palestine in 614, Egypt in 616, and in the same year Asia Minor was completely conquered, a Persian camp being pitched at Chaledon, opposite Constantinople, where the Persians maintained themselves during ten years. It was not before 621 that Heraclius showed himself that extraordinary man he really was, and saved the Eastern empire from the brink of ruin. The history of his splendid campaigns has been given in his life with sufficient details to make its repetition here superfluous. Borne down by a series of unparalleled misfortunes, and worn out by age and fatigue, Chosroes resolved, in 628, to abdicate in favour of his son Mordaza, but Shirweh, or Siros, his eldest, anticipated his design, and at the head of a band of noble conspirators seized upon the person of his father, deposed him on the 25th of February, 628, and put him to death on the 26th following.

The Orientals say that Chosroes reigned six years too long; and it is rather remarkable that his great antagonist Heraclius also outlived his glory. No Persian king lived in such splendour as Chosroes; and however fabulous the Eastern accounts respecting his magnificence may be, they are true in the main, as is attested by the Western writers. Chosroes was summoned by Mohammed to embrace the new doctrine, but replied with contempt to the messenger of a "lizard eater," as the Persians used to call the wandering tribes of the Arabs. His successors held a different language.

25. SHIRWEH OR SIROS (Sapirus), reigned only eight months, and died probably an unnatural death, after having murdered Mordaza and several others of his brothers. In the month of March, 628, he concluded peace with the emperor Heraclius. The numerous captives were restored on both sides, and hundreds of thousands of Greek subjects were thus given back to their families and their country. Siros also restored the holy cross which had been taken at the conquest of Jerusalem.

26. ARDISHIR OR ARTAXERXES, the infant son of Siros, was murdered a few days after the death of his father. He was the last male Sassanid. After him the throne was disputed by a host of candidates of both sexes and doubtful descent, who had no sooner ascended the throne than they were hurried from it into death or captivity. They were, according to the Eastern sources—

27. PURAN-DORHT, a daughter of Khosreuw Purwiz, and a sister of Siros.

28. SHAH-SHENANDAH, her cousin and lover.

29. ARZEM-DORHT, a daughter of Khosreuw Purwiz.
SATIBARZANES.

30. Kesra, said to be a royal prince, put to death.
31. Ferokhzad, said to be a son of Khusraw Pusraw, put to death.
32. Yesirderd or Jesigerd III, the last king, and said to be a grandson of Choroes, reigned from A.D. 632 till 651. Having decided to adopt the Mohammedan religion, as he was summoned to do by the khalif Abu-Bekr, his kingdom was invaded by the Arabic general Kaleb. In the battle of Cadesia (636), and other engagements, the Persians were worsted; their fortified towns and royal cities were taken one after the other; and, in 651, Jesigerd was an abandoned fugitive in the tract watered by the Oxus and the Jaxartes, whence he solicited and, perhaps, obtained the assistance of Tait-Song, emperor of China. He was thus enabled to raise an army of Turks, with whom he marched against the Arabs; but he was betrayed by his allies, by whom he was cut to pieces on his flight from them to the north. He left a son, Firuz, or Peroes, who entered the service of the Chinese emperor; and his son, the last of the Sassanid, was raised by the same to the rank of a vassal king of Bokhara. A daughter of Jesigerd married Hassan, the son of Ali; and another married Mohammed, the son of Abu-Bekr; important events for the later history of Persia, which was henceforth a Mohammedan country.

We observe here that the Persian historians are respectable sources for the history of the Sassanidae, and that their chronology differs but little from that of the Western writers.

(The Greek and Roman writers, who speak of the Sassanidae, are referred to in the lives of the contemporary emperors; comp. Malcom, History of Persia, vol. 1; Richter, Hist. kritischer Versuch über die Arsaciden und Sassaniden-Dynastie, Leipzig, 1804.) [W. P.]

SASSIA, the mother of the younger Cluentius, married after the death of her husband her only son-in-law, A. Aurius Melineus, and subsequently Opianicus. Cicero describes her as a monster of guilt. (Cic. pro Cluent. 5, 9, 62, 63, 70.) [CLUENTIUS.]

SATACES or SATHACES. [SARACES.]

SATASPES (Sakspy), a Persian and an Achaemenid, son of Teaspes. Having offered violence to a daughter of Zopyrus, the son of Megabyzus, he was condemned by Xerxes to be impaled; but at the request of his mother, the king’s aunt, this punishment was remitted on condition of his effecting the circumnavigation of Africa. He set sail accordingly from Egypt, passed through the Straits of Gibraltar, and continued his voyage towards the south for a considerable distance, but at length turned back again, being discouraged apparently by adverse winds and currents. Xerxes, however, did not accept his excuses, and inflicted on him the penalty to which he had been originally sentenced. (Herod. iv. 22.) [E. E.]

SATIBARZANES (Satbarzaš), a Persian, was satrap of Aria under Darius III. In B.C. 350, Alexander the Great, marching through the borders of Aria on his way from Hyrcania against the Parians, was met at a city named Susia by Satibarzanes, who made submission to him, and was rewarded for it by the restoration of his satrapy. Alexander also, in order to prevent the commission of any hostilities against the Arians by the Macedonian troops which were following from the west, left behind with Satibarzanes forty horse-dartmen, under the command of Anaxippus. These, however, together with their commander, were soon after murdered by the satrap, who excited the Arians to rebellion, and gathered his forces together at the city of Artoana. Hence, on the approach of Alexander, he fled to join the traitor Bessus; and the city, after a short siege, was captured by the Macedonians. Towards the end of the same year (b.c. 330), Alexander, hearing that Satibarzanes had again entered Aria with 2000 horse, supplied by Bessus, and had excited the Arians to another revolt, sent a force against him under Artabazus, Eriugius, and Caranus, according to Arrian. In a battle which ensued, and of which the issue was yet doubtful, Satibarzanes came forward and defied any one of the enemy’s generals to single combat. The challenge was accepted by Eriugius, and Satibarzanes was slain. (Arr. Anab. iii. 25, 28; Diod. xvii. 78, 81, 83; Curt. vi. 6, vii. 3, 4.) [E. E.]

P. SATRIENUS, a name which occurs only on coins, probably derived from Satrius, like Nasidius from Nasidius, &c. It is disputed whether the head on the obverse of the annexed coin is that of Pallas or of Mars; the features are in favour of its being Pallas, but the she-wolf on the reverse points rather to Mars. (Eckhel, vol. v. p. 300.)

COIN OF P. SATRIENUS.

SATRIUS. 1. I. M. SATRIUS, the son of the sister of L. Minucius Basius, was adopted by the latter, whose name he assumed (Cic. de Off. iii. 19). He is spoken of under Basilius, No. 5.

2. A. CANNIS SATRIUS, is mentioned by Cicero in B.C. 95 (ad Att. i. § 9).

3. SATRIUS, a legate of Trebonius, b.c. 43. (Pseudo-Brut. ad Cic. i. 6.)

SATRIUS RUFUS. [REFUS.]

SATRIUS SECUNDUS. [SEKUNDUS.]

SATURIE (Satvryf), an artist, whose portrait of Arisinoë in glass is highly praised by Diodorus, in an epitaph in the Greek Anthology. (Brunck, Anal. vol. ii. p. 185, No. 3; Anth. Pal. ix. 776, vol. ii. p. 261, ed. Jacobs). The artist’s age is determined by the subject; but there is a difficulty respecting the form of his work. It has been commonly supposed that it was in relief, like the Portland vase, and this is the interpretation given in the lemmata prefixed to the epitaph in the Palatine Codex, εἰς κρισταλλον γεγραμμένον, but the use of the word γράφας (not γραμμένον) in the epitaph itself, and the comparison of the work to one of Zeuxis, for colour and grace, would seem to show that it was nothing but a painting on glass. (Jacobs, Animade, in Anth. Graec. vol. ii. pt. ii. p. 78.) Some writers on art mention the name under the form Satyrus. (Winckelmann, Gesch. d. Kunst, b. x. c. 2. § 24.) [P. S.]

P. SATURIUS, is mentioned by Cicero in terms of great respect as one of the judges in SATURNINUS.

The case of Cluentius (pro Cluentia, 38, 65). He pleaded for Chaerea against Cicero's client, Q. Roscius, the comic actor (pro Rosc. Com. 1, 6, 8).

SATURNIA, that is, a daughter of Saturnus, and accordingly used as a surname of Juno and Vestia. (Verg. Aen. i. 23, xii. 156; Ov. Fast. i. 265, vi. 383. [L. S.])

SATURNIUS, artists. 1. One of the great gem-engravers of the age of Augustus. There is a beautiful cameo by him, engraved with the portrait of the younger Antonia, the wife of Drusus, and inscribed with the word CATOPNEINOT, in very fine characters. The gem formerly belonged to the Arcieri family at Rome, and afterwards to the late queen of Naples, Caroline Murat. (R. Rochette, Lettre à M. Schorn, p. 153, 2d ed.)

2. Among the artists of the age of the Antonines, Müller mentions, on the authority of Appuleius (de Magia, p. 66, ed. Bipont), a skillful wood-carver, named Saturninus, of Oea, in Africa. (Müller, Archäol. d. Kunst, § 204, n. 5.)

3. P. Lucrinius, a silver-claser, only known by a Roman inscription. (Doni, Inscript. p. 319, No. 12; R. Rochette, Lettre à M. Schorn, p. 401, 2d ed.) [P. S.]

SATURNIUS I, one of the thirty tyrants enumerated by Trebellius Pollio [see AURELUS], by whom we are told that he was the best of all the generals of his day, and much beloved by Valerian, that disgusted by the debauchery of Gallienus, he accepted from the soldiers the title of emperor, and that, after having displayed much energy during the period of his sway, he was put to death by the troops, who could not endure the sternness of his discipline. Not one word, however, is said of the country in which these events took place. (Trebell. Poll. Trig. Tyr. 22.) [W. R.]

SATURNIUS II, a native of Gaul, whose biography has been written by Vopiscus, distinguished himself so highly by military achievements in his native country, in Spain and Africa, that he was regarded as one of the most able officers in the empire, and was appointed by Aurelian commander of the Eastern frontier, with express orders that he should never visit Egypt, for it was feared that the presence of an active and ambitious Gaul among a population notorious for turbulence and violence might lead to disorder or insurrection. The far-seeing sagacity of this injunction was fully proved, for when, at a later period, during the reign of Probus, Saturninus entered Alexandria, the crowd at once saluted him as Augustus. Flying from such a dangerous compliment, he returned to Syria; but concluding, upon reflection, that his safety was already compromised, with great reluctance he permitted himself to be invested with a purple robe striped from a statute of Venus, and in that attire, surrounded by his troops, received the adoration of the crowd. He was eventually slain by the soldiers of Probus, although the emperor would willingly have spared his life. (Vopiscus, Saturn.) [W. R.]

SATURNIUS III. A medal in third brass has been described by Banduri, which, if genuine, cannot, according to the most skilful numismatologists, be ascribed to an epoch earlier than the age of the sons of Constantine, and must therefore commemorate the usurpation of some pretender with regard to whom history is altogether silent. The piece in question exhibits on the obverse a nayed head with the words IMP. CAE. SATURNINVS AV.; on the reverse a soldier stabbing an enemy who has fallen from his horse, with FEL. TEM. REPARATIO, a legend which appears for the first time on the coins of Constantine and Constans. (Eckhel, vol. viii. pp. 111—113.) [W. R.]

SATURNIUS, AE'LIUS, composed some poems disrespectful to the emperor Tiberius, and was in consequence condemned by the senate, and hurled down from the Capitol. (Dion Cass. lvi. 22.)

SATURNIUS, AEMILIUS, praefectus pretorio under Septimius Severus, was slain by Plautianus, the all-powerful favourite of the emperor. (Dion Cass. lxxv. 14.)

SATURNIUS, ANNIUS, mentioned in a letter of Cicero (ad Att. v. 1. § 2).

SATURNIUS, L. ANTO'NIUS, governor of Upper Germany in the reign of Domitian, raised a rebellion against that emperor from motives of personal hatred, a. d. 81. A sudden inundation of the Rhine prevented Saturninus from receiving the assistance of the barbarians which had been promised him, and he was in consequence conquered without difficulty by L. Appius Maximus, the general of Domitian. Maximus burnt all the letters of Antonius, that others might not be implicated in the revolt; but Domitian did not imitate the magnanimity of his general, for he seized the pretext to put various persons to death along with Saturninus, and sent their heads to be exposed on the Rostra at Rome. It is related that the victory over Antonius was announced at Rome on the same day on which it was fought. As to the variations in the name of L. Appius Maximus in the different writers see MAXIMUS, p. 986, b. (Dion Cass. lxvii. 11; Suet. Dom. 6, 7; Aurel. Vict. Epit. 11; Mart. iv. 11, ix. 85; Plut. Aemil. Pult. 25.)

SATURNIUS, APO'NIUS, the governor of Moesia at the death of Nero, repulsed the Saracens, who had invaded the province, and was in consequence rewarded by a triumphal statue at the commencement of Otho's reign. In the struggle between Vitellius and Vespasian for the empire, he first espoused the cause of the former, but afterwards declared himself in favour of the latter, and crossed the Alps to join Antonius Primus in northern Italy. But Primus, who was anxious to obtain the supreme command, excised a mutiny of the soldiers against Saturninus, and compelled him to fly from the camp. Tacitus calls him a consular, which we might infer from his being Legatus of Moesia, but his name does not occur in the Fasti. (Tac. Hist. i. 79, ii. 85, 96, iii. 3, 9, 11.)

SATURNIUS, APPULEIUS. I. C. AP'PEL'IUS SATURNIUS, was one of the commissioners sent by the senate in b. c. 168 to inquire into and settle the disputes between the Pisani and Lunenses. (Liv. xiv. 13.)

2. APPULEIUS SATURNIUS, praetor b. c. 166, is probably the same person as the L. Appuleius who was appointed in b. c. 173 one of the commissioners for dividing certain lands in Liguria and Gaul among the citizens and Latins. (Liv. xiv. 44, comp. xiii. 4.)

3. L. APPULEIUS SATURNIUS, the celebrated...
demagogue, was probably a grandson of the preceding. He possessed considerable powers of oratory, but was of a loose and dissolute character; and he might probably have passed through life much like most other Roman nobles, had he not received an insult from the senate at the commencement of his public career, which ranked in his breast and made him a furious opponent of the aristocratical party. In his quaeestorship, n. c. 104, he was stationed at Ostia, and to Rome was suffering at that time from a scarcity of corn, and the senate thought that Saturninus did not make sufficient exertions to supply the city; they superseded him and entrusted the provisioning of the capital to M. Scursus (Diod. Ec. xxxvi. p. 608, ed. Wess.; Cic. pro Sext. 17, de Horusp. Resp. 20). Saturninus forthwith threw himself into the foremost ranks of the democratical party, and entered into a close alliance with Marius and his friends. He soon acquired great popularity, and was elected tribune of the plebs for the year n. c. 102. We have scarcely any accounts of his conduct in his first tribunitian; but he did enough to earn the hatred of the aristocracy, and accordingly Metellus Numidicus, who was at that time censor, endeavoured to expel him from the senate on the ground of immorality, but was prevented from carrying his purpose into execution by the agitation of his colleague. Saturninus vowed vengeance against Metellus, which he was soon able to gratify by the assistance of Marius, who was also a personal enemy of Metellus. He resolved to become a candidate for the tribunitian for the year n. c. 100. At the same time Glaucia, who next to Saturninus was the greatest demagogue of the day, offered himself as a candidate for the praetorship, and Marius for the consulsiphip. If they all three carried their elections, the power of the state, they thought, would be in their hands; they might easily ruin Metellus, and crush the aristocracy. But in the midst of these projects Saturninus was nearly ruined by a skilful movement of his enemies. In the course of n. c. 101, and before the comitia for the election of the magistrates for the ensuing year were held, the ambassador of Mithridates appeared at Rome, bringing with him large sums of money for the purpose of bribing the leading senators. As soon as this became known to Saturninus, he not only attacked the senators with the utmost vehemence, but heaped the greatest insults upon the ambassadors. Upon the latter complaining of this violation of the law of nations, the senate eagerly availed themselves of the opportunity, and brought Saturninus to trial for the offence he had committed. As the judges at that time consisted exclusively of senators, his condemnation appeared certain. Saturninus in the utmost alarm put on the dress of a supplicant, and endeavoured by his appearance, as well as by his words, to excite the commiseration of the people. In this he completely succeeded; the people regarded him as a martyr to their cause, and on the day of his trial assembled in such crowds around the court, that the judges were overset, and contrary to general expectation pronounced a verdict of acquittal (Diod. Ec. p. 631, ed. Wess). In the comitia which soon followed, Marius was elected consul and Glaucia praetor, but Saturninus was not equally successful. He lost his election chiefly through the exertions of A. Nonius, who distinguished himself by his vehement attacks upon Glaucia and Saturninus, and was chosen in his stead. But Nonius paid dearly for his honour, for in the same evening he was murdered by the emissaries of Glaucia and Saturninus; and early the following morning before the forum was full, Saturninus was chosen to fill up the vacancy. As soon as he had entered upon his tribunitian (n. c. 100), he brought forward an agrarian law for dividing the lands in Gaul, which had been lately occupied by the Cimbri, and added to the law a clause, that, if it was enacted by the people, the senate should swear obedience to it within five days, and that whoever refused to do so should be expelled from the senate, and pay a fine of twenty talents. This clause was specially aimed at Metellus, who, it was well known, would refuse to obey the requisition. But in order to make sure of a refusal on the part of Metellus, Marius rose in the senate and declared that he would never take the oath, and Metellus made the same declara- tion; but when the law had been passed, and Saturninus summoned the senators to the rostra to comply with the demands of the law, Marius, to the astonishment of all, immediately took the oath, and advised the senate to follow his example. Metellus alone refused compliance; and on the following day Saturninus sent his vioi to drag the ex-censor out of the senate-house. Not content with his victory, he brought forward a bill to punish with exile. The friends of Metellus were ready to take up arms in his defence; but Metellus declined their assistance, and withdrew privately from the city. Saturninus brought forward other popular measures, of which our information is very scanty. He proposed a Lex Frumentaria, by which the state was to sell corn to the people at 5-6ths of an as for the modius (Auctor, ad Herenn. i. 12), and also a law for founding new colonies in Sicily, Achaia, and Macedonia (Aurel. Vict. de Vir. Ill. 73; comp. Cic. pro Balb. 21). In the comitia for the election of the magistrates for the following year, Saturninus obtained the tribunitia for the third time, and along with him there was chosen a certain Equitius, a runaway slave, who pretended to be a son of Tib. Gracchus. Glaucia was at the same time a candidate for the consulsiphip; the two other candidates were M. Antonius and C. Memmius. The latter, being a Roman of the equestrian order, and the struggle lay between Glaucia and Memmius. As the latter seemed likely to carry his election, Saturninus and Glaucia hired some ruffians who murdered him openly in the comitia. All sensible people had previously become alarmed at the mad conduct of Saturninus and his associates; and this last act produced a complete reaction against him. The senate felt themselves now sufficiently strong to declare them public enemies, and ordered the consuls to put them down by force. Marius was unwilling to act against his associates, but he had no alternative, and his backwardness was compensated by the zeal of others. Driven out of the forum, Saturninus, Glaucia, and the quaestor Saturninus took refuge in the Capitol, but the partisans of the senate cut off the pipes which supplied the Capitol with water, before Marius began to move against them. Unable to hold out any longer, they surrendered to Marius. The latter did all he could to save their lives; as soon as they descended from the Capitol, he placed them for security in the Curia Hostilia, but the mob pulled off the tiles of the senate-house, and pelted them with the tiles till they died. The senate gave their sanction to these proceedings by rewarding with the citizenship a slave of the name of Scaeva, who claimed the honour of having killed Saturninus. Nearly forty years after these events, the tribune T. Lucius, accused an aged senator Rabirius, of having been the murderer of Saturninus. An account of this trial is given elsewhere. [RABIRIUS] (Appian, B.C.I. 29—32; Plut. Mar. 29—30; Liv. Epit. 69; Oros. v. 17; Flor. iii. 16; Vell. Pat. ii. 12; Val. Max. ix. 7, § 3; Cic. Brut. 62, pro Sest. 47; pro C. Rabir. passim).

4. L. APPELUS Saturninus, was propraetor of Macedonia in B.C. 56, when Cicero visited the province after his banishment from Rome. Although a friend of Cicero, he did not venture to show him any marks of attention for fear of displeasing the ruling party at Rome. It was only his quaestor Plancius who openly espoused the cause of the exile. This Saturninus was a native of Atina, and was the first native of that prefecture who had obtained a curule office. (Cic. pro Planc. 8, 11, 41.)

5. CN. APPULEIUS Saturninus, the son of No. 4, was present at the trial of Cn. Plancius, in B.C. 51. During Cicero’s absence in Cilicia, in B.C. 50, he was accused by Cn. Domitius, as Cælius writes to Cicero (Cic. pro Planc. 8, 12, ad Fam. viii. 14). He is also mentioned by Cicero in B.C. 43, as the heres of Q. Tarius (ad Fam. xii. 26). This Saturninus is probably the same as the one of whom Valerius Maximus tells a scandalous tale (ix. 1, § 8).

SATURNINUS, CLAUVIUS, a jurist from whose Liber Singularis de Poenis Paganorum there is a single excerpt in the Digest (50. tit. 19. s. 16). In the Florentine Index the work is attributed to Venuleius Saturninus, an error which, as it has been observed, has manifestly originated in the title to the fifteenth excerpt of lib. 50. tit. 19. Two excerpts of Antonius Pius are addressed to Claudius Saturninus (Dig. 29. tit. 3. a. 1 § 2, 50. tit. 7. 4). Saturninus was praetor under the Divi Fratres (Dig. 17. tit. 1. s. 6. § 7). A rescript of Hadrian on the excusatio of a minor annis xxv, who had been appointed (datus) tutor to an admiris, is addressed to Claudius Saturninus, legatus Bel- giae; and there is no chronological impossibility in assuming him to be the jurist.

Grotius maintains that the Q. Saturninus who wrote, at least, ten books Ad Edictum (Dig. 34. tit. 2. s. 19. § 7), is a different person from the author of the treatise De Poenis Paganorum. A Saturninus is again mentioned in an excerpt from Ulpian (Dig. 12. tit. 2. s. 13. § 5). But this Quintus may be Venuleius Saturninus. (Zimmerm, Geschicht des Rom. Privatrechts, i. p. 354.) [G. L.]

SATURNINUS, FAVINNIUS, the paedagogus, who corrupted the daughter of Pontius Aulidianus. (Val. Max. vi. i. § 3.)

SATURNINUS, FRUIUS, a rhetorician mentioned in the Contraversae of the elder Seneca. (Contr. 21.)

SATURNINUS, JUINIUS, a Roman historian of the Augustan age, quoted by Suetonius. (Aug. 27.)

SATURNINUS, LUSIUS, ruined in the reign of Claudius through means of Sullius, as the enemies of the latter asserted. (Tac. Ann. xiii. 43.)

SATURNINUS, POMPEIUS, a contem- porary of the younger Pliny, is praised by the latter as a distinguished orator, historian, and poet (Plin. Ep. i. 8). Several of Pliny’s letters are addressed to him. (Ep. i. 8, v. 9, vii. 15, ix. 38.)

SATURNINUS, SENTIUS. 1. C. SENTIUS (SATURNINUS), was propraetor of Macedonia during the Social war, and probably for some time afterwards. He defeated the Thracians, who had invaded his province with a large force, under their king Sotimthus (Gros. v. 13, Sall. 11; Cis. Verg. iii. 93, in Pison. 34). The exact time during which he governed Macedonia is uncertain. If the reading is correct in the Epitome of Livy (Epit. 70), he could not have been appointed later than B.C. 92, as none of the events recorded in the seventieth book were later than that year. It is said in the Epitome that he fought unsuccessfully against the Thracians, but this is probably an error. It is, as at all events, clear from Plutarch (I. C.) that he was still governor of Macedonia in B.C. 88, when Sulla was in Greece. Modern writers give him the cognomen Saturninus, as it was borne by most of the other Sentii, but it does not occur in any of the ancient writers, as far as we are aware.

2. C. SENTIUS SATURNINUS, was one of the persons of distinguished rank who deserted Sex. Pompeius in B.C. 33, and passed over to Octavius (Vell. Pat. ii. 77; Appian, B.C. v. 130, comp. v. 52). He is no doubt the same as the Sentius Saturninus Vetulio, who was proscribed by the triumvirs in B.C. 43, and escaped to Pompeii in Sicily (Val. Max. vii. i. § 9). The circumstances, however, which Velarius Maximus relates respecting his escape, are told by Appian (B.C. iv. 45), with reference to one Pompeius. [POMPONIUS. No. 14.] Saturninus was rewarded for his desertion of Pompeii by the consulship, which he held in B.C. 19, with Q. Lucertus Vespillo. Velicius Paterculus celebrates his praises for the manner in which he carried on the government during his consulship, and for his opposition to the seditious schemes of Eugnatius Rufus. [RUPUS, EGNATUS, No. 2.] After his consulship he was appointed to the government of Syria, in connection with which he was prosecuted, as mentioned by Josephus. He was succeeded in the government by Quintilius Varus (Dion Cass. liv. 10; Frontin. de Aquaed. 10; Vell. Pat. ii. 92; Joseph. Ant. xvi. 10. § 8, xvi. 11. § 3, xvii. i. § 1, xvii. 3. § 2, xvii. 5. § 2, B. J. i. 27. § 2). Josephus (Ant. xvi. i. § 3) speaks of three sons of Saturninus, who accompanied him as legati to Syria, and who were present with their father at the trial of Herod’s sons at Berytus in B.C. 6.

3. C. SENTIUS C. F. C. N. SATURNINUS, the son of No. 2, was consul a.d. 4, in which year the Lex Aelia Sentia was passed. He was appointed by Augustus governor of Germany, and served with distinction under Tiberius, in his campaign against the Germans. He was, in consequence, rewarded by Augustus with the triumphal ornaments in A.D. 6. (Vell. Pat. ii. 103, 105, 109; Dion Cass. liv. 28.)

4. CN. SENTIUS SATURNINUS, consul suffectus A.D. 4, was probably likewise a son of No. 2, since the latter had, as we have already seen, three sons in Syria, who were old enough to serve as his legati. He was appointed in A.D. 19, governor of Syria, and compelled CN. Piso by force of arms to surrender the province to him. [Piso, No. 23.] Tacitus calls the governor of Syria simply Cn. Sentius, but there can be little doubt that he is the same as the consul suffectus of A.D. 4. (Tac. Ann. ii. 74, 79, 81, iii. 7.)

5. Cn. Sentius Saturninus, son of No. 4, was consul A.D. 41, with the emperor Caligula, who was slain in this year. After the death of Caligula, Saturninus made a long speech in the senate against tyranny, if we may trust the account in Josephus. (Joseph. Ant. xiv. 2, B. J. ii. 11.)

6. L. Sentius Saturninus, occurs on coins of the republican period, but it is uncertain who he was. (Eckhel, vol. v. p. 305.)

COIN OF L. SENTIUS SATURNINUS.

SATURNIUS, VENULEIUS, is said by Lampridius (Alex. Severus, c. 68) to have been a pupil of Papinius, and a consiliarius of Alexander Severus. There is a rescript of Alexander to Venuleius (Cod. 7, tit. 1 s. 1), and one of Antoninus (Camocia) addressed to Saturninus in the year A.D. 213 (Cod. 5, tit. 65 s. 1); both of which may have been addressed to Venuleius Saturninus. His writings, as they are stated in the Florentine Index and appear from the excerpts in the Digest, were:—Decem Libri Actionum, Sex Interdictorum Quatuor de Office Proconsulis, Tres Publicorum or De Publicis Judicis, and Novemdecem Stipulationum. The title Venul. Libri Septem Disp. (Dig. 46, tit. 7 s. 18) is manifestly erroneous, as appears from the titles of the two following extracts, and we must either read Stipulationum in place of Disputationum, or we must read Ulp. in place of Venul. The work De Poenis Paganorum is erroneously attributed to Venuleius in the Florentine Index.

There are seventy-one excerpts from Venuleius in the Digest. (Zimmerm, Geschichte des Rom. Privatrechts, i. p. 379.) [O. L.]

SATURNINUS, VITEILLIUS, praefectus of a legion under Otho. (Tac. Hist. i. 82.)

SATURNINUS, VOLUSIUS. 1. L. Volusius Saturninus, consul suffectus in A.D. 12, was descended from an ancient family, none of the members of which, however, had previously obtained any higher office in the state than the praetorship. This Saturninus first accumulated the enormous wealth for which his family afterwards became so celebrated. He died in A.D. 20. (Tac. Ann. iii. 30.)

2. L. Volusius Saturninus, son of the preceding, was consul suffectus, A.D. 3. He died in the reign of Nero, A.D. 56, at the age of ninety-three, having survived all the persons who were members of the senate during his consulsipal. It appears from Pliny that he was prefect of the city at the time of his death. The great wealth which he had inherited from his father he still further increased by economy. (Tac. Ann. xiii. 30, xiv. 56; Plin. H. N. vii. 12 s. 14, vii. 48 s. 49, xi. 38 s. 90.)

3. Q. Volusius Saturninus, son of the preceding, was consul in A.D. 56, with P. Cornelius Scipio. His father was upwards of sixty-two years of age when he was born: his mother was a Cornelia of the family of the Scipios. He was one of three commissioners who took the census of the Gauls, in A.D. 61. (Plin. H. N. vii. 12 s. 14; Tac. Ann. xiii. 25, xiv. 46.)

4. A. Volusius Saturninus, consul A.D. 87, with the emperor Domitian. (Fasti.)

5. Q. Volusius Saturninus, consul A.D. 92, with the emperor Domitian. (Fasti.)

SATURNIUS, that is, a son of Saturnus, and accordingly used as a surname of Jupiter and Neptune. (Verg. Aen. iv. 372, v. 799.) [L. S.]

SATURNUS, a mythical king of Italy to whom was ascribed the introduction of agriculture and the habits of civilised life in general. The name is, notwithstanding the different quantity, connected with the verb sero, set, saturn, and although the ancients themselves invariably identify Saturnus with the Greek Cronos, there is no resemblance whatever between the attributes of the two deities, except that both were regarded as the most ancient divinities in their respective countries. The resemblance is much stronger between Demeter and Saturn, for all that the Greeks ascribe to their Demeter is ascribed by the Italians to Saturn, who in the very earliest times came to Italy in the reign of Janus. (Verg. Aen. viii. 314, &c.; Macrobr. Sat. i. 10; P. Vict. De Orig. Gent. Rom. 1, &c.) Saturnus, then, deriving his name from sowing, is justly called the introducer of civilisation and social order, both of which are inseparably connected with agriculture. His reign is, moreover, conceived for the same reason to have been the golden age of Italy, and more especially of the Aborigines, his subjects. As agricultural industry is the source of wealth and plenty, his wife was Ops, the representative of plenty. The story related of the god, that is, in the reign of Janus he came to Italy, was hospitably received by Janus, and formed a settlement on the Capitoline hill, which was hence called the Saturnian hill. At the foot of that hill, on the road leading up to the Capitol, stood in the temple of Saturn. (Dionys. vi. 1; Liv. xii. 27; Vict. l. c. 3, Reg. Urb. viii.) Saturn then made the people acquainted with agriculture, suppressed their savage mode of life, and led them to order, peaceful occupations, and morality. The result was that the whole country was called Saturnia or the land of plenty. (Verg. Aen. viii. 359; Justin, xliii. 1; Macrobr. Sat. i. 7; Varro, De Ling. Lat. v. 42; Fest. s. v. Saturnus; Victor, l. c.) Saturn, like many other mythical kings, suddenly disappeared, being removed from earth to the abodes of the gods, and immediately after Janus is said to have erected an altar to Saturn in the forum. (Macrobr. l. c.; Arnob. iv. 24; Ov. Fast. i. 238.) It is further related that Latium received its name (from lateo) from this disappearance of Saturn, who for the same reason was regarded by some as a divinity of the nether world. (Plut. Quaest. Rom. 24.)

Respecting the festival solemnized by the Romans in honour of Saturn, see Dict. of Antiq. s. v. Saturnalia.

The statue of Saturnus was hollow and filled with oil, probably to denote the fertility of Latium in olives (Plin. H. N. xv. 7. 7); in his hand he held a crooked pruning knife, and his feet were

SATURNUS.
SATYRUS. surrounded with a woolen riband. (Virg. Aen. vii. 179; Armob. vi. 12; Macrob. l. c.; Martial, xi. 6. 1.) In the pediment of the temple of Saturn were seen two figures resembling Tritons, with horns, and whose lower extremities grew out of the ground (Macrob. Sat. i. 8); the temple itself contained the public treasury, and many laws also were deposited in it. (Macrob. Sat. i. 8.) It must be remarked in conclusion that Saturn and Ops were not only the protectors of agriculture, but all vegetation was under their care, as well as every thing which promoted their growth. (Macrob. Sat. i. 7, 10; comp. Hartung, Die Religion der Römmer, vol. ii. p. 192, &c.)

SATYRION or SATYRON (Σατυρίων, Σατυρόων), a Socratic philosopher, of whom nothing is known, beyond the bare mention of his name by M. Antoninus (x. 31). [P. S.]

SATYRUS, artist. [Satureius.]

SATYRUS, literary. [Satyrus.]

SATYRUS (Σάτυρος), the name of a class of beings in Greek mythology, who are inseparably connected with the worship of Dionysus, and represent the luxuriant vital powers of nature. In their appearance they were goat-like or rams, whence many ancients believed that the word σάτυρος was identical with τίτωρος, a ram. (Schol. ad Theocr. iii. 2, vii. 72; Aelian, V. H. iii. 40; comp. Eustath. ad Hom. p. 1157; Hesych. s. v.; and Strab. x. p. 466.) Homer does not mention any Satyr, while Hesiod (Work. 94, ed. Göttling) speaks of them in the plural and describes them as a race good for nothing and unfit for work, and in a passage quoted by Strabo (x. p. 471) he states that the Satyrs, Nymphs and Curetes were the children of the five daughters of Hecateus and the daughter of Phoroneus. The more common statement is that the Satyrs were the sons of Hermes and Iphithame (Nomn. Dionys. xiv. 113), or of the Naiads (Xenoph. Sympos. v. 7); Silen also calls them his own sons. (Eurip. Cyc. 13, 82, 269.)

The appearance of the Satyrs is described by later writers as robust, and rough, though with various modificatious, but their general features are as follows: the hair is bristly, the nose round and somewhat turned upwards, the ears pointed at the top like those of animals (whence they are sometimes called σήπες, Eurip. Cyc. 624); they generally have little horns, or at least two hornlike protruberances (φόμες), and at or near the end of the back there appears a little tail like that of a horse or a goat. In works of art they were represented at different stages of life: the older ones, commonly called Seilens or Silens (Paus. i. 23. § 6), usually have bald heads and beards, and the younger ones are termed Satyriscis (Σατυρίσκοι, Theocrit. iv. 62, xvii. 49). All kinds of satyrs belong to the retinue of Dionysus (Apollod. iii. 5. § 1; Strab. x. p. 468; Ob. Fest. iii. 737, Arc Am. i. 542, iii. 157), and are always described as fond of wine, whence they often appear either with a cup or a thyrsus in their hand (Athen. xi. p. 484), and of every kind of sensual pleasure, whence they are seen sleeping, playing musical instruments or engaged in volupitous dances with nymphs. (Apollod. ii. 1. § 4; Horat. Carm. ii. 19. 3, i. 1. 30; Ob. Met. i. 692, xiv. 657; Philostr. Vit. Apoll. vi. 27; Nom. Dionys. xii. 82.) Like all the gods dwelling in forests and fields, they were greatly dreaded by mortals. (Virg. Æglog. vi. 13; Theocrit. xiiii. 44; Ob. Hel. iv. 49.)

Later writers, especially the Roman poets, confounded the Satyrs with the Pans and the Italian Fauns, and accordingly represent them with larger horns and goats' feet (Horat. Carm. ii. 19. 4; Propert. iii. 15. 34; Ob. Met. i. 193, vii. 392, xiv 637), although originally they were quite distinct kinds of beings, and in works of art, too, they are kept quite distinct. Satyrs usually appear with flutes, the thyrsus, syrinx, the shepherd staff, cups or bags filled with wine; they are dressed with the skins of animals, and wear wreaths of vine, ivy or fir. Representations of them are still very numerous, but the most celebrated in antiquity was the Satyr of Praxiteles at Athens (Paus. i. 20. § 1; Plin. H. N. xxxiv. 8, s. 19; comp. Heyne, Antiquar. Auff. in. 53, &c.; Voss, Mythol. Briefe, ii. p. 234, &c.; C. O. Müller, Ancient Art and its Remains, § 383, Eng. Transl.; and the article Praxiteles, p. 521.)

SATYRUS (Σάτυρος), historical.

1. An officer who was sent out by Ptolemy Philadelphia, king of Egypt, on an expedition to explore the western coasts of the Red Sea, where he founded the city of Philotera. (Strab. xvii. p. 755.)

2. An ambassador of the Ilienses, who was sent to Rome in B. C. 187, to intercede with the senate in favour of the Lycians. (Polyb. xxii. 3.)

3. The chief of the embassy sent by the Rhodians to Rome in B. C. 173, on which occasion he gave great offence by his intemperate attacks upon Eumenes, king of Pergamum. (Liv. xlii. 14.)

4. One of the ambassadors sent by the Achaeans to Rome in B. C. 164, to intercede with the senate for the liberation of the Achaeans citizens who had been sent to Rome at the instigation of Callirrates, or, at least, that they should be brought to a fair trial. The embassy was dismissed with a haughty refusal. (Polyb. xxxi. 6. 8.)

5. A leader of insurgent slaves in Sicily, during the second servile war in that island. After the defeat and death of Athenion, B. C. 101 [Athen-]ion, Satyrus, with the remains of the insurgents, shut himself up in a strong fortress, but was closely blockaded by the consul M. Aquilinus, and at length compelled by famine to surrender, with about 1000 of his followers. They were all carried to Rome, and condemned to fight with wild beasts in the amphitheatre, but preferred dying by one another's hands, and Satyrus put an end to his own life. (Diod. xxxvi. 5. Exc. Phot. pp. 536, 537.)

SATYRUS (Σάτυρος), kings of Bosporus.

1. SATYRUS I. was a son of Spartacus I., king of Bosporus. According to the statement of Dio- dorus (xiv. 93), that he reigned fourteen years, we must assign his accession to the year 456 or 406; but as the same authority only four years to the reign of Seleucus, there is a gap in the chronology of twenty years, which are unaccounted for. There is little doubt that there is an error in the numbers of Diodorus, but in which of the two reigns it is impossible to say. M. de Boze, on the other hand, supposes (Mém. de l'Acad. des Inser. vol. vii. p. 555) this interval to have been filled by another Spartacus, and that it was this second king, and not Spartacus I., who was the father of Satyrus: but this seems a very forced and unnecessary hypothesis. Our knowledge of the events of his reign is confined to the fact that he encouraged those friendly and commercial relutions with Athens, which he appears to have already found in existence, and which were still farther extended by his son Leucon [Leucon].

His conduct in this respect, as related by Isocrates, would lead us to form a favourable estimate of his character (Isocr. Tract. pp. 355, 360, 370; Lysius pro Manth. p. 145; Demosthen. e. Lept. p. 487). He was slain at the siege of Thebes (b.c. 393), and was succeeded by his son, Leucon.

(Savaria.)

2. SATYRUS II. was the eldest of the three sons of Paersides I., and was in consequence appointed by his father to succeed him in the sovereign power. But on the death of Paersides (b.c. 311), his second son Eumenus contested the crown with his brother, and had recourse to the assistance of Ariphernes, king of one of the neighbouring Scythian tribes, who supported him with a large army. Satyrus, however, defeated their combined forces, and followed up his advantage by laying siege to the capital of Ariphernes; but, while pressing the assault with vigour, he was himself mortally wounded, and died immediately after, having reigned hardly nine months from his father's death. (Diod. xx. 22, 26, 27.)

It is probable that the Satyrus who is mentioned by Polybius (De b. xvi. p. 95), among the tyrants of Bosporus as early as b.c. 524, is the same with the preceding, who may have been admitted by his father to a share of the sovereign power during his own lifetime.

3. There is a king of Bosporus of the name of Satyrus, mentioned by Polybius (vii. 55), as waging unsuccessful wars with Tirgatao, a queen of the Iomatae, who is probably distinct from either of the preceding, as that author represents him as dying of grief for his ill success, and being succeeded by his son Gorgippus. But nothing is known of the period to which these events are to be referred. [E. II. B.]

SATYRUS (Σάτυρος), literary. 1. A celebrated musician of Thebes, father of the flute-player Antigenidas (Suid. s. v. Ἀρτεμισίας). Since his son was the flute-player of Philoxenus, Satyrus himself must have flourished about the latter period of the Peloponnesian War. [Pir. De b. i. 17; Diod. xvi. 70.]

2. The son of Theognis, of Marathon, a distinguished comic actor at Athens, and a contemporary of Demostenes, is said to have given instructions to the young orator in the art of giving full effect to his speeches by appropriate action. (Plut. Dem. 7.) The same orator relates an honourable anecdote of him, that having once been at a festival given by Philip king of Macedon, after the capture of Olynthus (b.c. 347), when the king was making large presents to all the other artists, Satyrus begged, as his reward, the liberation of two of the Olynthian captives, daughters of an old friend of his, to whom he afterwards gave marriage portions at his own cost. (Dem. de fals. Leg. pp. 401, 402; Diod. xvi. 55.) He is also mentioned incidentally by Plutarch (De se ips. c. iv. laud. p. 545, f.)

Atheneus (xiii. p. 501, e) quotes a statement respecting the flute from the Panathenias of "Satyrus, the actor of Olynthus," from which it would seem that Satyrus not only acted comedies, but also wrote some. Either Atheneus may have called him an Olynthian carelessly, from the scene of the anecdote in Demostenes being at Olynthus, or he may have settled at Olynthus.

3. Another flute-player, perhaps a descendant of No. 1, of whom Aelian (V.H. xxxii. 13) tells us, that, having often heard the lectures of the Stoic philosopher Ariston of Chios, he became so attached to the study of philosophy as often to be tempted to cast his flute to the fates with which Pandarus in Homer (II. v. 215) threatens his bow and arrows.

3. A distinguished Peripatetic philosopher and historian, who lived in the time of Polylene Philosopher, if not later. He wrote a collection of biographies, among which were lives of Philip and Demostenes, and which is frequently cited by ancient writers. He also wrote on the population of Alexandria; and a work ἔρως ἄρακτος. (Vosius, de Hist. Graec. p. 495, ed. Westermann; Fabric. Bibli. Graec. vol. iii. pp. 51, 504.)

4. An epigrammatic poet, who is mentioned in the titles to his epigrams in the Palatine and Punican Anthologies by the various names of Satyrus, Satyrus, Satyrus Thyllius, and Thyillus or Thytius alone. Jacobs supposes the epigrams to be by two different persons, the one named Satyrus and the other Thyillus. (Brucke, Anab. vol. ii. p. 456; Jacobs, Anth. Graec. vol. ii. p. 252, xxiii. pp. 949, 950, ed. by P. S.)

SATYRUS, artists. 1. One of the architects of the celebrated Mausoleum, of which he wrote a description. (Vitr. v. 22, 26, 27; Philorus; for an account of the building see the art. Mausoleum in the Dict. of Antig. 2d ed.)

2. An architect who lived in Egypt under Polylene Philadelphus, and to whom some ascribed the transport to its site and the erection of one of the great obelisks. (Plin. H.N. xxxvi. 9. 14.)

SATYRUS (Σάτυρος), a physician in the second century after Christ, a pupil of Quintus (Gal. De Anatomo. Adm. i. 1, 2, vol. ii. pp. 217, 223; De Antid. i. 14, vol. xiv. p. 71; Comment. in Hippocrates. "De Nat. Hom." ii. 6, vol. xv. p. 130; Comment. in Hippocrates. "Praedict." i. 5, vol. xv. p. 524; Comment. in Hippocrates. "Epip. III." i. 29, vol. xvii. p. 575), whose opinions he accurately preserved and transmitted to his own successor, whom he recommended for other works (Gal. De Aed. Edit. Mor. vol. xix. p. 58). He passed some years at Pergamus (id. vol. ii. p. 224), where he was one of Galen's earliest tutors, about the year 149 (id. vol. ii. p. 217, xiv. 69, xv. 136, xvi. 484, 524, xvi. A. 575, xix. 57). He wrote some anatomical works (id. vol. xv. p. 136), and a commentary on part (if not the whole) of the Hippocratic Collection (id. vol. xvi. pp. 484, 524); but none of his writings are now extant. [W. A. G.]

SAVE'RRIO, the name of a patrician family of the Sulpicia Gena.

1. P. Sulpicius Saevarrio, consul b.c. 304, with P. Sempronius Sophus. According to the Triumphal Fasti, Saevarrio triumphed in this year over the Sammites; but this appears to be an error, since Livy relates that, though Saevarrio remained in Samnium with a small army, all hostilities were suspended, while negotiations were carried on for a peace. Towards the end of the year the peace was concluded. Livy says that the ancient alliance was restored to the Sammites; but Niebuhr points out that this is a mistake, and directs attention to the statement of Dionysius, that, in the treaty which was made, the Samnites acknowledged the supremacy of Rome. In B.C. 229 Sauerrio was censer with Sempronius Sophus, his former colleague in the consulship. In their censorship two new tribes were formed, the Anemias and Terentia. (Liv. ix. 49, x. 9; Dionys. Enc. Legat. p. 2331, ed. Reiske; Niebuhr, Hist. of Rome, vol. iii. pp. 258, 259.)

2. P. Sulpicius P. F. Ser. N. Sauerrio, son of the preceding, was consul B.C. 279, with P. Decius Mus, and commanded, with his colleague, against Pyrrhus. The history of this campaign is given under Mus, No. 3, where the authorities are also cited.

SAUERIUS. 1. C. Saufrius, quaestor in B.C. 100, was one of the partisans of Saturninus, took refuge with him in the capitol, and was slain along with his leader, when they were obliged to surrender to Marius. (Cic. pro C. Rabir. 7; Appian, B. C. i. 32.) (Saturninus, p. 724.)

2. M. Saufrius, was a companion of Milo, and had taken the principal share in the murder of Clodius, B.C. 52. After the condemnation of Milo, he was accused under the lex Pompeia de Vi, and escaped punishment by only a single vote. He was accused a few days afterwards under the lex Plautia, but was again acquitted. He was on each occasion defended by Cicero. (Ascon. in Mil. p. 54, ed. Orelli.)

3. L. Saufrius, a Roman eques, was an intimate friend of Atticus, and, like the latter, a warm admirer of the Epicurean philosophy. He had very valuable property in Italy, which was confiscated by the triumvirs; but Atticus exerted himself on behalf of his friend with so much success, that the latter received intelligence, at the same time, of the confiscation and restitution of his property. (Cic. ad Att. i. 3, ii. 3, iv. 6, vi. 9, vil. 1, xiv. 10, xvi. 4; Corn. Nep. Att. 12.)

4, 5. App. Saufrius, and D. Saufrius, a scribe, are mentioned by Pliny, as two instances of sudden death (H. N. vii. 53, s. 54.)

6. Saufrius Troias was put to death in A.D. 48, because he had been privy to the marriage of Messalina with Silius (Tac. Ann. xi. 35). Some editions of Tacitus have Saufellus.

7. L. Saufrius occurs on coins of the republican period, but cannot be referred with certainty to any of the persons above mentioned. (Eckhel, vol. v. p. 301.)

COIN OF L. SAUERIUS.

SAURAS or SAURUS, sculptor. [Batracchus.]

SAURIAS (Sauros), a very ancient artist of Samos, to whom some ascribed the invention of that first step in the art of drawing, which was called σχευρονομα, that is, tracing the outline of a shadow. The statement, however, deserves little credit, as it rests on the sole authority of Athenagoras (Athenag. Legat. pro Christ. 14, p. 59, ed. Dechiar). [P. S.]

SAUROMATES. 729

SAUROMATES (Σαυρωμάτης) is the name of several kings of Bosporus, who are for the most part known only from their coins. These bear most commonly the head of the reigning Roman emperor on one side, and that of the king of Bosporus on the other, in token of the dependent condition of the latter monarchs. From this circumstance we are fortunately enabled to determine, approximately, the period at which the several kings of the name respectively reigned in Bosporus; but, besides this, many of their coins bear dates which have been ascertained to be computed from an era corresponding with the year B.C. 296, thus enabling us to fix still more accurately their chronology. (See Eckhel. vol. ii. p. 392.)

1. Sauromates I. was contemporary with Augustus and Tiberius: and assumed, in compliment to the latter emperor, the names of Tiberius Julius, which appear on some of his coins. The date on the one annexed, incorrectly copied in the engraving, is ΘΩΣ, or 293, which corresponds with A.D. 3: others bear dates as late as the year 310 of the Bosporan era, or A.D. 14. None of those with the titles of T. Julius have any dates, and Mionnet considers (apparently without sufficient reason) that these belong to a second king of the name of Sauromates.

According to Eckhel (Tb. p. 375), Pepesiris was the wife of this Sauromates [PEPEPIRIS]; but later numismatists consider her as the queen of Mithridates king of Bosporus. It appears probable, also, that the true form of her name is Gepesiris. (Dumersan, Médailles d'Allier, pp. 64, 66; Mionnet. Suppl. iv. pp. 482, 496.)

COIN OF SAUROMATES I.

2. Sauromates II. was a contemporary of the emperors Trajan and Hadrian, and is incidentally mentioned by the younger Pliny as having sent an embassy to the former emperor (Plin. Ep. x. 13, 14, 15). From his coins we learn that he ascended the throne as early as A.D. 94, before the death of Domitian, and that he still occupied it in A.D. 124. The annexed coin, which bears on the obverse the head of Hadrian and the date 413 (A.D. 117), belongs to this Sauromates.

COIN OF SAUROMATES II.

3. Sauromates III. was the successor of Eupator, and must have become king of Bosporus before the death of M. Aurelius. His earliest extant coin bears the head of that emperor, with the date of 474 (A.D. 178). Others have the heads of Commodus, Severus, and Caracalla, the latest date being a.d. 210. His reign must thus have comprised a period of more than thirty-two years. He was succeeded by Rhescuporis III. The annexed coin has the head of Commodus, with the date 475 (a.d. 190).*

COIN OF SAUROMATES III.

4. SAUROMATES IV. was a contemporary of Alexander Severus. His coins bear dates from a.d. 230 to 232. The one annexed has the head of Alexander Severus, and the date 527, of a.d. 231; and it thus appears that his short reign must have intervened between those of Rhescuporis III. and Cotys IV.

COIN OF SAUROMATES IV.

5. SAUROMATES V. was a contemporary of the emperor Probus, as we learn from a coin bearing the date of 572 (a.d. 276). He is very probably identical with the following, though Mionnet considers him to be distinct.

6. SAUROMATES VI., a contemporary of the emperor Diocletian. No coins are extant of this prince, and our knowledge of his reign is derived solely from Constantine Porphyrogenitus, who informs us that he took advantage of the weakness of the Roman empire to raise a large army among the Sarmatian tribes, with which he invaded Colchis, ravaged that country and the whole of Pontus, and advanced as far as the river Halys. Here, however, he was met by the Roman general Constantius, who held him in check, while Chrestus, king of Cherson, at the instigation of Diocletian, invaded the kingdom of Bosphorus, and actually made himself master of its capital city. Sauromates in consequence found himself obliged to purchase peace and the restitution of his capital, by giving up all his prisoners, as well as abandoning his conquests. This expedition appears to have taken place in a.d. 291. (Const. Porphyrog. de Administ. Imper. c. 53, pp. 244—249, ed. Bonn.)

7. SAUROMATES VII., a grandson of the preceding, ascended the throne after the accession of Constantine the Great. Being desirous to obliterate the disgrace incurred by the failure of his grandfather in the above expedition, he assembled an army, and invaded the territory of the Chersonites, but was defeated, and compelled to conclude a treaty, by which he ceded a part of his own dominions. (Const. Porphyrog. l.c. pp. 255, 253.)

8. SAUROMATES VIII. was the last king of Bosphorus. His connection with the preceding is not mentioned. But we learn that he renewed the war with the Chersonites, and the two armies met at a place called Caphe. Here it was agreed to refer the issue of the contest to a single combat between Sauromates and Pharmaces, king of Cherson, in which Sauromates, though greatly superior in strength and stature, was vanquished and slain by his antagonist. From this time the kingdom of Bosphorus became subject to the rulers of Cherson. The date of these events is unfortunately unknown to us. (Const. Porphyrog. l.c. pp. 255, 255.) There are no coins extant of any of these three last princes. Concerning the kings of Bosphorus, and their coins in general, see Cary, Hist. des Rois du Bosphore Cimmerien, 4to. Paris, 1753; Eckhel, vol. ii. pp. 377—382; Dumesnil, Desor. des Médailles du Cabinet de M. Alb. de Hautefoche, 4to. Paris, 1829, pp. 66—66; Mionnet, Suppl. vol. iv. p. 479, &c.

SAXA, DEC'l'DIUS. 1. A native of Celtiberia, was one of Caesar's soldiers, who rose from the ranks to offices of importance and trust. According to Cicero, he was originally a land-surveyor, who marked out the ground for the camp, and was not even a Roman citizen (Cic. Phil. xii. 5, xiii. 13). He served under Caesar in Spain, against the legates of Pompey, in b.c. 49, and appears to have remained in that country till the conclusion of the war against the sons of Pompey in b.c. 45, when he came to Rome with Caesar, and was made by the latter tribune of the plebs for the following year. In the troubles following Caesar's death, Saxa took an active part in supporting the friends of his murdered patron. He attached himself to M. Antonius, and served under him as centurion in the siege of Mutina. In b.c. 45, Saxa and Norbanus were sent by Antonius and Octavius to Macedonia, with eight legions. They took possession of the mountain-passes beyond Philipi, in order to stop the march of Brutus and Cassius, but the latter changed their route and arrived safely at Philipi. Saxa and Norbanus were now called upon, but Amphipolis, and confined themselves to the defensive, as the forces of the enemy far outnumbered their own. After the defeat of Brutus and Cassius Saxa accompanied Antony to the East, and was made by the latter governor of Syria. Soon after his appointment the younger Labienus invaded Syria (b.c. 40), at the head of a powerful Parthian army, and defeated Saxa, who fled from his camp in the course of the same night, fearing that his soldiers would go over to Labienus. He had intended to take refuge in Antioch; but hearing that the important town of Apamea had fallen into the hands of Labienus, he did not venture to go to Antioch, but continued his flight towards Cilicia. He was, however, overtaken by the troops of Labienus, and put to death by them. One account states that he killed himself to avoid falling into their power. (Caes. B. C. i. 66; Cic. Phil. viii. 3, i. 26, x. 10, xi. 5, xii. 8, xiii. 13, xiv. 4; Dio

2. The brother of the preceding, served under him as quaestor, in Syria, and had the command, as it appears, of the town of Apameia, which he continued to keep while all the surrounding garrisons surrendered to Labienus, till he, having a report of the death of his brother, when he likewise surrendered Antioch. (Dion Cass. xlviii. 25.)

SAXA, Q. VOCO'NIUS, tribune of the plebs, B. C. 169, proposed the Voconia lex, which was supported by the elder Cato, who spoke in its favour, when he was sixty-five years of age (Liv. Epit. 41; Cic. de Seenet. 5, pro Balb. 8, Verr. Act. i. 48). Respecting the contents of this important lex, see Dict. of Ant. s. v.

S'A'XULA, CLU'VIUS. [CLUVIUS, No. 1.]

SCAEA (Zzaca), a daughter of Danans (Apollod. ii. 1 § 5), was married to Archander, who, with his brother Architeles, emigrated from Phthisiotes in Thessaly to Argos. (Paus. vili. 1 § 3; compare AUTO'Mate.)

Scaeva, a slave of Q. Croton, was rewarded with his liberty on account of his killing Saturninus, the tribune of the plebs, in B. C. 100. (Cic. pro C. Father. 111.)

SCAEVA, CASS'IUS, a centurion in Caesar's army at the battle of Dyrrhachium, distinguished himself by his extraordinary feats of valour in that engagement. He maintained possession of the post with which he was intrusted, although he lost an eye, was pierced through both his shoulder and thigh, and his shield was transfixed in a hundred and twenty places (Caes. B. C. iii. 53; Suet. Caes. 68; Flor. iv. 2 § 40; Val. Max. iii. 2 § 23, who calls him M. Cassius Scaeva; Appian, B. C. ii. 60, whose account is inaccurate, and must be corrected from the preceding authorities). Scaeva survived his wounds, and is mentioned by Cicero as one of the partisans of Caesar, just before and after the death of the latter. (Cic. ad Att. xiii. 23, xiv. 10.)

ScaevA, DI'DIUS, one of the generals of the Sexian tribe, was slain in the taking of the Capitol in B. C. 79. (Tac. Hist. iii. 73.)

SCAEVA, JU'NIUS BRUTUS. [BRUTUS, Nos. 5 and 6.]

ScaevINUS, FLAV'IUS, a senator of dissolute life, took part in the conspiracy of Piso against Nero. It was through Milichius, the freedman of Scaevinsus that the conspiracy was discovered by Nero. Milichius was liberally rewarded by the emperor, and Scaevinus put to death. (Tac. Ann. xv. 49, 54, 55, 70.)

P. SCAEVIUS, a soldier who served under Caesar in Spain in B. C. 60, when the latter governed that province after his praetorship. (Dion Cass. xxxvii. 52.)

Scaevola, Q. CerviDIUS, a Roman jurist, appears to have been giving Responsa in the time of Antoninus Pius (Dig. 34, tit. 1. s. 13, § 1.). Scaevola speaks of constitutions of Verus and Marcus Antoninus, in such terms as imply that they were then living (Dig. 2. tit. 15. s. 3, 50. tit. 1. s. 24); and he was employed by Marcus as a legal adviser (Jul. Capitol. Marc. c. 11, unus est Scaevola praecipe juris perito); and Scaevola himself, as quoted by Ulpian, reports a judgment of Marcus in his auditorium (ad Sot. Treboll. Dig. 36. tit. 1. s. 29). Whether Scaevola survived Marcus is uncertain. As to the passage in the Scaevola, 32. s. 39, in which the expression "im- porter noster Divus Marcus" occurs, see the note in Zimmern (Geschichte des Röm. Privatrechts, vol. i. p. 360, No. 7).

Septimius Severus, afterwards emperor, and the jurist Papinian, were the hearers of Scaevola (Spart. Caracalla, 8.). He appears to have been living when Scaevola was emperor and Paulus was active as a jurist (Dig. 29. tit. 2. s. 19); and in one passage (Dig. 44. tit. 3. s. 14) he speaks of a rule of law being confirmed by a rescript of Se- verus and Caracalla.

Some of his Responsa are given in a single word. His style is compressed, and hence has been sometimes considered obscure, but he left an illustrious name, which he earned well. In the Theodosian Code Cervidius Scaevola is called "Prudentissi- mus omnium Jurisconsultorum." His writings which are excerpted in the Digest were:—Digestorum Libri quadranginta, which often contain the same matter that is given more briefly in his Re- sponsorum Libri sex (Blumhe, Zeitschrift, &c. vol. iv. p. 325, Die Ordnung der Fragmente in den Pandectentexten); Vigniti Libri Quaestionum; Libri quaestor Regularum; and a Liber singularis Ques- tionum publice (that is judicially). There are 307 excerpts from Scaevola in the Digest. The Florentine Index also mentions a Liber Singularis de Quaestione Familiae. He made notes on Julianus and Marcellus, which are merely cited in the Digest. The Liber Singularis ipse must be attributed to Q. Mucius Scaevola the pontifex. Claudius Tryphoninus and Paulus made notes on Scaevola. He is often cited by these and other jurists.

Puchta (Inst. i. § 100) does not adopt the opinion of Bluhme above referred to, which is in fact the opinion of Conradi. He observes, that "in the collection of Responsa the facts are stated with the necessary completeness, but the opinions generally in few words and without a statement of the grounds; the quaestiones were appropriated to the complete examination and justification of the opinions; the Digests also contain Responsa, sometimes with a short notice of the opinion, sometimes, as in the Responsa, with an indication of the reasons."

Scaevola, MUCIUS. 1. C. Mucius Scaevola. When King Porssenna was blockading Rome, C. Mucius, a young man of the patrician class, went out of the city with the approbation of the senate, after telling them that he was not going for plunder, but, with the aid of the gods, to perform some nobler deed. With a dagger hid beneath his dress, he approached the place where Porssenna was sitting, with a secretary (scriba) by his side, dressed nearly in the same style as the king himself. Mistaking the secretary for the king, Mucius killed him on the spot. He was seized by the king's guards, and brought before the royal seat, when he declared his name, and his design to kill the king himself, and told him that there were many more Romans ready to attempt his life. The king in his passion and alarm ordered him to be burnt alive, unless he explained more clearly what he meant by his vague threats, upon which Mucius thrust his right hand into a fire which was already lighted for a sacrifice, and held it there without flinching. The king, who was amazed at his firmness, ordered him to be removed from the altar, and bade him go away, free and uninjured. To make some return to the king for his generous behaviour, Mucius told him that there were three hundred of the first youths of Rome who had agreed with one another to kill the king; that the lot fell on him to make the first attempt, and that the rest would do the same when that fact should be known.

Mucius received the name of Scevola, or left-handed, from the circumstance of the loss of his right hand. Porsenna being alarmed for his life, which he could not secure against so many desperate men, made proposals of peace to the Romans, and evacuated the territory. The patriots or the senate, for it is impossible to say which body Livy means (ii. 13, comp. ii. 12), gave Mucius a tract of land beyond the Tiber, which was thenceforward called Mucia Prata. Such is the substance of Livy's story. Dionysius tells it with tedious prolixity, as usual; but he omits all mention of the king's threat to burn Mucius, and of Mucius burning his right hand. (See Niebuhr's Remarks on the story of C. Mucius Scevola, Lectures, "Earliest Times to the First Punic War," 1840; and Niebuhr, Roman Hist. vol. i., "The Times with Porsenna." The substance of this story is called a patrician; and the Mucii of the historical period were plebeians. This is urged as an objection to assuming the descent of the historical Mucii from the Mucii of b.c. 509. But independent of this minor difficulty, we do not concern ourselves about the descent of the illustrious Mucii of the later Republic from the half-fabulous man with the left hand who assisted at its birth.

According to Varro (de Ling. Lat. vi. 5) the surname of the Mucii (scevola) signified an amulet. The word scevola is a diminutive. (See Facciol. Lex. s. v. Scevola.) The following appear to be the only Mucii of whom any thing worth knowing is recorded.

2. Q. MUCIUS SCAEVOLA, the son of Publius, was praetor in b.c. 215, in the consulsiphip of C. Postumius Albinus III. and T. Sempronius Gracchus: he had Sardinia for his province (Liv. xxiii. 24, 30), where he fell sick (c. 34, 40). His command in Sardinia was prolonged for the two following years (Liv. xxiv. 9, 44), and again for another year (Liv. xxv. 3): nothing is recorded of his operations. This appears to be the Mucius who is mentioned by Pomponius (Dig. i. tit. 2, s. 2, § 37), if Mucius is the right reading there (comp. Liv. xxii. 18; Galliis, x. 27; Florus, ii. 6). Quintus was decemvir sacrorum, and died in b.c. 209. (Liv. xxvi. 8.)

3. Q. MUCIUS SCAEVOLA, probably the son of No. 2, was praetor in b.c. 179, and had Sicily for his province (Liv. xl. 44). He was consul in b.c. 174, with Sp. Postumius Albinus for his colleague. Scevola accompanied the consul P. Licinius Crassus, as tribunus militum, in b.c. 171, when the consul went against Perseus, king of Macedonia. (Liv. xiii. 49, and 67.)

4. P. MUCIUS SCAEVOLA, the son of Quintus, was elected a praetor, with his brother Quintus, b.c. 179. (Liv. xl. 44.) Publius had the urbana provincia, and the quaestio de veneficiis in the city, and within ten miles of the city. He was consul in b.c. 175, with Aemilius Lepidus II. Publius had the Ligerus for his province (Liv. xii. 19). He fought a battle with some tribes which had ravaged Luna and Pisae, gained a victory, and was honoured with a triumph, which is recorded in a fragment of the Capitoline marbles, where he is named [F. Ma] Q. F. P. N. (Clinton, Fasti, b.c. 175.)

5. P. MUCIUS SCAEVOLA, was probably the son of P. Mucius Scevola [No. 3]. Publius Mucius, Manilius, and Brutus, are called by Pomponius (Dig. i. tit. 2. s. 2. § 9) the founders of the Jus Civile. Publius was tribunus plebis, b.c. 141, in which year he brought L. Hostilius Tubulus to trial for mal-administration as praetor (Rein, Criminalrecht der Romer, p. 602); he was praetor urbanus in b.c. 136. In b.c. 133, Publius was consul with L. Calpurnius Piso Frugi, the year in which Tit. Gracchus lost his life. In b.c. 131, he succeeded his brother Mucianus [MUCIANS] as Pontifex Maximus. Plutarch (Tit. Gracchus, c. 9) says, that Tit. Gracchus consulted P. Scevola about the provisions of his Agrarian Law. When Tiberius was a candidate for a second tribuneship, and the opposite faction had resolved to put him down, Scipio Nasica in the senate "entreated the consul (Mucius) to protect the state, and put down the tyrant. The consul, however, answered mildly, that he would not be the first to use violence, and that he would not take any citizen's life without a regular trial: if, however, he said, the people should come to an illegal vote at the instigation of Tiberius, or from compulsion, he would not respect any such decision." The colleague of Mucius was absent in Sicily, where he was conducting the war against the slaves. After the death of Tit. Gracchus, Scevola is said to have approved of the conduct of Scipio Nasica, who was the chief mover in the affray in which Tiberius lost his life (Cic. pro Cn. Plancio, c. 36); and even to have declared his approbation by moving or drawing up various Senatusconsulta (Cic. pro Dom. c. 54). Scevola must have lived till after the death of C. Gracchus, b.c. 121, for he gave his opinion that as the res doctae of Licinia, the wife of C. Gracchus, had been lost in the disturbance caused by her husband, they ought to be made good to her. (Dig. 24. tit. 3. s. 62.)

Ciceron (de Or. ii. 12) states that from the earliest period of Roman history to the times of P. Mucii Pontifex Maximus, it was the custom for the Pontifex Maximus to put in writing on a tablet all the events of each year, and to expose it at his house for public inspection: these, he says, are now called the Annales Maximi. Mucius was distinguished for his knowledge of the Jus Pontifici; and he was also famed for his skill in playing at ball, as well as at the game called Duodecim Scripta. (Cic. de Or. i. 50; see Scriptum, Facciolati, Lex.) The passage of Cicero shows that Valerius Maximus (viii. 8. 2) means P. Mucius Scevola, the Pontifex Maximus, when he is speaking of the relaxations of Scevola from his severe labours. Quintilian (Inst. Or. xi. 2) in speaking of the same thing, gives an anecdote of the strong memory of Scevola.

He expressed (Cic. Brut. c. 28) himself well but rather diffusely. His fame as a lawyer is recorded by Cicero in several passages (de Or. i. 56); and Cicero twice quotes his words (Top. c. 4, 6). The latter of the two passages in the SCAEVOLA.

Topsicia contains Scaevola's definition of Gentius. According to Pomponius he wrote ten books (libelli) on some legal subject. There is no excerpt from the writings of Scaevola in the Digest, but he is cited several times by the jurists whose works were used for that compilation (Dig. 24. tit. 3. s. 66; 50. tit. 7. s. 17; and 49. tit. 15. s. 4.) It is conjectured that the Scaevola mentioned in the Digest (47. tit. 4. a. 1. § 15) is this Publius, because Cicero (ad Fam. vii. 22) cites his name in connection with the same question that is put in the Digest; but this is only conjecture.

Most of the ancient authorities that relate to Scaevola are cited by Zimmern, Geschichte des Röm. Privatrechts, vol. i. p. 257. As to P. Licinius Crassus Mucianus, the brother of P. Mucius Scaevola, see Mucianus.

6. Q. Mucius Scaevola, called the Augur, was the son of Q. Mucius Scaevola, consul B.C. 174. He married the daughter of C. Lælius, the friend of Scipio Africanus the younger (Cic. Loel. 3. Brut., c. 26). He was tribunus plebis B.C. 128, plebeian aedile B.C. 125, and as praetor he was governor of the province of Asia B.C. 121, the year in which C. Gracchus lost his life. He was prosecuted after his return from his province for the offence of Repetundæ, in B.C. 120, by T. Albinus, probably on mere personal grounds; but he was acquitted (Cic. de Fin. i. 3, Brutus, 26, 35, de Or. i. 17, ii. 79). Scaevola was consul B.C. 117, with L. Caecilius Metellus. It appears from the Loelius of Cicero (c. 1), that he lived at least to the tribunate of P. Sulpicius Rufus, B.C. 89. Cicero, who was born B.C. 106, informs us, that after he had put on the toga virilis, his father took him to Scaevola, who was then an old man, and that he kept as close to him as he could, in order to profit by his remarks (Loel. c. 1). It does not appear how long the Augur survived B.C. 88, the year in which the quarrel of Marius and Sulla began. After his death Cicero became a hearer of Q. Mucins Scaevola, the pontifex. The Augur was distinguished for his knowledge of the law, and his activity was continued to the latest period of his life. Cicero (Philipp. vi. 10) says, that during the Marseis war (B.C. 90), though he was a very old man, and in bad health, he was ready to give his opinion to those who wished to hear it as soon it was light, and during that time no one ever saw him in bed, and he was the first man to come to the curia. Valerius Maximus (iii. 9) records, that when L. Cornelius Sulla, after driving Marius out of the city (B.C. 88), proposed that the senate should declare him an enemy, Scaevola affirmed that he would never consent to declare him an enemy who had saved Rome. Probably all the following passages in Valerius Maximus (iv. 1. § 11, iv. 5. § 4, viii. 12. § 1) may refer to this Scaevola, but Valerius has not always distinguished the two pontifices and the Augur. The Augur showed his modesty, his good sense, and his confidence in his own knowledge, by not hesitating to refer his clients to others who knew certain branches of law better than himself (Val. Max. viii. 12. § 1). That this passage of Valerius refers to the Augur, is proved by the passage of Cicero (Pro Balbo. c. 20), which may have been the authority of Valerius. In his writings the Augur are recorded as he mentions (Cic. de Consol. 2. a. 2.)

Mucia, the Augur's daughter, married L. Licinius Crassus, the orator, who was consul B.C. 95, with Q. Mucius Scaevola, the pontifex maximus (Valer. Max. viii. 8; Cic. de Orat. 1. 7); whence it appears that the Q. Mucius who is one of the speakers in the treatise de Oratore, is not the pontifex and the colleague of Crassus, but the Augur, the father-in-law of Crassus. He is also one of the speakers in the Loelii sive de Amicitia (c. 1), and in the de Republica (i. 12).

7. Q. Mucius Scaevola, was the son of Publius, consul, B.C. 133, and pontifex maximus (Cic. Off. i. 22, iii. 15), and an example whom Cicero quotes, of a man who aimed at excellence in that which had given his father distinction. He was tribunus plebis in B.C. 106, the year in which Cicero was born, aedilis communis in B.C. 104, and consul in B.C. 95, with L. Licinius Crassus, the orator, as his colleague. In their consulate was enacted the Lex Mucia Licinia de Civitate (Cic. Off. iii. 11), a measure which appears to have contributed to bring on the Marseis or Social War. After his consulship Scaevola was the governor (proconsul) of the province Asia, in which capacity he gained the esteem of the people who were under his government; and, to show their gratitude, the Greeks of Asia instituted a festival day (dies Mucia) to commemorate the virtues of their governor (comp. Valer. Max. viii. 15). Subsequently he was made pontifex maximus, by which title he is often distinguished from Quintus Mucius the Augur. He lost his life in the consulsip of C. Marius the younger and Cn. Papirius Carbo (B.C. 92), having been proscribed by the Marian party, from whom we may conclude that he was of the faction of Sulla, or considered to be, though so upright a man could not be the blind partisan of any faction. (Vell. Pat. ii. 26.) The pontifex in vain fled for refuge to the Vestal altars and the everburning fires; he was killed in the presence of the goddess, and her statue was drenched with his blood (Florus, iii. 21; Cic. de Or. iii. 3; Vell. Pat. ii. 26; Lucan, ii. 126). His body was thrown into the Tiber (Appian, Bell. Civ. i. 86). The story in Valerius Maximus (ix. 11) of an attempt by C. Finmbrin to murder Scaevola at the funeral of C. Marius (B.C. 86), does not refer to the death of Scaevola in B.C. 82, as some commentators have supposed. The facts of this attempt to assassinate Scaevola are recorded by Cicero (pro S. Rosc. Amer. 12). The assassin was C. Flavius Finmbrin, who afterwards met with the fate that he deserved in Asia. (Plut. Sulla, c. 25.)

The virtues of Scaevola as recorded by Cicero, who, after the death of the Augur, became an attendant (auditor) of the pontifex. His political opinions probably attached him to the party of the nobles, but he was a man of moderation, and averse to all violence. The purity of his moral character, his exalted notions of equity and fair dealing (Cic. Off. iii. 15, gives a rare instance), his abilities as an administrator, an orator, and a jurist place him among the first of the illustrious men of all ages and countries. He was, says Cicero (de Or. i. 39), the most eloquent of jurists, and the most learned jurist among orators. According to Cicero's expression (Brutus, 82), he did not offer himself as an instrument to anyone, yet he mentions Fimbria (Pro Pomp. c. 2. a. 2.) as having been at the disposal of Cicero. (Resp.) He did in fact instruct those who made it their business to attend him (consulenti: respondendo studiosos audiendi docet), Cicero mentions an important case (causa curiana). in which Scaevola was opposed to L. Licinius Crassus, his former colleague (de Or. i. 39, Brutus, 93, 52; Crassus, No. 29).

Q. Scaevola the pontifex is the first Roman to whom because he attributes a scientific and systematic handling of the Jus Civile, which he accomplished in a work in eighteen books (Jus civile primus constituit generation in libros decem et octo redigendo; Pomponius). This work had doubtless a great effect both on his contemporaries and on the writings of subsequent jurists, who frequently cited it, and probably followed it as a model. Another work of his is also mentioned by Pomponius, Liber Singularis, περὶ δρών, a work on Definitions, or perhaps rather, short rules of law, from which there are four excerpts in the Digest (Dig. 41. tit. 1. s. 64; 43. tit. 20. s. 8; 50. tit. 16. s. 241; and tit. 17. s. 73). This is the oldest work from which there are any excerpts in the Digest, and even these may have been taken at second-hand. The work on the Jus Civile was commented on by Servius Sulpicius, Laelius Felix (Gell. xv. 27), Pomponius, and Maximus.

(Andrō) of Scaevola was C. Aquilius Gallus, the colleague of Cicero in the praetorship (b. c. 64). Cicero himself, a diligent attendant on Scaevola, was not, and did not profess to be a jurist. As pontifex maximus Scaevola must also have been skilled in the Jus Pontificium, and Cicero refers to him as his authority on these matters (de Leg. ii. 20). The Cautio Maiorum, which is mentioned in the Digest, was devised by this Scaevola. It was a caution, or security, originally applied to the case of certain conditional legacies; but afterwards to cases when a heres was instituted sub conditione. (Dig. 35. tit. 1. s. 7, 77, 79, &c.)

Scaevola was one of those illustrious men whose fame is not preserved by his writings, but in the more enduring monument of the memory of all nations to whom the language of Rome is known. [G. L.]

Scae'vola, P. Sept'i'nius, a Roman senator, condemned in the pretorship of Hortensius, b. c. 72, on a charge of repetundae, but in reality demiurgus of quaestors, was accused by Clemens, in b. c. 74, to condemn Oppianicus. (Cic. Verr. l. 13, pro Cluent. 41.)

Scaev'ola (Σκάεβολα), one of the sons of Hippococon. (Paus. iii. 14. § 7; Herod. v. 69; Apollod. ii. 10. § 5; comp. Hippococon.) [L. S.]

Scamander (Σκάμανδρος), the god of the river Scamander, in Troas, was called by the gods Xanthus. Being insulted by Achilles, he entered into a contest with the Greek hero; but Hera sent out Hephaestus to assist Achilles, and the god of fire dried up the waters of Scamander, and frightened Scamander, until Hera ordered Hephaestus to spare the river-god. (Hom. Il. xx. 74, xxxi. 136, &c.; Hes. Theog. 345.) [L. S.]

Scamander, the freedman of C. Fabricius, was accused, in b. c. 74, of having attempted to administer poison to Cluentius. He was defended by Cicero in a speech which is lost, but was condemned. (Cic. pro Cluent. 16-20.)

SCAMANDRIUS (Σκαμανδρίος). 1. The son of Hector and Andromache, whom the people of Troy called Astyanax, because his father was the protector of the city of Troy. (Hom. Il. vi. 492; Plut. Cuth. p. 392; Strab. xiii. p. 607.)

2. A Trojan, a son of Strophius. (Hom. Il. v. 49.) [L. S.]

SCAP'TIUS. SCAPTIUS, of Mytilene, wrote a work on inventions (Ηεί Επινδυματων), of which the first book is quoted by Athenaeus (xiv. pp. 630, b, 637, b; see also Cleon. Alex. Strom. i. p. 132; Ruseh. Prosop. En. x. 7; Vossius, de Hist. Graec. p. 493, ed. Westermann).

P. Scandi'lius, a Roman eques, oppressed by Verres at Syracuse. (Cic. Verr. iii. 58-61.)

SCA'NTIA. 1. A woman whom Clodius threatened with death, unless she surrendered her gardens to him. (Cic. pro Mil. 27.)

2. A Vestal Virgin, in the reign of Tiberius. (Tac. Ann. ix. 16.)

SCANTILLA, M. AN'LLIA, the wife of the emperor Didius Julianus. She received and enjoyed the title of Augusta during the brief period of her husband’s work. (Julianus.) [W. R.]

COIN OF SCANTILLA.

.SCANTIN'IUS. 1. C. Scantinius Capit'o-linus, aedile about b. c. 226, was accused by M. Claudius Marcellus, his colleague in the aedileship, of having made infamous proposals to his son Marcus, and was condemned to the payment of a heavy fine. This is the account of Plutarch, which seems preferable to that of Valerius Maximus, who makes Scantinius tribune of the people at the time of his condemnation. (Plut. Marc. 2; Val. Max. vi. 1. § 7.)

2. P. Scantinius, a pontifex, who died in b. c. 216. (Liv. xxiii. 21.)

3. Scantinius, a tribune, but in what year is unknown, proposed a law to suppress unnatural crimes. Some persons suppose that this law derived its name from Scantinius, who spoke of above [No. 1]; but such a way of naming a lex would be contrary to Roman usage, though it is a curious coincidence that the person condemned on account of this crime should bear the same name as the lex. It was under this lex that M. Caelius Rufus brought an accusation against App. Claudius the censor (Cael. ad Fam. viii. 12, 14). This lex is mentioned by other writers. (Juv. i. 44; Suet. Dom. 8; Auson. Epigr. 88; Terullian. de Monogam. 12.)

SCAP'TIUS. 1. P. Scaptius. It is related that the inhabitants of Aricia and Ardea having a dispute about certain land, made the Roman people the arbiters; and that the latter, upon the testimony and advice of P. Scaptius, adjudged that the land belonged to neither of these people, but to themselves, i. c. 466 (Liv. iii. 71, 72; Dionys. xi. 52). But as the district in question lay in the region of the Scaptian tribe, Niebuhr observes that it is very doubtful whether such a person as Scaptius ever existed. He also makes some other remarks upon the tale which are worth reading. (Hist. of Rome, vol. ii. p. 449, note 985.) SCAPULA.

2. P. SCAPTIUS, a Roman citizen, who carried on the trade of a negotiator, or money-lender, in the province of Cilicia. The king of Salamis in Cyprus owed him a sum of money; and in order to obtain from the Salamians what was due to him, as well as the usurious interest which he chose to charge, App. Claudius, the predecessor of Cicero in the government of Cilicia, had made Scapitus praefectus in the town, and had also placed some troops of cavalry at his disposal, for the purpose of enforcing his claims. When Cicero succeeded Claudius in the province, M. Brutus, who was a friend of Scapitus, warmly recommended his interests to Cicero; but the latter very properly declined to be a party to such infamous proceedings, recalled the cavalry from Cyprus, and refused the praefecture to Scapitus, on the ground that such an appointment ought not to be given to any negotiator. Scapitus is mentioned at a subsequent period in Cicero's correspondence. (Cic. ad Att. v. 21, vi. 1—3, xv. 13, Pseudo-Cic. ad Brut. i. 18.)

P. SCA'PULA, a usurer, to whom C. Quintius owed money, n. c. 81. (Cic. pro Quinct. 4.)

SCA'PULA, OST'O'RIUS. 1. P. SCA'PULA OST'ORIUS, succeeded A. Plautius as governor of Britain, about a. d. 50, with the title of propraetor. He had previously held the consulship, and his name is inserted in some of the Fasti as consul suffectus in a. d. 46. He is characterised by Tacitus as bello egregius, and carried on the war with success against several of the British tribes. Among others, he defeated the powerful tribe of the Silures, took prisoner their king Caractactus, and sent him in chains to Rome (Caractacu.s). In consequence of this success he received the insignia of a triumph, but died soon afterwards in the province, worn out by the toils and anxieties of war. (Tac. Ann. xii. 31—39, Agr. 14.)

2. P. O斯塔'RIUS SCAPULA, the son of the preced ing, fought under his father in Britain, in a. d. 50; and received the reward of a corona civica, for saving the life of a Roman citizen in battle. In a. d. 62, he appeared as a witness in favour of Antitiarius Susianus, who was accused of having recited in his house some libellous verses against the emperor Nero; but his services were repaid with ingratitude; for, in a. d. 64, the same Susianus accused him to the emperor. He was condemned to death, and put an end to his own life. (Tac. Ann. xii. 31, xiv. 48, xvi. 14, 15.)

SCAPULA, QUI'NTIUS. 1. T. QUINTIUS SCAPULA, a zealous partisan of the Pompeians, passed over into Spain with Cn. Pompeius the elder, son of the triumvir, and took the most active part in organising the revolt against Caesar in that country. He and his companions obtained the appointment of consular legates from Caesar as their leaders; but on the arrival of Sex. Pompeius, he fled to Spain after the defeat of his party at the battle of Thapsus in Africa, Scapula surrendered the command to him. After the defeat of the Pompeians at Munda, in b. c. 45, Scapula, seeing that all was lost, fled to Corduba, and there burned himself to death on a pyre which he had erected for the purpose, after partaking of a splen died banquet. (Appian, B. C. ii. 87, 105; Dion Cass. xiii. 29, 30; Cic. ad Fam. ix. 13; Auctor, B. Hipp. 33.)

2. P. QUINTIUS SCAPULA, mentioned by Pliny as an instance of sudden death. (Plin. H. N. vii. 53. s. 54.)

SCAR'PUS.

SCAR'PUS, L. PINAI'R'US, was placed by Antonius over Cyrene and the neighbouring country with four legions, shortly before the battle of Actium. After the loss of this battle, Antonius sailed to Libya; but Scarpus, who saw that the affairs of his former patron were desperate, refused to receive him, put to death the messengers he had sent to him, and handed over his troops to Cor nelius Gallus, the lieutenant of Augustus (Dion Cass. li. 5, 9; comp. Plut. Ant. 69; Oros. vi. 19). There are several coins of this Scarpus extant, some of them bearing the name of Antonius, and others that of Caesar (Octavianus). From the latter circumstance we may infer that he was re-appointed by Octavianus to the command of Libya, when Cornelius Gallus was placed over Egypt shortly afterwards. The following coin of Scarpus was struck when he served under Octavian. (Eckhel, vol. v. p. 272.)

COIN OF L. PINARIUS SCAR'PUS.

SCATO or CATO, VETTIUS, one of the Italian generals in the Marseis war, b. c. 90. He defeated the consul L. Julius Caesar, and then advanced against Aesernia, which was obliged to surren der through failure of provisions. He also defeated the other consul, P. Rutlius Lupus, who fell in the battle (Appian, B. C. i. 40, 41, 43). Cicero speaks of an interview at which he was present, between Vettius and Cn. Pompey (Phil. xii. 11); and it is therefore not improbable that the P. Ventidius, who is said by Appian to have been one of the Italian generals that defeated the army of Cn. Pompey, is the same person as the subject of this article. (Appian, B. C. i. 47, with the note of Schweigh.) We learn from Seneca (de Benef. iii. 23), that Vettius was taken prisoner, and was stabbed to death by his own slave as he was being dragged before the Roman general, and that he was thus delivered from the ignominy and punishment that awaited him.

There is some difficulty respecting the ortho graphy of the cognomen of Vettius. Appian calls him Cato, and the Insteus Cato, mentioned by Velleius Paterculus (ii. 16) as one of the Italian generals in this war, is probably the same as this Vettius. In the best MSS. of Cicero (l. c.), however, we find Scato, which is probably the correct form, since Scato occurs as a Marseis cognomen in the oration "Pro summo Domo" (c. 44), and it was natural enough that the obscure name of Scato should be changed into the celebrated one of Cato. The praenomen of Vettius is also given differently. In Cicero (l. c.) it is Publius; in Eutropius (v. 3), Titus; in Seneca (l. c.), Caius: the first of these is probably the most correct.

SCA'RI'NIUS, a celebrated grammarian, was the instructor of the emperor Alexander Severus. (Lamprid. Alex. Sec. 3.)

SCA'RIUS signified a person who had a defect in his ankles or feet (Scaurum, praecis fulatum maius tali, Hor. Sat. i. 3. 47), and was used, like many other words of a similar kind, as a cognomen in several Roman gentes.
SCAURUS.

SCAURUS, AEMILIUS. The Scaurus were a patrician family of the ancient Aemilia gens, but remained in obscurity to a very late period. The first person of the name who is mentioned is, 1. L. AEMILIUS SCAURUS, who served as one of the officers in the Roman fleet, in the war against Antiochus, B.C. 190. (Liv. xxxvii. 31.)

2. M. AEMILIUS SCAURUS raised his family from obscurity to the highest rank among the Roman nobles. He was born in B.C. 163. His father, notwithstanding his patrician descent, had been obliged, through poverty, to carry on the trade of a coal-merchant, and left his son a very slender patrimony. The latter had thought at first of carrying on the trade of a money-lender; but he finally resolved to devote himself to the study of eloquence, with the hope of rising to the honours of the state. He likewise served in the army, where he appears to have gained some distinction. His first campaign was in Spain, probably in the war against Numantia. He next served under the consul L. Aurelius Orestes, in Sardinia, B.C. 126. He was curule aedile in B.C. 123, but was prevented by his poverty from giving the games with much splendour. Though we have only scanty accounts of his early career, it appears that he had already obtained great influence in the state; and he is mentioned by Sallust as one of the leading men at Rome, when Adherbal came to the city, about B.C. 117, to solicit assistance against Jugurtha. He was one of the few Roman nobles who abstained on that occasion from receiving the bribes of Jugurtha, but more through fear of the odium that was likely to accrue from such an act, than from any abhorrence of the thing itself. He was an unsuccessful candidate for the consulship for B.C. 116, but obtained it for the year B.C. 115, when he had M. Caecilius Metellus as his colleague. In his consulship he brought forward a new public law, and another respecting the manner in which the libertini were to vote in the comitia. He likewise carried on war with success against several of the Alpine tribes, and obtained a triumph for his victories over them. Aurelius Victor says that he triumphed over the Ligures and Gentiisci, the Capitoline Fasti make him triumph over the Galli and the Curni. In B.C. 112, he was sent at the head of an embassy to Jugurtha, who had forcibly deprived Adherbal of the dominions which the commissioners of the senate had assigned to him, and was now besieging him in Cirta. But Jugurtha, though he waited upon Scaurus with great respect, did not raise the siege of Cirta, and put Adherbal to death when he obtained possession of the town, towards the end of the year. [JUGURTHA.] Upon this the Romans declared war against Jugurtha, and intrusted the conduct of it to the consul L. Bestia, of the consuls of the following year (A.D. 111). Bestia chose Scaurus as one of his legates; and upon both of them receiving large sums of money from Jugurtha, the consul granted the king most favourable terms of peace. This disgraceful transaction excited the greatest indignation at Rome; and such was the excitement of the people, that the senate dared not resist the bill of the tribune, C. Mamilius, B.C. 110, by which an inquiry was to be instituted against all those who had received bribes from Jugurtha, or had in any way favoured his designs. Although Scaurus had been one of the most guilty, such was his influence in the state that he contrived to be appointed one of the three quaestors, who were elected under the bill, for the purpose of prosecuting the criminals. But though he thus secured himself, he was unable to save any of his accomplices. Bestia and many others were condemned.

In B.C. 109, Scaurus was censor with M. Livius Drusus. In his censorship he restored the Milvian bridge, and constructed the Aemilian road, which ran by Pisae and Luna as far as Dertona. His colleague Drusus having died, Scaurus sought, according to custom, to have resigned his office immediately; but he continued to retain it till the tribunes compelled him to abdicate by threat of imprisonment. In B.C. 107, he was elected consul a second time, in place of L. Cassius Longinus, who had fallen in battle against the Tigurini. P. Rutilius Rufus, who was a candidate for the office at the same time, accused Scaurus of having gained the election by bribery; but he was acquitted by the judices, and thereupon straightforwardly accused Rutilius of the same offence. In the struggles between the aristocratical and popular parties, he was always a warm supporter of the former. He accordingly took up arms against Saturninus in B.C. 100, whose enmity he had previously incurred by having been appointed by the senate, in B.C. 104, to supersede him in the duty of supplying the city with corn. [SATURNINUS, APPULIUS.] He was several times accused of different offences, chiefly by his private enemies; but such was his influence in the state, that he was always acquitted. Thus, in consequences of his having refused to elect Cn. Domitius Ahenobarbus into the college of augurs, of which he was a member, Ahenobarbus accused him of majestas, in B.C. 94, on the ground that the sacra publica at Lavinium had, through his fault, not been properly observed; but thirty-three tribes out of the thirty-five voted for his acquittal. In B.C. 91, he was accused of repetundae by Q. Servilius Caepio, who alleged that he had appropriated to his own use some public money, during an embassy to Asia; but he secured himself by bringing a counter-accusation against Caepio. The latter, out of revenge, induced Q. Varus, the tribune of the people, to accuse Scaurus in the following year, B.C. 90, of having excited the Italian allies to revolt. Scaurus boldly met the charge; and going into the forum, put it to the people whether they would give credence to Q. Varus, the Spaniard, or M. Scaurus, the princeps senatus; whereupon there was such an unequivocal demonstration of popular feeling in his favour, that the tribune himself withdrew the accusation. Scaurus was then about sixty-two years of age, and died soon afterwards; since, in B.C. 88, his widow, Caecilia, was married to Sulla. [CAECILIA, No. 5.] By his wife Caecilia Scaurus had three children, two sons [see below, Nos. 2 and 3], and a daughter Aemilia, first married to M. Gabrio, and next to Cn. Pompeius, subsequently the triumvir.

Scaurus is frequently praised in the highest terms by Cicero and others, in consequence of his being such a strong supporter of the aristocratical party. But though he distinguished himself throughout the whole of his public life by opposing the popular leaders from the Graeciae downwards, he appears to have been always regarded with some degree of favour by the people, as his frequent acquittals would show. There was a gravity and earnestness in his character which commanded their respect; and he carefully concealed from public view his vices, especially his avarice and acts of rapine. Sallust characterizes him as "homo nobiliss. impiger, factious, avidus poten tiae, honoris, divitiarum; ceterum vitia sua callide ocul-tans" (Jug. 13). Some deductions ought, per haps, to be made from this estimate of his character, in consequence of the well-known hatred of the historian to the aristocracy; but when it is recollected that Scaurus was a poor man when he commenced public life, it is evident that the innumeable wealth which he left to his son could not have been acquired by honest means; and the bribes which he received from Jugurtha, may fairly be regarded as only a specimen of the way in which his property was obtained. The speeches of Scaurus were impressive and weighty, but were deficient in imagination and fire. "They were more adapted," says Cicero (Brut. 29), "for the senate than the courts." Cicero accordingly classes him among the Stoic orators. Scaurus also wrote a work in three books on his own life, which is sometimes referred to by the grammarians, but which no one was accustomed to read in the time of Cicero. (Aurel. Vict. de Ill. Vir. 72; Val. Max.

3. M. Aemilius Scaurus, the eldest son of the preceding, and stepson of the dictator Sulla, whom his mother Cecilia married after the death of his father, as has been already remarked. In the third Mithridatic war he served under Pompey as quaestor. The latter sent him to Damascus with an army, and from thence he marched into Judaea, to settle the disputes between the brothers Hyrcanus and Aristobulus. Both of them offered him large sums of money; but he decided for Aristobulus, probably because he bid the highest,
b.c. 64. After driving Hyrcanus out of Judaea, Scaurus returned to Damascus. Upon Pompey's arrival in this city in the following year, an accusation was brought against Scaurus of having been bribed by Aristobulus; but though Pompey reversed his decision, and placed Hyrcanus upon the throne, he took no notice of the charges, and left Scaurus in the command of Syria with two legions.
Scaurus remained in Syria till b. c. 59, when he was succeeded by L. Marcus Philippus. During his government of Syria he made a predatory incursion into Arabia Petrea, but withdrew on the payment of 300 talents by Arenas, the king of the country.

On his return to Rome he became a candidate for the curule aedileship, which he held in b. c. 58, the year in which P. Clodius was tribune. The extraordinary splendour with which he celebrated the public games surpassed every thing of the kind that had been previously witnessed in Rome, and it is by them that his name has been chiefly handed down to posterity. The temporary theatre which he built accommodated 80,000 spectators, and was adorned in the most magnificent manner. Three hundred and sixty pillars decorated the stage, arranged in three stories, of which the lowest was made of white marble, the middle one of glass, and the highest of gilt wood. Between these pillars there were three thousand statues, besides paintings and other ornaments. The combats of wild beasts were equally astonishing. A hundred and fifty panthers were exhibited in the circuses, and five crocodiles and a hippopotamus were seen for the first time at Rome. But Scaurus purchased the favour of the people in these shows rather too dearly. So costly were they that they not only absorbed all the property which his father had left him, and the treasures which he had accumulated in the East, but compelled him to borrow money of the usurers in order to defray the expenses.

In b. c. 56 Scaurus was praetor, during which year he presided in the court in which P. Sestius was accused, who was defended by Cicero. In the following year he governed the province of Sar dinia, which he plundered, without mercy, as he wanted money both to pay his debts and to purchase the consulship. On his return to Rome in
b. c. 54, he became a candidate for the consulship;
but before the consular elections took place, his competitors, at the beginning of July, got P. Val-erius Triarius and three others to accuse him of repudetan in Sardinia, thus hoping to get rid of a formidable opponent. His guilt was certain; there were numerous witnesses against him; and M.
Cato, who presided as praetor, was not to be cor-ruputed, and was favourable to Triarius. Still Scaurus did not despair. He was defended by Cicero and Hortensius, as well as by four other orators. Many of the most distinguished men at Rome, and among them nine persons of consular rank, pleaded on his behalf; while the tears of Scau-urs himself, and his appeals to the splendor of his aedileship, produced a powerful effect upon the judges. Thus, notwithstanding his guilt, he was acquitted on the 2nd of September, almost nunmously. Soon afterwards, and in the course of the same year, he was again accused by Triarius, on a charge of ambitus (Cic. ad Att. iv. 16. §§ 7, 8, iv. 17.
§ 2, ad Q. Fr. iii. 2. § 3). Drummans says that he was condemned in this year, and went into exile. But this appears to be a mistake; for although it is evident from the preceding passages in Cicero's letters, that Scaurus was accused of ambitus in b. c. 54, it is equally clear from the testimony of Appian (B. C. ii. 24), that he was condemned in the third consulship of Pompey,
b. c. 52. Hence it is probable that Scaurus was acquitted in b. c. 54, and accused again in b. c. 52, under Pompey's new law against ambitus. From this time the name of Scaurus does not occur again.
He married Mucia, who had been previously the wife of Pompey (Mitt. ii. p. 2), and by her he had one son [No. 5]. (Joseph. Ant. xiv. 3—5,

COIN OF M. AEMILIUS SCAURUS.

4. AEMILIUS SCAURUS, the younger son of No. 2, fought under the proconsul, Q. Catulus, against the Cimbri at the Athesia, and having fled from the field, was indignantly commanded by his father not to come into his presence; whereupon the youth put an end to his life. (Val. Max. v. 8. § 4; Frontin. Strat. iv. 1. § 3.)

5. M. AEMILIUS SCAURUS, the son of No. 3, and Mucia, the former wife of Pompey the triumvir, and consequently the half-brother of Sex. Pompey. He accompanied the latter into Asia, after the defeat of his fleet in Sicily, but betrayed him into the hands of the generals of M. Antonius, in B.C. 35. After the battle of Actium, he fell into the power of Octavian, and escaped death, to which he had been sentenced, only through the intercession of his mother, Mucia. (Appian, B.C. v. 142; Dion Cass. lii. 2, lvi. 38.)

6. MAEMERCU SCAURUS, the son of No. 5, was a distinguished orator and poet, but of a dissolute character. He was a member of the senate at the time of the accession of Tiberius, A.D. 14, when he offended this suspicious emperor by some remarks which he made in the senate. He is mentioned as one of the accusers of Domitius Corbulon in A.D. 21, and likewise as one of the accusers of Silanus, in A.D. 22. He was himself accused of majestas in A.D. 32, but Tiberius stopped the proceedings against him. He was, however, again accused of the same crime in A.D. 34, by Servilius and Cornelius Tuscus, who charged him with magic, and with having had adultery with Livia; but his real ground of offence was his tragedy of Areus, in which his enemy Macro had interpolated some verses reflecting upon the emperor. He put an end to his own life at the suggestion of his wife Sexia, who killed herself at the same time (Tac. Ann. i. 13, ii. 31, 36, vi. 9, 29; Dion Cass. iviiii. 24; Senec. Suas. 2, de Benef. iv. 31; Meyer, Oath. Rom. Progr. pp. 556, 559, 23 ed.). Both Tacitus (Ann. iii. 69) and Seneca (de Benef. v. 31) call him a consular, but the year of his consulship is not known. Besides Sexia, who was his wife at the time of his death, he had also been married to Lepida, by whom he had a daughter, and who was condemned in A.D. 20 (Tac. Ann. iii. 23). In the following year he is called the paternal uncle (patrus) and stepfather (viriicus) of Sulla (Tac. Ann. iii. 31), and therefore it would appear that, after the death of Lepida, he had married his brother's widow. Seneca says (Suas. 2) that this Scaurus was the last of his family.

SCAURUS, Aurelius. 1. C. Aurelius Scaurus, praetor B.C. 186, obtained Sardinia as his province. (Liv. xxxix. 6, 8.)

2. M. Aurelius Scaurus, was consul suffectus in B.C. 108. Three years afterwards, B.C. 105, he was consul legate in Gaul, where he was defeated by the Cimbri, and taken prisoner. When he was brought before the leaders of the Cimbri, he warned them not to cross the Alps, as they would find it impossible to subdue the Romans, and was thereupon killed on the spot by Boiorix, one of the chiefs. He is erroneously called by Velleius Paterculus consul, instead of consularis (Liv. Epit. 67; Oros. v. 16; Vell. Pat. ii. 12; Tac. Germ. 37.) This M. Aurelius Scaurus is erroneously called M. Aemilius Scaurus by many modern writers.

3. M. Aurelius Scaurus, the quaestor mentioned by Cicero (Verr. i. 33), was probably a son of the preceding.

4. M. Aurelius Scaurus, whose name occurs on coins, of which a specimen is annexed. On the obverse is the head of Pallas, and on the reverse Mars driving a chariot. From the legend L. LEC. and CN. DOM. on the reverse, it is supposed that Scaurus was one of the triumvirs of the mint at the time that L. Licinius and Cn. Domitius held one of the higher magistracies. There are several other coins of the same kind. [See Vol. I. p. 863, b, and more especially Vol. II. p. 783, a.]

SCAURUS, MA'XIMUS, a centurion in the praetorian troops, was one of the parties privy to Piso's conspiracy against the emperor Nero. (Tac. Ann. xv. 50.)

SCAURUS, Q. TERE'N'IUS, a celebrated grammian who flourished under the emperor Hadrian (dei Hadriani temporibus grammaticus vel nobilissimus), and whose son was one of the preceptors of the emperor Verus (Gell. xi. § 3; comp. Auson. Epist. xviii. 27; Capitolin. Verus, 2). He was the author of an Ars Grammatica and of a commentary upon Plautus, Virgil, and the Ars poetica of Horace, which are known to us from a few scattered notices only, for the tract entitled Q. Tertulli Scauri de Orthographia ad Theoseum included in the "Grammaticae Latinae Auctores Antiqui" of Putschius (4to. Hannover, 1605, pp. 2250—2264), but originally published at Basle (4vo. 1527), is not believed to be a genuine production of this Scaurus at least. SCEPHRUS (Σκέφρος), a son of Tegeates and Maera, and brother of Leimon. When Apollo and Artemis took vengeance upon those who had ill-treated Latona, while she was wandering about in her pregnancy; and when they came into the country of the Tegeatans, Apollo had a secret conversation with Scephrus. Leimon, suspecting that Scephrus was plotting against him, slew his brother, and Artemis punished the murderer by sudden death. Tegeates and Maera immediately offered up sacrifices to Apollo and Artemis; but the country was nevertheless visited by a famine, and the god of Delphi ordered that Scephrus should be honoured with funereal solemnities. From that time, it is said, a part of the solemnities at the festival of Apollo Agyioun at Tegea, was performed in honour of Scephrus, and the priestess of Artemis pursued a man as Artemis had pursuued Leimon. SCERDILAIDAS, or SCERDILAEDUS. (Σκερδίλαϊδας or Σκερδίλαϊδος. Concerning the various forms of the name see Schweighäuser, ad Polyb. ii. § 5. § 6. Bekker, in his recent edition of Polybius, retains the form Σκερδίλαϊδος.)

I. A king of Illyria, who was in all probability a son of Pleuratus, and younger brother of Agron, both of them kings of that country (see Schweighäuser, loc. c.). He is first mentioned shortly after the death of Agron, as commanding a force sent by Teuta, the widow of that monarch, against Epeirus, n. c. 250. He advanced through the passes of Atatinnans, defeated an army which the Epireotes opposed to him, and penetrated as far as Phocis, when he was recalled by Teuta to oppose the Durdanians (Polyb. ii. § 5, § 6). At this time he was clearly in a private station, and the period at which he assumed the sovereignty is uncertain; but it seems probable that, after the defeat and abdication of Teuta (n. c. 229), Scerdiilaidas succeeded to a portion of her dominions, though at first without the title of king, which he probably did not assume till after the death of his nephew Pines, on whom the Romans had bestowed the sovereignty, under the guardianship of Demetrius of Pharos (see Schweighäuser, ad Polyb. loc. c.). In n. c. 220 we find him joining with Demetrius in a predatory expedition against the Achaenians, and concluding a treaty with the Aetolians against that people: but he quickly became dissatisfied with the conduct of his new allies, and was, in consequence, induced by Philip to change sides, and conclude an alliance with the Macedonian monarch (Polyb. iv. 16, 29). In the spring of 216 he sent a small squadron to the support of Philip, but he appears to have rendered him little efficient assistance, either on that or any subsequent occasion during the war. Notwithstanding this he claimed from the Macedonian king his promised share of the booty, and conceiving himself aggrieved in this respect, in the following year (n. c. 217) he turned his arms against Philip, captured by treachery some of his ships, and made an inroad into Macedonia itself, where he made himself master of some of the frontier towns. Philip, who was at this time in the Peloponnesse, hastened to the relief of his own dominions, and having quickly recovered the places he had lost, occupied himself during the winter in the equipment of a powerful fleet, to carry on operations against the Illyrian king. Scerdiilaidas, alarmed at these tidings, applied for assistance to the Romans, who were favourably disposed towards him from jealousy of Philip, but were too hard pressed at home to furnish him any effectual succour. They, however, in the summer of n. c. 216, sent a squadron of ten ships to his support, and the very name of a Roman fleet struck such a terror into Philip that he abandoned the Adriatic, and retired, with his whole fleet, to Cephallenia (Polyb. v. 3, 95, 101, 108, 110). But during the following years his Roman allies were able to give little assistance to the Illyrian king, and Philip wrested from him the important fortresses of Lissus, as well as a considerable part of his dominions. In n. c. 211 Scerdilaidas joined the alliance of the Aetolians with the Romans, but his part in the war which followed appears to have been confined to threatening and infesting the Macedonian frontiers by occasional predatory incursions (Liv. xxvi. 24, xxvii. 20, xxviii. 5; Polyb. x. 41). It would appear that he must have died before the peace of 204, as his name, which is coupled with that of his son Pleuratus, during the negotiations in n. c. 208, does not appear in the treaty concluded by P. Sempronius with the Macedonian king (see Liv. xxviii. 30, xxix. 12). He left a son, Pleuratus, who succeeded him on the throne.

2. A son of Gentius, king of Illyria, who was taken prisoner and carried captive to Rome, together with his father and his brother Pleuratus. (Liv. xiv. 32.)

SCIBVNIUS, FLAVIUS. [SCARVIVUS.]

SCHEDIUS (Σχεδίος). 1. A son of Iphitus by Hippolyta, commanded the Phocians in the war against Troy along with his brother Epistrophus (Hom. ii. i. 517, &c.) Apollodorus (iii. 10. § 8) calls Epistrophus the father of Schedius. He was slain by Hector (II. xvii. 306, &c.; Paus. x. 4. § 1), and his remains were carried from Troy to Anticyra in Phocis. He was represented in the Lesche at Delphi. (Paus. x. 30. § 2, 36, in fin.)

2. A son of Perimedes, likewise a Phocius who was killed at Troy by Hector. (Hom. i. xv. 515; comp. Strab. ix. p. 424.)

SCHOENEUS (Σχωνέος), a son of Athanas and Themistio, was king in Boeotia and father of Atalante and Clymenus (Apolrod. i. § 7, § 9, § 2). The town of Schoenus is said to have derived its name from him. (Paus. viii. 35. § 8; Steph. Byz. s. v.) Another personage of this name occurs in Anton. Lib. 10. [ L. S.]

SCIPIO, the name of an illustrious patrician family of the Cornelius gens. This name, which signifies a stick or staff, is said to have been originally given to a Cornelius, because he served as a staff in directing his blind father (patreum pro baculo regem), and to have been handed down by him as a family name to his descendants (Macrob. Sat. i. 6). This family produced some of the greatest men in Rome, and to them she was more indebted than to any others for the empire of the world. The Scipios, like many other Roman families, possessed a burial-place in which all the members of the family were interred (Cic. Tusc. i. 7). This family-tomb, which was near the Porta Capena, was discovered in 1729, and is one of the most interesting remains of the republican period. It was discovered on the left of the Appia Via, about 400 paces within the modern Porta S Sc-

The inscriptions are also given by Orelli, Inscrip. Nos. 530—539. (See also Becker, Handbuch der Römischen Alterthümer, vol. i. p. 513.)

1. P. Cornelius Scipio, magister equitum, in B. C. 336, to the dictator M. Furius Camillus. The Capitoline Fasti, however, make P. Cornelius Magniensis the magister equitum in this year. Scipio was consular tribune in B. C. 395, and again in 394. He was also twice interrex, once in B. C. 391, and again in 389. (Livy. v. 19, 24, 26, 31, vi. 1.)

2. P. Cornelius Scipio, probably son of the preceding, was one of the first curule aediles, who were appointed in B. C. 306, when one place in the consulsipal was thrown open to the plebeians. He is apparently the same as the L. Scipio who was magister equitum to the dictator Camillus, in B. C. 356. (Livy. vii. 1, 24.)

3. L. Cornelius Scipio, was interrex in B. C. 353, and consul in 350, with M. Popillius Laenas. (Livy. vii. 21, 23.)

4. P. Cornelius Scipio Barbatus, was consul B. C. 328, with C. Plautius, according to the Fasti. Livy. (viii. 22), however, calls him P. Cornelius Scapula. In B. C. 306 he was appointed dictator, for the purpose of holding the consular comitia, and in the following year he is spoken of as pontifex maximus. (Livy. ix. 44, 46.)

5. L. Cornelius Scipio Barbatus, the son of Cnaeus, as we learn from his epitaph. He was consul B. C. 298, with Cn. Fulvia Maximus Cen- tumalus, carried on war against the Etruscans, and defeated them near Volaterrae. In the following year, B. C. 297, he served as legate under the consul Q. Fabius Maximus, against the Samnites. (comp. Frontin. ii. 4 § 2.) In B. C. 295 he again served under the consul Fabius Maximus and Decius Mus, with the title of propraetor, in the great campaign of that year against the Gauls, Etruscans, and Samnites. In B. C. 293 he again fought, under L. Papirius Cursor, in the campaign which brought the Samnite war to a close. (Livy. x. 11, 12, 14, 25, 26, 40, 41.) This is the narrative of Livy, but we have a very different account of his exploits in the epitaph on his tomb, which says nothing of his victory in Etruria, but speaks of his conquests in Samnium and Apulia.* Niebuhr supposes that his conquests in Samnium and Apulia were made in B. C. 297, when he was the legate of Fabius Maximus (Niebuhr, Hist. of Rome, vol. iii. pp. 363—366, 373). This Scipio was the great-grandfather of Hannibal. The genealogy of the family can be traced with more certainty from this time.

6. Cn. Cornelius Scipio Asina, the son of No. 5. The origin of his cognomen Asina is related by Macrobius (Sat. i. 6). He was consul in B. C. 260, with C. Duillius, in the fifth year of the first Punic war, and received the command of the fleet which the Romans had recently built. In an attempt upon the Liparian islands, he was taken prisoner with seventeen ships; but the details of his capture are related somewhat differently (Polyb. i. 21, 22; Livy. Ep. 17; Oros. iv. 7; Eutrop. ii. 20; Flor. ii. 2; Zonar. viii. 10; Val. Max. vi. 6 § 2; Polyena. vi. 16 § 5). He probably recovered his liberty when Regulus invaded Africa; for he was consul a second time in B. C. 254, with A. Attilius Calatinus. In this year he was more successful. He and his colleague crossed over into Sicily, and took the important town of Panormus. The services of Scipio were rewarded by a triumph. (Polyb. i. 38; Zonar. viii. 14; Val. Max. vi. 9 § 11; for the purpose of holding the consular elections. He is mentioned again in B. C. 211, when he showed so little of the spirit of a Scipio as to recommend that the senate should recall all the generals and armies from Italy for the defence of the capital, because Hannibal was marching upon the city. (Eutrop. iii. 7; Oros. iv. 13; Zonar. viii. 20; Liv. xxxii. 34, xxvii. 8.)

7. P. Cornelius Scipio Asina, son of No. 5, was consul in B. C. 258, with C. Aquillius Florus. He drove the Carthaginians out of Saridina and Corsica, defeating Hanno, the Carthaginian commander, and obtained a triumph in consequence. The epitaph on his tomb records that “he took Corsica and the city of Aleria.” In the Fasti he appears as censor in B. C. 258, with C. Duillius, and his epitaph calls him “Consul, Censor, Aedilis.” (Livy. Ep. 17; Oros. iv. 7; Eutrop. ii. 20; Flor. ii. 2; Zonar. viii. 11; Val. Max. vi. 1 § 2; Orelli, Inscri. No. 532.)

8. P. Cornelius Scipio Asina, son of No. 6, was consul B. C. 221, with M. Minucius Rufus, and carried on war, with his colleague, against the Istri, who annoyed the Romans by their piracy. The Istri were completely subdued, and Scipio obtained the honour of a triumph. In B. C. 217 he was appointed interrex, for the purpose of holding the consular elections. He is mentioned again in B. C. 211, when he showed so little of the spirit of a Scipio as to recommend that the senate should recall all the generals and armies from Italy for the defence of the capital, because Hannibal was marching upon the city. (Eutrop. iii. 7; Oros. iv. 13; Zonar. viii. 20; Liv. xxxii. 34, xxvii. 8.)

9. P. Cornelius Scipio, the son of No. 7, was consul, with T. Sempronius Longus, in the first year of the Punic War, B. C. 218. Scipio, having received Spain as his province, set sail with his army from Pisa to Massilia. On his arrival at the latter place, he found that Hannibal had already crossed the Pyrenees, and was advancing towards the Rhone; but as his men had suffered much from sea-sickness, he allowed them a few days’ rest, thinking that he had abundance of time to prevent Hannibal’s crossing the Rhone. But the rapidity of Hannibal’s movements were greater than the consul had anticipated. The Carthaginian army crossed the Rhone in safety, while the Romans were at the mouth of the river; and when Scipio marched up the left bank of the river, he found that Hannibal had advanced into the interior of Gaul, and had already got the start of him by a three days’ march. Despairing, therefore, of overtaking him, he resolved to sail back to Italy, and await his arrival in Cisalpine Gaul. But as the Romans had an army of 25,000 men in Cisalpine Gaul, under the command of the two praetors, Scipio resolved to send into Spain the army which he had brought with him, under the command of his brother and legate, Cn. Scipio, and to take back with him only a small portion of his forces to Italy. This wise resolution of Scipio probably saved Rome; for if the Carthaginians had maintained the undisputed command of Spain, they would have been able to have concentrated all their efforts to support Hannibal in Italy, and might have sent him such strong reinforcements after the battle of Cannae as would have compelled Rome to submit.

After Scipio had landed at Pisa, he took the command of the praetor's army, and forthwith hastened to meet Hannibal, before he might be able to collect reinforcements among the Cisalpine Gauls. He crossed the Po at Placentia, and then advanced along the left bank of the river in search of Hannibal. Soon after crossing the Ticinus, over which he had thrown a bridge, his cavalry and light-armed troops, which he was leading in person in advance of the rest of his forces, fell in with the cavalry of the Carthaginians, also commanded by Hannibal himself. An engagement took place, in which the Romans were defeated. The consul himself received a severe wound, and was only saved from death by the courage of his young son, Publius, the future conqueror of Hannibal; though, according to other accounts, he owed his life to a Ligurian slave (Liv. xxx. 46; Polyb. x. 9). Scipio now retreated across the Ticinus, breaking the bridge behind him and so soon recovered the Po also, and took up his quarters at Placentia. Here Hannibal, who had likewise crossed the Po, offered him battle, which was declined by Scipio, whose wound prevented him from taking the command of his army, and who had moreover determined to wait the arrival of his colleague, Sempronius Longus, who had been summoned from Sicily to join him. Upon the arrival of Sempronius, Scipio was encamped upon the banks of the Trebia, having abandoned his former position at Placentia. As Scipio still continued disabled by his wound, the command of the army devolved upon Sempronius. The latter, who was anxious to obtain the glory of conquering Hannibal, resolved upon a battle, in opposition to the advice of his colleague. The result was the complete defeat of the Roman army, which was obliged to take refuge within the walls of Placentia. [HANNIBAL, p. 335, b.]

In the following year, B.C. 217, Scipio, whose imperium had been prolonged, crossed over into Spain with a fleet of twenty ships and eight thousand foot-soldiers. Scipio and his brother Cneius continued in Spain till their death in B.C. 211; but the history of their campaigns, though important in their results, is full of such confusions and contradictions, that a brief description of them is quite sufficient. Livy found great discrepancies in his authorities, which are in themselves not worthy of much confidence. It is even impossible to state with certainty the years in which most of the events occurred (Niebuhr, Lecturae on Roman History, vol. i. pp. 206, 207). Upon the arrival of Publius in Spain, he found that his brother Cneius had already obtained a firm footing in the country. Soon after Cneius had landed at Em- porium in the preceding year, B.C. 218, most of the chiefs on the sea-coast joined him, attracted by his affability and kindness, which formed a striking contrast with the severity and harshness of the Carthaginian commanders. In the course of the same year he gained a victory near the town of Scissis or Cissa, in which Hamno, the Carthaginian general, was taken prisoner, and which made him master of nearly the whole of northern Spain from the Pyrenees to the Iberus. Hasdrubal advanced by rapid marches from the north of Spain to retrieve the Carthaginian cause in the north, but arrived too late in the year to accomplish any thing of importance, and accordingly recrossed the Pyrenees after burning part of the Carthaginian fleet. Scipio wintered at Tarrauco. In the following year, B.C. 217, he defeated the Carthaginian fleet at the mouth of the Iberus, and thus obtained for the Romans the command of the sea. Publius arrived shortly afterwards in the middle of the summer, and the two brothers now advanced against Saguntum, where Hannibal had deposited the hostages, whom he had obtained from the various Spanish tribes. The treachery of a Spaniard of the name of Abelix or Abilyx surrendered them to the Scipios, who restored them to their own people, and thus gained the support of a large number of the Spanish tribes.

In the course of the next two or three years Livy gives a description of several brilliant victories gained by the Scipios, but as these were evidently followed by no results, there is clearly great exaggeration in his account. Thus, they are said to have defeated Hasdrubal in B.C. 216 with such loss, near the passage of the Iberus, that he escaped from the field with only a few followers. This victory was gained after the battle of Cannae, when Hasdrubal was attempting to march into Italy to support his victorious brother Hannibal. In the following year, B.C. 215, Hasdrubal, having received reinforcements from Carthage, under the command of his brother Mago, laid siege to the town of Illiturgi; but their united forces were defeated by the two Scipios, who are also said to have gained another decisive victory over them in the course of the same year near Intibili.

Next year, B.C. 214, another Carthaginian army arrived under Hasdrubal, the son of Gisco. The Roman accounts again speak of two successive victories gained by Cn. Scipio, but followed as usual by no results. About this time Hasdrubal, Hannibal's brother, was recalled to Africa to oppose Syphax, one of the Numidian kings, who was carrying on war against Carthage. The Scipios availed themselves of this disunion to strengthen their power; they gained over new tribes to the Roman cause, took 20,000 Celtiberians into their pay, and felt themselves so strong by the beginning of B.C. 212 or 211, that they resolved to cross the Iberus, and to make a vigorous effort to drive the Carthaginians out of Spain. They accordingly divided their forces. P. Scipio was to attack Mago and Hasdrubal, the son of Gisco, who were supported by Masinissa and the Spanish chief Indilibis, while his brother Cneius was to attack Hasdrubal the son of Barca, who had already returned from Africa, after bringing the war against Syphax to a successful termination. But the result was fatal. Publius was destroyed, with the greater part of his forces, and Mago and Hasdrubal, son of Gisco, now joined Haddrubal, son of Barca, to crush Cneius. Meanwhile Cneius had been at once paralysed by the defection of the 20,000 Celtiberians, who had been gained over by the Carthaginian general; and being now surrounded by the united forces of the three generals, his camp was taken, and he himself fell, twenty-nine days after the death of his brother. The remains of his army were collected by L. Marcus Septimus, a Roman consul (Liv. x. 63). The year in which the Scipios perished is rather doubtful. Livy says (xxv. 36) that it was in the eighth year after Cn. Scipio had come into Spain; but Becker (Vorarbeiten zu einer Geschichte des zweiten Punischen Krieges in Dahlman's Forschungen, vol. ii. pt. ii. p. 113) brings forward several reasons, which make it probable that they did not fall till the spring of B.C. 211. (Liv. lib. xx. —xxv.; Polyb. lib. iii.; Appian, Amil. 5—3, Hisp. 14—16.)

10. Cn. Cornelius Scipio Calvus, son of No. 7, and brother of No. 9, was consul B.C. 222 with M. Claudius Marcellus. In conjunction with his colleague he carried on war against the Insurgents. The details of this war are given under Marcellus. [Vol. II. pp. 227, 228.] (Polyb. ii. 34; Plut. Marcell. 6, 7; and the other authorities quoted in the life of Marcellus.) In B.C. 218 Cneius served as legate of his brother Publius, under whom he carried on war for eight years in Spain, as has been related above.

11. L. Cornelius Scipio, son of No. 7, and brother of the two Scipios who fell in Spain, is only known as the father of No. 27.

12. P. Cornelius Scipio Africanus Major, the son of P. Scipio, who fell in Spain (No. 9), was the greatest man of his age, and perhaps the greatest man of Rome, with the exception of Julius Caesar. He appears to have been born in B.C. 234, since he was twenty-four years of age when he was appointed to the command in Spain in B.C. 210 (Liv. xxvi. 18; Val. Max. iii. 7. § 1; Oros. iv. 18.) Polybius, it is true, says (x. 6) that he was then twenty-seven, which would place his birth in B.C. 237; and his authority would outweigh that of Livy, and the writers who follow him, if he had not stated elsewhere (x. 3) that Scipio was seventeen at the battle of the Ticinus (B.C. 218), which would make him twenty-four when he went to Spain, according to the statement of Livy.

In his early years Scipio acquired, to an extraordinary extent, the confidence and admiration of his countrymen. His enthusiastic mind had led him to believe that he was a special favourite of the gods; and from the time he had put on the toga virilis, he had never engaged in any public or private business without first going to the Capitol, where he sat some time alone, enjoying communication from the gods. For all he proposed or executed he alleged the divine approval; and the Roman people, who had not yet lost all faith in the powers of an unseen world, gave credit to his assertions, and regarded him as a being almost superhuman. (Livy, ii. 5; Plut. Scip. 21; Polyb. i. 19.) Polybius, who did not possess a particle of enthusiasm in his nature, and who was moreover a decided rationalist, denies (x. 2, 5) that Scipio had or believed that he had any communication with gods, and that his pretences to such intercourse were only a wise and politic means for obtaining a mastery over the minds of the vulgar. But such a supposition is quite at variance with all that is recorded of Scipio's character. He was, like Mohammed and Cromwell, a hero, and not an impostor; he believed himself in the divine revelations, which he asserted to have been vouchsafed to him, and the extraordinary success which attended all his enterprises must have deepened this belief, while such a belief, on the other hand, imparted to him a confidence in his own powers which made him irresistible.

P. Scipio is first mentioned in B.C. 218 at the battle of the Ticinus, where he is reported to have saved the life of his father, though he was then only seventeen years of age. He fought at Cannae two years afterward (B.C. 216), when he was already a tribune of the soldiers, and was one of the few Roman officers who survived that fatal day. He was chosen along with Appius Claudius to command the remains of the army, which had taken refuge at Cannasium; and it was owing to his youthful heroism and presence of mind, that the Roman nobles, who had thought of leaving Italy in despair, were prevented from carrying their rash project into effect (Liv. xxi. 53; Val. Max. v. 6. § 7). He had already gained the favour of the people to such an extent, that he was unanimously elected aedile in B.C. 212. On this occasion he gave indications of the proud spirit, and of the disregard of all the forms of the law, which distinguished him throughout life; for when the tribunes objected to the election, because he was not of the legal age, he haughtily replied, "If all the Quirites wish to make me aedile, I am old enough." In the spring of B.C. 211, his father and uncle fell in Spain, and C. Nero was sent out as propraetor to supply their place; but in the following year (B.C. 210), the Romans resolved to increase their army in Spain, and to place it under the command of a proconsul. But when the people assembled to elect a proconsul, none of the generals of experience ventured to sue for so dangerous a command. At length Scipio, who was then barely twenty-four, offered himself as a candidate, to the surprise of the whole people. The confidence he felt in himself he communicated to the people, and he was accordingly chosen with enthusiasm, to take the command. Livy places his election in B.C. 211, but it could not have been earlier than B.C. 210.

Upon his arrival in Spain in the summer of B.C. 210 Scipio found the whole country south of the Iberus in the power of the enemy. The three Carthaginian generals, Hasdrubal son of Barca, Hasdrubal son of Gisco, and Mago, were not, however, on good terms with one another, and were at the time engaged in separate enterprises in distant parts of the peninsula, leaving the Carthaginian province almost without defence. Instead of attacking any one of them in detail, Scipio formed the project of striking a deadly blow at the Carthaginian power by a sudden and unexpected attack upon New Carthage. He gave the command of the fleet to his intimate friend Hasdrubal, to whom alone he entrusted the securé of the expedition, while he himself led the land-forces by inconceivably rapid marches against the town. The project was crowned with complete success; the Carthaginian garrison did not amount to more than a thousand men, and before any succour could arrive the town was taken by assault. The hostages, who had been given by the various Spanish tribes to the Carthaginians, had been placed for security in this town, and these now fell into the hands of Scipio, who treated them with generosity and kindness; and the hostages of those people, who had declared in favour of the Romans, were restored without ransom. Scipio also found in New Carthage magazines of arms, corn, and other necessaries, for the Carthaginians had deposited in this city their principal stores. The inactivity of the Carthaginian generals, meantime, is not explained by any of the ancient authorities. Scipio was allowed to return to Tarraco without molestation, where he remained quietly during the remainder of the year, as his forces were not sufficiently numerous to face the enemy in the field, and he was anxious to strengthen himself by alliances with the Spanish chiefs. In this he was more successful than he could have anticipated. The capture of Carthage, as well as his personal popularity, caused many of the Spanish tribes to desert the Carthaginian cause; and when he took the field in the following year, B.C. 206, Mantineus and Hasdrubal, the most powerful and hostile to the most faithful supporters of Carthage, quitted the camp of Hasdrubal, and awaited the arrival of Scipio. Hasdrubal was encamped in a strong position near the town of Baecula, in the upper valley of the Guadalquivir, where he was engaged in collecting money from the silver mines in the neighbourhood. As he had now fully resolved to march to the assistance of his brother in Italy, he did not wish to risk the lives of his soldiers, and therefore avoided a battle; but Scipio attacked his camp, and gained a brilliant victory over him, taking, it is said, 22,000 prisoners, and killing 8000 of his men. The victory, however, cannot have been so complete as the Roman writers represent, since Hasdrubal was able to take with him his treasures and elephants in safety, and to retire unmolested into northern Spain. Here he collected fresh troops, with which he eventually crossed the Pyrenees, and marched into Italy to the assistance of his brother. Licinius, while the other Carthaginian generals, Hasdrubal, the son of Gisco, and Mago, advanced against Scipio, and prevented him from pursuing their colleague. Scipio therefore remained in southern Spain during the remainder of that year. In the following year, B.C. 205, the praetor Silanus defeated Mago in Celtiberia [Magga, p. 903], whereupon the latter marched into the south of the country and joined Hasdrubal, son of Gisco, in Baetica. Scipio advanced against them; but as the Carthaginian generals would not risk a battle, and distributed their army in the fortified towns, he was unable to accomplish anything of importance, and was obliged to content himself with the capture of the town of Oringias, which was taken by his brother Lucius. Next year, B.C. 207, Scipio gained possession of nearly the whole of Spain, by a decisive victory near a place variously called Silipia, Elinga, or Carmo, but the present of what was called later the province of Gades. Hasdrubal, son of Gisco, and Mago took refuge within the walls of Gades, which was almost the only place that still belonged to the Carthaginians; and all the native chiefs now hastened to acknowledge the supremacy of Rome. But the victories of Scipio had only a small share in winning Spain. His personal influence had won far more people than his arms had conquered; he had gained such an ascendancy over the Spaniards by his humanity and courage, his courtesy and energy, that they were ready to lay down their lives for him, and wished to make him their king.

The invasion of Spain was regarded by Scipio as only a means to an end. He seems for some time past to have formed in his own mind the project of transferring the war to Africa, and thus compelling the Carthaginians to recall Hannibal from Italy. He therefore resolved, before returning to Rome, to cross over into Africa, and secure, if possible, the friendship and co-operation of some of the native princes. His personal influence had already secured the attachment of Masinissa, who was serving in the Carthaginian army in Spain, but whose defection from his ancient allies was for the present to remain a secret; and he trusted that the same personal ascendancy might gain the still more powerful support of Syphax, the king of the Massaesylian tribe of Numidians. With only two quinqueremes he ventured to leave his province, and repair to the court of Syphax. There he met his old adversary, Hasdrubal, son of Gisco, who had crossed over from Gades for the same purpose; and the two generals spent several days together in friendly intercourse. Laelius, who accompanied his friend, related to Polybius that Scipio made a great impression upon Syphax, and that the latter even concluded a treaty of alliance with the Roman proconsul; but the truth seems to be that the Carthaginian general was more successful than the Roman; a success, however, which was in great part owing to the charms of his daughter Sophonisba, whom he gave in marriage to the Numidian king. Scipio did not remain long in Africa, and on his return to Spain was surprised to find that a formidable insurrection against the Roman power had broken out among many of the Spanish people. The causes are not mentioned; but it is probable that as soon as Scipio's personal influence had been withdrawn, Mago, who was still at Gades, had not found it difficult to instigate the revolt. The insurrection, however, was soon put down, and the terrible vengeance was inflicted upon the town of Illirii, which had taken the Carthaginian cause in the revolt. Scarcely had this danger passed away, when Scipio was seized with a dangerous illness. Eight thousand of the Roman soldiers, discontented at not having received their usual pay, and at being prevented from plundering the people, availed themselves of this opportunity to break out into open mutiny; but Scipio recovered in time to put it down; and in this difficult and delicate transaction, which is related at length by Livy, he showed his usual prudence and presence of mind. He now crushed the last remains of the insurrection in Spain; and to crown his other successes, Gades at last deserted the Carthaginians, and went over to the Romans. Mago had quitted Spain and crossed over into Liguria to effect a diversion in favour of his brother Hannibal, and there was therefore now no longer any enemy left in Spain. Scipio and Mago surrendered the Roman army, in B.C. 206, to the proconsul Publius Licinius Crassus, and Manlius Acidinus, who had been appointed as his successors, and returned to Rome in the same year. Scipio now became a candidate for the consulship, and was elected for the following year (B.C. 205) by the unanimous votes of all the centuries, although he had not yet filled the office of praetor, and was only thirty years of age. His colleague was P. Licinius Crassus, who was bontifer maximus, and could not, therefore, leave Italy. Consequently if the war was to be carried on abroad, the conduct of it must of necessity de-volve upon Scipio. The latter was anxious to cross over at once to Africa, and bring the contest to an end at the gates of Carthage; but the oldest members of the senate, and among them Q. Fabius Maximus, opposed his project, partly through ti-midity and partly through jealousy of the youthful conqueror. All that Scipio could obtain was the province of Sicily, with permission to cross over to Africa, if he should think it for the advantage of the republic; but the senate resolutely refused him an army, thus making the permission reluctantly granted of no practical use. But the allies had a truer view of the interests of Italy than the Roman senate: what the latter, blinded by their fears and their jealousy, refused, the Italian allies generously granted; and from all the towns of Italy volunteers flocked to join the standard of the youthful hero, and to enable him to subdue Carthage without the aid of the Roman government. The senate could not refuse to allow him to enlist volunteers; and such was the enthusiasm in his favour, that he was able to cross over to Sicily with an army and a fleet contrary to the expectations and even the wishes of the senate. While busy with his preparations in Sicily he sent over Laelius to Africa with a small fleet to concert a plan of co-operation with Masinissa, and to convince his opponents that the invasion of Africa was not such a mad and impracticable project as they supposed. But meanwhile his enemies at Rome had nearly succeeded in depriving him of his command. Although he had no command in Lower Italy, he had assisted in the reduction of Locri, and after the conquest of the town he left his legate, Q. Pleminius, in command of the place. The latter had been guilty of such acts of excesses against the inhabitants, that they sent an embassy to the Roman senate to complain of his conduct. In the course of the investigation it was alleged that Scipio had allowed Pleminius to continue in the command after he had been fully informed of the misconduct of his lieutenant; and thereupon Q. Fabius Maximus and his other enemies eagerly availed themselves of the opportunity to inveigh in general against the conduct of Scipio, and to press for his immediate recall. Scipio's magnificent style of living, and his love for Greek literature and art, were denounced as dangerous innovations upon old Roman manners and frugality; and they asserted that the time which ought to be given to the exer-cise and the training of his troops was wasted in the Greek gymnasia or in literary pursuits. Though the senate lent a willing ear to these attacks, they did not venture upon his immediate recall, but sent a commission into Sicily to inquire into the state of the army; and if the charges against him were well founded, to order him to return to Rome. The commissioners arrived in Sicily at the beginning of B.C. 204. During the winter Scipio had been busy in completing his prepara-tions; and by this time he had collected all his stores, and brought his army and navy into the most efficient state. The commissioners were aston-ished at what they saw. Instead of ordering him to return to Rome, they bade him cross over to Africa at once.

Accordingly in B.C. 204, Scipio, who was now proconsul, sailed from Lilybaeum and landed in Africa, not far from Utica. The force which he brought with him is stated so differently that it is impossible to determine what its numbers were, some accounts making it as low as 12,200, others as high as 35,000 men. As soon as Scipio landed he was joined by Masinissa, who rendered him the most important services in the war. With his assistance he obtained some advantages over the enemy [see Hanno, No. 23], but was unable to obtain possession of Utica, where he was anxious to establish his quarters for the winter. He was therefore obliged to pass the winter on a projecting headland, which he fortified. Meanwhile the Car-thaginians had collected a powerful army which they placed under the command of Hasdrubal, son of Gisco, Scipio's old opponent in Spain, and Syphax came to their assistance with a great force. Towards the close of the winter, in the early part of a c. 203, Hasdrubal and Syphax meditated a general attack upon the land and sea forces of Scipio; but the latter, who was informed of their plan by some Numidians, anticipated them by an attack upon their two encampments in the night. With the assistance of Masinissa, his enterprise was crowned with success; the two camps were burnt to the ground, and only a few of the enemy escaped the fire and the sword. Among these, how-ever, were both Hasdrubal and Syphax; the former fled to Carthage, where he persuaded the senate to raise another army, and the latter retreated to his native dominions, where he likewise collected fresh troops. But their united forces were again de-feated by Scipio. Hasdrubal did not venture to make his appearance again in Carthage; and Syphax once more fled into Numidia. She ruined-however, did not give the Numidian prince any repose; he was pursued by Laelius and Masinissa, and finally taken prisoner. Among the captives who fell into their hands was Sophonisba, the wife of Syphax, whom Masinissa had long loved, and had expected to marry when she was given to his rival. He now hastened to marry her; but the well-known story of the tragic termination of these nuptials is related elsewhere. [Sophonisba.]

These repeated disasters so alarmed the Carthagi-nians that they resolved to recall Hannibal and Mago from Italy. At the same time they opened negotiations with Scipio for a peace. The terms which Scipio offered were not objected to by the Carthaginians, and a suspension of arms for forty-five days was agreed to, while a Carthaginian em-bassy went to Rome. It would appear, however, that the great mass of the Carthaginian people were not in reality anxious for peace, and only wanted to gain time till Hannibal's arrival in Africa. Be-fore the time had expired, a Carthaginian mob plundered some ships which were bringing pro-visions for Scipio's army, and then insulted the ambassadors whom he had sent to demand restitution. As soon as Hannibal arrived, hostilities were re-commenced against the Romans. The Carthaginian army was numerically superior to the Romans, but inferior in discipline and skill. Still the presence of Hannibal gave the nation confidence, and they looked forward to a favourable termination of the war. Hannibal, however, formed a truer estimate of the real state of affairs; he saw that it was not possible to carry his army to Carthage, and was therefore anxious to conclude a peace before it was too late. Scipio, who was anxious to have the glory of bringing the war to a close, and who feared lest his enemies in the senate might appoint him a successor, was equally desirous of a peace. The terms, however, which the Roman general proposed seemed intolerable to the Carthaginians; and as Hannibal at a personal interview with Scipio could not obtain any abatement of the hard conditions, he was forced, against his will, to continue the war. Into the details of the campaign, which are related very differently, our limits will not permit us to enter. The decisive battle was at length fought on the 19th of October, B. c. 202, at a place called Narnia, near the Bagradas, not far from the city of Zama. Scipio's victory was complete; the greater part of the Carthaginian army was cut to pieces; and Hannibal, upon his arrival at Carthage, was the first to admit the magnitude of the disaster, and to point out the impossibility of a further prosecution of the war. The terms, however, now imposed by Scipio were much severer than before. Carthage had no alternative but submission; but the negotiations were continued for some time, and the final treaty was not concluded till the following year, B. c. 201.

Scipio returned to Italy in B. c. 201, and entered Rome in triumph. He was received with universal enthusiasm; the surname of Africanus was conferred upon him, and the people in their gratitude were anxious to bestow upon him the most extraordinary marks of honour. It is related that they wished to make him consul and dictator for life, and to erect his statue in the comitia, the rostra, the curia, and even in the Capitol; but that he prudently declined all these invinciblusions (Liv. xxxvii. 56; Val. Max. iv. 1. § 6). As he did not choose to usurp the supreme power, which it seems he might have done with ease, and as he was an object of suspicion and dislike to the majority of the senate, he took no prominent part in public affairs during the next few years. He was censor in B. c. 199 with P. Aelius Paetus, and consul a second time in 194 with Ti. Sempronius Longus. At the same time the censors conferred upon him the title of princeps senatus, a distinction which he had received from the former censors, and which was again bestowed upon him in B. c. 190. In B. c. 193, he was one of the three commissioners who were sent to Africa to mediate between Masinissa and the Carthaginians; and in the same year, according to a story related by Q. Claudius Quadrigarius, he was on one of the ambassadors sent to Antiochus at Ephesus, at whose court Hannibal was then residing. The tale runs that he there had an interview with the great Carthaginian, who declared him the greatest general that ever lived. The compliment was paid in a manner the most flattering to Scipio. The latter had asked, "Who was the greatest general?" "Alexander the Great," was Hannibal's reply. "Who was the second?" "Pyrhus." "Who the third?" "Myself," replied the Carthaginian. "What would you have said, then, if you had conquered me?" asked Scipio, in astonishment. "I should then have placed myself before Alexander, before Pyrrhus, and before all others." (Liv. xxv. 14.) Whether the story be true or not, there can be no doubt that Scipio towered above all the Romans as a general, and was only second to Hannibal himself. Each of these great men possessing true nobility of soul, could appreciate the other's merits; and Scipio was the only member of the senate who opposed the unworthy persecution which the Romans chose to employ against their once formidable opponent. (Liv. xxxiii. 47.)

In B. c. 190 L. Scipio, the brother of Africanus, and C. Laelius were consuls. Each of the consuls was anxious to obtain from the senate the province of Greece, in order to have the honour of carrying on the war against Antiochus. In order to secure it for his brother Lucius, Africanus offered to serve under him as legatus; and the senate thereupon granted Lucius the province which he desired. In the meantime, the expedition of Africanus, who accompanied his father, fell into the hands of the Syrian king. The latter offered to restore his captive without ransom, if Africanus would obtain for him a favourable peace; but although the father rejected his proposal, Antiochus sent him back his son while he was absent from the army in consequence of illness. Africanus out of gratitude advised Antiochus not to fight till he himself had rejoined the army. The object which he had in giving this advice it is impossible to say; it is quite inconceivable that Scipio mediated any treachery towards his own country; it is more probable that he hoped to induce Antiochus to consent to a peace before a defeat should expose him to harder and more humiliating terms. Antiochus, however, did not listen to his advice; and the decisive battle was shortly afterwards fought near Mount Syphlus, in which the Syrian king was totally defeated. Antiochus now applied again to Africanus, who used his influence in the king's favour with his brother Lucius and his council of war. The terms of peace were severe, but they did not appear sufficiently severe to the Roman senate, who imposed much harder conditions upon the conquered monarch in the treaty which was finally made.

Africanus returned to Rome with his brother Lucius after the completion of the war in B. c. 189, but his remaining years were embittered by the attacks of his old enemies. Shortly after his return, he and his brother Lucius were accused of having received bribes from Antiochus to let the monarch off too leniently, and of having appropriated to their own use part of the money which had been paid by Antiochus to the Roman state. The glory of his African victory had already grown dim; and his enemies availed themselves of the opportunity to crush their proud antagonist. The accusation was set on foot by M. Porcius Cato, but the details of it are related with such discrepancies by the ancient authorities, that it is impossible to determine with certainty the true history of the affair, or the year in which it occurred. It appears, however, that there were two distinct prosecutions, and the following is perhaps the most probable history of the transaction. In B. c. 187, two tribunes of the people of the name of Petillii, instigated by Cato and the other enemies of the Scipios, required L. Scipio to render an account of all the sums of money which he had received from Antiochus. L. Scipio accordingly prepared his accounts, but as he was in the act of delivering them up, the proud conqueror of Hannibal indignantly snatched them out of his hands, and tore them up in pieces before the senate. But this haughty conduct appears to have produced an unfavourable impression, and his brother, when brought to trial in the course of the same year, was declared guilty, and sentenced to pay a heavy fine.
The tribune C. Minucius Augurinus ordered him to be dragged to prison and there detained till the money was paid; whereupon Africanus, still more enraged at this fresh insult to his family, and setting himself above the laws, rescued his brother from the hands of the tribune’s officer. The contest would probably have been attended with fatal results had not Tib. Gracchus, the father of the celebrated tribune, and then tribune himself, had the prudence, although he disapproved of the violent conduct of Africanus, to release his brother Lucius from the sentence of imprisonment. The property, however, of Lucius was confiscated; and, as it was not sufficient to pay the fine, his clients and friends generously contributed not only a sufficient amount to supply the deficiency, but so large a sum that he would have been richer even than before; but he would only receive sufficient to defray his most pressing wants. The successful issue of the prosecution of Lucius, emboldened his enemies to bring the great Africanus himself before the people. His accuser was M. Naevius, the tribune of the people, and if the date of his tribunate is correctly stated by Livy (xxxix. 52) the accusation was not brought till the end of B.C. 185. When the trial came on, Scipio did not condescend to say a single word in refutation of the charges that had been brought against him, but descanted long and eloquently upon the signal services he had rendered to the commonwealth. Having spoken till night-fall, the trial was adjourned till the following day. Early next morning, when the tribunes had taken their seats on the rostra, and Africanus was summoned, he proudly reminded the people that this was the anniversary of the day on which he had defeated Hannibal at Zama, and called upon them to neglect all disputes and law-suits, and follow him to the Capitol, and there return thanks to the immortal gods, and pray that they would grant the Roman state other citizens like himself. Scipio struck a chord which vibrated on every heart; their veneration of the hero returned again; and he was followed with such crowds to the Capitol, that the tribunes were left alone in the rostra. Having thus set all the laws at defiance, Scipio immediately quitted Rome, and retired to his country seat at Liternum. The tribunes wished to renew the prosecution, but Gracchus wisely persuaded them to let it drop. (Liv. xxxviii. 50—60; Gell. iv. 18, vii. 19; Val. Max. iii. 7, § 1; Meyer, Orat. Roman. Fragn. pp. 6—8, 2d ed.) Scipio never returned to Rome. He would neither submit to the laws nor aspire to the sovereignty of the state; and he therefore resolved to expatriate himself for ever. He passed his remaining days in the cultivation of his estate at Liternum (Senec. Ep. 86); and at his death is said to have requested that his body might be buried there, and not in his ungrateful country. His request was complied with, and his tomb existed at Liternum in the time of Livy. This appears to have been the more general account; but others related that he died at Rome, and was buried in the family sepulchre, outside of the porta Capena, where a statue of him was erected alongside of the statues of his brother Lucius and the poet Ennius (Livy, xxxvii. 56). The year of his death is equally uncertain. Polybius and Rutilius related that he died in the same year as Hannibal and Philopoemen, that is, in B.C. 183. Livy and Cicero placed his death in B.C. 185, and Valerius of Antium as early as B.C. 187 (Livy. xxxix. 52; Cic. Cat. maj. 6). The date of Polybius is most probably the correct one.

Scipio married Aemilia, the daughter of L. Aemilius Paulus, who fell at the battle of Cannae [Aemilia, No. 2], and by her he had four children, two sons [Nos. 14 and 15], and two daughters, the elder of whom married P. Scipio Nasica Corvinus [No. 23], and the younger Tib. Gracchus, and thus became the mother of the two celebrated tribunes [Cornellia, Nos. 4, 5]. (It is unnecessary to cite the numerous passages in Polybius and Livy relating to Scipio; those in Cicero in which he is mentioned are given by Orelli, in his Onomast. Tull. vol. ii. p. 186; there are some interesting remarks on his character and the state of parties in Rome at his time, by Gerlach, in his treatise entitled P. Cornelius Scipio et M. Porcius Cato, in the Schweizer. Museum for 1837.)

13. L. Cornelius Scipio Asiaticus, also called Asiae nepes or Asiae nepos, was the son of No. 9, and the brother of the great Africanus [No. 12]. He served under his brother in Spain, where he took the town of Oritigis in B.C. 208; and on the completion of the war was sent by his brother to Rome, with the joyful news. He was praetor in B.C. 193, when he obtained the province of Sicily, and consul in B.C. 190, with C. Laelius. The senate had not much confidence in his abilities (Cic. Phil. xi. 7), and it was only through the offer of his brother Africanus to accompany him as a legate that he obtained the province of Greece and the conduct of the war against Antiochus (Liv. xxviii. 3, 4, 17, xxxiv. 54, 55, xxxv. 45, xxxvii. 1). He defeated Antiochus at Mount Sipylus, in B.C. 190, entered Rome in triumph in the following year, and assumed the surname of Asiaticus. The history of his accusation and condemnation, and of the confiscation of his property, has been already related in the life of his brother. But notwithstanding the poverty to which he is said to have been reduced (Liv. xxxviii. 60), he celebrated with great splendour, in B.C. 185, the games which he had vowed in his war with Antiochus. Valerius of Antium related that he obtained the necessary money during an embassy on which he was sent after his condemnation, to settle the disputes between the kings Antiochus and Eumenes. He was a candidate for the censorship in B.C. 184, but was defeated by the old enemy of his family, M. Porcius Cato, who gave another proof of his hatred to the family by depriving Asiaticus of his horse at the review of the equestrians (Liv. xxxix. 22, 40, 44). It appears, therefore, that even as late as this time an eques did not forfeit his horse by becoming a senator.

The name of Scipio Asiaticus occurs on coins, and he is the only one of the family of whom coins are extant. On the obverse is a head crowned with laurel, and on the reverse Jupiter
SCIPIO.

14. P. Cornelius Scipio Africanus, the elder son of the great Africanus [No. 13], was prevented by his weak health from taking any part in public affairs. Cicero praises his oratorical gifts and his Greek history, and remarks that, with the greatness of his father's mind he possessed a larger amount of learning. He had no son of his own, but adopted the son of L. Aemilius Paulus [see below, No. 21]. (Cic. Brut. 19, Cat. Maj. 11, de Off. i. 33; Vell. Pat. i. 10). He was elected augur in B.C. 180 (Liv. xii. 45), and was also Flamen Dialis, as we see from the inscription on his tomb. This inscription runs as follows:—"Quæ apicem, insigne Diliae flaminis, gessiæte, mors perfect æt, ut essent omnia brevia, honos fama virtutesque, gloria atque ingenium. Quibus se in longa licuisset tibe uter vita, facile superas(æ) gloriæ majorem. Quæe labes te in gremi(m), Scipio, recipit terræ, Publí, prognatum Pubbio, Corneli." (Orelli, Inscript. No. 538).

15. L. or CN. Cornelius Scipio Africanus, the younger son of the great Africanus [No. 12]. He accompanied his father into Asia in B.C. 190, and was taken prisoner by Antiochus, as has already been related in the life of his father. Appian, in relating this circumstance (Syr. 29), confounds him with the celebrated Africanus minor. This Scipio was a degenerate son of so illustrious a sire, and only obtained the praetorship, in B.C. 174, through Cicero, who had been a scribe of his father's. He did not long prosper. In the same year he was expelled from the senate by the censors. (Liv. xii. 27; Val. Max. iii. 5 § 1, iv. 5. § 3.)

16. Cornelia, the elder daughter of the great Africanus [No. 12], married P. Scipio Nasica Corculum, No. 23. [Cornelia, No. 4.]

17. Cornelia, the younger daughter of the great Africanus [No. 12], married Tib. Sempronius Graccus, and became by him the mother of the two celebrated tribunes. [Cornelia, No. 5.]

18. L. Cornelius Scipio Asiaticus, the son of the conqueror of Antiochus [No. 13]. The following is the inscription on his tomb:—"L. Cornelii F. P. N. Scipio quæst. tr. mil. annos gratus XXXI11 mortuos. Pater regem Antioch(m) subjegit" (Orelli, Inser. No. 556). As he is here called quæstor, he is probably the same as the L. Cornelius Scipio, the quæstor, who was sent to meet Prusias and conduct him to Rome, when this monarch visited Italy in B.C. 167 (Liv. xiv. 44).

19. L. Cornelius Scipio Asiaticus, is only known from the Fasti Capitolini, as the son of No. 18, and father of No. 20.

20. L. Cornelius Scipio Asiaticus, is first mentioned in B.C. 100, when he took up arms with the other members of the senate against Saturninus (Cic. pro Rabir. Perd. 7). In the Social War he was stationed with L. Acilius in the town of Aesernia, from which they escaped on the approach of Vettius Scato in the dress of slaves (Appian, B. C. i. 41). He belonged to the Marian party in the civil wars, and was appointed consul in B.C. 83 with C. Norbanus. In this year Sulla returned to Italy, and advanced against the consuls. He defeated Norbanus in Italy, but seduced the troops of Scipio to desert their general, who was taken prisoner in his camp along with his son Lucius, but was dismissed by Sulla unjured. He was, however, included in the proscription in the following year, B.C. 82, whereupon he fled to Massilia, and passed there the remainder of his life. His daughter was married to P. Sestius (Appian, B. C. i. 85, 86; Plut. Sull. 28, Sertor. 6; Liv. Epit. 83; Flor. iii. 21; Oros. v. 21; Cic. Phil. xii. 11, xiii. 1; Cic. pro Sest. 3; Schol. Boh. in Sest. p. 293, ed. Orelli). Cicero speaks favourably of the oratorical powers of this Scipio (diebæ imperio, Cic. Brut. 47).

21. P. Cornelius Scipio Aemilianus Africanus Minor, was the younger son of L. Aemilius Paulus [see below, No. 14], and was adopted by P. Scipio, the son of the conqueror of Hannibal [No. 14], whose mother was a sister of L. Aemilius Paulus. He was born about B.C. 185. In his seventeenth year he accompanied his father Paulus to Greece, and fought under him at the battle of Pydna, in B.C. 168 (Liv. xiv. 44; Plut. Aemil. Paul. 22). While in Greece he probably became acquainted with the historian Polybius; and when the latter was sent to Rome, along with the other Achaean exiles, in the following year, B.C. 167, Scipio afforded him the patronage and protection of his powerful family, and formed with him that close and intimate friendship which continued unbroken throughout his life. Scipio appears from his earliest years to have devoted himself with ardour to the study of literature; and he eagerly availed himself of the superior knowledge of Polybius to direct him in his literary pursuits. He was accompanied by the Greek Polybius, and also by a Greek symologist, who, in the midst of his most active military duties, lost no opportunity of enlarging his knowledge of Greek literature and philosophy, by constant intercourse with his friend. At a later period he also cultivated the acquaintance of the philosophers Panaetius; nor did he neglect the literature of his own country, for the poets Lucilius and Terence were, as is well known, admitted to his intimacy. His friendship with Lucilius, whose tastes and pursuits were so congenial to his own, was as remarkable as that of the elder Africanus with the elder Lucilius, and has been immortalised by Cicero's celebrated treatise entitled "Laelius sive de Amicitia." In his younger years it was feared by Scipio's friends that he would not uphold the honour of his house, an apprehension probably only founded on his literary habits and pursuits; but in him the love of Greek refinement and Greek literature did not enervate his mind, or incapacitate him for taking a distinguished part in public affairs. On the contrary he is said to have cultivated the virtues which distinguished the elder Romans, and to have made Cato the model of his conduct. If we may believe his panegyrists, Polybius and Cicero, he possessed all the simple virtues of an old Roman, mellowed by the refining influences of Greek civilization.

Scipio first attracted public notice in B.C. 151. The repeated disasters which the Roman arms had sustained in Spain had inspired such dread of that war, that when the consuls attempted to levy troops in B.C. 151, no one was willing to enlist as a soldier, or to take the offices of tribune or legate. Scipio inspired confidence by coming forward, and offering to serve in Spain in any capacity in which the consuls might choose to employ him. He was appointed military tribune, and accompanied the consul L.Lucullus to Spain. Here he distinguished himself by his personal courage. On one occasion he slew, in single combat, a gigantic Spanish chieftain; and at another time he was the first to mount the walls at the storming of the city of Interia. Such daring deeds gained for him the admiration of the barbarians, while his integrity and other virtues conciliated their regard and esteem. He quite threw into the shade his avaricious and cruel commander, and revived among the Spanish the recollection of his grandfather, the elder Africanus. In the following year, B.C. 150, he was sent by Lucullus to Africa to obtain from Masinissa a supply of elephants. His name secured him a most honourable reception from the aged Numidian monarch. He arrived in the midst of the war between Masinissa and the Carthaginians, and was requested by the latter to act as mediator between them; but he was unable to accomplish any thing, and returned to Spain with the elephants.

On the breaking out of the third Punic war in B.C. 149, Scipio again went to Africa, but still only with the rank of military tribune. Here Scipio gained still more renown. By his personal bravery and military skill he repaired, to a great extent, the mistakes, and made up for the incapacity of the consul Manilius, whose army on one occasion he saved from destruction. His abilities gained him the complete confidence of Masinissa and the Roman troops, while his integrity and fidelity to his word were so highly prized by the enemy, that to his promise only would they trust. Accordingly, the commissioners, who had been sent by the senate to inspect the state of affairs in the Roman camp, made the most favourable report of his abilities and conduct. When L. Calpurnius Piso took the command of the army in the following year, B.C. 148, Scipio left Africa, and returned to Rome, accompanied by the wishes of the soldiers that he would soon return to be their commander. Many of them wrote to their friends at Rome, saying that Scipio alone could conquer Carthage, and the opinion became general at Rome that the conduct of the war ought to be entrusted to him. Even the aged Cato, who was always more ready to blame than to praise, praised Scipio in the Homeric words (Od. x. 495), "He alone has wisdom, the rest are empty shadows." (Plut. Cat. Maj. 27.) The prepossession in favour of Scipio was still further increased by the want of success which attended the operations of Piso: and, accordingly, when he became a candidate for the aedileship for B.C. 147 he was elected consul, although he was only thirty-seven, and had not therefore attained the legal age. The senate, of course, assigned to him Africa as his province, to which he forthwith sailed, accompanied by his friends Polybius and Laelius. The details of the war, which ended in the capture of Carthage, are given by Appian (Pun. 135—131), and would take up too much space to be repeated here. The Carthaginians defended themselves with the courage of despair. They were able to maintain possession of their city till the spring of the following year, B.C. 146, when the Roman legions at length forced their way into the devoted town. The inhabitants fought from street to street, and from house to house, and the work of destruction and butchery went on for days. The fate of this once magnificent city moved Scipio to tears, and anticipating that a similar catastrophe might one day befall Rome, he is said to have repeated the lines of the Iliad (vi. 448) over the flames of Carthage.

After completing the arrangements for reducing Africa to the form of a Roman province, he returned to Rome in the same year, and celebrated a splendid triumph on account of his victory. The surname of Africanus, which he had inherited by adoption from the conqueror of Hannibal, had been now acquired by him by his own exploits.

In B.C. 142 Scipio was censor with L. Mummius. Scipio, in the administration of the duties of his office, followed in the footsteps of Cato, and attempted by severity to repress the growing luxury and immorality of his contemporaries. He exhorted the people to uphold and maintain the customs of their ancestors in a specie which was preserved in later times. His efforts, however, to preserve the old Roman habits were thwarted by his colleague Mummius, who had himself acquired a love for Greek and Asiatic luxuries, and was disposed to be more indulgent to the people (Gell. iv. 20, v. 19; Val. Max. vi. 4. § 2). In the solemn prayer offered at the conclusion of the lustrum, Scipio changed the supplication for the extension of the commonwealth into one for the preservation of its actual possessions (Val. Max. iv. 1. § 10*). He vainly wished to check the appetite for foreign conquests, which had been still further excited by the capture of Carthage.

In B.C. 139 Scipio was brought to trial before the people by T. Claudius Asellus, the tribune of the plebs. He seems to have been accused of majestas; but Asellus attacked him out of private animosity, because he had been deprived of his horse, and reduced to the condition of an acarian by Scipio in his censorship. Scipio was acquitted, and the speeches which he delivered on the occasion obtained great celebrity, and were held in high esteem in a later age (Gell. ii. 20, iii. 4, vii. 11; Cic. de Orat. ii. 64, 66; for further particulars see Vol. i. p. 385 a). It appears to have been after this event that Scipio was sent on an embassy to Egypt and Asia to attend to the Roman interests in those countries (Cic. de Rep. vi. 11). To show his contempt of the pomp and luxury in which his contemporaries indulged, he took with him only five slaves on this mission.

The long continuance of the war in Spain, and the repeated disasters which the Roman arms experienced in that country, again called Scipio to the consulsiphip. He was appointed consul in his absence, along with C. Fulvius Flaccus, and had the province of Spain assigned to him, B.C. 134. His first efforts were directed to the restoration of discipline in the army, which had become almost disorganised by sensual indulgences. After bringing the troops into an efficient condition by his

* Valerius Maximus, however, appears to be mistaken in stating that Scipio held the lustrum, since Cicero says (de Orat. ii. 69), that it was held by his colleague Mummius.
severe and energetic measures, he laid siege to Numantia, which was defended by its inhabitants with the same courage and perseverance which has pre-eminently distinguished the Spaniards in all ages in defence of their walled towns. It was not till they had suffered the most dreadful extremities of famine that they surrendered the place in the following year, B. c. 133. Fifty of the principal inhabitants were selected to adorn Scipio's triumph, the rest were sold as slaves, and the town was levelled to the ground. He now received the surname of Numantius in addition to that of Africamus. While Scipio was employed in the reduction of Numantia, Rome was convulsed by the disturbances consequent upon the measures proposed by Tib. Gracchus in his tribunate, and which ended in the murder of the latter. Although Scipio was married to Sempronia, the sister of the fallen tribune, he had no sympathy with his reforms, and no sorrow for his fate; and upon receiving intelligence of his death at Numantia, he is said to have exclaimed in the verse of Homer. (Od. i. 47): —

"So perish all who do the like again."

Upon his return to Rome in B. c. 132, he did not disapprove his sentiments, and when asked in the assembly of the tribes by C. Papirius Carbo, the tribune, who entered upon his office at the end of this year, what he thought of the death of Tib. Gracchus, he boldly replied that he was justly slain (jure caesum). The people, who had probably expected a different answer from their favourite general and from the brother-in-law of their martyred defender, loudly expressed their disapprobation; whereupon Scipio, with true aristocratic contempt for the mob, exclaimed "Taceant quibus Italia noverca est." (Val. Max. vi. 2; Aurel. Vict. de Vir. Ill. 58; Plut. Tib. Gracch. 21; Cic. loc. cit. 25.) The people did not forget this insult, and from this time Scipio lost much of his influence over them. Still there was a prestige attaching to his name which the people could not divest themselves of, and it was mainly owing to his influence and authority that the aristocratic party were able to defeat the bill of the tribune Carbo, by which the same persons were to be allowed to be elected tribunes as often as the people pleased (Liv. Epit. 59; Cic. loc. cit. 25). Scipio was now regarded as the acknowledged leader of the aristocracy, and the latter resolved to avail themselves of his powerful aid to prevent the agrarian law of Tib. Gracchus from being carried into effect. The social classes were becoming rapidly alarmed at the prospect of losing some of their lands, and Scipio skillfully availed himself of the circumstance to propose in the senate, in B. c. 129, that all disputes respecting the lands of the allies should be taken out of the hands of the commissioners, who were appointed under the agrarian law of Tib. Gracchus, and that the decision respecting them should be committed to other persons. This would have been, in effect, equivalent to an abrogation of the law; and accordingly Fulvius Flaccus, Papirius Carbo and C. Gracchus, the three commissioners, offered the most vehement opposition to his proposal. In the forum he was accused by Carbo with the bitterest invectives as the enemy of the people, and upon his again expressing his approval of the death of Tib. Gracchus, the people shouted out "Down with the tyrant." In the evening he went home accompanied by the senate and a great number of the allies, and then retired quietly to his sleeping-room with the intention of composing a speech for the following day. In the following morning Rome was thrown into consternation by the news that Scipio was found dead in his room. The most contradictory rumours were circulated respecting his death, but it was the general opinion that he was murdered. Some thought that he died a natural death, and others that he put an end to his own life, despairing of being able to carry his proposal through the assembly on the following day; but the fact, which is admitted by all writers, that there was no inquiry into the cause of his death, corroborates the popular opinion that he was murdered. Suspicion fell upon various persons; his wife Sempronia and her mother Cornelia were suspected by some; Carbo, Fulvius, and C. Gracchus by others (Appian, B. C. i. 19, 20; Vell. Pat. ii. 4; Plut. C. Gracc. 10; Schol. Boc. in Mil. p. 283, ed. Orelli). Of all these Papirius Carbo was most generally believed to have been guilty, and is expressly mentioned as the murderer by Cicero. (Cic. de Or. ii. 40, ad Fam. ix. 21, § 3, ad Q. Fr. ii. 3, § 3.)

The character of Scipio is thus described by Niebuhr:—"Scipio is one of those characters who have a great reputation in history, which, however, in my opinion, is not altogether well deserved. He was, it is true, a very eminent general, and a great man; he did many a just and praiseworthy thing; but he made a show of his great qualities, and Polybius, his friend and instructor, who in other respects loves him very much, shows in his narrative quite clearly that the virtues of Scipio were ostentatious. Things which every other good and honest man does quietly, Scipio boasts of, because they are not common among his own countrymen. What distinguishes him is an unflinching political character: he belonged to those who wished by all means to maintain the state of things as it actually was. Everything which existed had in his eyes an indisputable right to exist, and he never asked whether it was right or wrong in its origin, or how detrimental its injustice was to the republic itself." (Lectures on Roman History, vol. i. p. 293, ed. Schmitz.) Some deductions, however, should be made from this estimate of his political character. It is true that after his return from Numantia, he opposed with the utmost energy the measures of the popular party; but previous to that time he had recognized the necessity of some concessions in the popular feeling, and had incurred the serious displeasure of his own party by supporting in B. c. 139 the Lex Tabellaria of the tribune L. Cassius Longinus (Cic. Brut. 25, de Leg. iii. 16). Some even went so far as to class him among the men of the people (Cic. Acad. ii. 5). With respect to the literary attainments of Scipio, there was but one opinion in antiquity. He was better acquainted with Greek literature and philosophy than any of his contemporaries, unless it were his friend Laelius. He spoke his own language with purity and elegance (omnium aetatis suae purissime locutum, Gell. ii. 20), of which we have a striking confirmation in the report, whether true or false, of his having assisted Terence in the composition of his comedies. He was one of the most distinguished orators of his day (Cic. Brut. 21, de
SCIPIO.

Orat. i. 49; Vell. Pat. ii. 9; Quintil. xii. 10, § 10; and his speeches were admired, as we have seen above, down to a late period. The few fragments of them, which have been preserved by A. Gellius and others, are given by Meyer (Orat. Roman. Fragm., pp. 176—193, 2d ed.). The general opinion entertained by the Romans of a subsequent age respecting Scipio is given in the most pleasant colours by Cicero in his work on the Republic, in which Scipio is introduced as the principal speaker. (The life and character of Scipio are delineated with ability by Nitzsch, in his treatise Polypius, Kiel, 1842, and also in his work Die Graechen und ihre nächsten Vorganger, Berlin, 1847; on the death of Scipio, see Scheu, De Morte Africani minoris ejusque auctoribus, in Beier's edition of Cicero's Laelius, Leipzig, 1828; Gerlach, Der Tod des P. Cornelius Scipio Aemilianus, in his Historische Studien, p. 254, &c., Hamburg, 1841; Zimmermann, Zeitchrift fur die Alterthumswissenschaft, 1841, No. 52.)

22. P. CORNELIUS SCIPIO NASICA, that is, "Scipio with the pointed nose," was the son of Cn. Scipio Calvis, who fell in Spain in B. C. 211. [No. 10.] He is first mentioned by Livy in B. C. 204 as a young man who was not yet of sufficient age to obtain the quaevaria, but was nevertheless judged by the senate to be the best citizen in the city; and was therefore elected quaestor of Rome with the Roman matrons to receive the statue of the Idaean Mother, which had been brought from Pessinus. In B. C. 200 he was one of the triumvirs, for the purpose of settling new colonists at Venusia; he was curule aedile in B. C. 196, praetor in 194, and in this year as well as in the following fought with great success in Further Spain, which was assigned to him as his province. But, notwithstanding these victories, and the powerful support of his cousin, the great Africanus, he was an unsuccessful candidate for the consulship for B. C. 192, and did not obtain it till the following year, when he was elected with M. Atilius Glabrio. In his consulship, B. C. 191, he fought against the Boii, defeated them in battle, and triumphed over them on his return to Rome. He defended his cousin, L. Scipio Asiaticus, when he was accused in B. C. 187, after his conquest of Antiochus. He was one of the magistrates to whom the Senate gave the censorship in B. C. 184, but was defeated by M. Porcius Cato. Hence Pliny speaks of him (H. N. vii. 34), as his regula notulat a populo. In B. C. 183 and 182 he was engaged as one of the triumviri in settling a Latin colony at Aquileia. The last time he is mentioned is in B. C. 171, when he was one of the advocates appointed by the Spanish deputies to bring to trial the Roman governors who had oppressed them. Scipio Nasica is mentioned both by Cicero and Pomponius as a celebrated jurist, and the latter writer adds, that a house was given to him by the state in the Via Sacra, in order that he might be more easily consulted (Livy. xiv. 14, xxxi. 49, xxxii. 23, xxxiv. 42, 43, xxxv. 1, 10, 24, xxxvi. 1. 2, 37, &c.; Cic. Orat. 40, 5. 34, xiii. 2; Dio. XXXV. 7; C. de Fin. v. 22, de Harusp. Resp. 13, de Orat. ii. 68, iii. 33; Pomponius, de Origine Juris in Dig. 1. tit. 2. s. 2. § 37, where he is erroneously called Caius; Zimmermann, Geschichte des Römischen Privatrechts, vol. i. 273.)

23. P. CORNELIUS SCIPIO NASICA CORCULUM, the son of No. 22, was twice consul, censor and pontifex maximus. He inherited from his father a love for jurisprudence, and became so celebrated for his discernment and for his knowledge of the pontifical and civil law, that he received the surname of Corculum (corculum a corde diecibant antiqui solerent et auctum, Festus, s. v.). He married a daughter of Scipio Africanus the elder. He is first mentioned in B. C. 169, when he served with distinction under L. Aemilius Paulus in Macedonia. He was consul for the first time in B. C. 162 with C. Marcius Figulus, but abdicated, together with his colleague, almost immediately after they had entered upon their office, on account of some fault in the auspices. He was censor in B. C. 159 with M. Popillius Laenas, when he enacted, together with his colleague, that no states of public men should be allowed to be erected in the forum without the express sanction of the senate or the people. In his censorship the clepsydra was for the first time introduced at Rome. He was consul a second time in B. C. 155 with M. Claudius Marcellus, and subdued the Dalmatians. He was a firm upholder of the old Roman habits and manners, and a strong opponent of all innovations, of which he gave a striking instance in his second censorship, by inducing the senate to order the demolition of a theatre, which was near the theatre of Antonius; this act of public morals. When Cato repeatedly expressed his desire for the destruction of Carthage, Scipio, on the other hand, declared that he wished for its preservation, since the existence of such a rival would prove a useful check upon the licentiousness of the multitude. He was elected pontifex maximus in B. C. 150. The reputation of Scipio Corculum as a jurist has been already alluded to; his oratory is likewise praised by Cicero; and he is described by Aurelius Victor as a man "eloquentiae primus, juris scientia consultissimus, ingenio sapientissimus." (Aurel. Vict. de Vir. Ill. 44, who confounds him with his father; Liv. xlv. 33, 36, 46, Epit. 47—49; Polyb. xxxix. 6; Plin. H. N. xxxiv. 14; Cic. de Nat. Deor. ii. 4, de Die. ii. 33, Brut. 20, 50, Cui. 14, Tusc. i. 9; Plut. Cat. Mag. 27; Appian, Pun. 69, B. C. 1, 28, but there is an anachronism in the last cited passage of Appian.)

24. P. CORNELIUS SCIPIO NASICA SERAPIO, the son of No. 23, was a fierce and stiff-necked aristocrat, and is chiefly known by the repeated mention of him in Cicero's writings, as the leader of the senate in the murder of Tib. Gracchus. He is first mentioned in B. C. 149, when he was sent along with Cn. Scipio Hispalus [No. 28], to demand from the Carthaginians the surrender of their arms (Appian, Pun. 80). He was unsuccessful in his application for the nectileus, but was consul in B. C. 138, with D. Junius Brutus. In consequence of the severity with which he and his colleague conducted the levy of troops, they were thrown into prison by C. Curiatius, the tribune of the plebs. It was this Curiatius who gave Nasica the nick-name of Serapio, from his resemblance to a dealer in sacrificial animals, or some other person of low rank, who was called by this name; but though given in derision, it afterwards became his distinguishing surname (Livy. Epit. 55; Val. Max. ix. 14. § 5; Plin. H. N. vii. 10). In B. C. 133, when the tribes met to re-elect Tib. Gracchus to the tribunate, and the utmost confusion prevailed.
in the forum, Nasica called upon the consuls to save the republic; but as they refused to have recourse to violence, he exclaimed, "As the consul betrays the state, do you who wish to obey the laws follow me," and so saying rushed forth from the temple of Fides, where the senate was sitting, followed by the greater number of the senators. The people gave way before them, and Gracchus was assassinated as he attempted to escape (Appian, B. C. i. 16; Plut. Tib. Gracch. 19; for further particulars see Vol. ii. p. 293).

In consequence of his conduct on this occasion Nasicon became an object of such detestation to the people, that the senate found it advisable to send him on a pretended mission to Asia, although he was pontifex maximus, and ought not, therefore, to have quitted Italy. He did not venture to return to Rome, and after wandering about from place to place, died soon afterwards at Pergamum. (Plut. Tib. Gracch. 21; Cic. pro Flor. 21; and the other passages of Cicero in Orelli's Onomast. Tull. vol. ii. p. 191.)

25. P. CORNELIUS SCIPIO NASICA, son of No. 24, was consul b. c. 111, with L. Calpurnius Bestia, and remained in Italy, while his colleague had the conduct of the war against Jugurtha. He died during his consulship. He is described by Diodorus as a man who was inaccessible to bribery throughout his life, though he lived in an age of general corruption. Cicero speaks with praise of the affability of his address, in which his father was deficient; and although he spoke neither much nor often in public, he was equal to any of his contemporaries in the purity of his Latin, and surpassed them in wit and humour. (Sall. Jug. 27; Diod. Ecocr. p. 606, ed. Wess.; Cic. de Off. i. 30, Brut. 34, pro Planc. 34, and Schol. Bot. p. 259, ed. Orelli.)

26. P. CORNELIUS SCIPIO NASICA, son of No. 23, praetor b. c. 94, is mentioned by Cicero as one of the advocates of Sex. Roscius of America. He married Licinia, the second daughter of L. Crassus, the orator. (Cic. pro Sex. Rosc. 28, Brut. 58.) He had two sons, both of whom were adopted, one by his maternal grandfather L. Crassus in his testament, and is therefore called L. Licinius Crassus Scipio [Crassus, No. 26]; and the other by Q. Caecilius Metellus Pius, consul b. c. 80, and is therefore called Q. Caecilius Metellus Pius Scipio. This Scipio became the father-in-law of Cn. Pompey the triumvir, and fell in Africa in b. c. 46. His life is given elsewhere. [METELLUS, No. 22.]

27. CN. CORNELIUS SCIPIO HISPALLUS, a son of L. Scipio [No. 11], who was a brother of the two Scipios who fell in Spain. Hispallus was praetor b. c. 179, and consul b. c. 171, with Q. Petullius Spurinna. He was struck with paralysis during his consulship, and died at Cumae in the course of the year. (Liv. xl. 44, xli. 14, 16.)

28. CN. CORNELIUS SCIPIO HISPALLUS, son of No. 27, was sent along with Scipio Nasica Sernpio [No. 24], in b. c. 149, to demand from the Carthaginians the surrender of their arms (Appian, Pum. 80). He was praetor, b. c. 139, when he published an edict that all Chaldaeans (i.e. astrologers) should leave Rome and Italy within ten days (Val. Max. i. 3, § 2). Valerius Maximus (L.c.) calls him Caius; whence Pighius makes him the brother of the Hispallus mentioned by Appian, but it is far more probable that there should be a mistake in Valerius Maximus of C. for Q., than that he should have borne a name which does not occur elsewhere in the family of the Scipios.

29. CN. CORNELIUS SCIPIO HISPALLUS, the son of No. 28, is mentioned only by Valerius Maximus, who relates (vi. 3, § 3), that he had obtained the province of Spain by lot, but was prevented by the senate from going thither on account of the disgraceful life he had previously led.

30. CN. CORNELIUS SCIPIO SALUTIO, an obscure person, whom Caesar is said to have carried with him in his African campaign, b. c. 46, and to have placed in front of the army, because it was believed that a Scipio would always conquer in Africa; he died in 27, and attempted to fight against Metellus Scipio, the general of the insurgents, but was killed in the battle. Others, however, thought that he did it as a kind of joke, to show his contempt of Metellus Scipio. Pliny relates that he was called Salutio from his resemblance to a minus of this name. Dion Cassius calls him Salatton. (Suet. Cae. 59; Plut. Caes. 52; Dion Cass. xiii. 58; Plin. H. N. vii. 12, xxx, 2.)

31. P. CORNELIUS SCIPIO, married Scribonia, who was afterwards the wife of Augustus, and by whom he had two children [Nos. 32 and 33]. His descent is uncertain, and we have no particulars of his life. Suetonius says (Octav. 62) that both the husbands of Scribonia, before she was married to Augustus, were men of consular rank; but this statement makes the matter still more uncertain, since the last Scipio who obtained the consulship was L. Scipio Asiaticus in b. c. 83. [No. 20.]

32. P. CORNELIUS SCIPIO, son of No. 31 and Scribonia, afterwards the wife of Augustus, was consul, b. c. 16 with L. Domitius Ahenobarbus. (Dion Cass. liv. 19; Propert. iv. 11, 67.)

33. CORNELIA, daughter of No. 31 and Scribonia, married Paulus Aemilius Lepidus, censor b. c. 52. [LEPIDUS, No. 19.]

34. CORNELIUS SCIPIO, legatus of Julius Blaes, proconsul of Africa, under whom he served in the campaign against Tachfarus in a. d. 22 (Tac. Ann. iii. 74). He may, perhaps, have been the son of No. 32.

35. CORNELIA, who married L. Volusius Saturninus, consul succ. a. d. 3, and who was the mother of Q. Volusius Saturninus, consul a. d. 56 (Plin. H. N. vii. 12, s. 14), may have been the sister of No. 34. [SATURNINUS, VOLUSIUS, Nos. 2 and 3.]

36. P. CORNELIUS SCIPIO, perhaps the son of No. 34, was the husband of Poppea Sabinia, who was put to death by Messalina, the wife of the emperor Claudius. He did not venture to express any disapproval of the deed, and showed his subserviency at a later period by proposing in the senate that thanks should be returned to Pallas, the freedman of Claudius, because he allowed himself to be regarded as one of the servants of the emperor, although he was descended from the kings of Arcadia. He was consul under Nero in a. d. 56, with L. Volusius Saturninus, who was probably his first cousin. (Tac. Ann. xi. 2, 4, xii. 53, xii. 25; Plin. H. N. vii. 12, s. 14.)

The lives of the Scipios are given with accuracy by Haack in the Real-Encyclopädie der klassischen Altertumswissenschaft, to which we have been much indebted in drawing up the previous account.
SCIRONIDES.

SCIRAS or SCLE'RIAS (Σκιράς, Σκλέριας) of Tarentum, was one of the followers of Rhinthon in that peculiar sort of comedy, or rather burlesque tragedy, which was cultivated by the Dorians of Magna Graecia, and especially at Tarentum. [Rhinthon.] His Meleager is quoted by Atheneus, who describes the species of composition now referred to, by the phrase τῆς Ἰταλικῆς καλούμενης Κομίνας (ix. p. 492, b). He is also quoted by other writers. The true form of his name is doubtful, but in the greater number of the few passages in which he is quoted he is called Sclerias. The gnominess of some of the fragments is also doubtful. (Fabric. l. c. p. 491; Muller, Dor. i. 7, § 6.) [P. S.]

SCIRAS (Σκιράς), a surname of Athena, under which she had a temple in Attic territory. [Muller, Dor. iv. 7, § 6.]

SCIRON (Σκιρόν or Σκιρόν), 1. A famous robber who haunted the frontier between Attica and Megaris, and not only robbed the travellers who passed through the country, but compelled them, on the Scironian rock to wash their feet, during which operation he kicked them with his foot into the sea. At the foot of the rock there was a tortoise, which devoured the bodies of the robber's victims. He was slain by Theseus, in the same manner in which he had killed others (Plut. Thes. 10; Dio. 59; Strab. ix. p. 391; Paus. i. 44. § 12; Schol. ad Eurip. Hipp. 976; Or. Met. vii. 445). In the pediment of the royal Stoa at Athens, there was a group of figures of burnt clay, representing Theseus in the act of throwing Sciron into the sea. (Paus. i. 3. § 1.)

2. A son of Pyras and grandson of Lelex. He was married to the daughter of Pandion, and disputed with his brother Nius the government of Megera; but Aeacus, who was chosen umpire, decided that Nius should have the government of Megara, and Sciron the command in war (Paus. i. 39. § 5). Other traditions called this Sciron the husband of Charicle, and father of Endis. (Plut. Thes. 10.)

SCIRON or SCYRON (Σκιρόν or Σκύρον), a Messenian who enjoyed a high estimation among his countrymen, and held the office of Ephor at the time of the unpriuedral aggression of the Aetolian Dorimachus [DORIMACHUS]. He strongly urged his countrymen to exact reparation from the Aetolians, and, by his conduct in the assembly on this occasion, incurred the mortal enmity of Dorimachus. (Polyb. iv. 4.)

SCIRONIDES (Σκιρώνιδης), an Athenian, was joined with Phrynichus and Onomacides in the command of an Athenian and Argive force, which was sent out to the coast of Asia Minor in B.C. 412. After several engagements with the Melians, they prepared to besiege Mileto; but, on the arrival of a Peloponnesian and Sicilian fleet, they sailed away to Samos, by the advice of Phrynichus, without risking a battle. In the same year Scironides was one of the generals left at Samos, while Strombichides, with two colleagues, proceeded to act against Chios; but, in B.C. 411, Peisander induced the Athenians to recall Phrynichus and Scironides, and to transfer the command at Samos to Leon and Diomedon. (Thuc. viii. 25—27, 30, 54.) [E. E.]

SCIRUS (Σκίρος), a soothsayer of Dodona, who, in the reign of Erecrethus, came to Salamis, and was afterwards honoured in the island with heroic honours. Salamis is further said to have been called after him, Scirius. (Paus. i. 36. § 3; Strab. ix. p. 393; Steph. Byz. a. e.)

SCLE'RIAS [Sclerias].

SCOPAS (Σκόπας), an Aetolian, who held a leading position among his countrymen at the period of the outbreak of the Social War, B.C. 220. He was a kinsman of Aristo, who at this time held the office of praeator, or general of the Aetolian league, and the latter confided to him the chief conduct of affairs. On this account it was to Scopas that Dorimachus applied for assistance after the ill success of his predatory expedition against Messenia [DORIMACHUS], and although no pre-text had been given for involving the Aetolian nation in war, these two chiefs were bold enough to undertake the enterprise on their own account. In the spring of B.C. 220 accordingly they led an expedition against the Messenians, and not only ravaged the territories of the latter, but when Antius himself at the head of the Achaean army had come to their support, totally defeated him at Caphyae, and effected their retreat un molested (Polyb. iv. 5, 6, 9, 10—13). This daring outrage having naturally led to a public declaration of war by the Achaean and their ally Philip king of Macedonia against the Aetolians, the latter chose Scopas for their Strategus during the ensuing year, and entrusted to him the conduct of the war which he had himself brought upon them. In the spring of 219 he invaded Macedonia with a large force, laid waste the open country of Pieria without opposition, and having made himself master of Dium, not only destroyed the town, but even plundered and burnt the celebrated temple which gave name to the city. Meanwhile, however, he neglected the defence of Aetolia itself, and left it open to Philip to obtain important advantages on the side of Acarnania (Id. iv. 27, 63, v. 11). The next year (210) he was sent by Dorimachus (who had succeeded him in the supreme command) with a mercenary force to the assistance of the Eleusians (Id. v. 3), but we have no further account of his operations in that year, or during the remainder of the Social War. His name does not again occur until the year B.C. 211, when we find him again holding the office of general, and in that capacity presiding in the assembly of the Aetolians, which concluded the alliance with the Roman praetor, M. Valerius Laevinus. The conquest of Acarnania was the bait held out to allure the Aetolians into this league, and Scopas immediately assembled his forces for the invasion of that country. But the determined resistance of the Acarnanians themselves, and the advance of Philip to their relief, rendered his efforts abortive. The next year (B.C. 210) we find him co-operating with Laevinus in the siege of Anticyra, which, after its capture, was given up to the Aetolians (Liv. xxvi. 24—26). After the close of the war with Philip, we are told that the Aetolians were distracted

with civil dissensions, and in order to appease these disorders, and provide some remedy against the burden of debts with which the chief persons in the country were oppressed, Scopas and Dorimachus were appointed to reform the constitution, b. c. 294. They were certainly not well qualified for legislators, and Scopas had only undertaken the charge from motives of personal ambition; on finding himself disappointed in which, he withdrew to Alexandria. Here he was received with the utmost favour by the ministers who ruled during the minority of the young king, Ptolemy V., and appointed to the chief command of the army in Coele-Syria, where he had to make head against the ambitious designs of Antiochus the Great. At first he was completely successful, and reduced the whole province of Judaea into subjection to Ptolemy, but was afterwards defeated by Antiochus at Panium, and reduced to shut himself up within the walls of Sidon, where (after an ineffectual attempt by Ptolemy to relieve him) he was ultimately compelled by famine to surrender (Polyb. xiii. 1, 2, xvi. 18, 19, 39; Joseph. Ant. xii. 3. §3; Hieronym. ad Daniel. xi. 15, 16). Notwithstanding this ill success he appears to have contined in high favour at the Egyptian court, and in b. c. 200 he was sent to Greece with a large sum of money by a merchant for the service of Ptolemy, a task which he performed so successfully as to carry back with him to Alexandria a body of above 6000 of the flower of the Aetolian youth (Liv. xxxi. 43). His confidence in the support of so large a force, united to his own abilities, and the vast wealth which he had accumulated in the service of the Egyptian king, appears to have inflamed his ambition, and led him to conceive the design of seizing by force on the chief administration of the kingdom. But his projects were discovered before they were ripe for execution, and a force was sent by Aristomenes, the chief minister of Ptolemy, to arrest him. Scopas was taken by surprise, and unable to offer any resistance. He was at once led before the council of the young king, condemned to death, and executed in prison the next night, b. c. 296. According to Polybius he had well deserved his fate by the reckless and insatiable rapacity which he had displayed in his whole period of residence in Egypt. (Polyb. xviii. 36—39.) [E. H. B.]

SCOPAS (Σκόπας), one of the most distinguished sculptors of the later Attic school, was a native of Paros, which was then subject to Athens (Strab. xiii. p. 604; Paus. vii. 45. §4); and he appears to have belonged to a family of artists in that island. There is an inscription of a much later period (probably the first century B.C.), in which a certain Aristander, the son of Scopas of Paros, is mentioned as the restorer of a statue of C. Billienus, by Agasias, the son of Menophilius of Ephessus; and we also know that there was a sculptor, Aristander of Paros, who lived during the latter part of the Peloponnesian War [ARISTANDER]. These facts, taken in connection with one another, and with the well-known alternate succession of names in a Greek family, make the inference extremely probable that the father of Scopas was that very Aristander who flourished about b. c. 405, and that his family continued to flourish as artists in their native island, almost or quite down to the Christian era (Böckh, C. I. No. 2283, b., vol. ii. pp. 236, 237). Scopas flourished during the first half of the fourth century b. c. Pliny, indeed, places him, with Polycleitus, Phradmon, Myron, Pythagoras, and Pericles, at Ol. 90, b. c. 420 (H. N. xxxiv. 8, s. 19, Sillig's edition; the common editions place these artists with those of the preceding period, Ol. 67). It will be seen presently that this cannot possibly be true. The source of Pliny's error here, as in other such cases, is no doubt in the manner in which he enumerated his lists of artists, arranging the groups according to some particular epoch, and placing in each group artists who were in part contemporaneous with each other, although the earliest may have lived quite before, and the latest quite after the date specified. Other explanations of the difficulty have been attempted, of which it can only be said here that that of Sillig (Cat. Art. s. v.) is too far-fetched, and that the more usual plan of imagining a second artist of the name, a native of Elia, of whom nothing is known from any other source, is a vulgar uncritical expedient, which we have several times had occasion to condemn.

The indications which we possess of the true time of Scopas, in the dates of some of his works, and in the period at which the school of art he belonged to flourished, are sufficiently definite. He was engaged in the rebuilding of the temple of Athena in Arcadia which must have been commenced soon after Ol. 96, 2, b. c. 394, the year in which the former temple was burnt (Paus. viii. 45. § 1). The part ascribed to him in the temple of Artemis at Ephesus, on the authority of Pliny (H. N. xxxiv. 14. s. 21), is a matter of some doubt; but the period to which this testimony would extend his career is established by the undoubted evidence of his share in the sculptures of the Mausoleum in Ol. 107, about b. c. 350, or even a little later. The date cannot be assigned with exactness to a year; but, as Mausolus died in Ol. 106. 4, b. c. 352, and the edifice seems to have been commenced almost immediately, and, upon the death of Artemisia, two years after that of her husband, the artists engaged on the work continued their labours voluntarily, it would follow that they were working at the sculptures both before and after b. c. 330 (Plin. H. N. xxxvii. 5. s. 4. § 9 ; Vitruv. vii. praef. § 12). On these grounds the period of Scopas may be assigned as from b. c. 395 to b. c. 330, and perhaps a little earlier and later. He was probably somewhat older than PRAXITELES, with whom he stands at the head of that second period of perfected art which is called the later Attic school (in contradistinction to the earlier Attic school of Phidias), and which arose at Athens after the Peloponnesian War. The distinctive character of this school is described under PRAXITELES, p. 519, b.

Like most of the other great artists of antiquity, Scopas is hardly known to us except by the very scanty and obscure notices which Pliny and other writers give us of his works. Happily, however, we possess remains of those works of the highest excellence, though, unfortunately, not altogether of undoubted genuineness; we refer especially to the Niobe group, to various other statues, and the Bu-drum Martyrs. We proceed to enumerate the works which he executed as an architect, a sculptor, and a statuary.

1. His architectural works. 1. He was the architect of the temple of Athena Alea, at Tegen, in Arcadia, the date of which has already been referred to (Paus. viii. 45. §§ 3, 4. a. 4—7). This temple was the largest and most magnificent in the Peloponnesus, and is remarkable for the arrangement of its columns, which were of the Ionic order on the outside of the temple, and in the inside of the Doric and Corinthian orders, the latter above the former. From the way in which Pausanias speaks of the sculptures in the pediments, it appears evident that the sculptural decorations of the temple, as well as the building itself, were executed under the direction of Scopas; the sculptures were probably by his own hand, since Pausanias mentions no other artist as having wrought upon them. The subject represented in the front portico of the Calydonian boar, and, from the description of Pausanias, this must have been a most animated composition. In the centre was the wild beast himself, pursued on the one side by Atalante, Meleager, Theseus, Telamon, Peleus, Pollux, Iolaus, Prothous, and Cometes; on the other side, Anceus was seen mortally wounded, having dropped his axe, and supported in the arms of Epocbus, while standing by him were Castor, Amphiaraus, Hippothous, and Peirithous. The subject of the hinder pediment was the battle of Telephus with Achilles, in the plain of Cauris, the details of which Pausanias does not describe. Only some insignificant ruins of the temple now remain. (Dodwell, Tour, vol. ii. p. 419; Kienze, Aphorist. Demerk. auf einer Reise nach Griechenland, p. 647; Müller, Archéol. d. Kunst, § 109, n. 13.)

In his account of this temple, Pausanias takes occasion to mention that Scopas made statues in many places of Greece Proper (τῆς ἑπεξαίες Ἑλλάδος), besides those in Ionia and Caria; an important testimony to the extent of the sphere of the artist's labours.

2. Pliny, in describing the temple of Artemis at Ephesus (H. N. xxxvi. 14. s. 21), says that thirty-six of its sixty columns were sculptured (caelata; perhaps Caryatids), and then adds words which, according to the common editions, affirm that one of these columns was sculptured by Scopas; rather a curious circumstance, that just one of the thirty-six should be ascribed to so great an artist, and nothing be said of the makers of the other thirty-five; and rather surprising, also, that Scopas should have been engaged on what was more properly the work of a stone-mason. The fact is, that in the common reading—ex ii. xxxvi. caelatae, una a Scopas; operi praefuit Chersiphron, &c.—the a is a conjectural insertion of Salmacis (who, however, with greater consistency, also changes una into uno), and it is wanting in all the MSS. The case is one of those in which we can hardly hope to clear up the difficulty quite satisfactorily, but we are inclined to accept as the most probable solution that proposed by Sillig (Cat. Art. s. v.), namely, to follow the reading of the MSS., pointing it thus:—ex ii. xxxvi. caelatae. Una Scopus operi praefuit Chersiphron architectus, &c. “Together with Scopas, Chersiphron the architect superintended the work; for una, like simul, may be used as a preposition with an ablative. It is known that Chersiphron was the architect, not of this temple, but of its predecessor, which was burnt by Herostratus [Chersiphron]. But it is clear enough from Pliny's whole description, that he confounded the two temples; and therefore we may infer that, finding, in his Greek authorities, Chersiphron mentioned as the architect of the one, and Scopas as the architect of the other, he confused the two together. In no other passage is Scopas mentioned as the architect of this temple: it is generally ascribed to Deinocrates: but the variations in the name of the architect warrant the conclusion, which might be drawn a priori from the magnitude of the work, that more than one architect superintended its erection. The idea that Scopas may have been one of these architects, receives some confirmation from the reference of Pausanias, already quoted, to his works in Ionia and Caria; and the fact of his share in the temple not being referred to by any other writer, may be explained by his architectural labours having been eclipsed by his greater fame as a sculptor, and by the renown of Deinocrates as an architect, especially if the latter finished the work. The absence of any mention of Deinocrates by Pliny is another reason for retaining the name of Scopas in the passage. It is to be hoped that some critic may be able to cast some further light on a question which is so interesting as connected with the character of Scopas as an architect.

3. The part which Scopas took in the decoration of the Mausoleum has been already referred to. It is now scarcely possible to doubt, either that, by the sculptures mentioned by Pliny and Vitruvius, on the four faces of the edifice, we are to understand the bas-reliefs of the frieze of the peristyle which surrounded it, or that the slabs brought from Budrun (the ancient Halicarnassus), and now deposited in the British Museum, are portions of that frieze (see Dict. of Ant. 2nd ed. art. Mausoleum). These slabs are thought, by competent judges, to show traces of different hands, and unfortunately we have no means whatever of determining which of them, or whether any of them, were the work of Scopas; since, of the whole frieze we possess only enough to make up a quarter, or one side of the peristyle, and these pieces are not all continuous, nor were they found in their places in the building, but in the walls of the citadel of Budrum, into which they had been built by the knights of Rhodes. In consequence of an opinion that the reliefs are hardly worthy of the fame of Scopas, it has been suggested that the slabs which we possess may have been all the productions of the other three artists; but a supposition so perfectly gratuitous cannot be admitted until some proof of it shall be furnished; nor do we think it required by the case itself. A bas-relief on the frieze of a building must not be compared with such statues as those of the Niobe group. The artist was somewhat fettered by the nature of the work, and still more by the character of his subject, the battle of the Amazons, which belongs to a class from which, as may be seen in the Phigaleian frieze, and even in the metopes of the Parthenon, the conventionalities of the archaic style were never entirely banished. These remarks, however, are only intended to apply to the comparison between these marbles and the separate statues, upon which the artist, free from all restraint, lavished his utmost skill; but in the bas-relief, confined by itself, they do not seem to us to need any apology. Allowance being made for the great corrosion of the surface in most parts, they are beautiful works of art, and they exhibit exactly the characteristics of the later Attic school, as described by ancient writers, and as still visible in a very similar and nearly contemporaneous work of the same school, the frieze of the choragic monument of Lycraticus, which is also preserved in the adjoining room (the Elgin Room*) in the British Museum. The decided inferiority of both these works to the Panathenaic frieze of the Parthenon only proves the inferiority of the later Attic artists to those of the school of Pheidias; an inferiority which was not likely to be properly appreciated by judges who, in the kindred art of dramatic poetry, preferred Euripides to Sophocles. The part of the frieze of the Mausoleum executed by Scopas was that of the eastern front; the sculptors of the other three sides were Bryaxis, Leochares, and Timarchus. The former was an Athenian; and Pliny tells us that the works were in his time considered to vie in excellence with each other:—"bodieque certant manus (H. N. xxxvi. 5. s. 4 § 9)."

II. Having thus noticed the works of Scopas in architecture and architectural sculpture, we proceed to the single statues and groups which are ascribed to him, classifying them according to their connection with the Greek mythology. The kinds of mythological subjects, which Scopas and the other artists of his school naturally chose, have already been mentioned under PRAXITELIS, p. 519, b.

Nearly all these works were in marble, the usual material employed by the school to which Scopas belonged, and that also which, as a native of Paros, he may be supposed to have preferred and to have been most familiar with. Only one bronze statue of his is mentioned; and some critics would erase his name from Pliny's list of statuaries in bronze (H. N. xxxiv. 8. s. 19).

1. Subjects from the Mythology of Aphrodite.—Pliny (H. N. xxxvi. 5. s. 4 § 7), after mentioning Scopas as a rival of Praxiteles and Cephisodotus, tells us of his statues of Venus, Pothos (Desire), and Phaethon, which were worshipped with most solemn rites at Samothrace. (Respecting the true reading of the passage, and the mythological connection of Phaethon with Aphrodite, see Sillig's edition of Pliny; Hesiod. Theog. 896—991; and Welecker, in the Kunstblatt, 1827, p. 326.)

A little further on, Pliny mentions a naked statue of Venus, in the temple of Brutus Callicus, at Rome, as Praxiteles Ioan antecedens, which most critics suppose to mean preceding it in order of time; but Pliny appears really to mean surpassing it in excellence. It would, he adds, confer renown on any other city, but at Rome the immense number of works of art, and the bustle of daily life in a great city, distracted the attention of men; and for this reason also, there was a doubt respecting the artist of another statue of Venus, which was dedicated by Vespasian in the Temple of Peace, and which was worthy of the fame of the ancient artists. Another work mentioned by Pliny as doubtful, is the Cupid holding a thunderbolt, in the Curia of Octavia. Pausanias (vi. 25 § 2) mentions a bronze group by Scopas, of Aphrodite Pandemos, sitting on a goat, which stood at Elis, in the same temple with Pheidias's chryselephantine statue of Aphrodite Urania. The juxtaposition of these works of the two Attic schools must have furnished an interesting comparison. In the temple of Aphrodite at Megara was Scopas's group of marble statues of Eros, Himeros, and Pothos, in which he showed the perfection of his art by the distinct and characteristic personified expression of ideas so nearly the same (Paus. i. 43. § 6). The celebrated statue of Aphrodite as victorious (Venus Victrix), in the Museum at Paris, known as the Venus of Milo (Melos), is ascribed, by Waagen and others, to Scopas, and is quite worthy of his chisel. It is one of the most beautiful remains of ancient art. (Waagen, Kunstwerke u. Künstler in Paris; Nagler, Künstler-Lexicon; Müller, Denkmäler d. alten Kunst, vol. ii. pl. xxv. No. 270.)

2. Subjects from the Mythology of Dionysus.—Müller thinks that Scopas was one of the first who ventured to attempt the figure of Bacchus, which, under the influence of the display of Bacchic enthusiasm (Archäol. d. Kunst, § 125). His statue of Dionysus is mentioned by Pliny (H. N. xxxvi. 5. s. 4 § 5); and his Maenad, with flowing hair, as χωραφιοφορός, is celebrated by several writers (Callist. Imag. 2; Glauces, Ep. 3, ap. Brunck. Anod. vol. ii. p. 347, Anth. Pal. i. 774; Simonides, Ep. 81, ap. Brunck. Anod. vol. i. p. 142, Anth. Planod. iv. 60, Append. in Anth. Pal. vol. ii. p. 642, Jacques). There are several reliefs which are supposed to be copied from the work of Scopas; one of them in the British Museum. (Müller, Arch. L. c. n. 2, Denkmäler, vol. i. pl. xxxii. No. 140; Townley, Gallery, vol. ii. p. 103.) Respecting his Paniscus, see Cicero (de Div. i. 13).

3. Subjects from the Mythology of Apollo and Artemis.—Scopas embodied the ideal of the Pythian Apollo playing on the lyre in a statue, which Augustus placed in the temple which he built to Apollo on the Palatine, in thanksgiving for his victory at Actium; whence it is called by Pliny Apollo Palatinus, and on various Roman coins Apollo Actius or Palatinus (Eckhel, Doct. Num. vol. vi. pp. 94, 107, vol. vii. p. 124; comp. Tac. Ann. xiv. 14; Suet. Nerv. 25). Propertius describes the statue in the following lines (i. 31, 10—14):—

"Deinde inter matrem deus ipse interque sororem Pythia in longa carmina veste sonat. Hic equidem Phoebo visua mild pulchrior ipso Marmoreae tacita carmen hiare lyrae."

These lines, and the representation of the statue on the coins, enable us easily to recognise a copy of it in the splendid statue in the Vatican, which was found in the villa of Cassius (Mus. Pio-Clem. vol. i. pl. 16; Museo Franc. vol. i. pl. 5; Müller, Archäol. § 125, n. 4, Denkmäler, vol. i. pl. xxxii. No. 141). There was also a statue of Apollo Smintheus by him, at Chrysae in the Troad (Strab. xiii. p. 604; Eustath. ad II. i. 39). Two statues of Artemis are ascribed to Scopas; the one by Pausanias (ix. 17. § 1), the other by Lucian (Lexiph. 12, vol. ii. p. 339).

But of all his works in this department, by far the most interesting is the celebrated group, or rather series, of figures, representing the destruction of the sons and daughters of Niobe. In Pliny's time the statues stood in the temple of Apollo Sosianus, at Rome, and it was a disputed point whether they were the work of Scopas or of Praxiteles. The remaining statues of this group, or rather series, are all in the Florence Gallery, with the exception of the so-called Ilionens, at Munich, which some suppose to have belonged to

The group. There is a head of Niobe in the collection of Lord Yarborough, which has some claim to be considered as the original. Our space forbids our entering on the various questions which have been raised respecting this group, such as the genuineness or originality of the figures, the manner of grouping them, and the aesthetic character of the whole composition; on these matters the reader is referred to the works now quoted. (Müller, Archäol. d. Kunst, § 126, ed. Weiker, 1848, and the authorities there quoted; Denkmäler, vol. ii. pl. xxxii., xxxiv.; Thiersch, Epoche, pp. 368—371; Penny Cyclopaedia, art. Niobe.)

4. Statues of other Deities. — Pliny (H. N. xxxvi. 5. s. 4. § 10) ascribes to Scopas a much-admired sitting statue of Vesta in the Servilian gardens (respecting the corrupt words which follow, see Sillig's Pliny), a sitting Colossus of Mars in the temple of Brutus Callicius, and a Minerva at Cnidian (ib. 8); and the following works are mentioned by other writers: — a statue of Hermes (Anth. Plaud. iv. 192; Bruneck, Ausl. vol. iii. p. 197; Jacobs, Append. Anth. Pol. vol. ii. p. 684): a marble Hecaleis, at Sicyon (Paus. ii. 10. § 1): a beardless Aesclapius and a Hygiea, at Gortynia in Arcadia (Paus. viii. 28. § 1): a statue of Athena, which stood on one side of the entrance of the temple of Apollo Ismenius, outside the gates of Thebes; on the other side of the entrance was a Hermes by Pheidias; and the two statues were called Πώραος (Paus. ix. 10. § 2): a Hecate at Argos (Paus. ii. 22. § 8): and two Furies at Athens. (Clem. Alex. Protrept. p. 30, ed. Sylburg; Sillig. Cat. Art. s. v. Calus.)

5. But the most esteemed of all the works of Scopas, according to Pliny, was his group which stood in the shrine of Cn. Domitius in the Flaminian circus, representing Achilles conducted to the island of Leuce by the divinities of the sea. It consisted of figures of Neptune, Thetis, and Achilles, surrounded by Nereids sitting on dolphins and huge fishes (σκήτης) and hippocampi, and attended by Tritons, and by an assemblage of sea monsters, which Pliny describes by the phrase Χορὺς Φοιχίς et pistrices et nulta alta marinae. All these figures, he adds, were by the hand of Scopas himself, and would have been enough to immortalize the artist, even if they had cost the labour of his whole life. Müller thinks it probable that Scopas infused into this marine group something of the spirit of those Bacchic revellers upon the land whom he was so successful in pourtraying, making the Tritons to resemble Satyrs, and the Nereids Maenads. There is still extant a beautiful statue of a Nereid on a hippocamp, both in the Florentine Gallery and the Museum at Naples (Tiffin zu Meyer's Kunstgechichte, § 10, A), besides other statues of sea gods and monsters, but none of them can be assigned with certainty to the group of Scopas. (Müller, Archäol. §§ 125, 126, 402.)

The above list contains, we believe, all the known works of Scopas, except a Canophorus mentioned by Pliny, which was in the collection of Asinius Pollio. There is also a hopelessly corrupt passage of Pliny (xxxiv. 8. s. 19. § 33), in which Scopas appears to be mentioned as the maker of bronze statues of philosophers; but perhaps the name ought to be altogether banished from the passage (see Sillig, Cat. Art., and edition of Pliny, and James, Col. Bamb., app. to Sillig's Pliny). If this passage be rejected, there is no mention by Pliny of any work in bronze by Scopas, although his name appears in the chronological list of statues at the beginning of the chapter. But even that passage is, as has been seen, involved in difficulty, and one proposed emendation, that of Thiersch, would banish the name of Scopas from it altogether, substituting Onatas. The only work in bronze expressly ascribed to Scopas is the Aphrodite Pandemos at Elis, mentioned, as above stated, by Pausanias.

Raoul-Rochette enumerates, among the ancient engravers, a Scopas, whom he considers to be a Greek artist, of the Roman period (Lettre à M. Schorn, pp. 153, 154). It is not improbable that among the Roman artists descended from Scopas, one of the same name may have practised this branch of the art at the period in question; and if the antiquaries be correct in supposing the subject of one of the gems bearing his name to be the head of Sextus Pompeius, this evidence would be sufficient. Visconti, however, doubts the genuineness of the inscription on that gem; and besides, there is no positive evidence that the portrait is that of Sextus Pompeius. With regard to the other two gems bearing the inscription ΣKOPIA, it is pretty evident that on the one, which represents an Apollo Citharoeus, the inscription merely indicates that the subject is copied from the celebrated Apollo of Scopas; and it seems by no means probable that the case is similar with respect to the other, which represents a naked female coming out of the bath.

Sco'pasis (Σκόπαςις, Σκόπαςις), a king of the Scythians, commanded one of the three divisions of his countrymen, when Scythia was invaded by Dareius Hystaspis. It was the body under the command of Scopasis, which, arriving at the Danube before Dareius reached it in his retreat, endeavoured, though without success, to prevail on the Ionians to destroy the bridge of boats over the river, and thus ensure the destruction of the Persians. (Herod. iv. 120, 128, 136; Just. ii. 5.)

Sco'pel'i'anus (Σκοπελίανος), a sophist, rhetorician, and poet, of Clazomenae, was the disciple of Nicetes of Smyrna, and flourished under Domitian and Nerva, a little before Polemon and Herodes Atticus. He taught at Smyrna, and had Herodes among his pupils. He devoted himself to poetry, and especially to tragedy. His life is related at great length by Philostratus (Vit. Sophist. i. 21), who speaks of him with very high respect. (Weiker, die Griech. Trag. p. 1923; Clinton, Fast. Rom. a. d. 93.)

Sco'ria'na'us, Ae'lius, consul a. d. 276, when Probus was proclaimed emperor. (Vopisc. Prod. 11.)

Scrib'onia. The wife of Octavianus, afterwards the emperor Augustus, had been previously married to two men of consular rank, according to Suetonius (Aug. 62). This writer, however, does not mention their names; and we know the name of only one of them, namely P. Cornelius Scipio, of whose consulsip, however, there is no record. [Scrib. No. 31.] By him she had two children, P. Cornelius Scipio, who was consul, b. c. 16, and a daughter, Cornelia, who was married to Paulus Acilinus Lepidus, censor b. c. 22. [Lepidus, No. 19.] Scribonia was the sister of L. Scribonius Libo, who was the father-in-law of Sex. Pompey, the son of Pompey the Great. [Libo, No. 4.] SCROFA.

After the Perusinian war, b.c. 40, Octavian feared that Sex. Pompey would form an alliance with Antony to crush him; and, accordingly, on the advice of Mæcenas, he married Scribonia, in order to gain the favour of Pompey, and of his father-in-law Libo. Scribonia was much older than Octavian, and he never had any affection for her; and, accordingly, he did not hesitate to divorce her in the following year, b.c. 39, on the very day in which she had borne him a daughter, Julia, in order to marry Livia, more especially as he was now on good terms with Antony, and hoped to drive Pompey out of Sicily. Octavian said that he divorced her on account of her loose morals; but Antony maintained that it was because she had taken offence at her husband's intercourse with Livia: the real reason, however, was undoubtedly his love of Livia. Scribonia long survived her separation from Octavian, for in a. d. 2 she accompanied, of her own accord, her daughter Julia into exile, to the island of Pandateria. (Suet. Aug. 62, 69 ; Appian, B. C. v. 53 ; Dion Cass. xlviii. 34, lv. 10; Vell. Pat. ii. 100 ; Tac. Ann. ii. 27.)

2. The mother of Piso Licinianus, who was adopted by the emperor Galba (Tac. Hist. i. 14). [Piso. No. 31.]

SCRIBONIA GENS, plebeian, is first mentioned at the time of the second Punic war, but the first member of it who obtained the consulship was C. Scribonius Curio in b. c. 76. The principal families in the gens are those of Curio and Libo; and besides these we meet with one or two other surnames in the imperial period, which are given below. On coins Libo is the only cognomen which is found.

SCRIBONIA NUS, CAMERI NUS. [CAMILLUS.]

SCRIBONIA NUS, FURIO SI CAMILLUS. [CAMIL LU S. No. 7.]

SCRIBONIA NUS, LICINIUS CRASSUS, the son of M. Licinius Crassus and of Scribonia, the granddaughter of Sex. Pompey, and a brother of Piso Licinianus, who was adopted by the emperor Galba. [Piso. No. 31.] Scribonianus was offered the empire by Antonius Primus, but refused to accept it. (Tac. Hist. i. 47, iv. 39.)

SCRIBONIUS, a person who pretended to be a descendant of Mithridates, usurped the kingdom of Bosphorus on the death of Asander, about b. c. 16. According to Lucian the troops of Asander deserted to Scribonius in the life-time of the former, who thereupon put an end to his life by voluntary starvation. But Scribonius had scarcely mounted the throne before the Bosphorans discovered the deception that had been practised upon them; and accordingly put the usurper to death. The kingdom was thereupon given to Polemon [Polemon L.] (Dion Cass. lv. 24; Lucian, Macro. 17.)

SCRIBONIUS APHRODISIUS. [APHRODISIUS.]

SCRIBONIUS LARGUS. [LARGUS.]

SCRIBONIUS PROCOBUS and RUFUS. [PROCOBUS.]

SCROFA, literally "a sow that has had pigs," was the name of a family of the Tremella gens.

1. L. TREMELLIUS SCROFA, quaestor of A. Licinius Nerva, who governed Macedonia as propraetor in b. c. 142. During the absence of Nerva, he defeated a Pseudo-Perseus or a Pseudo-Philippus, for there is some uncertainty about the name, and a body of 16,000 men. When attacked by the enemy, he said that he would scatter them straightforward like a sow does her pigs ("dixit celeriter se illis, ut scrofa porcos, disjecturum") and from this saying he obtained the cognomen of Scrofa, which became hereditary in his family. His grandson told Varro that this was the origin of their family name; but Maebrius relates another tale respecting its introduction. (Liv. Epit. 53; Eutrop. iv. 15; Varr. R. R. ii. 4 ; Macrobi. Sat. i. 6.)

2. (TREMELLIUS) SCROFA, was quaestor of Crassus in the war against Spartaces, b. c. 71, and was wounded while pursuing the latter. (Plut. Crass. 11.)

3. CN. TREMELLIUS SCROFA, the grandson of No. 1, was a friend of M. Varro and he died an exile. He is probably the same as the Cn. Tremellius, who was one of the judges at the trial of Verres in b. c. 70, and had been appointed military tribune for the following year (Cic. Verr. Act. i. 10). Scrofa was one of the twenty commissioners for dividing the Campanian land under the agrarian law of Julius Caesar, b. c. 59, and he must afterwards have served under Julius Caesar in Gaul, as he is said to have commanded an army near the Rhine. He is introduced as one of the speakers in Varro's treatise De Re Rustica, where his knowledge of agriculture is praised in the highest terms. He there speaks of himself as praetorius, but in what year he was praetor is unknown (Varr. R. R. i. 2. § 10, i. 7. § 8, ii. 4; Plin. H. N. xvii. 21. § 35. § 22). He is mentioned in Cicero's correspondence as one of the friends of Atticus. (Cic. ad Att. v. 4. § 2, vi. 1. § 18, vii. 1. § 8.)

4. ANTONIUS (Scribonius) SCROFA, the son apparently of the preceding, spoken of by Cicero in b. c. 45. (Cic. ad Att. xiii. 21. § 7.)

SCTUTARIOTA, THEODO'RUS. [THEODORUS.]

SCYLAX (Σκύλαξ). 1. Of Caryanda in Caria, was sent by Dareius Hystaspis on a voyage of discovery down the Indus. Setting out from the city of Caspatyrus and the Pactyican district, Scylax and his companions sailed down the river to the east and the rising of the sun, till they reached the sea; from whence they sailed westward through the Indian Ocean to the Red Sea, performing the whole voyage in thirty months. (Herod. iv. 44.)

2. Of Halicarnassus, a friend of Panaetius, distinguished for his knowledge of the stars, and for his political influence in his own state. (Cic. de Orat. ii. 42.)

Suidas (s. v.), in his usual blundering manner, makes these two persons into one, and ascribes to Scylax the following works:—Περίπλου τῶν ἐκτὸς τῶν Ἱππαλκίου ἐσημάνων—τὰ κατὰ τὸν Ἱππαλκίου τῶν Μυλασαίων πασίλη—γῆς περίοδον—ἀντιγράφον τὰ τῶν Πολυδέου Ἱστοριῶν.

We have still extant a brief description of certain countries in Europe, Asia, and Africa, which bears the name of Scylax of Caryanda, and is entitled, Περίπλου τῆς Ἑλλάδος οἰκονόμου Εὐφράτου καὶ Αἰαίς καὶ Ἀλβηθῆς. This little work was supposed by Lucas Holstenius, Fabricius, Sainte-Croix, and others, to have been written by the Scylax mentioned by Herodotus. Other writers, on the contrary, such as G. I. Vossius, Is. Vossius, and Dodwell, regarded the author as the contemporary of Panetius and Polybius; but most modern scholars are disposed to hold that it was written by Scylax of Caryanda.
to follow the opinion of Niebuhr, who supposes the writer to have lived in the first half of the reign of Philip of Macedonia, the father of Alexander the Great (Philip began to reign B. C. 360). Niebuhr shows from internal evidence that the Periplus must have been composed long after the time of Herodotus; whilst, from its omitting to mention any of the cities founded by Alexander, such as Alexandria in Egypt, as well as from other circumstances, we may conclude that it was drawn up before the reign of Alexander. It is probable, however, that the author, whoever he was, may not have borne the name of Scylax himself, but prefixed to his work that of Scylax of Caryanda, on account of the close connexion of the two names. Hystaspis. Aristotle is the first writer who refers to Scylax (Pol. iii. 14); but it is evident, from his reference, as well as from the quotations from Scylax in other ancient writers (Philost. Apollon. iii. 47; Harcoprat. p. 174, ed. Gronov.; Tzetz. Chil. vii. 144), which refer to matters not contained in the Periplus come down to us, that we possess only an abridgment of the original work.

SCYLAX (Σκυλάξ), an engraver of precious stones, whose time is unknown, but from whose hand we still possess some beautiful gems. (Stosch, 58, 59; Bracci, 101, 102, 103). [P. S.]

SCYLES (Σκύλης), son and successor of Arianthes, king of the Scythians in the time of Herodotus. His mother was a Greek of Istria, who taught him her own language, and imbibed with him an attachment to Greek customs and modes of life. The tastes thus acquired he used to gratify at Olbia, a Milesian colony (as its inhabitants professed, at the mouth of the Batthyaneus, where he passed a great part of his time, having built a house there, and married a woman of the place. Here he was detected by some of his countrymen in the celebration of the Bacchic mysteries, whereupon they withdrew their allegiance from him, and set up his brother, Octamases, as king. Scyles, upon this, fled to Satalis, king of Thrace; but the latter, on the invasion of his kingdom by a Scythen army, surrendered him to Octamases, who caused him to be beheaded. (Herod. iv. 78 — 80).

[Ε. Ε.]

SCYLITZES or SCYLITZA, JOANNES, a Byzantine historian, of the later period of the empire, surnamed, from his office, EUROPALEEPES (Ευρωπαιολόγος, ή Αργαϊολόγος); properly also called (and Cedrenus. Compend. sub init.) JOANNES THRAEOCS, and, from his office, PROTOVESTRARIUS (ὁ πρωτοβεστιάριος ἱεράνυς ο Θρα-ναιος το ἐπισώμων). According to the account given by Fabricius and Cave, and which is now generally received, he was a native of the Thracian Thema (which nearly corresponded to the Roman proconsular Asia), and attained successively at the Byzantine court, the dignities of protovestarius (high chamberlain), magnus drungarius vigilarum (captain of the guards), and europalepites. He flourished as late as A. D. 1081, if not later. While he was protovestarius he published the first edition of his great historical work, which came down to A. D. 1057; and in or after A. D. 1081, when he was europalepites, he published either a supplement, or a second and enlarged edition, bringing the work down to A. D. 1080. Several parts of this account are, however, very questionable, as we shall take occasion to show. It has been already observed (Cedrenus, Georgius) that the portion of the history of Cedrenus which extends from the death of the emperor Nicephorus I. (A. D. 811) to the close of the work (A. D. 1057), is found almost verbatim in the history of Joannes Scylitzes, which commences from the death of Nicæphorus I. (A. D. 811), and extends, in the printed copies, to the reign of Nicephorus Botanotes (A. D. 1078—1081). From this circumstance two questions arise. Did Cedrenus borrow from Scylitzes, or Scylitzes from Cedrenus? and, did Scylitzes publish two editions of his history, or only one? The former question is the more important.

As the history of Scylitzes, in its present form, extends to a period more than twenty years after that at which Cedrenus closes his work, the natural inference, if we are justified from this circumstance alone, would be that Scylitzes was the later writer. And this was the opinion of Fabrot, the Parisian editor of Cedrenus; and of Henschienius. (Acta Sanctorum, Febr. a. d. xi. Comment, de Imperatrice Theodora, § 90, 97.) As, however, the dates indicate that they were nearly contemporaneous, such an extensive incorporation as must have been practised by one or the other could hardly have been practised without its being known; and, if known, there could be no reason why the borrower should not avow the obligation. The question then turns upon this point, has either of the two mentioned or referred to the other? Scylitzes, in his Prooemium, which is given in the original Greek by Montfaucon (Bibl. Coislin. p. 207, &c.), from a MS. apparently of the twelfth century, mentions Georgius Syncellus [Georgius, lit. and eccles. No. 46] and Theophanes [Theophanes], as the only writers who, since the time of the ancients, had successfully written history; and says that, after them, no one had devoted himself to the production of similar works; that those who had attempted to write history had either given mere catalogues of sovereigns, or had been influenced by the desire of panegyrising or vituperating some prince or patriarch or personal friend; by which we suppose he means that they had written biography, and that partially, instead of history. He enumerates many writers of this class, as Theodorus Daphnopates (Theodorus), Nicetas Paphlagon [Nich- tas, Byzantine writers, No. 9]. Joseph Genesius [Genesius], &c. But in neither class does he notice Cedrenus, whom, as the author of a recent at least, and last, work of the kind, was the later writer, had he transcribed it, he would thereby have borne a virtual testimony, he could hardly have overlooked. His silence, therefore, furnishes a strong, if not a decisive argument against the priority and originality of Cedrenus. The title of the work from which this Prœœium is taken is thus given by Montauck, from the MS., Συνώμιος Ἱστοριών συγγραφεῖα παρὰ Ιωάννου κουροπαλάτου καὶ μεγάλου διοργανῶν τῆς Βίλας τοῦ Σκυλίτζης, Synopsis Historiarum Scripta a Joanne Scylitze Curopala et Magnum Drangarui Vigilium, Or the other hand Cedrenus is a professor compiler; his work, which is also called Συνώμιος Ἱστοριῶν, Synopsis Historiarum, is avowedly described in the title as εὐαγγελισμένα ἐκ διαφόρων Βιβλίων, εὐεργετικὰ Λύπρα λεκτα. The Prœœium is so far identical with that of Scylitzes as to show that one has been taken from the other, and adapted to the borrower's purpose. In a passage, however, peculiar to Cedrenus, he quotes as one of his chief authorities, a certain Ioannes Proovestarii, surnamed Thraciæus, whose manner of writing he describes in the very terms in which Scylitzes, in his Prœœium, had laid down his own principles of composition. The point at which Cedrenus describes the history of this Ioannes Thraciæus as commencing, is precisely at which the history of Scylitzes begins. There can, therefore, we think, be no reasonable doubt that Ioannes Thraciæus and Ioannes Scylitzes are the same person; and their identity is further established by a short piece in the Jos Gracce–Romani of Leunclavias, mentioned below, in the title of which Ioannes Thraciæus is called Curopala and Magnus Drangarius Vigilarius. It is clear also that he wrote before Cedrenus; and that the latter borrowed from him; and this is now the general conclusion of competent judges, including Vossius, Hankius, Pontunus, Goar, Labbe, Lambecius, and Fabricius. It may be observed, however, that no other discord at that of being a mere compiler justly attaches to Cedrenus from this circumstance: he did not profess to be more than a compiler, and has fairly owned his obligations both to Scylitzes, assuming the latter to be identical with Ioannes Thraciæus, and to other writers from whom he borrowed. Had Scylitzes, who does not mention Cedrenus, borrowed as largely from the latter and concealed his obligations, he would have justly incurred the reproach of endeavouring to deck himself out with stolen plumage.

The question whether Scylitzes published two editions of his history, though less important, deserves notice. Vossius, Hankius, and other critics contend that he did. Their opinion appears to rest on these circumstances: that, in the Latin translation of Scylitzes by Gabius (of which presently), the history is said in the title-page to extend to the reign of Isaac Comnenus, "ad imperium Isaaci Commeni: " that Cedrenus, who, in the latter part of his work, transcribes Scylitzes, brings down his work only to A. d. 1057, and that, in speaking of Ioannes Thraciæus, he gives him the title of Proovestarii, while in the MSS. of Scylitzes' own work he has the titles of Curopala and Magnus Drangarius Vigilarius; and the work itself comes down to about 1089. From these premises it is inferred that Scylitzes first held the office of Proovestarii, and during that time published a first edition of his work, coming down to A. d. 1057; and that afterwards he attained the dignities of Curopala and Drangarius, and then published a second edition brought down to a later period. But this reasoning is not satisfactory. The title of Gabius's version is a manifest error, for the version itself comes down, as does the printed Greek text, to the reign of Nicephorus Botaniotes. Gabius apparently translated the title of the MS. which he used; and the name of Isaac Comnenus is probably an error (either of the transcripter of the MS. or of the translator) for Alexius Comnenus, Botaniotes' successor, to whose accession, as we shall presently see, the history extended in the author's purpose, if not in his performance. The earlier cessation of Cedrenus narrative may be otherwise accounted for. It may be questioned whether he ever finished his work; or whether, if he did, his work is extant in its entire form (comp. Vossius, de Historiis Graec. lib. ii. c. xxvi. ubi de Cedren.): the actual conclusion is abrupt; and the point at which it terminates partakes not of the character of an historical epoch. To this it may be added that the extant work of Scylitzes, which is assumed to be the second edition, does not make any reference to a former edition, or bear any mark of a continuation having been appended at the place where the supposed first edition concluded. Another consideration which weighs with us is this; that the title of Proovestarii was, in the scale of Byzantine rank, above those of Curopala and Drangarius; and, therefore, it is impossible to suppose him the last attained (comp. Codinus, de Official. Palat. Opolit. c. ii.). We see no reason, then, to suppose that there was more than one edition.

It remains to be considered at what date the history of Scylitzes was written, and to how late a period it extended. The abruptness of the termination of the work, as printed, in the middle of the short reign of Nicephorus Botaniotes, shows that we have it in an incomplete form, whether so left by the author or derived from an imperfect copy. A MS. in the Imperial Library at Vienna, fully described by Kollar (Supplement ad Lambeici Comment. lib. i. p. 613, &c.), contains a variety of chronological and other tables, probably compiled by Scylitzes (and which we shall presently notice), and a copy of his Synopsis Historiarum, written, as Kollar judges, early in the twelfth century. This MS. is mutilated at the end of Scylitzes' Synopsis, so that the history is not there brought to a close.

But a list of Byzantine sovereigns of both sexes, bearing the inscription of ἐν τῇ ἡμέρᾳ ἀναγεγραμμένων βασιλεὺς εἰς ὑπότατα, Imperatores quorum Κες in hac Libri sunt conscripserat, sunt hi, ends with 'Ἀλέξιος ὁ Κομνηνός, ἢ ἄλλος λέγεται ὁ ἄλλος ὁ ἄλλος,' ἡ γυνὴ αὐτοῦ Εὐφην, Alexius Comnenus, annis septem et triginta, men- sleus quattuor, dicitur quartodecim. Uxor ejus Irene. From this passage Kollar inferred that the history included the whole reign of Alexius, and that the author must have written after its close in A. d. 1118. But this inference, so far as it respects the close of the history, is contradicted by the title of the history itself, which describes it as ταξευς ιδιαὶ τῇ ἀναγεγραμμένῳ Ἀλεξίου τοῦ Κομνηνοῦ, In Alexii Comneni Coronatione desinent. The history then included, or was intended to include, not the whole reign of Alexius, but only its commencement; though the extent, at least, the published copies do not reach even this point, thus evidencing their incompleteness. The writer, therefore, must have lived after the commencement; and, if he was the author of the table of sovereigns, after the close of the reign of Alexius: but it may be doubted whether that table was not added, or the length of each sovereign's reign inserted, by a subsequent transcriber. All that can with certainty be concluded is, that the printed editions and the known MSS. of the history do not complete the work, according to the description given in its title; and that the author filled the offices ascribed to him by Cedrenus and in the title of his own work. Whether he lived after a.d. 1118; whether he held his several offices successively or simultaneously, and if successively, in what order, is quite uncertain. The theory of a double edition of his work, and the succession of his offices deduced from that theory, rests, as we have shown, on no sufficient foundation. Even the transaction of the Thracian Theme is doubtful; for Cedrenus, who calls him θρακιστός, "Thracius," does not add τὸ γένος, "by birth," but τὸ ἐπάνων, "by surname," as if to guard against the otherwise obvious inference as to his birth-place. Possibly, like Georgius Trapezuntius (George of Trebizond), he derived his surname from the original seat of his family. [Georgius, literary and ecclesiastical, No. 48.]

The work of Scylitzes, one of the most important of the Byzantine histories, has been singularly neglected. The unfounded opinion of Fabrot, the Parian editor of Cedrenus, that Scylitzes was merely the "Cedren simii," led to the publication of only that part of Scylitzes which Cedrenus did not transcribe, viz., the part extending from 1057 to 1089, and which those who suppose that there were two editions of the work regard as having been added in the second edition. It constitutes about a seventh part of the whole work. The Paris edition of Cedrenus appeared in two vols. fol. 1647. The Excerpta ex Dioniri Historico Joannis Scylitzae Careopolatase, execipienda ubi Cedrenus desinit are in the second volume, and are illustrated with a Latin version (slightly altered from Gabiuis's) and a few notes, by Goar. The Venice edition, fol. 1729, is a mere reprint of the foregoing; though in the interim Montfaucou had published (Bibliothèque Coislin. p. 207) the Prooemium, which, in an abridged or mutilated form, Cedrenus had adopted as his own, and prefixed to his own work. In the Bonn edition of Byzantine historians, it might have been expected that the entire work of Scylitzes would have appeared, even if the transcript of it in Cedrenus had been suppressed; but Dekker, the editor of Cedrenus, has been content to repeat the Excerpta of Fabrot, with the mere addition in the margin of such supplements, both to Cedrenus, in the part transcribed from Scylitzes, and to the Excerpta, as could be obtained from MSS., including the Coislin MS, examined by Montfaucou, but apparently not including the Vienna MS. The greater part of the Greek text of one of the most valuable of the Byzantine writers is yet, therefore, unpublished in its original and proper form.

A Latin version of the whole work (with the exception of some lacunae), by Ioannes Baptista Gabius (Giovanni Battista Gabio), Greek professor at Rome, was published, fol. Venice, 1570. A part of this version accompanies the Greek text of the Excerpta in the above editions. Gabio writes his author's name Scilia or Scyllizas.

The assertion that he was a native of the work of Scylitzes in the Vienna MS. were conjectured by Kollar to have been collected or compiled by Scylitzes as introductory to his work. This is not unlikely; and whenever the whole of the text of Scylitzes shall appear, it may be hoped these tables will be published also. They are:—1. Συνόψεις τῶν χρόνων ἀπὸ τῆς κτίσεως κόσμου, Synopsis annorum a creatione mundi. It is little else than a list of names, with their respective dates, beginning with Adam, and ending with the Roman emperors Diocletian and Maximian. 2. Ὅσα εἰς Βασιλεία θρακί- στουν Χριστονος, Quod Byzantium imperium obtinuerat Christiani, beginning with Constantine the Great, and ending with Nicephorus Botanotes; the length of each emperor's reign is given. 3. Certain historical epochs; beginning Eἰς ὅν πόθεν ᾧ Ἀδαμος γεννηθη (an Epochae) and Dioscorides (a list of the Kings of the Ten Tribes of Israel). 4. A list of the High Priests of Israel, beginning with Aaron. 6. A list of the Patriarchs of Jerusalem. 7. A list of the Bishops of Rome, ending with Boniface III, a.d. 550. 8. A list of the Bishops or Patriarchs of Byzantium, to Stephen, a.d. 886—893. 9. A list of the Patriarchs of Alexandria. 10. A list of the Patriarchs of Antioch, ending with the second patriarchate of Anastasius I, a.d. 553. 11, 12. The Canonical Books of the Old and New Testaments. 13. Controvers Books of the Old Testament, chiefly the Books of our Apocrypha. 14. Controvers Books of the New Testament, including the Apocalypsis Joannis, and some others not included in our canon, viz., the Apo- calypsis Petri, Darnalae Episiptol, and the Evangelitum secondum Hbreaeum. 15. Spurious Books of the Old Testament. 16. Spurious Books of the New Testament, among which are classed the Writings of Clement of Rome, Ignatius, Polycarp, and Hermas. 17. The Genealogy of the Roman Emperor Valentinian I. Lambecius, and, after him, Fabricius, doubted if all these tables were to be attributed to Scylitzes: but Lambecius (according to Kollar) subsequently changed his opinion, and thought they were his. (Kollar, Supplement, p. 618.)

The Jus Graeco-Romanum of Lemnclavius (vol. i. p. 152, &c.) contains, "Συνόψεις τῶν κυρίωτατων καὶ μεγάλων δρόμων τῆς Βυζαντίων θρακιστοῦν" μετά την περί μυστηρίων μερακεν γενομένη πρό τον αυτόν βασιλείαν κυρίων Ἀλέξιον τύν αμφιδόθη προτεραναφισμάτων, (Suggestio Careopolatase, Magnique Drrangui Videbillari, Dominis Joannis Thrascii post promulgatione de Sponsibus Novellam ekketai in Scripto Principi, Domino Alexio, de ambiendya quadda super haec enata. According to Possennino (Apparatus Sacror. Catalog, ad fin. tom. iii. p. 42), there were many, in MS. in the library of a convent of the monks of St. Basil, in the isle of Patmos, some other works of Scylitzes:—Joannis Scylitzae Varii Sermones Philosophici et Theologi- gici, of which the first was, Πρώτος κύριων καὶ τῆς κατ' αυτόν φύσεως, De Mundo et ejus Natura: also Ejusdem quaedam Epistolae. The dissertations would be curious, as Scylitzes appears to have had little respect for the property, whatever he may have had for the doctrines of the Church. He vindicates in his history (p. 808, ed. Paris, p. 642, ed. Bonn) the conduct of Isaac Connenus, in seizing the superfluous wealth of the monasteries, and wishes that he had been able to treat the whole Church in a similar way. (See, however, Mont- faucou, Annotationes. Bibli. Coislin, p. 206.) Possibly, some of the works of the Patmos MSS. may contain the works of a younger Joannes Scylitzes, different from the historian, who is mentioned by Nic. Connenus Papadopoli, but whose writings Fabricius had SCYLLA (Σκῆλος) and Charybdis, the names of two rocks between Italy and Sicily, and only a short distance from one another. In the midst of one of these rocks which was nearest to Italy, there dwelt, according to Homer, Scylla, a daughter of Crtaeas, a fearful monster, barking like a dog, with twelve feet, six long necks and mouths, each of which contained three rows of sharp teeth. The opposite rock, which was much lower, contained an immense fig-tree, under which there dwelt Charybdis, who thrice every day swallowed down the waters of the sea, and thrice threw them up again: both were formidable to the ships which had to pass between them (Hom. Od. xii. 73, &c., 235, &c.).

Later traditions represent Scylla as a daughter of Phorcys or Phorbas, by Hydæa Crtaeas (Apollon. Rhod. iv. 926, &c., with the Scholaust), or by Lamia; while others liken her a daughter of Triton, or Poseidon and Cretæis (Eustath. ad Hom. p. 1714), or of Typhon and Echidna (Hygin. Foh. praef.). Some, again, describe her as a monster with six heads of different animals, or with only three heads (Tzetz. ad Lyg. 650; Eustath. l. e.). One tradition relates that Scylla originally was a beautiful maiden, who often played with the nymphs of the sea, and was beloved by the marine god Glauceus. He applied to Circe for means to make Scylla return his love; but Circe, jealous of the fair maiden, threw magic herbs into the well in which Scylla was wont to bathe, and by these herbs the maiden was metamorphosed in such a manner, that the upper part of her body remained that of a woman, while the lower part was changed into the tail of a fish or serpent, surrounded by dogs (Ov. Met. xii. 732, &c., 905, xiv. 49, &c.; Tibull. iii. 4. 99). Another tradition related that Scylla was beloved by Poseidon, and that Amphitrite, from jealousy, metamorphosed her as a monster (Tzetz. ad I. Ttop. 45; Serv. ad Aen. iii. 420).

Hermes is said to have killed her, because she had stolen some of the oxen of Geryon; but Phorcys is said to have restored her to life (Eustath., Tzetz., Hygin., l. c.). Virgil (Aen. vi. 286) speaks of several Scyllae, and places them in the lower world (comp. Lucret. v. 893). Charybdis is described as a daughter of Poseidon and Gaia, and as a voracious woman, who stole oxen from Heracles, and was hurled by the thunderbolt of Zeus into the sea, where she retained her voracious nature. (Serv. ad Aen. iii. 420.)

2. A daughter of King Nisus of Megara, who, in consequence of her love of Minos, cut off the golden hair from her father's head, and thereby caused his death (Apollod. iii. 15. § 8). She has sometimes been confounded with the monster Scylla. [L. S.]

SCYLLIS. [Dipon.]

SCYMNUS (Σκύμνος), of Chios, wrote a Pei- rigeis, or description of the earth, which is referred to in a few passages of Stephanus and other later writers (Steph. Byz. s. v. Πέργειας, Ἐρμοκερασσία, Αγαθία, Ἀρεων νῖος; Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. iv. 284; Apollon. Hist. Mirab. 15, where we should read Σκύμων instead of Σκύνων). A brief Perigeis, written in Iambic metre, and consisting of nearly one thousand lines, has come down to us. This poem, as appears from the author's own statement, was written in imitation of Theban works supposed to be the same as Nicomedes 111, King of Bithynia, who died c. 74; but this is quite uncertain. A portion of this poem was first published by Hoeschel, under the name of Marcianus Heracleotes, along with other Greek geographers, Augsburg, 1600, 8vo.; and again by Morell, also under the name of Marcianus, Paris, 1606, 8vo. But Lucas Holstenius and Is. Vossius maintained that this poem was written by Scymnus Chius, and is the work referred to in the passages of the ancient writers quoted above. Their opinion was adopted by Dodwell, in his dissertation De Scymnio Chio, § 7, and the poem was accordingly printed under the name of Scymnus, by Hudson and by Gail, in the Geographi Graeci Minores, as well as by D. Fabricius, in his recent edition of the work, Leipzig, 1846. Meineke, however, has shown, most satisfactorily, in his edition of the poem, published shortly after that of Fabricius (Berlin, 1846), that the Perigeis of Scymnus Chius quoted by the ancient writers was written in prose, and was an entirely different work from the extant poem, the author of which is quite unknown.

SCYMYNUS, artists. 1. A statuary and silverschase, of high celebrity, but none of whose works were known in Pliny's time. He was the pupil of Critios, and must therefore have flourished about Ol. 83, b. c. 448. (Plin. H. N. xxxiv. 8. s. 19. § 25.)

2. An engraver of precious stones, one beautiful specimen of whose work is extant. It is not known whether or not he was the same person as the preceding. (R. Rochette, Lettre À M. Schorn, p. 154, 2d ed.)

3. A painter, whose picture of a female slave is mentioned by Hippocrates. He appears to have flourished about Ol. 110, b. c. 340. (Nagler, Künstler Lexicon, p. 542, 5 vol. [P. S.]

SCYTHIÆ (Σκύθιαι). 1. Tyrant or ruler of Zancle in Sicily, about 494 b. c. The Zancleans had sent to Ionia to invite colonists to join them in founding a new city on the Kαλά Άκτη, or north shore of Sicily, and the offer had been accepted by a large body of Samians, together with some fugitives from Miletus; but when they arrived at Locri, Scythes, at the head of the Zancleans, was engaged in hostilities against the Sicels, and the Samians were persuaded by Anaxila of Rhegium to take advantage of his absence, and occupy the city of Zancle itself. Hereupon Scythes called in the assistance of his ally, Hippocrates, tyrant of Geh, but the latter proved no less peridious than the Samians, and immediately on his arrival threw Scythes himself and his brother Polygenes into chains, and sent them prisoners to Inyces, while he betrayed his allies the Zancleans.

into the hands of the Samians. Scythes, however, contrived to make his escape to Himera, and from thence repaired to Asia, to the court of Dercius, king of Persia, where he was received with much distinction, and rose to a high place in the king's favour. He afterwards revisited his native city, but again returned to the Persian court, where he died at an advanced age, and in the possession of great wealth, while he enjoyed general esteem for the probity of his character (Herod. vi. 23, 24; Aelian. V. H. viii. 17). It is remarkable that Herodotus, while he designates Anazilis and Hippocrates as tyrants (τυράννοι) of their respective cities, styles Scythes king (Βασιλεύς) or monarch: a thing not uncommon in his history.

2. The father of Cadmus, tyrant of Cos, mentioned by Herodotus (vii. 163), is supposed by K. O. Müller (Doriaus, vol. i. p. 193, note) to be identical with the preceding [Cadmus]. The subsequent removal of Cadmus to Zancle certainly gives much probability to the conjecture. Valckenier and Larcher, however (ad Herod. vi. 23, vii. 163) consider him to have been another person of the same family. [E. H. B.]

SCYTHIANUS (Σκυθιανός), a Manichean heretic, who, according to Epiphanius, supported his opinions by the philosophy of Pythagoras. (Epiphani. Haer. lxvi. 2; Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vol. i. p. 366.) [P. S.]

SEBO'SUS, STATIUS, a writer on geography, cited by Pliny (H. N. vi. 29. s. 35, vii. 31. s. 36, ix. 13. s. 17; Solin. 52). He is perhaps the same as Sebouus, the friend of Catinus. (Cic. ad Att. ii. 14. 15.) [L. S.]

SEBROS (Σεβρός), a son of Hippocoon, was worshipped as a hero at Sparta, where he had an heroon called Sebrium. (Psus. iii. 15. 1.; comp. Doreus.) [W. R.]

SECUNDI'NUS, a Manichean, known to us only as the author of a letter addressed to Augustine, in which he gently upbraids him for having deserted the sect to which he was once attached, and urges him in the most earnest and flattering language to return. This Epistola ad Augustinum, which is totally destitute of merit, together with the reply Contra Secundinum Manichaeum, is given in the works of the bishop of Hippo, in the eighth volume of the Benedictine edition. [W. R.]

SECUNDI'NUS, NICOLAUS, a learned Greek of the island of Euboö, who acted as interpreter at the council of Florence in A. D. 1436, and the following years. He translated several Greek works into Latin; but his life does not fall within the limits of the present work. (Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vol. xi. p. 294.)

SECUNDUS (Σκούδος), Greek literary.

COIN OF M. ARRIUS SECUNDUS.

SECUNDUS, ATANUS, vowed during an illness of Caligula to fight in the gladiatorial games, if the emperor recovered, expecting to be rewarded for his devotion. But when Caligula got well, and Secundus was unwilling to fulfil his vow, the emperor compelled him to fight. (Dion Cass. ix. 8; comp. Suet. Calig. 27.)

SECUNDUS CARINAS. [CARINAS, No. 4.]

SECUNDUS, JULIUS, a Roman orator and a friend of Quintilian, is one of the speakers in the Dialogus de Oratoribus, usually ascribed to Tacitus. Quintilian praises his eloquentia, and says that if he had lived longer, he would have obtained with posterity the reputation of an illustrious orator. (Auctor, Dial. de Orat. 2, &c.; Quintil. x. 1. § 120, xii. 10. § 11.)

SECUNDUS, MA'RIUS, was governor of Phoenicia, under Macrinus, and took a share in the administration of Egypt also. He was slain in the tumult which arose when intelligence was first received of the victory achieved by Elagabalus. (Dion Cass. lxxviii. 35.) [W. R.]

SECUNDUS, PEDANIUS. [PEDANIUS, No. 3.]

SECUNDUS.

1. Of Athens, a distinguished sophist of the time of Hadrian, and one of the teachers of Herodes Atticus, who quarrelled with him, and wrote a sarcastic verse upon him; but, after his death, Herodes pronounced his funeral oration, and shed tears over him. He was the son of a carpenter, whence he obtained the nickname of εἰκώνους. According to Philostratus, he was exceedingly learned, but very inferior as a critic. (Philost. Vit. Soph. i. 26, pp. 544, 545; Suid. s. v., who appears to have confounded him with Pliny! though the reading is doubtful.)

Of his works very little is known with certainty. Suidas tells us that he wrote σελατρας διπροναί, and we have in Philostratus the theme and heads of his most celebrated rhetorical exercise. There is a collection of Sententiae ascribed to him, of doubtful authenticity, and not of sufficient importance to require further notice here. The whole question respecting them is discussed, and an account of their MSS. and editions given, in Fabricius, Bibl. Græc. vol. i. pp. 866—870.

2. Of Tarentum, an epigrammatic poet, three of whose epigrams are preserved in the Greek Anthology. His verses were included in the collection of Philip of Thessalonica, about whose time he seems to have lived. (Bruckn, Anal. vol. iii. p. 3; Jacobs, Anth. Græc. vol. iii. p. 226, vol. xiii. pp. 350, 351.)

SECUNDUS, M. A'RIUS, known only from coins, a specimen of which is annexed. It has been supposed by some that the head on the obverse is that of Augustus; by others that of Arrius himself; but it is impossible to obtain any certainty on the point. (Eckhel, vol. v. p. 142.)
SECUNDUS, PETRO'NIUS, praefectus praetorio along with Norbanus in the reign of Domitian, and one of the parties privy to the murder of the emperor. (Dion Cass. lxvii. 15; Eutrop. viii. 1.)

SECUNDUS, PLAT'NIUS. [Plinius.]

SECUNDUS, POMP'O'NIUS. 1. A distinguished poet in the reigns of Tiberius, Caligula, and Claudius. He was one of the friends of Sejanus, and on the fall of that minister in a.d. 31 was thrown into prison, where he remained till the accession of Caligula in a.d. 37, by whom he was released, and who raised him to the consulsip in a.d. 41. Dion Cassius says (lix. 6), that he had been consul seven years before the accession of Caligula; but his name does not occur in the Fasti. In the reign of Claudius he was appointed the emperor's legatus in Germany, and in a.d. 50 defeated the Chatti, and obtained the honour of the triumphal ornaments. Secundus was an intimate friend of the elder Pliny, who showed his affection for him by writing his life in two books. Tacitus speaks of him (Ann. v. 8) as a man "multa morum elegantia et ingenio illustri." It was by his tragedies that Secundus obtained the most celebrity. They are spoken of in the highest terms by Tacitus, Quintilian, and the younger Pliny, and were read even in a much later age, as one of them is quoted by the grammarians Charisius (Tac. Ann. v. 6, vi. 18; Dion Cass. lxx. 6, 29; Tac. Ann. xi. 13, xii. 27, 28; Dial. orat. 13; Quintil. x. 1. § 98; Plin. H. N. vii. 19, xii. 12. 26, xiv. 4. s. 6; Plin. Ep. iii. 5, vii. 17; Charisius, op. Bothe, Poet. Scen. Lat. Fragm. vol. ii. p. 279). The phenomena of Pomponus Secundus is doubted. In one passage Tacitus calls him Publius (Ann. xi. 13), and in another Lucius (Ann. xii. 27), while Dion Cassius (lix. 6) names him Quintus. Tacitus, however, call his brother Quintus. [No. 2.]

2. Q. POMPO'NIUS SECUN'DUS, the brother of the preceding, a man of abandoned character, accused Sancia and others towards the end of the reign of Tiberius, under the pretext of warding off dangers from his brother by acquiring the favour of the emperor. He subsequently revolted against the emperor Claudius. (Tac. Ann. vi. 18, xiii. 43.)

Poppaeus, Q. Secundus, consul suffectus a.d. 9, with M. Papius Mutilius. These consuls gave their name to the celebrated Papius Poppaea lex, frequently called Julia et Papius Poppaea. (Dion Cass. ixi. 10; Diet. of Asia, p. 691, 2d ed.)

SECUNDUS, SATRI'NIUS, a dependant of Sejanus, accused Cremutius Cordus in a.d. 25. He afterwards betrayed his master, and gave information to Tiberius of the conspiracy which Sejanus had formed against him. Josephus relates (Ant. xviii. 6) that Antonia informed Tiberius of the conspiracy of Sejanus; and hence it has been conjectured that Secundus, unwilling or unable to have an interview with the emperor, had acquainted Antonia with the plot. Secundus was married to the notorious Alcucilla. (Tac. Ann. iv. 34, vi. 8, 47; Senec. Consol. ad Marcium, 22.)

SECUNDUS, VITRUVIUS, a Roman eques, was accused of malversation (repetundae) in Mauritania, and condemned, a.d. 60. He was banished from Italy, and escaped a heavier punishment through the influence of his brother Vibles Crispus. (Tac. Ann. xiv. 28.)

SECUNDUS, VITRUVIUS, secretary to Commodus, was put to death along with Paternus and Julianus upon the discovery of the conspiracy against the emperor in a.d. 183. (Lamprid. Consol. 4.) [W. R.]

SEDIGITUS, VOLCA'TIUS, is described by Pliny (H. N. xii. 43) as "illustrem in poetica." A Gallius (xv. 24) has preserved from his work de Poëtica, which appears to have been a sort of metrical Didascalia, thirteen Iambic senarii, in which the principal Latin comic dramatists are enumerated in the order of merit. In this "Canon," as it has been termed, the first place is assigned to Casellus Statius, the second to Quaestus, the third to Naevius, the fourth to Lucinius, the fifth to Attius, the sixth to Terentius, the seventh to Turpilius, the eighth to Trachis, the ninth to Luscetius, the tenth, "causa antiquitatis," to Emnus. In addition to these verses, two fragments, probably from the same piece with the above, one a single line, the other extending to three, and both referring to Terence, are quoted in the life of that writer ascribed to Suetonius. (Burmann, Anthol. Lat. ii. 223, or No. 140, ed. Meyer; Osann, Annot. Crit. p. 3; Ludwig, Uber den Canon des Valerii Secunditi, Programm zu Neustrelitz, 4to. 1842; Klussmann, De Naevio poëta.) [W. R.]

SEDUL'US, COELIUS, a Christian poet, who is termed a presbyter by Isidorus of Seville (de Script. Ecles. c. 7), and by Honorius of Autun (de S. E. iii. 7). By the writer known as Anonymous Mellicencis (c. 35, in the Bibli. Ecles. of Fabricius) he is called an Antistes, a title confirmed by two acrostic panegyrics to be found in the edition of Cellarius, while by Sigebertus of Glemberg (de S. E. 6), and by Theophanes (de S. E. 142) is designated to have been a sort of Antistes is frequently equivalent—but no one has pretended to discover the see over which he presided. We cannot determine with absolute precision the date either of his birth or of his death, but the period when he flourished may be defined within narrow limits. He refers (Epist. ad Muced.) to the controversies of Jerome, who died a.d. 420, and is himself praised by Cassiodorus (de Instit. div. leg. 27; comp. Venant. Fortunat. Carn. viii. 1; Vit. S. Martin. i. 15), who was born a.d. 466, and by Pope Gelasius, who presided over the Roman Church from a.d. 492 to a.d. 496. Moreover, his works were collected after his death and published by Asterius, as we learn from a short introductory epigram, to which is added, in some MSS., the note "Hoc opus Sedulius inter charitata dispersione reliquit; quod recollectum adornaturnque ad omnem elegantiam divulgatum est est Turcico Rafo Asterio V. C. consulone ordinaris atque patriocio." Upon returning to the Fasti we discover that an Asterius was consul along with Progenetes in a.d. 449, and that Turcins Rufus Apronianus Asterius was consul along with Prasidines in a.d. 496. Combining these facts little doubt can be entertained that the latter is the person indicated above, and that we may fix the epoch of Sedulius about a.d. 450. Of his personal history we know nothing whatsoever. By Trithemius (L. c.) indeed he is said to have been a Scot, the disciple of archbishop Hildebert; but this and similar statements arose, it would appear, from confounding three different persons, all ecclesiastics, who bore the same name: 1. Sedulius, the poet, who belongs, as we have proved, to the fifth century.
2. Sedulius, who, in attaching his signature to the Acts of the Council of Rome, held in A.D. 721, describes himself as "Episcopus Britannie de genere Scotorum." 3. Sedulius, an Irish Scot, who lived some hundred years later, and compiled from the works of Origen, Eusebius, Jerome, and other celebrated fathers, a commentary upon St. Paul still extant under the title "Seduli Scoti Hiberniensis in omnes epistulas Pauli Collectaneum." The following pieces by the first of these individuals have descended to us.

1. Paschale Carnes s. Mirabilium Divinorum Libri V., in heroic measure; to which is prefixed in some MSS. a "Praefatio," in eight elegiac couplets, addressed "ad Theodotum Augustam," in fifteen hexameters. If the inscription of the latter be genuine, it could not have been written after A.D. 450, for in that year the younger Theodosius died. There is also an introductory epistle addressed to the Abbot Macedonius, at whose request Sedulius had executed a prose version of the above poem. This prose version has been preserved and was published at Paris in 1585 by F. Juret, from a MS. the property of P. Pithou. Sigebertus (l. c.) maintains that the work was first composed in prose and afterwards versified. But this account is directly at variance with the words of the letter. There is some doubt as to the number of books into which the Paschale Carnes ought to be divided. Although the MSS. vary, all the best distribute it into five: the Anonymus Mellicensis (l. c.) says that it consists of two parts; Isidorus and Honorius (l. c.c.) agree that there are three, one being devoted to the signs and wonders commemorated in the Old Testament, two to the Sacraments and Miracles of Christ. Trithemius (l. c.) expressly names four, and this seems to have been the arrangement contemplated by the author, who thus (Epist. ad Mocced.) explains the nature, object, and extent of his undertaking: "Quatuor mirabilium divinorum libellos, quos, et pluribus paucus complexus, usque ad Passionem et Resurrectionem Ascensionemque Domini Nostri Jesu Christi, quatuor Evangelistarum dicta congregans, ordinavi, contra omnes aemulos tune defensioni commendo. Huic autem operi, favente Deo, Paschalis Carnenis nomen imposui quia Pascha nostrum immaculat est Christus." The most easy solution of the difficulty is to be found in the supposition which assigns the disposition of the parts, as they are now exhibited, to the first editor Asterius, who would probably give that form to the scattered papers of the deceased which to him appeared most appropriate, while transcribers, following their own judgment, may have thought fit to introduce changes, and thus have caused the discrepancies and contradictions which we meet with in the historians of ecclesiastical literature. It is not improbable that Sedulius may, at one time, have intended the Miracles of the Old Testament to constitute a separate work, and it may even be urged that the words quoted above apply to the New Testament exclusively.

2. Venerabilis viri Sedulli Paschalliae Opera, quod heroici descripti versibus, insigni laude proferimus. In transcribing the document the word haurietis was accidentally substituted for heroici, and the error passed undetected in some of the authorised collections of Canons. Hence it came to pass that, for a considerable period, zealous churchmen, and among them Pope Paulus II. and Pope Hadrianus VI., moved by the authority of one so holy, were in the habit of anathematising poets in general, and of declaring that all who meddled with verse, even although the theme might relate to holy things, were heretics and accursed.

The Editio Princeps of Sedulius is a quarto volume, printed at Paris by Badius Ascensius, but without a date; the second edition was published along with Juvenal and others by Aldus, 4to. Venice. 1505. The most elaborate editions are those of Cellarius, 8vo. Hal. 1704 and 1739; of Arntzenius, 4to. Leovard. 1761; and of Arevalus, 4to. Rom. 1794. The different pieces will be found in "Poetarum veterum ecclesiasticorum Opera..."
SEGIMERUS.

SEGESTA (Σεγέστα). The Trojan Phoeni-dammas (others call him Hippotes, Ippoteus or Ippsosstratus) had three daughters. When he was to be compelled by Laomedon to expose one of them to the marine monster which was ravaging the country, he called the three together and induced them to compel Laomedon, whose guilt had brought the monster into the country, to expose his own daughter Hesione. Laomedon then took vengeance by causing some sailors to convey the three daughters of Phoeni-damas to a desert part of the coast of Sicily (some say Libya). One of these maidens was Segesta or Egesta, with whom the river god Crimissus, in the shape of a bear or a dog, begot Aegestus, Egestus or Acestes, by whom Egesta in Sicily was built. (Tzetz. ad Lycoph. 471, 953; Serv. ad Aen. i. 550, v. 30; Dionys. i. 52.)

SEGESTES, a Cherusan chiefman, the oppo-tent of Arminius. He was alternately the conqueror and the captive of his great rival. Private injuries embittered their political feud, for Arminius carried off and forcibly married the daughter of Segestes. In a.d. 9 Segestes warned Quintilius Varus of the conspiracy of Armi-nius. Sigimer and other Cherusan chiefs against him, and counselled him to arrest them ere the revolt broke out.
His warning was disregarded, and Varus perished.
In a.d. 14 Segestes was forced by his tribesmen into a war with Rome; but he still corresponded with the enemy, and sent to Germanicus information of the plans and movements of the Cheruscan.
His treachery was probably discovered, since the Cheruscan attacked Segestes in his own house, and he was rescued with difficulty by a detachment sent by Germanicus. Segestes was accompanied by the Roman camp by his children, his slaves, and clients. He extenuated his part in the war by pleading his services to Augustus, who had granted him the Roman franchise, and he offered to negotiate peace with the insurgent Germans. Germanicus assigned Segestes a secure dwelling-place in Narbonne, and pardoned his son Sigimundus who had revolted. The daughter of Segestes, although eluded the care of a Roman lady of the house of Armi-nius, than to her father's, was sent with her infant son to Ravenna. (Tac. Ann. i. 55–59; Vell.
Pat. ii. 118; Flor. iv. 12.) [W. B. D.]

SEGGETIA, a Roman divinity, who, together with Setia or Seja and Semonia, was invoked by the careful Latins at seed time, for Segetia, like the two other names, is connected with sero and seges.
(Plin. H. N. xviii. 2, 2; Macrobi. Sat. i. 16; August.
De Civ. Dei, iv. 8; comp. Tertull. De Spect. 8.)

SEGIMERUS ("the Conqueror"), brother of Segestes, was one of the leaders of the Cherus-cans in the revolt of Lower Germany, in a.d. 9. He was present with Arminius in the camp of Varus, and lured him on to his defeat and death [Arminius].
In a.d. 15 Sigimerus surrendered himself and his son Sesithecus to Sertinius, a lieutenant of Germanicus. He was banished to Cologne. His son's pardon was obtained with manly courtesy, since Sesithecus was accused by the survivors of Varus's legions of having treated with contumely their leader's remains. (Tac. Ann. i. 71; Strab. vii. p.
293; Dion Cass. iv. 19.) [W. B. D.]

SEGIMUNDUS; the son of Segestes, was appointed priest of an altar in the neighbourhood of Cologne, probably the altar raised to Augustus Caesar. He afterwards rejoined his tribe, the Che-ruscans. In a.d. 14 Sigimundus was one of the envoys whom Segestes sent to Germanicus, when the Cheruscans were besieging him in his own house. Germanicus pardoned the previous defection of Sigimundus, and allowed him to share his father's exile in Narbonne. [SEGESTES. (Tac. Ann. i.
57, 58; Strab. vii. p. 291.) [W. B. D.]

SEGONAX, one of the kings of Cantium in Britain, who joined Cassivellaunus to oppose Caesar.
(Caes. B. G. v. 22.)

SEGULIUS, an artist in gold (aurofax, sic), whose name is found in a Latin inscription (Gruter,
p. dxxxi. 1), in which his full name is D. Segulius Alexas (sic). The last word, in this case, as in the names of Aulus and Quintius Alexa (Quintus), is commonly supposed to be an abbreviation of the affectionate Alexandri or of Alexas; but Raoul-Rochee thinks that it is a distinct cognomen. (Lettre a M. Sborh., pp. 123, 401, 2d ed.) [F. S.]

SEGULIUS LA'BE'O, a friend of Octavianus,
B.C. 43, is called by Cicero, "homo nequaquam." (Cic.
Ad Fam. iv. 20. 7.)

SEJANUS, A. CASSIUS. Dion Cassius says that his patroness was Lucius. Tacitus (Ann.
iv. 1, &c.) is our chief authority for the history of this infamous instrument of Tiberius. Sejanus was born at Vul sinae, in Etruria: he was the son of Seius Strabo, a Roman eques, who was commander of the praetorian troops at the close of the reign of Augustus and the commencement of that of Tiber-us. Velleius Paterculus (ii. 127) says that he was of illustrious descent on the maternal side; and Lipsius conjectures that his mother was of the Junia gens, because Junius Blaesus, proconsul of Africa, was the maternal uncle of Sejanus (Tacit.
Ann. iii. 72). Rumour accused him of selling himself, when a young man, to the lust of Apicius, a rich debauchee (Dion Cass. liv. 19). Sejanus ultimately gained such influence over Tiberius, that this suspicious man, who was close and reserved to all mankind, opened his bosom to Seja-enus, and made him his confidant. Sejanus had a body capable of enduring fatigue, and a mind capable of the boldest projects; but he concealed his own thoughts, and was a calumniator of others;
he could fawn and crouch to power, though he was insolent to those below him; to the world he put on the appearance of moderation, but his greedi-ness had no bounds; and to accomplish his purposes he could be magnificent and profuse, as well as laborious and vigilant. Such was the character of the man who for many years governed Tiberius.
In the year in which Augustus died, a.d. 14, Sejanus was made the colleague of his father in the command of the Praetorian bands, and was sent by Tiberius to accompany his son Drusus, in his visit to the mutinous legions in Pannonia (Tacit. Ann. i. 24). Upon his father being sent as governor to Egypt, Sejanus had the sole command of the Praetorian cohorts. When Agrippina, the wife of Germanicus, by her heroic resolution, had prevented the bridge over the Rhine from being destroyed, and thus secured to the Roman legions their retreat from the east bank of the river, the suspicious temper of Tiberius, who was afraid of a woman of such a stamp, was still further irritated by the insinuations of Sejanus, who sowed the seeds of hatred in the mind of Tiberius, to the end that they might ripen in due time. The ambitious designs of Sejanus began to be suspected by the Romans when Tiberius betrothed the daughter of Sejanus to Drusus, the son of Claudius, who was afterwards emperor. The marriage was prevented by the untimely death of the youth (Sueton. Claud. 27). In a. d. 22 the theatre of Pompeius was burnt (Tacit. Ann. iii. 72), on which occasion Sejanus received the thanks of Tiberius, for preventing the conflagration from spreading further. Seneca (Ad Marciam, 22) states, that when a statue of Sejanus was decreed to be placed in the building which Tiberius restored, Cremutius Cordus exclaimed that the theatre was now really ruined.

Sejanus was the person who advised that the Praetorian cohorts, which had hitherto been disposed in various parts of the city, should be stationed in one camp (Tacit. Ann. iv. 2), a measure which was entirely opposed to the system of Augustus (Sueton. Aug. 19). He urged that the troops would be less manageable if they were scattered; that they would be more efficient for all emergencies if they were in one place; and would be more removed from the dissipation of the city. But they were not removed from the city; they were stationed close to it; and they afterwards controlled Rome, as masters, whenever the occasion came. The object of Sejanus was to make himself popular with the soldiers. He appointed the centurions and tribunes: he gave posts of honour and emolument to his creatures and favourites; and Tiberius, the most suspicious of men, had such confidence in the prefect, that he called him his associate in the labours of administration, and allowed his busts to stand in the theatres and fora, and even to be placed in the principia of the legions. The cunning tyrant was completely infatuated with a man whose object was to destroy his master.

There were many obstacles between Sejanus and the imperial power, but he set about removing them. Drusus, the son of Tiberius, who was of a hasty temper, had given Sejanus a blow, in a dispute with him; for this version of the story is more probable than that which makes Sejanus give the blow (Tacit. Ann. iv. 3, and the note of Lipsius). Sejanus revenged himself by debauching Livia or Livilla, the sister of Germanicus, and the wife of Drusus; and he encouraged her to the murder of her husband, by promising her marriage and a participation in the imperial power to which he aspired. To show that he was in earnest, Sejanus divorced his wife Apicata. The crime was delayed until there was a fitting opportunity, and Drusus was poisoned by Sejanus (Tacit. Ann. iv. 8, 16, a. d. 22). Sejanus asked the permission of Tiberius to marry Livia, but the emperor rejected his petition, though in studied language, and in terms that did not take away all hope. Sejanus saw that it was time to act with caution; he persuaded Tiberius to retire from Rome into privacy, hoping that he should thus gradually centre all the administration in himself. Agrippina, the wife of Germanicus, was now a widow; and Sejanus, who feared and hated her, instilled into Tiberius suspicions that she had a party at Rome. Agrippina, being weary of her widowed state, asked Tiberius to allow her to marry again; but the emperor gave no answer to her urgent entreaties. Sejanus seized the occasion to make Agrippina suspicious of the designs of Tiberius, and his agents persuaded her that the emperor designed to take her off by poison. Agrippina, who was not a woman to conceal her thoughts, plainly showed Tiberius, at a banquet, that she suspected his designs; and the emperor uttered words which importing that if he were suspected of wishing to poison her, it could not be surprising if he let her feel his resentment. An accident increased the credit of Sejanus, and confirmed the confidence of Tiberius. The emperor, with Sejanus and others, was feasting in a natural cave, between Amycnes, which was on the sea coast, and the hills of Fundi. The entrance of the cave suddenly fell in, and crushed some of the slaves; and all the guests, in alarm, tried to make their escape. Sejanus, resting his knees on the couch of Tiberius, and placing his shoulders under the falling rock, protected his master, and was discovered in this posture by the soldiers who came to their relief. After Tiberius had shut himself up in the island of Capeare, Sejanus had full scope for exercising his power, and the death of Livia, the mother of Tiberius (a. d. 29), was followed by the banishment of Agrippina and her sons Nero and Drusus.

Tiberius at last began to suspect the designs of Sejanus; perhaps he had suspected them for some time, but he had duplicity enough to conceal his suspicions. Josephus states that Antonia, his sister-in-law, informed him by letter of the ambitious views of Sejanus. Tiberius felt that it was time to rid himself of a man who was almost more than a rival. To cover his schemes and remove Sejanus from about him, Tiberius made him joint consul with himself, in A. D. 31; and gave a pontificate to him and his son. Still he would not let Sejanus come to him in his retreat, and while he still amused him with the hopes of Livia's marriage, he was plotting his ruin. In the mean time Tiberius strengthened himself by making Caligula a pontifex Augusti and intimating that he was to be his successor. Sejanus saw the danger coming, but he was unable to prevent it. Tiberius, along with his usual duplicity, gave Sejanus reason to believe that he was going to associate him with himself in the tribunitian authority; but at the same time he sent Sertorius Macro to Rome, with a commission to take the command of the praetorian cohorts. Macro, after assuring himself of the troops, and depriving Sejanus of his usual guard, produced a letter from Tiberius to the senate. Tiberius expressed himself in his usual perplexed way, when he wished his meaning to be inferred without being declared in explicit terms. The meaning was clear enough; he was afraid of Sejanus, and wished to be secured against him. Sejanus, who was present, had received the usual fawning submission of the servile senate, so long as they thought that the letter of Tiberius was going to announce new honours for him. When it was read, there was not a man among them to give him a word of consolation or show him a sign of respect. The consul Regulus conducted him to prison, and the people, who would have declared him emperor, if the word had been given to them, loaded him with insult and outrage. His statues were pulled down before his face. The senate on the same day decreed his death, and he was immediately executed. His body was dragged about the streets, and finally thrown into the Tiber; or rather, says Seneca.

that aedileship, ad had condemned a p. was heads were a panegyrist who truth her, and accordingly she was ravished by the executioner before she was put to death. (Tacit. Ann. v. 9.)

Apicata, the divorced wife of Sejanus, after having informed Tiberius by letter that his son Drusus had been poisoned by Sejanus and Livia, killed herself. This disclosure brought about more executions. It is said that Tiberius would have pardoned Livia, but that her mother Antonia would not pardon her, and compelled her to die by starvation. The property of Sejanus was taken from the neronium into the fiscus. (Tacit. Ann. vi. 2.)

The annals of Tacitus, the chief authority for the history of Sejanus are Suetonius, Tiberius, and Dion Cassius, livi. viii. All the authorities are referred to by Tillemont, Historie des Empereurs, vol. i. Velleius Paterculus is a panegyrist of Sejanus; and if Tacitus has told the truth of Sejanus, Paterculus was a vile flatterer. The fact that he dedicated his work to M. Vinius, who was consul a. d. 30, shows the latest period at which he was writing. He may have perished with Sejanus. [Paterculus.]

SEJANUS, L., was praetor a. d. 32. Though a friend of Aelius Sejanus, and probably a kinman, he was spared by Tiberius. This Sejanus, at the celebration of the Flora, employed only bald-headed persons to perform the ceremonies, which were prolonged to the evening, and the spectators were lighted out of the theatre by five thousand children, with torches in their hands and their heads shaved. This was done to ridicule the Tiberius, whose head had been cut off. Tiberius was thus affected to know nothing of this insult. It became a fashion, in consequence of this affair, to call bald persons Sejani. (Dion Cassius, lix. 19.) [G.L.]

SELENIUS. [Silenus.]

SEIUS. 1. M. SEIUS L. F., distinguished himself by his largesses to the people in his curule aedilship, although he had been previously condemned to the payment of so great a fine that he had no longer sufficient property to entitle him to a place in the equestrian census. We do not know the year in which he was aedile; but Cicero says that he was elected in preference to M. Pupius Piso, who was consul in b. c. 61 (Plin. H. N. xvi. 1; Cic. de Off. ii. 17, pro Planc. 5). In b. c. 52 he accused M. Saufeius, who was defended by Cicero [Sapeius, No. 2]. In the following year, b. c. 51, he was involved in the condemnation of Plautorius ( incentiv Plautorion ambuscus, Cic. ad Att. v. 20, § 8). [Plautorius, No. 5.] He was a friend of Atticus and Cicero, and the latter laments his death in b. c. 45. (Ascon. in Milon. p. 55, ed. Orrelli; Var. R. R. iii. 2, § 7, iii. 10, § 1; Cic. ad Fam. ix. 7, ad Att. v. 13, xii. 11.)

2. M. SEIUS, probably the son of the preceding, was a friend, and apparently legatus, of D. Brutus, in b. c. 44. (Cic. ad Fam. xi. 7.)

3. SEIUS, was a partisan of M. Antonius, after the death of Caesar, and is therefore abused by Cicero (Phil. xii. 6). The person called Viseus in another passage of Cicero (Phil. xiii. 12), is probably a false reading for Seius.

4. Cn. SEIUS, and the finest horse of his age, which was fatal to bring destruction to whoever possessed it. Seius was condemned and put to death by M. Antonius, afterwards the triumvir, apparently during the civil war between Caesar and the Pompeians. This horse then passed into the hands of Dolabella, and afterwards into those of Cassius, both of whom perished by a violent death. Hence arose the proverb concerning an unfortunate man: ille homo habet eumam Sejanum. (Gell. iii. 9.)

SELENE/NE (Σελήνη), also called Mene, or Latin Luna, was the goddess of the moon, or the moon personified into a divine being. She is called a daughter of Hyperion and Theia, and accordingly a sister of Helios and Eos (Hom. Hymn. 31. 5), or of Pallus (Hom. Hymn. in Merc. 99, &c.), or of Zeus and Latona (Schol. ad Eurip. Phoenix, 175), or lastly of Helios (Eurip. i.e.; comp. Hygin. Proph. p. 16, ed. Muncker). She is also called Phoebe, as the sister of Phoebus, the god of the sun. By Endymion, whom she loved, and whom she sent to sleep in order to kiss him, she became the mother of fifty daughters (Apollod. i. 7. § 5; Cic. Tusc. i. 38; Catull. 66. 5; Paul. v. 1. § 2); by Zeus she became the mother of Pandela, Ersa, and Nemea (Hom. Hymn. 32. 14; Plut. Sympos. iii. in fin.; Schol. ad Pind. Nem. Hypoth. p. 425, ed. Bicköch). Pan also is said to have had connexion with her in the shape of a white ram (Virg. Georg. iii. 391). Selene is described as a very beautiful goddess, with long wings and a long head (Hom. Hymn. 32. 1. 7). As Aeschylus (Sept. 390) calls her the eye of night. She rode, like her brother Helios, across the heavens in a chariot drawn by two white horses, cows, or mules (Orv. Fast. iv. 374, iii. 110, Rom. Am. 258; Aesop. Ep. v. 3; Claudian, Rapt. Prosperp. iii. 403; Nonn. Dionys. vii. 244). She was represented on the pedestal of the throne of Zeus at Olympia, riding on a horse or a mule (Pans. v. 11. § 3); and at Elis there was a statue of her with two horns (Pans. vi. 24. § 5). In later times Selene was identified with Artemis, and the worship of the two became amalgamated (Callim. Hymn. in Dion. 114. 141; Soph. Oed. Tyr. 207; Plut. Sympos. i.e.; Catull. 34. 16; Serv. ad Aen. iv. 511, vi. 118). In works of art, however, the two divinities are usually distinguished; the face of Selene being more full and round, her figure less tall, and always clothed in a long robe; her veil forms an arch above her head, and above it there is the crescent. (Hirt, Mythol. Bilderb., p. 38.)

At Rome Luna had a temple on the Aventine, (Liv. xl. 2; Orv. Fast. iii. 804.) [L.S.]

Antiochus VI. had no connection with the race of the Seleucidae, and is consequently omitted in this table, as well as his latter Alexander Balas, and Alexander Zéna, both of whom were mere pretenders.
SELEUCUS.

SELEUCUS (Seleukos), historical. 1. A king of Bosporus, of whom we know only that he ascended the throne in B.C. 435, on the death of Spartacus I., and reigned four years. (Diod. xii. 36.)

2. A Macedonian, father of Ptolemy, the Soma- tophylax of Alexander the Great, who was killed at the battle of Issus. [Ptolemaeus, No. 4.]

3. The second son of Antiochus VII. Sidetes, and elder brother of Antiochus Cyzicenus. In the battle against the Parthians, in which Antiochus Sidetes was slain, B.C. 128, Seleucus was taken prisoner: he was kindly received by the Parthian monarch, and treated with royal magnificence; but it does not appear that he ever regained his liberty (Enes. Arn. p. 167). A passage of Posidonius (ap. Athen. iv. p. 153), which had been referred to Froelich and other writers to SELEUCUS CALLINICUS, evidently relates to the captive of this Seleucus, though inadvertently it gives him the title of king. (Niebuhr, K. Schrif. p. 500.)

4. Surnamed Κυδωνακτής, the packer of salt fish, a name given him in derision by the Alexandrians, because of a certain man of ignoble birth, and a low condition, but who pretended to be descended from the royal race of the Seleucidae. On this account he was chosen by the Alexandrians in B.C. 58, when they had expelled their king Ptolemy Auletes, and established his daughter Berenice on the throne, to be the husband of their young queen. He was accordingly sent for from Syria, and the marriage actually solemnized; but Berenice was so disgusted with his mean and sordid character, that she caused him to be strangled only a few days after their nuptials (Dion Cass. xxxix. 57; Strab. xviii. p. 796; Suet. Vesp. 19). Vaillant (Hist. Reg. Syr. p. 397) and Froelich suppose him to have been a younger brother of Antiochus Asiaticus, and the same who accompanied him to Rome about B.C. 73 (see Cic. Verr. iv. 27); but both Dion Cassius and Strabo clearly imply that he was a mere pretender. But, from his being selected by the Alexandrians, it is not improbable that he claimed to be a son of Antiochus X. and Cleopatra Selene, which would give him an apparent connection with the royal family of Egypt also. [E. H. B.]

SELEUCUS I. (Seleukos) surnamed Nicator, king of Syria, and the founder of the Syrian monarchy. He was the son of Antiochus, a Macedonian of distinction among the officers of Philip II., but fabulous stories were in circulation (evidently fabricated after he had attained to greatness), which represented him as the offspring of a miraculous intercourse of his mother Laodice with Apollo. (Justin. xv. 4.) From the statements concerning his age at his death, his birth may be probably assigned to about B.C. 358, and he would thus be about twenty-four years old when he accompanied Alexander on his expedition to Asia, as one of the officers of the ιππαγός, or horse-guards. He was early distinguished for his great personal strength, as well as courage, of which he is said to have afforded a proof by overcoming a savage bull, unarmed and single-handed. (Appian. Syr. 57; Ael. V. H. xii. 16.) Of his services as an officer we hear nothing during the early campaigns of Alexander in Asia; but it is evident that he must have earned the confidence of that monarch, as at the passage of the Hydaspes, in B.C. 327, we find him selected by the king, together with Ptolemy, Perdiccas, and Lysimachus, to accompany him with the body of troops which were to cross the river in the first instance. In the subsequent battle against Porus, also, he bore an important part. (Arr. Anab. v. 13.) But that these services were only a small portion of those actually rendered by him, during the Indian campaigns, may be inferred from the circumstance that, after the return of Alexander to Susa, Seleucus was one of the officers upon whom the king bestowed, as a reward, the hand of an Asiatic princess. His bride was Apama, the daughter, according to Arrian, of the Bactrian chief Spatimenes, though Strabo calls her father, probably erroneously, Artabazus. (Arr. Anab. vii. 4; Strab. xii. p. 578.)

Seleucus was in close attendance upon Alexander during his last illness, and is mentioned as one of the officers who consulted the oracle of Serapis in regard to his recovery (Arr. Anab. vii. 26). During the dissensions which followed the death of the great king, he took part with Perdiccas and the other leaders of the cavalry, and was rewarded for his services by having the arrangements ultimately adopted, the important post of chaliph of the ιππαγός, one of the most honourable appointments in the army, and which had previously been held by Perdiccas himself. (Arrian. ap. Phot. p. 69 a; Diod. xviii. 3; Appian. Syr. 57; Justin. xiii. 4, who inaccurately terms it "castrorum tribunatus.") The regent, doubtless, thought that he could reckon with security on the fidelity of Seleucus; but the latter, though he adhered to him until the expedition against Egypt, and accompanied him on that occasion, was one of the first to join in the discontent which broke out on the disasters sustained at the passage of the Nile [PERDICCAS], and even put himself at the head of the mutineers who broke into the regent's tent, and transfixed him on their spears. (Corn. Nep. Eum. 5; Diod. xviii. 56.)

During the troubles that followed, we find him interposing his influence on the behalf of the mutineers, and joining them at Susiana, when assailed by the invectives of Eurydice; and, in the second partition of the provinces (at Tripoladeisus, B.C. 321), he obtained for his portion the wealthy and important satrapy of Babylon, of which he hastened to take possession. (Arr. ap. Phot. p. 71 b; Diod. xviii. 39, xix. 12; App. Syr. 57.)

The ambitious designs of Pithon having involved that general in war with the neighbouring satrapies, and ultimately led to his expulsion from his own government [PITHON], Seleucus afforded him a refuge in Babylonia, and was preparing to support him by arms, when the approach of Eumenes attracted the attention of both the contending parties in another direction. Seleucus and Pithon immediately declared in favour of Antigonus, and endeavoured, though without success, to prevent Eumenes from crossing the Tigris and effecting a junction with the forces assembled under Peusentes and his brother satraps. Seleucus, however, remained in possession of Babylonia, and sent to Antigonus to hasten his march. On the arrival of the latter, he joined him with all his forces, and they advanced together into Susiana, which was annexed by Antigonus to the satrapy of Seleucia, and the latter was appointed to carry on the siege of Susa, while Antigonus himself advanced into Upper Asia against Eumenes. Before the close of the campaigns in Media, which terminated in the defeat of Eumenes. Seleucus had made himself master of Susa, and returned to Babylon, where he received Antigonus in the most splendid manner, on his return from the upper provinces. But the victory of that general had entirely altered his position in relation to his former allies, and the fate of Pithon might well serve as a warning to his brother satraps. Nor was it long before these apprehensions were confirmed: Antigonus first took occasion to find fault with some exercise of authority on the part of Seleucus, and at length went so far as to call him to account for the administration of the revenues of his satrapy, an assumption of superiority to which he altogether refused to submit. But Seleucus was unable to cope with the power of his adversary, and consequently determined to escape the fate which awaited him, by timely flight, and secretly quitted Babylon with only fifty horsemen. Antigonus in vain issued orders for his pursuit and apprehension, and he made his way, in safety, through Mesopotamia and Syria, into Egypt, n. c. 316. (Diod. xviii. 78, xix. 12–14, 16, 43, 55; App. Syr. 53.) Here he immediately endeavoured to arouse Ptolemy to a sense of the danger impending from the power and ambition of Antigonus, and succeeded in inducing him to unite with Lysimachus and Cassander in a league against their common enemy. (Diod. xix. 56; App. Syr. 53.) In the war that followed (for the events of which see PTOLEMAEUS, p. 592) Seleucus took an active part. He was at first appointed to command the fleet of Ptolemy, with which we find him carrying on operations on the coast of Syria during the siege of Tyre by Antigonus, as well as subsequently in Ionia and the islands of the Aegean, and rendering important assistance to Menelaus in the conquest of Cyprus. At length, in n. c. 312, he induced Ptolemy to take the field in person in Cœle-Syria, against the youthful Demetrius, and bore an important part in the battle of Gaza. This victory laid the way once more to the Babylon and the East, and he now prevailed upon Ptolemy to send him, with a small force, to regain possession of his former satrapy. On this daring enterprise he set out with only 800 foot and 200 horse, but was joined by reinforcements on his march through Mesopotamia; and so great was his popularity, that all the inhabitants of Babylonia declared in his favour. He entered the city without opposition, and speedily reduced the garrison, which had taken refuge in the citadel. It is from the recovery of Babylon by Seleucus at this period, that the Syrian monarchy is commonly reckoned to commence, and we find the coins of the Syrian kings, as well as many later writers, calculating the years from this epoch. This era of the Seleucidae, as it is termed, has been determined by chroniclers to the 1st of October, n. c. 312. (Diod. xix. 58, 60, 62, 68, 80, 83, 84, 90, 91; Appian, Syr. 54; Euseb. Arm. p. 163; Froelich. Annales Regum Syriæ, p. 9; Ideker, Handtb. d. Chronologie, vol. i. pp. 445–451; Clinton, F. H. vol. ii. p. 172; Eckhel, vol. iii. pp. 210, 221.) Meanwhile Nicimon, the satrap of Media, had assembled a large force, with which he advanced to oppose Seleucus; but the latter hastened to meet him in the field, totally defeated him at the passage of the Tigris, and followed up his victory by the conquest of Susiana, Media, and some adjacent districts. But while he was thus engaged in the upper provinces, Demetrius, who had been detached by his father Antigonus, from Syria, had regained possession of Babylon, which Ptolemy (who had been left there by Seleucus) was unable to hold against him. The invader was, however, foiled in the attempt to redeem one of the citadels attached to the capital; and soon after, by his hasty return to Syria left it open to Seleucus to recover possession of Babylonia, which the latter probably effected with little difficulty. (Diod. xix. 100; Plut. Demetr. 7.)

From this period we are left almost wholly in the dark, as to the subsequent operations of Seleucus, during an interval of nearly ten years. It is not a little singular that his name is not even mentioned in the treaty of peace concluded in n. c. 311, by his confederates Ptolemy, Lysimachus, and Cassander with Antigonus, in which the latter was acknowledged as ruler of Asia. (Diod. xix. 105.) But though thus apparently abandoned by his allies, he had, in fact, little to fear from Antigonus, who was too much occupied with the affairs of Western Asia to find leisure for another expedition against the East, and Seleucus appears to have been left to pursue, without interruption, his career of conquest in the upper provinces. All details, however, concerning his operations in these quarters, are lost to us; and we know only the general fact, that by a series of successive campaigns he gradually extended his power over all the eastern provinces which had formed part of the empire of Alexander, from the Euphrates to the banks of the Oxus and the Indus. One of the most memorable of his wars was that with Sandracottus, an Indian king of the regions on the banks of the Ganges, who had availed himself of the disorders which followed the death of Eumenes, to establish his power over the Macedonian satrapies east of the Indus. [SANDRACOTTUS.] Both the date and the circumstances of this war are unfortunately lost; but it was terminated by a treaty by which Seleucus contracted a matrimonial alliance with the Indian monarch, to whom he ceded all the provinces beyond the Indus, and even that of Paropamisus, in exchange for the gift of 500 elephants, an immense addition to his military resources. (Justin. xiv. 4; Appian. Syr. 55; Strab. xvi. p. 724.)

Seleucus had followed the example of Antigonus and Ptolemy, by formally assuming, in n. c. 306, the regal title and diadem, which he had already previously adopted in his intercourse with the barbarian nations by whom he was surrounded (Diod. xx. 53; Plut. Demetr. 18): and he was probably inferior to none of the rival monarchs in power when he was induced, in n. c. 302, to accede to the league formed for the second time by Ptolemy, Lysimachus, and Cassander, against their common enemy Antigonus. The army which he brought into the field, considerably exceeded those of his allies; and he arrived in Cappadocia before the close of the autumn, with 20,000 foot, 12,000 horse, and the overwhelming force of 480 elephants. (Diod. xx. 106, 113.) The events of the cam-

* Droysen, indeed, supposes him to have made such an expedition; but there is no authority for this, and it seems impossible to suppose that an event of such importance would have been omitted by Diodorus.
paign which followed (n. c. 301), are very imperfectly known; but it seems certain that the decisive victory of the confederates at Ipsus [Lysimachus] was mainly owing to the cavalry and elephants of Seleucus, as well as to the skill with which he himself took advantage of the errors of Demetrius. (Plut. Demetr. 29.)

The removal of their common antagonist quickly brought about a change in the dispositions of the confederates towards each other. In the division of the spoil, Seleucus certainly obtained the largest share, being rewarded for his services with a great part of Asia Minor (which was divided between him and Lysimachus) as well as the whole of Syria, from the Euphrates to the Mediterranean. Ptolemy, however, laid claim to Phoenicia and Coele-Syria, and the possession of these provinces, so fruitful a subject of dissension between their successors, was near producing an immediate breach between the two kings of Syria and Egypt. Seleucus, indeed, waived his pretensions for the time; but the jealousy thus excited, was increased by the close alliance soon after concluded between Ptolemy and Lysimachus, and Seleucus sought to strengthen himself in his turn, by forming a matrimonial connection with Demetrius. His overtures to that prince were joyfully welcomed, the two rivals met on the most friendly terms, and the nuptials of Seleucus and Stratonice were celebrated, with great magnificence, at Rhodes, on the Syrian coast. But even before the two princes separated, the seeds of new disputes were sown between them, by the refusal of Demetrius to yield to his son-in-law the important fortresses of Sidon and Tyre. (Plut. Demetr. 31—33; Diod. xxi. Exc. Vet. pp. 42, 43.) A few years afterwards, Seleucus appears to have taken advantage of the wars which kept Demetrius continually occupied in Greece, to wrest from him possession, not only of these fortresses, but that of Cilicia also. (Droysen, vol. i. p. 572.)

The empire of Seleucus was now by far the most extensive and powerful of those which had been formed out of the dominions of Alexander. It comprised the whole of Asia, from the remote provinces of Bactria and Sagriana to the coasts of Phoenicia, and from the Paropamisus to the Euphrates; and even the boundaries, which separated him from Lysimachus is not clearly defined. These extensive dominions were subdivided into seventy-two satrapies; an arrangement evidently adopted with a view of breaking down the excessive power previously possessed by the several governors: but notwithstanding this precaution, Seleucus appears to have felt the difficulty of exercising a vigilant control over so extensive an empire, and accordingly, in b. c. 293, consigned the government of all the provinces beyond the Euphrates to his son Antiochus, upon whom he bestowed the title of king, as well as the hand of his own youthful wife, Stratonice, for whom the prince had conceived a violent attachment. (Appian, Syr. 53, 59—62; Plut. Demetr. 30.)

In b. c. 293, the ambitious designs of Demetrius (now become king of Macedonia) once more aroused the common jealousy of his old adversaries, and led Seleucus again to unite in a league with Ptolemy and Lysimachus against him. But he appears to have taken little part in the hostilities which followed, even when Demetrius, driven from his kingdom by Lysimachus, transported the seat of war into Asia Minor; nor was it until the fugitive monarch, hemmed in on all sides, threw himself into Cilicia, that Seleucus thought fit to take the field in person. Even then he readily entered into negotiations with Demetrius, and even allowed him to take up his winter quarters, during a truce of two months, in Catoonia; but his apprehensions were soon again roused, he fortified all the mountain passes so as effectually to surround Demetrius, and the latter was at length, after various vicissitudes of fortune, compelled to surrender to the Syrian king, b. c. 286. Seleucus had the generosity to treat his captive in a friendly and liberal manner; but at the same time took care to provide for his safe custody in the city of Apamea, on the Orontes. (Plut. Demetr. 44, 47—50; Polyæn. iv. 9. §§ 2, 3, 5.)

Lysimachus in vain represented to him the danger of allowing so formidable an enemy any hope of escape, and urged him to put Demetrius at once to death; Seleucus indignant refused to listen to his proposals; and it is even said that he was really designing to set his illustrious prisoner altogether at liberty, when the death of Demetrius himself, in the third year of his captivity, prevented the execution of the plan. (Plut. Demetr. 51, 52; Diod. xxx. Exc. Vales. P. 361.)

It is probable that Seleucus was influenced as much by policy as by generosity in his conduct on this occasion: increasing jealousies between him and Lysimachus had long threatened to lead to an open rupture, and it was not long after the death of Demetrius before the domestic dissensions in the family of the Thracian king [Agathocles; Lysimachus] brought on the long-impending crisis. After the death of the unhappy Agathocles, his widow Lysandra and her children fled for refuge to the court of Seleucus, who received them in the most friendly manner. The general discontent excited in the dominions of Lysimachus by this event, and the defection of many of his principal officers, encouraged the Syrian king to commence hostilities against him, and he accordingly assembled a large army with which he invaded the dominions of his rival in person. Lysimachus, on his side, was not slow to meet him, and having taken possession of the city of Coromenea, on the river Hyphasis, at 281, which terminated in the defeat and death of the Thracian monarch. (Memnon, c. 8; Justin, xvii. 1, 2; Appian, Syr. 62.) This victory appears to have been followed by the speedy submission of all the Asiatic provinces as far as the Hellespont; but not contented with this, Seleucus was desirous to occupy the throne of Macedonia, which had been left vacant by the death of Lysimachus; and after spending a few months in arranging the affairs of Asia, the government of which he now consigned wholly to his son Antiochus, he himself crossed the Hellespont at the head of an army. But he had advanced no farther than Lysimachia, when he was assassinated by Ptolemy Ceraunus, to whom, as the son of his old friend and ally, he had extended a friendly protection. His body was redeemed by Philocrates, the governor of Pergamus, who, after paying him due funeral honours, sent his remains to Antiochus, by whom they were deposited at Seleucia on the Orontes, in a temple dedicated to his memory. His death took place in the beginning of b. c. 280, only seven months after that of Lysimachus, and in the thirty-second year of his reign. According to Justin, he was at this time more than seventy-seven years old, but Appian makes him only seventy-three. (Appian, Syr. 62, 63; Justin. xvi. 1, 2; Menon. c. 11, 12; Paus. i. 16. § 2; Oros. iii. 23; Euseb. Arm. p. 163.)

We have little information concerning the personal character of Seleucus, but he is pronounced by Pausanias (i. 16. § 3) to have been the most upright among the successors of Alexander, and it is certain that his memory is stained with none of those crimes which are a reproach to the names of Lysimachus, Cassander, and even Ptolemy. Of his consummate abilities as a general no doubt can be entertained; and the little we know of his administration of the vast empire which he had united under his sceptre, gives an equally favourable impression of his political talents. He appears to have carried out, with great energy and perseverance, the projects originally formed by Alexander himself, for the Hellenization of his Asiatic empire; and we find him founding, in almost every province, Greek or Macedonian colonies, which became so many centres of civilization and refinement. Of these no less than sixteen are mentioned as bearing the name of Antiochus after his father; five of that of Lacedee, from his mother; seven were called after himself Seleucia, three from the name of his first wife, Apamea; and one Stratonicea, from his second wife, the daughter of Demetrius. Of these the most conspicuous were — Seleucia on the Tigris, which in great measure supplanted the mighty Babylon, and became the metropolis of the eastern provinces, under the Syrian dynasty; the city of the same name, near the mouth of the Orontes; and Antioch, on the latter river, which quickly rose to be the capital of Syria, and continued, for near a thousand years, to be one of the most populous and wealthy cities of the world. Numerous other cities, whose names attest their Macedonian origin — Beroea, Edessa, Pella, &c. — likewise owed their first foundation to the son of Antiochus. (Appian, Syr. 57; Strab. xxxi. pp. 738, 749, 750; Steph. Byz. s. v. Antiocheia, &c.; Paus. i. 16. § 3; Amm. Marc. xiv. 8. § 5. For a full review and examination of these foundations see Droysen, Hellenism, vol. ii. pp. 651, 660—720.)

of his wife [Laodice], the latter for a time artfully concealed his death until she had taken all necessary measures for establishing Seleucus on the throne, which he ascended without opposition, b. c. 246. The first measure of his administration, or rather that of his mother, was to put to death his stepmother Berenice, together with her infant son. [Berenice, No. 2.] But this act of cruelty produced the most disastrous effects, by alienating all his Syrian subjects, while it aroused Ptolemy Euergetes, king of Egypt, to avenge the fate of his unhappy sister. Seleucus was unable to offer any resistance to the Egyptian monarch, and withdrew beyond Mount Taurus, while Ptolemy not only made himself master of Antioc and the whole of Syria, but carried his arms unsupported beyond the Euphrates and the Tigris. [Ptolemaeus III.] During these operations Seleucus kept wholly aloof; but when Ptolemy had been recalled to his own dominions by domestic disturbances, he appears to have easily recovered possession of the greater part of the provinces which he had lost. All farther details of the revolution which replaced him in the possession of his father's empire, are lost to us; but it seems certain that as early as b. c. 242, he had again extended his power to the Euphrates, where he founded the city of Callinicum. (Droysen, Hellenism, vol. ii. p. 351; Clinton, P. H. vol. iii. p. 313.) A naval expedition which he undertook in order to subdue the maritime cities that had revolted, was less fortunate: his fleet was shattered by a storm, and he himself narrowly escaped with his life. Still, he soon after found himself strong enough to commence offensive operations against Ptolemy, but was totally defeated and his army dispersed. As this circumstance had recourse to his younger brother Antiocus Hierax, who appears to have been already established (probably by Ptolemy) in an independent position, and offered him the sovereignty of all Asia Minor as the price of his support. But Antioc, deeming the opportunity a favourable one for making himself master of the whole Syrian kingdom, instead of supporting his brother, turned his arms against him, and Seleucus found himself engaged in war at once with the king of Egypt and his own brother. (Justin. xxvii. 2.)

The events of the succeeding years are very imperfectly known to us, and it is scarcely possible to derive any connected historical results from the confused and fragmentary notices which have been transmitted to us. But it seems certain that Seleucus concluded (probably in b. c. 239) a truce for ten years with the king of Egypt, and thus found himself at leisure to turn his arms against his brother. He at first obtained decisive successes, and defeated Antiocus in a great battle in Lydia, which was followed by the reduction of all that province, except Sardis and Ephesus; but in a second battle, at Ancyra in Galatia, Antiocus, supported by Mithridates king of Pontus and a large force of Gaulish mercenaries, was completely victorious. Seleucus lost no less than 20,000 men, and himself escaped with such difficulty that he was generally reported to have perished in the flight (Justin. xxvii. 2; Trog. Pomp. Prol. xxvii.; Euseb. Arm. pp. 164, 165; Athen. xiii. p. 559; Plut. de Pomp., p. 489, &c.; Polyarn. viii. 61). The defection of his Gaulish soldiers must have prevented Antiocus from deriving much advantage from this victory; and whether or not any formal

COIN OF SELEUCUS I.

SELEUCUS II. (Seleucon), surnamed Calli- neus, king of Syria, was the eldest son of Antiocus II. by his first wife Laodice. (Appian. Syr. 66; Justin. xxvii. 1.) When his father Antiocus fell a victim to the jealousy of revenge truce was concluded by the two brothers (as supposed by Droysen), there appears to have been in fact a suspension of hostilities between them. (For the history of these wars in particular, as well as for the reign of Seleucus II. in general, see Niebuhr, KL. Schriften, vol. i. pp. 276—286; and Droysen, vol. ii. p. 357—359, 410—429.)

It must have been during this interval that Seleucus undertook an expedition to the East, with the view of reducing the revolted provinces of Pachia and Bactria, which had availed themselves of the disordered state of the Syrian empire to throw off its yoke. He was, however, defeated by Arsaces, king of Parthia, in a great battle which was long after celebrated by the Parthians as the foundation of their independent state, and was soon after recalled from these remote regions by fresh troubles which had arisen in his western provinces. Froelich (Ann. Syr. pp. 30, 31) and Clinton (F. H. vol. iii. p. 313) have represented him as himself falling a captive into the hands of the Parthians: but it appears, from the Armenian version of Ensebius (p. 167, fol. edit.), that the passage of Posidonius (ap. Athen. iv. p. 153) on which they rely as their authority, refers in fact to Seleucus the son of Antiochus Sidetes (see Niebuhr, KL. Schriften p. 300). It was probably during the same period of partial tranquillity that Seleucus found time to enlarge his capital of Antioch, by the construction of a new quarter of the city. (Strab. xvi. p. 750.)

Whether hostilities with Egypt were ever actually renewed, or the truce between the two countries at once passed into a durable peace, we know not; but it seems certain that such a peace was concluded before the death of Seleucus (Nicator, b.c. 297). On the other hand, the war between the two brothers broke out with fresh violence. We have, however, little information of its events; and we only know that it was terminated by a decisive victory of Seleucus in Mesopotamia, which compelled Antiochus to take refuge with Ariamnes, king of Cappadocia. From thence he made his escape to the court of Ptolemy; but that monarch being now desirous to maintain friendly relations with Syria, detained him in close custody, from which he only escaped to perish by the hands of robbers. Meanwhile Attalus, king of Pergamus, had extended his dominions over the greater part of Asia Minor, from which he had expelled Antiochus; and Seleucus appears to have been engaged in an expedition for the recovery of these provinces, when he was accidentally killed by a fall from his horse, in the twenty-first year of his reign. b.c. 226. (Justin, xxii. 3; Trog. Pomp. Prose xxviii.; Euseb. Arm. p. 165; Droysen, vol. ii. p. 426.)

One of the last acts of his reign was to send a magnificent present of corn, timber, and other supplies, as well as ten quinqueremes fully equipped, to the Rhodians, whose city had suffered severely by an earthquake (Polyb. v. 89). Seleucus had married Laodice, the sister of Andromachus, by whom he left two sons, who successively ascended the throne, Seleucus Cermnus and Antiochus, afterwards surnamed the Great (Appian, Syria 66; Polyb. ii. 71). His own surname of Canningius, which was probably assumed after his recovery of the provinces that had been overrun by Ptolemy, is not found on his coins, which, as they bear no dates, cannot be distinguished with certainty from those of his son. App. xxvi. 13, 15.)

On the death of Antiochus III. in b.c. 187, Seleucus ascended the throne without opposition. But the defeat of his father by the Romans, and the ignominious peace which followed it, had greatly diminished the power of the Syrian monarchy, and the reign of Seleucus was, in consequence, feeble and inglorious, and was marked by no striking events. In b.c. 125, we find him sending out an embassy to the Achaeans, to renew the friendship and alliance previously existing between them and Antiochus (Polyb. xxiii. 4, 9; Diod. xxix. Exc. Legat. p. 622); and shortly afterwards (probably in b.c. 181) assembling a considerable army, to assist Pharnaces, king of Pontus, against Eumenes; but he became alarmed lest his passing Mount Taurus for this purpose should be construed by the Romans into an act of hostility; and, in consequence, abandoned the design and dismissed his forces (Diod. Exc. Vales. p. 576). Yet he did not hesitate to conclude a treaty of alliance with Perseus, whose unfriendly disposition towards the Romans could no longer be a secret, and even to give him his own daughter, Laodice, in marriage, probably in b.c. 178 (Polyb. xxvi. 7; Liv. xiii. 12; Inscr. Del. op. Marn. Arundel. No. 41). But he was still studious to conciliate the favour of the Roman senate, and not long before his death sent his son Demetrius to Rome, to replace his brother Antiochus as a hostage for his fidelity (App. Syr. 45; Polyb. xxxi. 12). With Egypt he appears for the most part to have maintained friendly relations; but Ptolemy Epiphanes is said to have been preparing for the invasion of Coele-Syria, when his plans were frustrated by his own death (Hieronym. ad Daniel. xi. 20). Towards the Jews the conduct of Seleucus seems to have been, for the most part at least, liberal and favourable: concerning his alleged attempt to plunder the treasury of Jerusalem see HELIODORUS.

After a tranquil and inactive reign of twelve years, Seleucus was assassinated, in b.c. 175, by one of his own ministers, named Heliodorus, who had conceived the design of possessing himself of the sovereign power. The statement of Eusebius that he was sixty years old, is clearly erroneous, as his elder brother Antiochus was not born till n. c. 221. He left two children: Demetrius, who subsequently ascended the throne; and Laodice, married, as already mentioned, to Perseus, king of Macedonia. The name of his wife is unknown; but Froelich supposes him to have married his sister Laodice, the widow of his brother Antiochus. (Appian, Syr. 45, 66; Euseb. Arm. pp. 163, 166; Froelich, Ann. Syr. p. 42; Clinton, F. H. vol. iii. p. 317.) [E. H. B.]

COIN OF SELEUCUS IV.

SELEUCUS V. (ΣΑΕΛΕΥΚΟΣ), king of SYRIA, was the eldest son of Demetrius II., and assumed the royal diadem immediately on learning the death of his father, n. c. 125; but his mother Cleopatra, who had herself put Demetrius to death, was indignant at hearing that her son had ventured to take such a step without her authority, and caused Seleucus also to be assassinated. His death appears to have followed almost immediately after that of his father, though some of the chroniclers erroneously ascribe the duration of a year to his reign. (Appian, Syr. 68, 69; Justin, xxxix. 1; Liv. Epit. ix.; Euseb. Arm. p. 168; Porphyry. op. Euseb. l.c.)

SELEUCUS VI. (ΣΑΕΛΕΥΚΟΣ), king of Syria, named Epiphanes, and also Nicator, was the eldest of the five sons of Antiochus VIII. Grypus. On the death of his father, in b.c. 96, he immediately assumed the sovereignty, and raised an army, with which he reduced several cities of Syria. His claims were, however, resisted by his uncle Antiochus Cyzicenus, who marched from Antioch against him. A decisive battle ensued, in which Antiochus was totally defeated, and himself perished (n. c. 93); and the result of this victory enabled Seleucus to make himself master of Antioch. He was now for a short time undisputed ruler of Syria; but Antiochus Eusebes, the son of Cyzicenus, having escaped from the designs of Seleucus, who sought to put him to death, raised the standard of revolt against him, defeated him in a pitched battle, and expelled him from Syria. Seleucus took refuge in Cilicia, where he established himself in the city of Mopsuestia; but he alienated the inhabitants by his violent and tyrannical character, and at length, by his oppressive exactions of money, excited such a sedition among them that they set fire to the gymnasium in which he had taken refuge, and he perished in the flames, or, according to another account, put an end to his own life, in order to avoid a more cruel fate (Joseph. Ant. xiii. 13. § 4; Appian, Syr. 69; Porphyry. ap. Euseb. Arm. p. 160). The death of Seleucus may probably be assigned to the year B.C. 94.

His coins, like those of all the later Seleucid kings, bear his titles at full length. [E. H. B.]

Seleucus (Seleukos), literary 1. A poet, the son of the historian Mnesistepolous, who flourished under Antiochus the Great. A panegyric scolion of his is preserved by Athenaeus (who calls him τὸν τῶν ἱππῶν δοματίων τιμητή), and also in the Greek Anthology. (Athen. xiv. p. 697, d; Bruck, Anord. vol. ii. p. 291; Jacobs, Anth. Graec. vol. iii. p. 5, vol. xiii. p. 951.)

2. A grammarian of Emeusa, who composed two books of Parthian history, a commentary on the lyric poets, and a poem on fishing (Δεισικτά), in four books (Suid. s. v.). Athenaeus, however, quotes the latter as the work of Seleucus of Tarsus (vii. p. 320, a.)

3. A distinguished grammarian of Alexandria, who also taught at Rome. He was summoned Ho- merus to Athens, and, in addition to his commentaries on pretty well all the poets, wrote a number of grammatical and miscellaneous works, the titles of which are given by Suidas (s. v.). There are some other in-

Seleucus, an engraver of precious stones, of unknown date, one of whose gems is extant; it is a cornelian, engraved with a small head of Silenus. (Bracc. 104; Stosch, 60.) [P. S.]

Selecius, an usurer, and a friend of P. Lentalus Spinther (Cic. ad Att. i. 12, iv. 18. § 3, ad Fam. i. 5, a.). Orelli thinks (Onom. Tull. s. v.) that Selicus may perhaps be the same name as the Secillus (Σεκιλίους) mentioned in Dion Cassius (xviii. 9), but this Secillus is called Seliskus in Plutarch (Julius Cæsar). [P. S.]

Selinus (Seleuqos), a son of Poseidon, was king of Aegialos and father of Helice. (Paus. viii. 1. § 2; Estath. ad Hom. p. 292.) [L. S.]

Seyluis, 1. 2, P. and C. Seyliluz, two learned men, friends of L. Lucullus, who had heard Philon at Rome. (Cic. Acad. ii. 4.)

3. Seylilus, a bad orator mentioned by Cicero about B.C. 51 (ad Fam. vii. 32). A. SeyliiLus, elected tribune of the plebs in his absence in B.C. 422. (Lit. iv. 42.)

Semele (Σεμελή), a daughter of Cadmus and Harmonia, at Thebes, and accordingly a sister of Ino, Agave, Antiocon, and Polydorus. She was beloved by Zeus (Hom. I. xiv. 323, Hymn. in Beov. 6. § 57; Schol. ad Pind. Ol. ii. 40), and Hera, stimulated by jealousy, appeared to her in the form of her aged nurse Beroç, and induced her to pray Zeus to visit her in the same splendour and majesty with which he appeared to Hera. Zeus, who had promised that he would grant her every request, did as she desired. He appeared to her as the god of thunder, and Semele was consumed by the fire of lightning; but Zeus saved her child Dionysus, with whom she was pregnant (Apollod. iii. 4. § 3; Ov. Met. iii. 260, &c.; Hygin. Fab. 179.). Pausanias (ix. 2. § 3) relates that Actaeon was in love with her, and that Artemis caused him to be torn to pieces by his dogs, to prevent his marrying her. The inhabitants of Brasiae, in Laconia, related that Semele, after having given birth to Dionysus, was thrown by her father Cadmus in a boat upon the sea, and that her body was driven to the coast of Brasiae, where it was buried, whereas Dionysus, whose life was saved, was brought up at Brasiae (Paus. iii. 24. § 3). After her death, the common account continues, she was led by her son out of the lower world, and carried up to Olympus as Thymoe (Pind. Ol. ii. 44, Pyth. xi. 1; Paus. ii. 31. § 2, 37. § 5; Apollod. iii. 5. § 3). A statue of her and her tomb were shown at Thebes. (Paus. ix. 12. § 3, 16. § 4.) [L. S.]

Semiramis (Σεμιραμίς) and Ninus (Νί-νος), the mythical founders of the Assyrian empire of Ninus or Nineveh. Their history is related at length by Diodorus (ii. 1—20), who borrows his account from Ctesias. According to this narrative, Ninus was a great warrior, who built the town of Ninus or Nineveh, about B.C. 2192 [see above, p. 712, a.], and subdued the greater part of Asia. Semiramis was the daughter of the fish-goddess Derceto of Ascalon in Syria, and was the fruit of her love with a Syrian youth; but being ashamed of her filthiness, she fled away with the youth, and exposed her infant daughter. But the child was miraculously preserved by doves, who fed her till she was discovered by the shepherds of the neighbourhood. She was then brought up by the chief shepherd of the royal herds, whose name was Simmas, and from whom she derived the name of Semiramis. Her surpassing beauty attracted the notice of Onnes, one of the king's friends and generals, who married her. He subsequently sent for his wife to the army, where the Assyrians were engaged in the siege of Bactra, which they had long endeavoured in vain to take. Upon her arrival in the camp, she planned an attack upon the citadel of the town, mounted the walls with a few brave followers, and obtained possession of the place. Ninus was so charmed by her bravery and beauty, that he resolved to take her his wife, whereupon her unfortunate husband, Ninus, by his own hand. By Ninus Semiramis had a son, Ninyas, and on the death of Ninus she succeeded him on the throne. According to another account, Semiramis had obtained from her husband permission to rule over Asia for five days, and availed herself of this opportunity to cast the king into a dungeon, or, as is also related, to put him to death, and thus obtained the sovereign power. (Diod. ii. 20; Aelian, V. H. vii. 1.) Her fame threw into the shade that of Ninus; and later ages loved to tell of her marvellous deeds and her heroic achievements. She built numerous cities, and erected many wonderful buildings; and several of the most extraordinary works in the East, which were extant in a later age, and the authors of which were unknown, were ascribed by popular tradition to this queen. In Nineveh she erected a tomb for her husband, nine stadia high, and ten wide; she built the city of Babylon * with all its wonders,

* Herodotus only once mentions Semiramis (1. 184), where he states that she was a queen of Babylon, who lived five generations before Ninorci, as well as many other towns on the Euphrates and the Tigris, and she constructed the hanging gardens in Media, of which later writers give us such strange accounts. Besides conquering many nations of Asia, she subdued Egypt and a great part of Ethiopia, but was unsuccessful in an attack which she made upon India. After a reign of forty-two years she resigned the sovereignty to her son Ninyas, and disappeared from the earth, taking her flight to heaven in the form of a dove.

Such is a brief abstract of the account in Dio-dorus, the fabulous nature of which is still more apparent in the details of his narrative. We have already pointed out, in the article SARDANAPALUS, the mythical character of the whole of the Assyrian history of Ctesias, and it is therefore unnecessary to dwell further upon the subject in the present place. A recent writer has brought forward many reasons for believing that Semiramis was originally a Syrian goddess, probably the same who was worshipped at Ascalon under the name of Astarte, or the Heavenly Aphrodite, to whom the dove was sacred (Lucian, de Syriia Dea, 14, 33, 39). Hence the stories of her voluptuousness (Diod. ii. 13), which were current even in the time of Augustus (Ov. Am. i. 5. 11) (Comp. Movers, Die Phönizier, p. 631).

SEMO SANCUS. [SANCUS]

SEMON, an engraver of precious stones, being to an early period, as is clear from the only work of his which is extant, namely, a stone in the form of a scarabæus, engraved with the name ΧΜΟΝΟΣ, but in the reverse order, and in archaic characters. It is very rare to find an old Greek gem inscribed with the name of the engraver, although this was the usual practice in the Roman period. (R. Rochette, Lettre à M. Schom, p. 158, 2d ed.) [P. S.]

SEMIPRONIA. 1. The daughter of Tib. Gracchus, censor n. c. 169, and the sister of the two celebrated tribunes, married Scipio Africanus minor. We know nothing of her private life or character. On the sudden death of her husband, she and her mother Cornelia were suspected by some persons of having murdered him, since Scipio did not like her on account of her want of beauty and her sterility, and she likewise had no affection for him. But there is no evidence against her; and if Scipio was really murdered, Paphius Caesar was most probably the guilty party. [SCIPIO, No. 21, p. 750.] (Appian, B. C. i. 20; Liv. Epit. 59; Schol. Balb. pro Mil. p. 293.)

2. The wife of D. Junius Brutus, consul n. c. 77, was a woman of great personal attractions and literary accomplishments, but of a prodigal character. She took part in Catiline's conspiracy, though her husband was not privy to it (Sall. Cat. 25, 49). Asconius speaks of a Sempronius, the daughter of Tuditanus, and the mother of P. Claudius, who gave her testimony at the trial of Milo, in n. c. 52 and dammed up the Euphrates. As Nitoeris probably lived about n. c. 600, it has been maintained that his Semiramis must be a different person from the Semiramis of Ctesias. But there is no occasion to suppose two different queens of the same name; the Semiramis of Herodotus is probably as fabulous as that of Ctesias, and merely arose from the practice we have noticed above, of assigning the great works in the East of unknown authorship to a queen of this name, poses that she may be the same as the wife of Brutus mentioned above.

SEMIPRONIA GENS, patrician and plebeian. This gens was of great antiquity, and one of its members, A. Sempronius Atratinus, obtained the consulship as early as n. c. 497, twelve years after the foundation of the republic. The Sempronii were divided into many families, of which the Atratini were undoubtedly patrician, but all the others appear to have been plebeian: their names are ASELLO, BLASEUS, DENSUS, GRACCHUS, LONGUS, MUSCA, PETIO, RUFUS, RUTILUS, SO-PIUS, TRADTANUS. Of these, ASELLO, GRACCHUS, and PETIO alone occur on coins. The glory of the Sempronia gens is confined to the republican period. Very few persons of this name, and none of them of any importance, are mentioned under the empire.

SEMUS (ΣΟΥΟΣ), a Greek grammarian of uncertain date, wrote, according to Suidas (s. v.), eight books on Delos, two books of περιδοι, one on Paros, one on Pergamus, and a work on Paeans. Suidas calls him an Eleon, but it appears from Athenaeus (iii. p. 123, d.) that this is a mistake, and that he was a native of Delos. His work on Delos (ΔΥΛΙΑΚΑ or ΔΥΛΙΑ) was the most important, and is frequently referred to by Athenaeus, and once or twice by other writers (Athen. iii. p. 109, E. iv. p. 173, c., viii. pp. 331, L. 333, a., xi. p. 499, c. xiv. pp. 614, a., 607, b., 645, b., xv. p. 676, e.; Steph. Byz. a. e. Τύρπων; Etym. Magn. s. v. Βίλλα). Athenaeus also quotes (xiv. pp. 618, d., 622, a.—d.) his work on Paeans (Παίδων). We likewise find in Athenaeus (iii. p. 123, d.), a reference to a work of Semus on Islands (Νησίδα), but it has been suggested with much probability that this is a false reading for ΔΥΛΙΑ (Vossius, De Histor. Graecia, p. 497, ed. Wester-mann.)

SENECA, M. ANNAEUS, was a native of Corduba (Cordova) in Spain. The time of his birth is uncertain; but it may be approximated to. He says (Contr. Proef. i. p. 67) that he considered that he had heard all the great orators, except Cicero; and that he might have heard Cicero, if the Civil Wars, by which he means the wars between Pompeius and Caesar, had not kept him at home (infra collegia numem). But if Seneca appears to allude in this passage to some of Cicero's letters (ad Fam. vii. 33, ix. 16), in which Cicero speaks of Hirtius and Dolabella being his "discendi disciplili" (n. c. 46).

It is conjectured that as Seneca might be fifteen in n. c. 46, he may have been born on or about n. c. 61 (Clinton, Fasti), the year before C. Julius Caesar was praetor in Spain. Seneca was at Rome in the early period of the power of Augustus, for he says that he had seen Ovid declaring before Aurelius Fuscus (Contr. x. p. 172). Ovid was born n. c. 43. Seneca was an intimate friend of the rhetorician M. Porcius Latro, who was one of Ovid's masters. He also mentions the rhetorician Marullus, as the master of himself and of Latro. He afterwards returned to Spain, and married Helvia, by whom he had three sons, L. Annaeus Seneca, L. Annaeus Mela or Mella, the father of the poet Lucan, and Marcus Novatus. Novatus was the eldest son, and took the name of Junius Gallio, upon being adopted by Junius Gallio, Seneca was rich, and he belonged to the equestrian class. The time of his death is uncertain; but he

SENECA.
probably lived till near the end of the reign of Ti-berius, and died at Rome or in Italy. It appears that he was at Rome early in life, from what has been stated as to Ovid; and he must have returned to Spain, because his son Lucius was brought to Rome from Spain when he was an infant. (L. Seneca, Consol. ad Helviam.)

Seneca was gifted with a prodigious memory.
He was a man of letters, after the fashion of his time, when rhetoric or false eloquence was most in vogue. His Controversiarum Libri decem, which he addressed to his three sons, were written when he was an old man. The first, second, seventh, eighth, and tenth books only, are extant, and these are somewhat mutilated: of the other books only fragments remain. These Controversiae are rhetorical exercises on imaginary cases filled with common-places, such as a man of large verbal memory and great reading carries about with him as his ready money. Another work of the same class, attributed to Seneca, and written after the Controversiae, is the Scaevolarius Liber, which is probably not complete. We may collect, from its contents, what the subjects were on which the rhetoricians of that age exercised their wits: one of them is, "Shall Cicero apologise to Marcus Anotius? Shall he agree to burn his Philippius, if Antonius requires it?" Another is, "Shall Alexander embark on the ocean?" If there are some good ideas and apt expressions in these puerile declamations, they have no value where they stand; and probably most of them are borrowed. No merit of form can compensate for worthlessess of matter. The eloquence of the Roman orators, which was derived from their political institutions, was silenced after the Civil Wars; and the pursuits of the rhetoricians were the signs of declining taste.
The Controversiae and Scaevolarius Liber have often been published with the works of Seneca the son. The edition of A. Schottus appeared at Heidelberg, 1603 and 1604, Paris, 1607 and 1613.
The Elzivir print of 1672, 8vo., contains the notes of N. Faber, A. Schottus, J. F. Gronovius, and others.
The confusion between Seneca, the father, and Seneca, the philosopher, is fully cleared up by Lipsius, Eletorun Lib. 1. cap. 1, Opera, vol. i. p.
631, ed. 1675. [G. L.]

SENECA, L. ANNAEUS, the son of M. Annaeus Seneca, was born at Corduba, probably about a few years b. c., and brought to Rome by his parents when he was a child. Though he was naturally of a weak body, he was a hard student from his youth, and he devoted himself with great ardour to rhetoric and philosophy. He also soon acquired distinction as a pleader of causes, and he excited the jealousy and hatred of Caligula by the ability with which he conducted a case in the senate before the emperor. He was spared, it is said, because Caligula was assured by one of his mistresses that Seneca would soon die of disease.
The emperor also affected to despise the eloquence of Seneca: he said that it was sand without line (Sueton. Calig. 53). Seneca obtained the quae-torship, but the time is uncertain. In the first year of the reign of Claudius (A. D. 41), the successor of Caligula, Seneca was banished to Corsica. Claudius had recalled to Rome his nieces Agrippina and Julia, whom their brother Caligula had exiled to the island of Pontia (Ponza). It seems probable that Messalina, the wife of Claudius, was jealous of the influence of Julia with Claudius, and hated her for her haughty behaviour. Julia was again exiled, and Seneca's intimacy with her was a pretext for making him share her disgrace.
What the facts really were is unknown; and the innocence of Seneca and Julia is at least as probable as their guilt, when Messalina was the accuser.

In his exile in Corsica Seneca had the opportunity of practising the philosophy of the Stoics, to which he had attached himself. His Consolatio ad Helvium, or consolatory letter to his mother, was written during his residence in the island.
If the Consolatio ad Polibyam, which was also written during his exile, is the work of Seneca, it does him no credit. Polibius was the powerful freedman of Claudius, and the Consolatio is intended to comfort him on the occasion of the loss of his brother. But it also contains adulation of the emperor, and many expressions unworthy of a true Stoic, or of an honest man. The object of the address to Polibius was to have his sentence of exile recalled, even at the cost of his character.

After eight years' residence in Corsica Seneca was recalled A. D. 49, by the influence of Agripp-pina (Tac. Ann. xii. 8), who had just married her uncle the emperor Claudius. From this time the life of Seneca is closely connected with that of Nero, and Tacitus is the chief authority for both.
On his return he obtained a praetorship, and was made the tutor of the young Domitius, afterwards the emperor Nero, who was the son of Agrippina by a former husband. Agrippina relied on the reputation of Seneca and his advice as a means of securing the succession to her son; and she trusted to him for gratitude to herself as a guarantee for her fidelity to her interests, and to his hatred of Claudius for the wrongs that he had suffered from him.

It was unfortunate that the philosopher had so bad a pupil, but we cannot blame him for all that Nero learned and all that he did not learn. The youth had a taste for what was showy and superficial: he had no capacity for the studies which beft a man who has to govern a state. If Seneca had made a rhetorician of him after his own taste, that would have been something, but Domitius had not even the low ability to distinguish him self as a talker. There is no evidence to justify the imputation that Seneca encouraged his vicious propensities; and if Nero had followed the advice contained in Seneca's treatise, De Clementia ad Neronem Caesarem, written in the second year of Nero's reign, the young emperor might have been happy, and his administration beneficent.
That Seneca would look upon his connection with Nero as a means of improving his fortunes and enjoying power, is just what most other men would have done, and would do now in the same circumstances; and that a man with such views would not be very rigid towards an unruly pupil is a reasonable inference. We know that he did not make Nero a wise man or a good man; we do not know that he helped to make him worse than he would have been; and in the absence of positive evidence of his corrupting the youth, and with the positive evidence of his own writings in his favour, it is a fair and just conclusion that he did as much with Nero as a man could who had accepted, and chose to retain a post in which his character could not possibly escape some imputation. He who consents to be the tutor of a vicious youth of high station, whom he cannot control, must be content to take the advantages of his post, with the risk of being blamed for his pupil's vices.

Claudius was poisoned by his niece and wife Agrippina A.D. 54, and Nero succeeded to the Imperial power. Tacitus (Ann. xiii. 2, &c.) states that both Burrus and Seneca attempted to check the young emperor's vicious propensities; and both combined to resist his mother's arrogant pretensions. A woman assuming the direct exercise of political power was a thing that the Romans had not yet seen, and it was inconsistent with all their notions. The opposition of Burrus and Seneca to the emperor's mother was the duty of good citizens.

Nero pronounced the funeral oration in memory of Claudius. The panegyric on the deceased emperor was listened to with decency and patience till Nero came to that part of his discourse in which he spoke of the foresight and wisdom of Claudius, when there was a general laugh. The speech, which Nero delivered, was written by Seneca in a florid style, suited to the taste of the age, with little regard to truth, and none for his own character; for he afterwards wrote a satire (Apologeticus) to ridicule the Apotheosis of the man whom he had despised and praised.

In the first year of his reign Nero affected mildness and clemency, and such was the tone of his orations to the senate; but these professions were the words of Seneca, uttered by the mouth of Nero; the object of Seneca was, as Tacitus says, either to give public evidence of the integrity of his counsels to the emperor, or to display his abilities. There might be something of both in his motives; but it is consistent with a fair judgment and the character of Seneca's writings to believe that he did attempt to keep Nero within the limits of decency and humanity. A somewhat ambiguous passage of Tacitus (Ann. xiii. 13), seems to affirm that he endeavoured to veil Nero's amours with Acte under a decent covering; and Cluvius (Tacit. Ann. xiv. 2) states that the amours with Acte were discovered, and he prevented a detestable crime. "What a part for a Stoic to play," says one of Seneca's biographers, "whose duty it was to recall his disciple to the arms of his wife, the virtuous Octavia." The Stoic probably did the best that he could under the circumstances.

The murder of Britannicus a.d. 55 was followed by large gifts from Nero to his friends; and "there were not wanting persons to affirm, that men who claimed a character of sober seriousness, divided among themselves houses and villas at that time, as if it were so much booty." (Tacit. Ann. xiii. 18.) The allusion is supposed to be to Seneca and Burrus; but the passage of Tacitus contains no distinct charge against either of them.

It was unlucky for Seneca's reputation that he was rich; for a man in power cannot grow rich, even by honest means, without having dishonesty imputed to him.

The struggle for dominion between Nero and his mother could only be decided by the ruin of one of them; and if Seneca wished to enjoy credit with Nero, it was necessary that he should get rid of this imperious woman. Fabius Rusticus says that Seneca maintained Burrus in his post of Praefectus Praetorio, when Nero intended to remove him on the ground of his supposed adherence to the cause of Agrippina (Tacit. Ann. xiii. 20).

But Plinius and Claudius Rufus said that Nero never doubted the fidelity of Burrus, and that in his alarm and his impatience to get rid of his mother, he could not be pacified till Burrus promised that she should be put to death, if she should be convicted of instigating what were imputed to her. Burrus and Seneca paid Agrippina a visit, with some freedmen, to be witnesses of what took place. Burrus charged her with treasonable designs, to which Agrippina replied with indignant eloquence. A reconciliation with Nero followed, her accusers were punished, and her friends rewarded; neither Burrus nor Seneca was under any imputation of having prejudiced Nero against her.

The affair of P. Sullius (A.D. 49) brought some discredit on Seneca. Sullius had been a formidable instrument of tyranny under Claudius, and was justly hated. He was charged under a Senatus-consultum, which had amended the Lex Cincia, with receiving money for pleading causes; a feeble pretext for crushing an odious man. The defence of Sullius was an attack on Seneca; he charged him with debauching Julia, the daughter of Germanicus, and with having a commercial connexion with women of the imperial family, probably meaning Agrippina; and he asked by what wisdom, by what precepts of philosophy he had, during a four-years' intimacy with an emperor, amassed a fortune of three hundred million sesterces; at Rome he was a hunter after testamentary gifts, an enusurer of those who were childless; Italy and the provinces were drained by his exorbitant usury. His own profits, Sullius said, were moderate, and earned with toil; and he would endure any thing rather than humble himself before an upstart favourite. We must assume that Sullius supposed that Seneca had moved against him in this matter: his words were reported to Seneca, and perhaps aggravated. A charge was got up against him, it is not said by whom, as to his infamous delusions under Claudius, and he was banished to the Balearic Islands. The words of such a man are no proof of Seneca's guilt; but the enormous wealth of Seneca gave a colour of truth to what was said against him. (Tacit. Ann. xiii. 42.)

Nero's passion for Poppaea brought the contest between him and his mother to a crisis (Tacit. Ann. xiv. 1. A.D. 59). Poppaea burned to become the wife of Nero, but she saw that it was impossible while Agrippina lived. She plied Nero with her blandishments, her tears, and even her sarcasms; and at last he resolved to kill his mother, and the only question was as to the way of doing it. After an unsuccessful attempt to drown her, Nero, terrified at the failure of his plan, sent for Burrus and Seneca. Whether they were previously acquainted with the design against Agrippina's life is uncertain (Tacit. Ann. xv. 7). Dion Cassius (ix. 12) writes, with his usual malignity, accuses Seneca of the designing Nero to the crime. Burrus and Seneca were long silent in the presence of Nero; either they thought that it would be useless to dissuade the emperor from his purpose, or, what is more probable, they saw that either the mother or the son must perish. Seneca broke the silence by asking Burrus if orders should be given to the soldiers to put Agrippina to death. Burrus replied that the soldiers were devoted to the family of Germanicus, and would not shed the blood of his children; but Anicius, he added, would finish what he had begun. Anicius performed his promise, and Agrippina died by the hand of assassins, A. D. 60.

The imperial murder fled as if he could leave his conscience behind him, to the city of Naples, whence he addressed a letter to the senate upon the death of his mother: he charged her with a conspiracy against himself, on the failure of which she had committed suicide. The author of the letter was Seneca (Tacit. Ann. xiv. 11): it is not extant, but a few words from it are quoted by Quintilian (Inst. Orat. viii. 5). This letter is Seneca's great condemnation: he had consented to Agrippina being assassinated, and he added to this crime the despicable subterfuge, that nobody could believe. From this time Nero felt more free, and Seneca in due time had his reward.

In A. D. 63 Burrus died, and he may have been poisoned. Nero appointed two commanders of the Praetorians in place of Burrus, Fennius Rufus and Sosonius Tigellinus, whose infamy has been perpetuated with that of his master. The death of Burrus broke the power of Seneca: it diminished his influence towards good, and Nero was now in the hands of persons who were exactly suited to his taste. Tigellinus and Rufus began an attack on Seneca. His enormous wealth, a never-failing matter of charge against Seneca, his gardens and villas, more magnificent than those of the emperor, his exclusive claims to eloquence, and his disparagement of Nero's skill in driving and singing, were all urged against him; and it was time, they said, for Nero to get rid of a teacher. Seneca heard of the charges against him: he was rich, and he knew that Nero wanted money. He obtained an interview in which he addressed the emperor in a studied speech (Tacit. Ann. xiv. 53). He asked for permission to retire, and offered to surrender all that he had. Nero affected to be grateful for his past services, refused the proffered gift, and sent him away with perfunctory assurances of his respect and affection. Seneca now altered his mode of life, saw little company, and seldom visited the city, on the ground of feeble health, or being occupied with his philosophical studies.

When Nero, after plundering Italy and the provinces, began, like the Eighth Henry of England, the pillage of the temples and of things dedicated to religion, in order to meet his extravagant expenditure, Seneca, who feared that he might be involved in the odium of the sacrilege, though it is not said why he feared (Tacit. Ann. xiv. 43), prayed for leave to retire into the country; and when it was refused, he kept his chamber on the pretence of sickness. A story was current that Nero tried to poison him, but the attempt failed.

The conspiracy of Piso gave the emperor a pretext for a more direct attack on his teacher's life, though there was not complete evidence of Seneca being a party to the conspiracy (Tacit. Ann. xv. 60). Certain words of Seneca to Antonius Natalis, which were of a suspicious character, were repeated to Nero; and Granius Sylvanus, a tribune of a Praetorian cohort, was sent by the emperor to Seneca to demand the meaning of them. It happened that Seneca was returning from Campania, and had rested at a villa four miles from the city.

In the evening the tribune with a band of soldiers surrounded the house where Seneca was supping with his wife Pompeia Paullina and two friends, Seneca explained the words that he had used to Natalis, and the tribune carried them to the emperor. Nero was in close council with the two great ministers of his cruelty, his wife Poppea and Tigellinus. Nero asked if Seneca was preparing to die voluntarily; and on the tribune replying that he saw no signs of fear, no gloomy indication in his words or countenance, he was ordered to go back and give him notice to die. The tribune, himself a party to the conspiracy of Piso, did not show himself again to Seneca, but he sent in a centurion with the order of death. Without showing any sign of alarm, Seneca asked for his testament, apparently with the intention of adding some legacies, but the centurion refused to allow this, on which Seneca showed his grief that his friends were forbidden to reward their services, his last testamentary bequest must be the portraiture of his life, which, if they kept in their memory, they would have the reputation of an honest life and of a constant friendship. He cheered his weeping friends by reminding them of the lessons of philosophy, and that he who had murdered a brother and a mother could not be expected to spare his teacher. Embracing his wife, he prayed her to moderate her grief, and to console herself for the loss of her husband by the reflection that he had lived an honourable life. But as Paullina protested that she would die with him, Seneca consented, and the same blow opened the veins in the arms of both.

Seneca's body was attenuated by age and meagre diet; the blood would not flow easily, and he opened the veins in his legs. His torture was excessive; and to save himself and his wife the pain of seeing one another suffer, he bade her retire to her chamber. Their last words to each other were, writing by persons who were called in for the purpose, and were afterwards published. Tacitus for some reason has not given the words, and he did not think proper to give the substance of them. The soldiers, at the entreaty of the slaves and freedmen of Seneca, stopped the wounds of Paulina, and she lived a few years longer; but her pallid face showed that the stream of life was largely drawn from her. Scandal, as usual, said that when she found that Nero did not wish her death, she was easily prevailed upon to submit to live. Seneca's torments being still prolonged, he took hemlock from his friend and physician, Statius Annaneus, but it had no effect. At last he entered a warm bath, and as he sprinkled some of the water on the slaves nearest to him, he said, that he made a libation to Jupiter the Liberator. He was then taken into a vapour store, where he was quickly suffocated, A. D. 65. The body was burnt without ceremony, according to the instructions in a codicil to his will, which was made when he was in the full enjoyment of power and wealth. Seneca died, as was the fashion among the Romans, with the courage of a stoic; but with somewhat of a theatrical affectation which detracts from the dignity of the scene. Tacitus has not strongly censured Seneca in any passage; but Dion Cassius collected from among the contradictory memoirs of the time every thing that was most unfavourable to his character. Seneca's great misfortune was to have known Nero; and though we cannot say that he was a truly great or a truly good man, his character will not lose by comparison with that of many others who have been placed in equally difficult circumstances. Whether he was privy to Piso's conspiracy or not, is a matter which has been warmly discussed, but cannot be determined; nor if we suppose that he was in the conspiracy, would that circumstance be an additional blot on the life of a man who had aided the tyrant in killing his mother. Senecæ's fame rests on his numerous writings, which, with many faults, have also great merits.

The following are Seneca's works: —

1. De fœrro, in three books, addressed to Novatus. Opinions vary as to the time when it was written. Lipsius concludes from book iii. c. 18, that it was written in the time of Caligula, in which case it would be the earliest of Seneca's works. But this conclusion is by no means certain; and it is unlikely that he wrote so freely of Caligula while the "beast" was alive. The author has exhausted the subject. In the first book he combats what Aristotle says of Anger in his Ethic.

2. De Consolatione ad Helviam Matrem Liber, which has been already mentioned. It is one of Seneca's best treatises. The conclusion from c. 17, that Seneca had been in Egypt, is by no means sure.

3. De Consolatione ad Polybiun Liber, which has also been already mentioned: it was written in the third year of Seneca's Consian exile. It is sometimes placed after the treatise De Brevitate Vitis. Didron and others maintain that it is not the composition of Seneca, because it is not worthy of him, and contains sentiments inconsistent with the Consolatio ad Helviam and ad Marciam. But this internal evidence is not supported by any external evidence; and an unprejudiced criticism will vindicate the work as Seneca's, though it disgraces him. It contains (c. 26) a humiliating picture of the Roman world crumbling before an enfraunched slave and a stupid master (Schlosser, Univ. Hist. Uberseicht, vol. iii. pt. 1., pp. 221, 410.)

4. Liber de Consolatione ad Marciam, written after his return from exile, was designed to console Marcia for the loss of her son. Marcia was the daughter of A. Cremitius Cordius. (Tacit. Ann. iv. 34; and the Consol. ad Marciam, c. 22.)

5. De Providentia Liber, or Quare bonus viris mala accidente casu, is addressed to the younger Lucilius, procurator of Sicily. The question that is here discussed often engaged the ancient philosophers: the stoical solution of the difficulty is that suicide is the remedy when misfortune has become intolerable. Lipsius calls this a Golden Book. In this discourse Seneca says that he intends to prove "that Providence hath a power over all things, and that God is always present with us." (c. 1.)

6. De Animis Tranquilitate, addressed to Senerus, probably written soon after Seneca's return from exile. It is in the form of a letter rather than a treatise: the object is to discover the means by which tranquillity of mind can be obtained. This work may be compared with the treatise of Plutarch περὶ ἀθάνατος. This treatise was written some time after Seneca's return from exile (c. 1), when he was elevated to the praetorship, and had become Nero's tutor. He speaks as one who felt himself ill at ease in the splendour of the palace after living a solitary and frugal life.

7. De Constantia Sapiens seu quod in sapientem non cadit injuria, also addressed to Senerus, is founded on the stoical doctrine of the impassiveness of the wise man. "This book," saith Lipsius, "betokeneth a great mind, as great a wit, and much eloquence; in one word, it is one of his best."

8. De Clementia ad Neronem Caesarum Libri duo, which has been already mentioned. There is too much of the flatterer in this; but the advice is good. The second book is incomplete. It is in the first chapter of this second book that the anecdote is told of Nero's unwillingness to sign a sentence of execution, and his exclamation, "I would I could neither read nor write." The work was written at the beginning of Nero's reign.

9. De Brevitate Vita ad Paulinum Liber, recommends the proper employment of time and the getting of wisdom as the chief purpose of life. Life is not really short, but we make it so.

10. De Vita Beata ad Gallionem, addressed to his brother, L. Junius Gallio, is probably one of the later works of Seneca, in which he maintains the stoical doctrine that there is no happiness without virtue; but he does not deny that other things, as health and riches, have their value. "No man hath condemned wisdom to perpetual poverty." The conclusion of the treatise is lost.

11. De Otto aut Sessus Sapientis, is sometimes joined to No. 10.

12. De Beneficiis Libri septem, addressed to Ambivus Lucilius, is an excellent discussion of the way of conferring a favour, and of the duties of the giver and of the receiver. The handling is not very methodical, but it is very complete. It is a treatise which all persons might read with profit. The seventh chapter of the fourth book contains the striking passage on Nature and God: "What else is Nature but God, and a divine being and reason which by his searching assistance resideth in the world and all the parts thereof?" &c.

13. Epistolæ ad Lucilium, one hundred and twenty-four in number, are not the correspondence of daily life, like that of Cicero, but a collection of moral maxims and remarks without any systematic order. They contain much good matter, and have been favourite reading with many distinguished men. Montaigne was a great admirer of them, and thought them the best of Seneca's writings (Essay of Books). It is possible that these letters, and indeed many of Seneca's moral treatises, were written in the latter part of his life, and probably after he had lost the favour of Nero. That Seneca sought consolation and tranquillity of mind in literary occupation, is manifest. The thoughts which engaged him and the maxims which he inculcated on others were consolatory to himself at least, while he was busied with putting them into form; and that is as much as most philosophers get from their speculations in the way of comfort. Seneca was old when he wrote these epistles. (Ep. 12.)

14. Apocolocyntosis, is a satire against the emperor Claudius. The word is a play on the term Apoortion or defilement, and is equivalent in meaning to Pumpkinification, or the reception of Claudius among the pumpkins. The subject was well enough, but the treatment has no great merit; and Seneca probably had no other object than to gratify his spite against the emperor. If such a work was published in the lifetime of Seneca, he must have well known that it would not displease either Agrippina or Nero; and it leads to the probable inference, that the poisoning of Claudius was not a matter which he would complain of. In fact, the manner of the death of Claudius was a subject for the wits of that day to sport with. (Dion Cass. lx. 33, and the notes of Reimarus.)

15. Quaestionum Naturalium Libri septem, addressed to Lucilius Junior, is one of the few Roman works in which physical matters are treated of. It is not a systematic work, but a collection of natural facts from various writers, Greek and Roman, many of which are curious. The first book treats of meteors, the second of thunder and lightning, the third of water, the fourth of hail, snow, and ice, the fifth of winds, the sixth of earthquakes and the sources of the Nile, and the seventh of comets. Moral remarks are scattered through the work; and indeed the design of the whole appears to be to find a foundation for ethic, the chief part of philosophy, in the knowledge of nature (Physic.) He says (book vii. c. 30).—"How many things are there besides comets that pass in secret, and never discover themselves to man's eyes? For God hath not made all things subject to human sight. How little see we of that which is enclosed in so great an orb? Even he who manageth these things, who hath created them, who hath founded the world, and hath inclosed it about himself, and is the greater and better part of this his work, is not subject to our eyes, but is to be visited by our thoughts." This is the man whom some have called an Atheist.

The judgments on Seneca's writings have been as various as the opinions about his character; and both in extremes. It has been said of him that he looks best in quotations; but this is an admission that there is something worth quoting, which cannot be said of all writers. That Seneca possessed great mental powers cannot be doubted. He had seen much of human life, and he knew well what man was. His philosophy, so far as he adopted a system, was the stoical, but it was rather an eclectic stoicism than pure stoicism. His style is antithetical, and apparently laboured; and when there is much labour, there is generally affectation. Yet his language is clear and forcible; it is not mere words: there is thought always. It would not be easy to name any modern writer who has treated on morality, and has said so much that is practically good and true, or has treated the many things the way.

People will judge of Seneca, as they do of most moral writers, by the measure of their own opinions. The less a man cares for the practical, the real, the less will he value Seneca. The more a man envelops himself in words and ideas without exact meaning, the less will he comprehend a writer who does not merely deal in words, but has ideas with something to correspond to them. Montaigne (Defence of Seneca and Plutarch) says: "the familiarity I have had with these two authors, and the assistance they have lent to my age and to my book, which is wholly compiled of what I have borrowed from them, obliges me to stand up for their honour." In another place (Essay of Books) he compares Seneca and Plutarch in his usual lively way: his opinion of the philosophical works of Cicero is not so favourable as of Seneca's; and herein many people will agree with him. The judgement of Ritter (Geschichte der Philosophie, vol. iv. p. 189) is a curious specimen of criticism. If Diderot is extravagant in his praise of Seneca, Ritter and others are equally extravagant in their censure. Ritter finds contradictions in Seneca; and such we may expect in a man who lived the life that he did. We cannot suppose that his conscience always approved of his acts. A practical philosopher, who has lived in the world, must often have done that which he would wish undone; and the contradiction which appears between a man's acts and his principles will appear in his writings. Ritter remarks that he has treated of the doctrines of Seneca at some length, because they show how little talent the Romans had for philosophy. Perhaps the historian of Philosophy may provoke a like remark by his criticisms. Seneca applied himself chiefly to Ethic, which in its wide sense is the art of living happily, without which philosophy has no value. To Physic he paid some attention, and he does not undervalue it as an instrument towards an end. Of the other division of philosophy, Logic, he knew little and cared nothing; and it is of no value except so far as it may be an aid to Physic and Ethic. Ritter says: "his zeal to establish a science which shall be simple and merely adapted for the practical purpose of purity of morals, carries him so far, that he declares even the liberal sciences and philosophical Physic to be useless, so far as they are not capable of application to Ethic. This zeal leads him to expressions which are scarcely intelligible with a philosophical style of thinking. To wish to know no more than is necessary is a kind of intemperance; such a knowl edge makes us only proud: he considers it as a sample of the prevailing luxury." The passages to which Ritter refers are in the Epistolas (Ep. 85, 106). The latter contains the striking passage: "sed nos ut caetera in supervacuum diffundimus, in philosophiam ipsam. Quemadmodum omnium rerum, sic litterarum quoque intemperantia laboramus; non vitae, sed scholae discimus." Which is the wiser, Seneca or his critic, let every man judge for himself. There is enough in Ethic, or the practical application of knowledge to life, to employ us all. Those who have no taste for Ethic, as thus understood, may indulge, if they have money and leisure, in the intemperant litterarum," of which kind of intemperance a large part of all literature is an example.

Seneca, like other educated Romans, rejected the Persians of his country: he looked upon the ceremonial of religion as a matter of custom and fashion, and nothing more. His religion is simple Deism: the Deity acts in man and in all things; which is the same thing that Paul said when he addressed the Athenians, "for in him (God) we live and move and have our being" (Acts, xvii. 28). Indeed there have been persons who, with the help of an active imagination, have made Seneca a Christian, and to have been acquainted with Paul, which is a possible thing, but cannot be proved. The resemblance between many passages in Seneca and passages in the New Testament is merely an accidental circumstance. Similar resemblances occur in the Meditations of the Emperor Marcus Antoninus. The fourteen letters of Seneca to Paul, which are printed in the old editions of Seneca, are apocryphal. Seneca wrote other works which are no longer extant, though the titles of some of them are known. Quintilian (Inst. Or. x. 1 § 128) says, "he treated also on almost every subject of study; for both orations of his, and poems, and epistles, and dialogues, are extant." The fragments of the lost works are contained in the complete editions of Seneca. Niebuhr discovered the fragment of work on Friendship in the Vatican, and the beginning of another "De Vita Patris."

Besides the works which have been enumerated there are extant ten tragedies, which are attributed to Seneca: Quintillian (Inst. Or. ix. 2. § 9) and other Latin writers quote these plays as the works of Seneca. The plays are entitled Hercules Furens, Thyestes, Thesbae or Phoenixiaeus, Hippolytus or Phoebides, Oedipus, Troades or Hecuba, Meleagrum, Agamemnon, Hercules Oetaeum, and Octavia. After all the discussion that there has been about the authorship of these tragedies, there seems no other person to whom we can assign them than Seneca, the teacher of Nero. The titles themselves, with the exception of the Octavia, indicate sufficiently what the tragedies are. Greek mythological subjects treated in a peculiar fashion. They are written in Iambic senarii, interspersed with choral parts, in anapastic and other metres. The subject of the Octavia is Nero's ill-treatment of his wife, his passion for Poppaea, and the exile of Octavia. Seneca himself is one of the personages of the drama, and he is introduced in the second act, depicting the vices of the age and his own unhappiness in his elevated station. There seems no reason why this tragedy should not be attributed to the same author as the other nine, except the fact that it is not contained in the oldest Florentine MS. of the tragedies; nor is there such difference between this and the other tragedies, in character and expression, as to make it a probable conclusion that it is not by the same hand. If it is a work of Seneca, it must have been written after the exile of Octavia, A.D. 62. [Octavia.]

These tragedies are not adapted, and certainly were never intended for the stage. They were designed for reading or for recitation after the Roman fashion, and they bear the stamp of a rhetorical age. The Greek tragedies themselves, of which these Latin tragedies are an imitation in form only, are overloaded with declamation, especially those of Euripides. The tragedies of Seneca contain many striking passages, and have some merit as poems. Moral sentiments and maxims abound, and the style and character of Seneca are as conspicuous here as in his prose works. But there is a wonderful difference between the Latin tragic writer and the Greek dramatists. A comparison of the Medea of Euripides and of Senecan is instructive: the dullest understanding will feel that the Greek play is intended and is suited for acting, and that the Roman play was not intended for the stage, and could not be acted. These Roman tragedies are, in fact, little more than dramas in name and in form: the form, indeed, is precisely Greek, but there is no substance under the form. The Octavia, which some critics violently condemn, is perhaps the best of them, viewed as a drama. There is something to move the affections: there is a tragic situation of an unhappy woman suffering from a brutal husband and a rival favourite, and a catastrophe in the wretched fate of Octavia. The study of the tragedies of Seneca has had some influence on the French drama.

The edition princeps of Seneca is that of Naples, 1475, for which we cannot assign the whole works of Seneca and of particular treatises are numerous. The edition of J. F. Gronovius, Leiden, 1649—1658, is in 4 vols. 12mo.; that of Ruhnkopf, Leipzig, 1791—1811, 5 vols. 4to.; Bippent edition, Strassburg, 1809, 5 vols. 8vo. There are three complete French translations of the works of Seneca, of which that of Lagrange is the last, and is said to be the best. The last edition of Lagrange's version is that of Paris, 1819, 13 vols. 12mo.: the life of Seneca makes the fourteenth volume. The French translations of particular treatises are very numerous.

A list of the English translations of Seneca, or of separate treatises, is contained in Brühlgenmann's work. The first edition of "The Works of L. Annaeus Seneca, both Morall and Natural", translated by Thos. Lodge, D. in Playacak, was published in London in 1614, with a Latin dedication to Chancellor Ellesmere; and "The Life of L. Annaeus Seneca described by Justus Lipsius." This translation contains all the works of Seneca except the Apocolocyntosis, and the Epistles to Paul. The translation has considerable merit, and was a great thing for a man to do who also translated Josephus, and in other respects contributed to the literature of England.

The best of the editions of the tragedies of Seneca is that by Schröder, Delft, 1728, 4to. There is an edition by F. H. Bothe, Leipzig, 1819, 2 vols. 8vo. There are two French translations of the tragedies, the latter of which is by M. Leveé in his Théâtre des Latins, Paris, 3 vols. 8vo. 1822. An English translation of the tragedies by several hands appeared in 1581.

Bähr, Geschichte der Römischen Literatur, vol. i. contains very copious references to all the literature that belongs to the works of Seneca. [G. L.]

SENECIO, CLAUDIUS, a favourite of Nero at the commencement of his reign, was the son of a freedman of the emperor. (Tac. Ann. xiii, 12.)

SENECIO, HERENNIUS, was a native of Baetica in Spain, where he served as quaeator. He was put to death by Domitian on the accusation of Metius Carus, who charged him with having been a candidate for no public office after the quaeatorship, and with having written the life of Helvidius Priscus. He wrote the latter work at the request of Fannia, the wife of Helvidius. (Dion Cass. lvii. 15; Tac. Agr. 2, 43; Plin. Ep. 1. 5, iv. 7, 11. viii. 33.)

SENECIO, C. SOSIUS, consul suffectus, A.D. 58, and consul A.D. 99, 102, 107, is probably the same person who was a friend of the younger Pliny (Ep. 1. 13), and whom Plutarch addresses in several of his lives. (Thecetus, 1, Democrit, i, Brut.)

SENECIO, TULLIUS, a friend of Nero, nevertheless took part in Piso's conspiracy against the emperor, and on its detection was obliged to put an end to his life. (Tac. Ann. xv. 50, 55, 70.)

SENTIA GENS, plebeian, is not mentioned till towards the close of the republic. We find it in the cognomina AURINUS and SATURNIUS; and the first member of it who obtained the consulship was C. Sentius Saturnius, in B.C. 19.
SEPTIMIUS.

Some coins of the gens bear the cognomen Saturninus, and others occur without any surname. Of the latter we give a specimen: on the obverse is the head of Pallas with Arg. FVH, and on the reverse Jupiter in a quadriga with (L) SEXTI C. F. (Eckhel, vol. v. p. 305.)

SEPPIIUS LE'SIUS, held the office of meddix tuticus at Capua, in b. c. 211, being the last of the Campanians who obtained this dignity. (Livy. xxvi. 6, 13.)

SEPTI'CIUS CLARUS. [CLARUS.]

SEPTI'CIUS GENS, apparently the wife of Sicca. (Cic. N. D. 13. 11.)

SEPTI'MIUS, Septimius, plebeian. The Septimii are not mentioned till towards the close of the republic, and none of them obtained any celebrity till the imperial period, when they were raised to importance by Septimius Severus being elevated to the empire.

SEPTI'MIUS, FABIIUS CILO. [Cilo.]

SEPTI'MIUS. 1. P. SEPTI'MIUS SCAEVOLA, b. c. 72. [SCAEVOLA, p. 734, a.]

2. SEPTI'MIUS, one of Catiline's conspirators, was sent by him in b. c. 63 into the Ager Picenum. (Sall. Cat. 27.)

3. T. SEPTI'MIUS SABINUS, curule aedile, apparently after the consulship of L. Lucullus, the conqueror of Mithridates. (Plin. H. N. xxxiv. 3. 19. § 35.)

4. C. SEPTI'MIUS, a scriba of the consul Bibulus, b. c. 59. (Cic. ad Att. ii. 24.)

5. P. SEPTI'MIUS, one of the witnesses against L. Valerius Flaccus in b. c. 59. [FLACCUS, VALERIUS, No. 15.]

6. C. SEPTI'MIUS, praeator b. c. 37, supported Cicero's recall from banishment. Cicero speaks of him as augur in b. c. 45. (Cic. post Red. in Sen. 9, ad Att. xii. 13, 14.)

7. P. SEPTI'MIUS, the quaestor of M. Terentius Varro, who sent to him three books De Lingua Latina (Varr. L. L. v. i. 109, ed. Müller). He is probably the same as the P. Septimius, who wrote two books on architecture, as his name is mentioned by Vitruvius in conjunction with Varro's. (Vitr. v. i. Preuf. p. 194, ed. Bip.)

8. L. SEPTI'MIUS, had served as a centurion under Cn. Pompey, in the war against the pirates, and afterwards under Gabinius, when he restored Ptolemy Aeletes to the throne. Gabinius left him behind in Egypt with a considerable force, to protect the king, and he was still in the country, with the rank of tribunus militum, when Pompey fled Valerius Flaccus battle of Pharsalia, in b. c. 49. In conjunction with Achillas, he slew his old commander, as he was landing in Egypt. Appian erroneously calls him Sempronius. (Dien Cass. xliii. 3. 4, 38; Cass. B. C. iii. 104; Plat. Pomp. 78; Appian, B. C. ii. 84.)

9. SEPTI'MIUS, was proscribed by the triumvirs in b. c. 43, and betrayed by his wife to the assassins. (Appian, B. C. iv. 23.)

10. SEPTI'MIUS, a friend of Horace, who dedicates to him one of his odes (Carm. ii. 6, Epist. i. 9). He is also called by Augustus Septimius noster, in a letter addressed by the emperor to Horace. (Suet. Hor.)

11. SEPTI'MIUS, a centurion, slain by the soldiers in Germany, where they broke out into revolt at the commencement of the reign of Tiberius. (Tac. Ann. i. 32.)

12. SEPTI'MIUS, wrote the life of Alexander Severus, and is referred to by Lampridius as an authority. (Lamprid. Alex. Sever. 17, 48.)

13. Q. SEPTI'MIUS, the translator of the work on the Trojan war, bearing the name of Dictys Cretensis. [Vol. i. p. 1003, a.]

SEPTI'MIUS, TITIUS. Horace, in an epistle (i. 3, 9—14) to Julius Florus, at that time in the East along with Tiberius Nero, makes inquiries with regard to the welfare and occupations of a certain Titius, whom in a tone of serious eulogy or covert ridicule,—for here and elsewhere in these pieces it is difficult to determine whether words of apparent praise do not hide a lurking sneer,—he represents as having boldly ventured to quaff a draught from the Pindaric spring, and as having, moreover, been ambitious to achieve distinction in the impassioned and grandiloquent outpourings of the tragic muse. Acro and Porphyrio agree in declaring that Horace is here laughing at Titius, a poet of no merit; although the latter commentator admits that the expressions might reasonably admit of an opposite interpretation. They add that this personage had attempted to translate Pindar into Latin, and that he had composed lyrics and tragedies, explanations which after all amount to little more than an echo of the text. The Scholiast published by Cruquius states, in like manner, “lyrica carmina et tragodiae scriptis, Augusti tempore,” but calls him Titius Septimius, adding that his works were no longer extant, but that a tomb had been reared to his memory below Aricia. In consequence of this note Titius is believed by many modern commentators to be the same individual with the Septimius who is addressed in the sixth ode of the second book, and who is introduced in the ninth epistle of the first book. [SEPTI'MIUS, No. 10.]

Much learning and ingenuity have been displayed in attacking and defending this position, as may be seen from the dissertation “De Tito Septimio poëta,” in the “Poëtarum Latinorum Reliquiae” of Weichert, Svo. L.ips. 1830, pp. 365—390; see also the remarks of Obbians on Hor. Ep. i. 3. 9. [W. R.]

L. SEPTI'MULEBIUS, of Anagnia, although a friend of C. Gracchus, carried the head of the latter to the consul Opimius, and obtained for it its weight in gold, in accordance with a proclamation which had been made at the beginning of the contest. It is related that Septimuleius took out the head, but put melted lead in its stead, according to another version of the story, filled the mouth with lead. (Plut. C. Gracch. 17; Val. Max. ix. 4. § 8; Plin. H. N. xxxiii. 14; Cic. de Oral. ii. 67.)

usuallly called by Livy simply L. Marcius, was a Roman eques, and served for many years under Cn. Scipio in Spain. On the defeat and death of the two Scipios in Spain, in b. c. 211, L. Marcius, who had already gained great distinction by his military abilities, was called by the soldiers to take the command of the surviving troops, and by his prudence and energy preserved them from total destruction. He appears indeed to have gained some advantage over the Carthaginian army commanded by Hasdrubal, son of Hasdrubal, which the Roman annalists magnified into a brilliant victory. The details of the history of the Roman war in Spain are not

Several names appear in this piece which are to be found in no other ancient writer. Some of these have arisen from misapprehension on the part of the compiler himself, others are palpable corruptions, while a few are doubtless derived from sources to which we have no access. The general merits of Seston's work have been very fairly estimated from sources to which he had no access, others are palpable corruptions, while a few are doubtless derived from sources to which we have no access. SERAPION.

Concerning SEQUESTER, SEPU'LIIUS, an Aegyptian statue of unknown date, made the bronze statue of the Olympic victor Agriatus. (Paus. vi. 10. § 2.) [P.S.] SER'A'PIA. [T. C.; L. C.]

SER'APIO, a surname of P. Cornelius Scipic Nasica, consul B. c. 130. [Scipio. No. 24.] SERAPION, SERAPION of Paeserium, or SARRAPION, literary. 1. Of Antioch, a writer on Geography, whom Pliny mentions among his chief authorities. (Elench. Lib. ii. iv. v.) He seems to be the same as the Serapion who is twice mentioned by Cicero as very unintelligible, and as a severe critic of Eratosthenes. (Ad Att. ii. 4, 6.)

2. Aeilius Serapion, of Alexandria, a distinguished sophist and rhetorician, in the time of Hadrian. (Suid. s. v.) The following works of his are enumerated by Suidas: Περὶ τῶν ἐν ταῖς μελετὴσι αἰαρκτομαθῶν, Ἀκροδαδον αἰαρκτοκσον, Παντηργαμόο εἰς ἄδιαυτά τὴν Βασιλείαν, Βουλευτικόν Ἀλεχείρωνον, Εἰ δικαια Πλάτων ὁμοιο ἀνεπακρυφτικά τῆς ποιητικῆς, Τέχνη ρητορικῆ, and many other works. There is also a little work on astrology ascribed to him. (Lambec. vii. p. 256.) The Greek Anthology contains an epigram of his. (Branc. Anat. vol. ii. p. 291; Jacobs, Anth. Graece, vol. iii. p. 5, vol. iv. p. 93.)

3. A younger Serapion, of Alexandria, is mentioned by Porphyry as a pupil of Plotinus. (Vit. Plot. 7.)

4. A philosopher of Hierapolis (Steph. Byz. s. v. Ἱεράπολις), probably the same as the following.

5. A philosopher who flourished at Rome under the early emperors, and who is censured for his false eloquence by Seneca. (Epist. 40; comp. Muret. Adv.)

6. A philosopher of a later period, the friend of Isidore, of whom Suidas (s. v.) gives a long eulogistic notice, extracted from the Life of Isidore by Damascius, but containing scarcely any facts of general interest. His library is said to have consisted of three volumes, one of which was the Orphic poems.

7. Of Ascalon, wrote on the interpretation of dreams. (Fulgent. Myth. i. 13; Tertullian. de Anima. 46.)

8. There was at least one poet of this name, perhaps more. A Serapion of Athens, who, from the context, was evidently an epic poet, is introduced by Plutarch as a speaker in his dialogue on the reason of the Pythia's no longer giving oracles in verse (p. 296). Another of the interlocutors compares Serapion's poems to those of Homer and Heaioi, for their force, and grace, and the style of SERENUS.

Alexander Severus (c. 30) that this prince was wont to read "et oratores et poëtas, in quibus Serenum Sammonicum, quem ipse novaret et dilexerat, et Horatium." His son, who bore the same name, was the preceptor of the younger Gordian, and bequeathed to pupil the magnificent library which he had inherited from his sire. (Capitolin. Gordian. 183.)

A medical poem, extending to 115 hexameter lines, divided into 65 chapters or sections, and ending abruptly, has descended to us under the title Q. Serenii Sammonici de Medicina praeccepta subberrima, or, Praecptae de Medicina parvo pretio paralidis, which is usually ascribed to the elder Sammonicus. It contains a considerable amount of information, extracted from the best authorities, on natural history and the healing art, mixed up with a number of puerile superstitions, such as the efficacy of the Abracchandra as an amulet in ague, the whole expressed in plain, unambitious, and almost prosaic language. The text is very corrupt, probably in consequence of the estimation in which the treatise was held during the middle ages. The most useful edition is that of Burmann, included in his Poëtæ Latinæ Minores (4to. Leid. 1731, vol. ii. pp. 187—388), containing the best notes and the Prolegomena of Keuchen. For an account of some recent contributions towards the improvement of the text, see Reuss, Lectureèmes Sammoniæces, p. i. 4to. Wiresb, 1837. [W. R.]

SERENUS, A. SEPTIMIUS, a Roman lyric poet (Terent. Mau. p. 2427, ed. Putsch.; Serv. ad Virg. Aen. iii. 15; Hieron. Epist. ad Paulin. 7), who exercised his muse chiefly, it would appear, in depicting the charms of the country, and the delight of rural pursuits. With the exception of one or two incidental notices in Sidonius Apollinaris (Epist. ad Polen. Carn. ix. ad Fel.), and the passage in St. Jerome referred to above, he is known to us from the grammarians alone, unless, indeed, we adopt the conjecture of Gronovius that in the Ode of Stattius (Silv. iv. 5) addressed to Septimius Severus, we have to substitute Serenus for Severus. The age in which he flourished is uncertain, since it depends upon the epoch which we assign to Terentianus Maurus, with whom he seems to have been nearly contemporary. (Terent. Maur. pp. 2424, 2427, ed. Putsch.)

His chief work, at least that which is most frequently mentioned, is quoted by Nonius (c. v. n. 35) under the title of Opuscula Ruralia, by Terentianus Maurus (p. 2427, ed. Putsch.), as Opuscula Ruris, by others simply as Opuscula, and must have been divided into two or more books (Non. c. xiv. 5). Another piece, unless indeed it was included in the Opuscula, was named Faliscæ, from containing a description of a farm which he possessed in the country of the Falisci, and from this the author is designated as Poëta Faliscæus (Terent. Maur. p. 2423, ed. Putsch.). It was composed in a peculiar measure invented by himself, consisting of three dactyls and a pyrrhichius, which is hence termed Metrum Faliscæus by Servius (Centimetr. p. 1824, ed. Putsch.) and Victoriaus (p. 2573 ed. Putsch.). Of this we have a specimen in the lines:

Quando flagella jugas, ita jugas,
Vitis et culmis uti simul cant.
Nam nisi sint paribus frutices, Umbra necat teneras Amanicas.

Wernsdorf has endeavoured to prove that the Moretum, found among the Catalecta Virgilianæ, belongs in reality to Serenus, but the hypothesis rests upon no sure nor even plausible evidence.

The scanty remains of Serenus, of which the longest fragment, the commencement of a sort of hymn to Janus, extends to five lines only, afford examples of several uncommon metres, and will be found collected in Wernsdorf, Poët. Lat. Min, vol. ii. p. 279. The dissertation commencing in p. 247 of the same volume contains every thing that has been ascertained or conjectured with regard to his name, his history, and his writings. See also Burmann, Athol. Lat. i. 27, iii. 57, or No. 191, 192, ed. Meyer. [W. R.]

SERENUS, VIBBIUS, proconsul of Further Spain, was condemned of Via publica in a.d. 23, and exiled (deportatus) to the little island of Amorgus, near Naxos. The real reason of his punishment was his being an enemy of the all-powerful Sejanus, as we learn from Dion Cassius (viii. 8), who relates the circumstance, but without mentioning the name of Serenus. In the following year he was brought back to Rome, because he was accused by his own son, in the senate, of a plot against the emperor. The younger Serenus became one of the most infamous accusers in the reign of Tiberius, and was therefore held in all the higher honour by the emperor. (Tac. Ann. iv. 13, 28, 36.)

SERGIA. 1. One of the noble women at Rome who were accused of poisoning the leading men of the state in b.c. 331. The details and authorities are given under CORNELIA, No. 1.

2. The sister of Catiline, was married to Q. Caecilius, a Roman eque, who was slain by his brother-in-law during the proscription of Sulla. Sergia, like her brother, bore a bad character (q. Cic. de Pet. Cons. 2; Ascon. in Top. Cand. p. 84, ed. Orelli).

SERGIA GENS, patrician. The Sergi, like many other ancient Roman gentes, traced their descent from the Trojans. They regarded Ser-gestas as their ancestor (Virg. Aen. v. 121):

"Sergestusque, demus tenet a quo Sergia nomen." The Sergii were distinguished in the early history of the republic, but obtained an unenviable notoriety at a later age by Catiline belonging to them. The first member of the gens who obtained the consulship was L. Sergius Fidenas, in b.c. 437. The Sergii bore the cognomina of CATILINA, ES-QUILINUS, FIDENAS, ORATA, PAULUS, PLANCU, (accidentally omitted under Plinianus, and given below), and SILUS. Silus is the only cognomen which occurs on coins. A few persons of the gens are mentioned without any surname: these are given below.

SERGIUS. 1. M. SERGIUS, tribune of the soldiers, was sent by P. Scipio to Rhegium, and was there slain shortly afterwards by the soldiers of Pellininius, b.c. 265. (Liv. xxix. 6, 9.)

2. L. SERGIUS, one of the three ambassadors sent by P. Scipio to Carthage, in b.c. 203. (Liv. xxx. 25.)

3. C. SERGIUS PLANCU, praetor urbanus b.c. 200. His imperium was prolonged for the following year, that he might assign lands to the soldiers who had served for many years in Spain, Sicily, and Sardinia. (Liv. xxxi. 4, 6, xxxii. 1.)

carios, is mentioned by Cicero as alive at the time of the Social War, B.C. 90. (Cic. pro Client. 7.) 5. L. SERGIUS, a son of Cicero, when he was quaestor in Sicily, B.C. 75. (Cic. Verr. iii. 78.)
6. L. SERGIUS, the armiger of Catiline, and subsequently one of Clodius’s mob. (Cic. pro Dom. 5, 33.)
7. SERGIUS, proscribed by the triumvirs in B.C. 43, lay concealed in the house of Antony, till the latter obtained his pardon. (Appian, B.C. iv. 45.)
SERGIUS (Σεργιος), of Zeugma, a town in Syria, the son of Apathion, was, according to Suidas, 257. (Liv. xxxiv. 27.)
SERGIUS, probably the second son of No. 2, was praetor B.C. 192, and obtained, as his province, Macedonia and the command of the fleet, under the pretext of carrying on hostilities against the Lacedaemonian tyrant Nahis, but in reality that he might be ready to act in the threatening war against Antiochus the Great, king of Syria. In the following year he retained the command of the fleet till the arrival of his successor, C. Livius Salinator; and as the war had been already fixed against Antiochus, he captured in the Aegean a large fleet of transports carrying provisions to the king, and brought the ships into the Peiraeus. He was praetor a second time in B.C. 173, and obtained the jurisdiction urbana. He was ordered in the same year to renew with Antiochus Epiphanes the treaty which had been concluded with his father. In B.C. 171 he was sent, with Q. Marcius Philippus and others, as ambassador into Greece, to counteract the designs and influence of Perseus. An account of this embassy, and of the way in which he and Philippus deceived the Macedonian monarch, is given in the life of Philippus [Vol. III. p. 286, a.]. In the following year, B.C. 170, he was consul with A. Hostilius Manemus, and obtained Italy as his province, while his colleague had the conduct of the war against Perseus. (Liv. xxxv. 10, 20, 32, xxxvi. 20; Appian, Syr. 22; Liv. xii. 28, xii. 1, 6, 37, 38, 44, 47; Polyb. xxvii. 2; Liv. xiii. 9.)
8. M. ATILIUS SERGIANUS, probably the third son of No. 2, was one of the triumvirs appointed in B.C. 190, for settling new colonists at Placentia and Cremona. He is probably the same as the M. Atilius who was praetor in B.C. 174, and obtained the province of Sardinia. (Liv. xxxvii. 46, xlii. 21.)
9. M. ATILIUS SERGIANUS, praetor B.C. 152, in Further Spain, defeated the Lusitan and took their principal city, Oxythracea. (Appian, Hisp. 58.)

SERRANUS.

SERRANUS.

6. L. SERGIUS, a son of Cato, the younger, was, according to Donatus, the second, In secundam Donati Editionem Commentaria, which were first published in the collection of minor grammarians, printed at Milan, vol. 1504, and which will both be found in the "Grammaticae Latinae auctores antiqui" of Putschius (4to. Han. nov. 1605, pp. 1816—1838). The former appears under its best form in the "Analecta Grammatica" of Endlicher, who has also printed from a Bobbio MS., now at Vienna, a fragment of Sergius, de Arte Grammatica. By some scholars this Sergius is supposed to be the same person with Servius Mauro Honoratus, the celebrated commentator on Virgil; but there is still extant (pp. 1779—1799, ed. Putsch.) a commentary by Servius upon the second edition of Donatus altogether different from that which bears the name of Sergius. [W. R.]
Sermo, M. MARCELLUS, tribune of the plebs B.C. 172, in conjunction with his colleague Q. Marcilius Scylia, compelled the consuls of that year to go into their provinces, and also proposed the regio Marcia de Liguribus. (Liv. xiii. 21.)
SERRANA, was originally an agnomen of C. Atilius Regulus, consul B.C. 257, but afterwards became the name of a distinct family of the Atilia gens. The origin of the name is uncertain. Most of the ancient writers derive it from serene, and relate that Regulus received the surname of Serranus, because he was engaged in sowing when the news was brought him of the elevation to the consulship ("Serentem invenerunt dati honores Ser- ranum, unde cognomen." Plin. H. N. xviii. 3. s. 4.; "e te sulco, Serrana, serement, Virg. Aen. vi. 845.; Cic. pro se. Rosc. 18; Val. Max. iv. 4. § 5.) It appears, however, from coins, that Serranus is the proper form of the name, and Petronius (Antinidae. Hist. c. 1) thinks that it is derived from Sarranum, a town of Umbria.
C. ATILIUS REGULUS SERRANUS, consul B.C. 257. [Regules, No. 4.]
2. C. ATILIUS SERGIANUS, probably son of the preceding, was praetor B.C. 218, the first year of the second Punic War, and was sent into northern Italy, to strengthen the army of the other praetor, L. Manlius, who was attacked by the Boii. At a later period of the year, he and his colleague resigned their command to the consul P. Scipio, who returned from the Rhone to oppose Hannibal in Italy. He was an unsuccessful candidate for the consulship for B.C. 216. (Liv. xxi. 26, 39, 62; Appian, Annib. 5; Polyb. iii. 40; Liv. xxii. 35.)
3. C. ATILIUS SERGIANUS, probably the eldest son of No. 2, curule aedile B.C. 193, with L. Scribonius Libo. They were the first aediles who exhibited the Megalasia as ludi scenici; and it was in their aedilship that the senators had seats assigned them in the theatre, distinct from the rest of the people. He did not obtain the praetorship till B.C. 185. (Liv. xxxiv. 54; Val. Max. ii. 4. § 3; Ascon. in Tog. Cand. p. 69, ed. Orelli; Liv. xxxix. 23.)
SERTORIUS.

In order to prevent his recall from banishment, and in conjunction with his colleague, Q. Numerius Rufus, offered the most vigorous resistance to Cicero's friends. When the consul Lentulus proposed in the senate on the 1st of January the recall of Cicero, Serranus begged that the question might be adjourned, in order that he might have a night to consider it: this time he employed in securing for himself increase of the pay which he had already received. After Cicero's return to Rome, Serranus put his veto upon the decree of the senate restoring to Cicero the site on which his house had stood, but he found it advisable to withdraw his opposition. (Cic. pro Sest. 33, 34, 39, 43, post Red. ad Quir. 5, ad Att. iv. 2 § 4, de Harusp. Resp. 15; Ascon. in Pison. p. 11, ed. Orelli.)

11. (Attilius?) Serranus Domesticus, the funeral of whose son B.C. 54, is spoken of by Cicero (ad Q. Fr. iii. 8, § 5.)

It is uncertain to which member of the family the annexed coin refers. It bears on the obverse the head of Pallas, with SARAN., and on the reverse the Dioscuri, with M. ATI., and below ROMA. (Eckhel, vol. v. p. 146.)

COIN OF M. ATIULLUS SERRANUS.

SERRANUS, a Roman poet mentioned by Juvenal (vii. 80), to whom Sarpe assigns the Edologues which have come down to us under the name of Calpurnius Siculus [CALPURNIUS]. (Sarpe, Quest. Philol. Rostoch, 1819.)

Q. SERTORIUS, was the son of a reputable father, of Nursia, a Sabine village. His father died young, and he owed a good education to the care of a mother, to whom he was most affectionately attached. (Plut. Sertor. 2, 22.) Sertorius had no ancestral dignity, and he left no children to perpetuate his name. He had acquired some reputation as a speaker even before he became a soldier. Cicero, who was acquainted with him, commends his facile speech and the sharpness of his judgment. (Brutus, 48.) Bodily strength, endurance of fatigue, sagacity and fertility of resources, qualified him for the life of adventure which it was his lot to have. The ancient writers have amused themselves with comparing him with other remarkable men. Plutarch has instituted a parallel between Sertorius and Eumenes, which is not inappropriate. The comparison with Hannibal, Philipus, and Antigonus, is mainly a classification of one-eyed men; for Sertorius also had lost an eye.

His military career commenced in Gaul. He was in the bloody battle on the Rhone (B.C. 105), in which the consul, Q. Servilius Caepio, was defeated by the Germans; and though wounded, Sertorius saved his life by swimming across the river in his armour. He was with Marius, B.C. 102, at Aix (Aquae Sextiae), and before the battle he entered the camp of the Teutones in disguise as a spy, for which hazardous undertaking his intrepid character and some knowledge of the Gallic language well qualified him. He served as tribunus militum in Spain under T. Didius (B.C. 97). During his residence in winter quarters at Castulo, which was probably on the Guadalquivir, he was expelled by the inhabitants on account of the oppressive conduct of the Roman garrison; but as the Spaniards left their gate unguarded, Sertorius made his way into the town again, and massacred all who were capable of bearing arms. He then distributed the dresses and armour of the barbarians who had been killed among his men, and under this guise obtained admission into a town which had sent men to aid the people of Castulo in ejecting the Roman soldiers; most of the persons in the town were killed, and the rest were sold.

On his return to Rome he obtained the quaestorship in Gaul upon the Po, and he held this office at a critical time (B.C. 91), for the Marse war was impending. He actively exerted himself in raising troops and procuring arms, and probably he held some command during the war; but the Roman generalists did not care to record the heroic acts of a man of unknown family. The marks of honour which he bore were, as he said, his scars, and the loss of an eye. Sertorius was well received in Rome; the people acknowledged his merit by clapping of hands when he entered the theatre; but L. Cornelius Sulla and his party successfully opposed him when he was a candidate for the tribuneship. On the outbreak of the civil war, B.C. 88, he declared himself against the party of the nobles, though he was by no means an adherer of his old commander, C. Marius, whose character he well understood.

When Marius fled from Rome before Sulla, Sertorius remained; and while Sulla was engaged in the war against Mithridates, Sertorius sided with L. Cornelius Cinna, the consul, against the other consul Octavius. The two consuls fought a battle in the Forum, which ended in the victory of Octavius, and the flight of Cinna and Sertorius. Cinna, however, soon rallied his party, and got a force together which made him a match for Octavius. In B.C. 87, Marius returned to Italy from Africa, and proposed to join Cinna. Sertorius was against receiving the proposals of Marius, "a man who could ensure no partner in power, and who was devoid of good faith." Cinna did not follow the advice of Sertorius, and Marius was allowed to join them. Sertorius commanded one of the four armies that presented themselves before Rome; and he, in conjunction with Cinna, fought the battle against Pompeius Strabo before the Colline gate. (Appian, Bell. Civ. i. 67; Orosius, v. 19.)

Sertorius is not charged with the guilt of the bloody massacre which ensued after Marius and Cinna entered Rome. The slaves whom Marius had invited to his standard, and now kept as guards, committed worse excesses than Marius himself; they butchered their masters, lay with their masters' wives, and violated their children. Sertorius was at last roused, and either alone or with the concurrence of Cinna, he fell upon these scoundrels in their camp, and spared four thousand of them. (Plut. Sertor. 3, Mar. 44.)

In B.C. 63 Sertorius was praetor. Sulla was now returning home after reducing Mithridates to terms, and the party of Sertorius made prepartions to oppose him. But their means and measure were ineffectual against so wily an enemy. The consul Norbanus was defeated, and the army of the other consul, L. Scipio, being gained over by Sulla, though Q. Sertorius had warned Scipio of the danger of a negotiation with Sulla, he withdrew into Etruria. His remonstrances also had no effect in n. c. 82 with the consuls Carbo and the younger Marius, and in order to get rid of him, they suggested that he should undertake the administration of the province of Further Spain.
Julius Exsuperantius (c. 8) is the sole authority for this fact, though he does not state the whole affair correctly. Appian (Bell. Civ. 1. 86, 108) makes Sertorius go to Spain in n. c. 83, before the consulship of Carbo and the younger Marius.
With few men and little money, Sertorius made his way through Gaul, and bought a free passage over the Pyrenees from the barbarians (Plut.
Sertor. 6). In Spain he set about forming an army of Roman settlers and Spaniards, providing munitions and warlike stores and building ships. Sulla sent C. Aurelius Luscius into Spain to oppose Sertorius, with the title of proconsul, who was followed by his quaestors, L. Fabius and Q. Tarquinius. They found the passages of the Pyrenees occupied by Julius Salinator, the legate of Sertorius, and they could not make any way until Salinator was treachereously murdered. The road into Spain being opened, the troops of Luscius advanced without meeting with resistance, and Sertorius embarking at Carthago Nova (Carragena) set sail for Mauritania. Here he was attacked by the barbarians, and after some loss he put to sea again, and being joined by some Cilician pirates, he drove the Roman garrison from the Pytusae Islands (Yvica and Formonteram). His light ships were now attacked by the fleet of Luscius; and harassed by stormy weather, he sailed for the Strait of Gibraltar, and finally landed at the mouth of the Guadalquivr. Here he met with some seamen who had building ships. Sulla sent
B. M. Norbanus into Spain to oppose Sertorius, and the two men, being attacked first by pirates (Madeira and Porto Santo, or, as some suppose, the Canaries), and from their description of this happy region he was seized with a strong desire to dwell in the islands, and to live in quiet, free from tyranny and never-ending wars." But the Cilician pirates left him; and, to satisfy his men and keep them employed, he went over again to Mauritania, to help the people against their king, whom he defeated. He also defeated Paccianus, whom Sulla had sent against him; and he took Tingis (Tangier), in which the Moorish king was. This African campaign of Sertorius was in the northwest part of Marocco.
Being strengthened by the addition of the forces of Paccianus, and having acquired some fame by his success in Africa, Sertorius was invited by the Usitau who, were exposed to the invasion of the Romans, to become their leader. He crossed over to the peninsula at the call with about two thousand Spanish and Moorish men, of whom about one third were Libyans; and he soon got together an army, which for some years successfully opposed all the power of Rome.
Plutarch says that he also availed himself of the superstitious character of the people among whom he was, to strengthen his authority over them.
A fawn was brought to him by one of the natives as a present, which soon became so tame as to accompany him in his walks, and attend him on all occasions. Plutarch's life of Sertorius is written something in the style of a romance, but his story of the fawn, and of the means which Sertorius made of it, contains nothing improbable, if we consider the character of the man and his circumstances.
The story of the fawn is also supported by the testimony of Frontinus (Stratagy. 1. 11, § 13).
His first exploit was the defeat of Cotta, the legate of Luscius, in a sea-fight in or near the Straits of Gibraltar (Plut. Sertor. 12). In n. c. 80, Sulla sent L. Domitius Ahenobarbus to take the command against Sertorius in Neader Spain, and Fufidius in Further Spain. Fufidius was defeated by Sertorius with great loss on the banks of the Guadalquivr. Sertorius was now strengthened by the accession of many Romans who had been proscribed by Sulla; and this not only added to his consideration, but brought him many good officers. The dictator Sulla appointed, as governor of Spain for the following year, n. c. 79, his colleague in the consulship, Q. Metellus Pins, the son of the proconsul, L. Gensins, the pro-consul of Gallia Narbonensis, was routed, and with difficulty escaped to Leriida (Ilerda) on the Segre with the loss of his baggage (Caesar, Bell. Gall. iii.
20; Orosius, v. 25.) Metellus was still harassed by the guerilla warfare of Sertorius (Plut.
Sertor. 13): he also received a challenge to a single combat from Sertorius, which, as Plutarch observes, he wisely declined. Metellus made an attempt to take the town of the Langobritae (Langobriga or Lacobriga, a place of uncertain position), which had only one well of water within the walls. He expected to take the town in two days; but Sertorius supplied the place with water by means of skins, which were carried into the town by Spanish and Moorish volunteers. C.
Aquinins, who was sent by Metellus to forage, fell into an ambuscade, and Metellus at last was compelled to retire.
In the year n. c. 77 Sertorius was joined by
M. Perperna, one of the legates of M. Lepidus.
Perperna fled before the generals of Sulla, and came to Spain with some troops and several senators and nobles. His men compelled Perperna to take the command under Sertorius; Plutarch says that Perperna had fifty-three cohorts with him. (Sertor.
15.) To give some show of form to his formidable power, Sertorius established a senate of three hundred, into which no provincial was admitted; but to soothe the more distinguished Spaniards, and to have some security for their fidelity, he established a school at Huesca (Osca), in Aragon, for the education of their children in Greek and Roman learning. The position chosen for his school shows that the north-east of Spain was under the authority of Sertorius, and probably his power was acknowledged in every part of the peninsula which had ever felt the Roman arm.

Some time in B.C. 77 Pompeius was appointed by the senate to command in Spain. Pompeius was only an eques; but in reply to the question in the senate if an eques should be sent as proconsul, L. Philippius wisely replied, "not "pro consule," but "pro consulibus." Pompeius was entrusted with equal authority with Metellus, an unwise measure, which bred jealousy between the commanders. Pompeius left Italy in B.C. 76, with thirty thousand infantry and a thousand cavalry, and he crossed the Alps between the sources of the Po and the Rhone, as Appian states (Bell. Civ. i. 109).

He entered Spain, and advanced to the Ebro (Iberus) without meeting resistance. (Ep. Pomp. Frag. Sallust. lib. iii.) He probably marched near the coast, and advanced into Valencia to relieve Lauro, on the Xucar (Sucro) which Sertorius was besieging. But Pompeius was out-manoeuvred by his opponent, and compelled to retire with the loss of a legion. Frontinus (Stratig. ii. 5), following the authority of Livius, makes the loss of Pompeius much larger. Appian (i. 100) gives an instance of the severity of Sertorius on this occasion: he put to death a whole Roman cohort of his own troops, on the ground of the men being addicted to unnatural practices. Pompeius wintered north of the Ebro, a fact which shows the advantage that Sertorius had gained. The winter camp of Sertorius was also not far from the Iberus at Aelia Castra. Appian says that both Metellus and Pompeius wintered near the Pyrenees, and Sertorius and Perperna in Lusitania. (Compare Drumm. Pompeius, p. 364.)

In the spring of B.C. 75 Perperna was sent by Sertorius, with a large force, to the mouth of the Iberus, to watch Pompeius. In Baetica, or Further Spain, L. Hirtuleius had to observe the movements of Metellus. Sertorius ascended the Ebro, and laid waste the country as far as Calahorra (Calagurta Nasica). Contrebia was the place at which M. Instineus, who was ordered to reinforce the cavalry, and the rest of the commanders, were to meet him.

Hirtuleius, contrary to the instructions of Sertorius, fought a battle with Metellus at Italica near Seville, in which he was totally defeated. After the victory Metellus advanced northwards against Sertorius. Hirtuleius rallied his troops, and followed Metellus; but in a second battle near Segovia he was again defeated, and lost his life. Pompeius, though he had received no reinforcements from Rome, marched southward to oppose Herennius and Perperna, who had joined their forces; and he gave them a signal defeat near Valencia on the Guadavil (Turia): Herennius lost his life, and according to Plutarch (Pompeius, 10), ten thousand men fell on that day.

To prevent the junction of Pompeius and Metellus, Sertorius advanced to the river Xucar; but Pompeius had no wish to join Metellus: he aspired to the glory of finishing the war himself. Sertorius met his enemy on the river, and, with his usualacity, deferred the combat till the evening, because whether Pompeius was conquered or victorious, his movements after the battle during the dark, and in an unknown country, must be impeded. The loss was great on both sides: the camp of Sertorius was plundered; and Pompeius, who was wounded, only escaped by quitting his costly-caparisoned horse, the capture of which amused the Moors who were in pursuit of him. It may have been in this battle that Sertorius stabbed the man who brought him news of the defeat of Hirtuleius (Frontinus, Stratig. ii. 7), to prevent his soldiers being discouraged by the intelligence. On the following day Sertorius was ready to fight again; but observing that Metellus was near, he broke up his order of battle, and marched off, saying, "If that old woman had not come up, I would have given this boy a good drubbing, by way of lesson, and have sent him back to Rome." (Plut. Sertor. 19.)

The fawn of Sertorius had been lost in the confusion, but he got it again by offering a great reward to the finder. His men were encouraged by the reappearance of this animal, which was supposed to be a favourable omen, and Sertorius led them against the united forces of Metellus and Pompeius, which were encamped at Murviedro, on the site of Saguntum. Pompeius was compelled to retreat with the loss of six thousand men; Sertorius lost three thousand. The division of Metellus defeated that of Perperna, which lost above five thousand men. (Appian, i. 110.)

The winter was now coming on. Sertorius, according to his fashion, gave the greater part of his troops leave to disperse, and appointed, as their rendezvous, Clunia, a town among the Arevaci, not far from the Douro. (Drummann, p. 369.) Metellus and Pompeius separated: Metellus wintered between the Ebro and the Pyrenees; Plutarch (Sertor. 21) says that he wintered in Gallia, which is probably a mistake. Pompeius wintered among the Vacciæi. If the position of Clunia is well fixed, Pompeius must have wintered to the rear of Sertorius, which is very improbable. Owing to the want of precision, in Plutarch's narrative, and the defective state of other authorities, the movements of the hostile armies cannot be ascertained.

Pompeius wrote to the senate, in urgent terms, for men and supplies. He said, that if they did not come, he and his army must leave Spain, and Sertorius would come after them. (Frag. Hist. Sallust. lib. iii.) The letter reached Rome before the end of the year B.C. 75, but nothing was done upon it until the following year.

The last battle had procured Metellus the title of Imperator, and he was as proud of it as any silly child would have been. He was received in Nearer Spain with flattering entertainments, and all the pomp of rejoicings after victory. Pompeius was better employed in looking after his troops. In B.C. 74 he received from Italy money and two legions, for which he was indebted as much to the jealousy of his enemies at Rome as to his friends. The central Macedonians were afraid that if Pompeius returned from Spain, he would get the command in the war against Mithridates, king of Pontus. Mithridates now sent proposals to Sertorius to form an alliance, and they were accepted with some modifications. The terms are stated by Plutarch (Sertor. 24): Metellus had already offered a great reward for the head of Sertorius, a measure which would appear to be in some degree justified by Roman notions, if it followed the treatment with Mithridates. Plutarch (Sertor. 29) mentions this fact before he mentions the treaty; but his chronology cannot be trusted.

Jealousy among the party of Sertorius was the immediate cause of his ruin. Many Roman nobles who served under him, envied the man who was their superior, and Perperna, for his own ambitious purposes, increased the disaffection. Pompeius, who was in the north of Spain, was now besieging Palencia (Palantia) in Leon, but he retreated on the approach of Sertorius, and joined Metellus. The two generals advanced against Calharora on the Ebro, but here they were attacked by Sertorius, and sustained great loss. Metellus spent the winter in Nearer Spain, and Pompeius was compelled, by want of supplies, to spend the winter in Galla, in the province of M. Fonteius (Cic. pro Font. 3). Sertorius was actively employed in visiting the south-east coast of Spain and inspecting his fleet, which was employed in intercepting any supplies to the enemy.

The events of the campaigns B.C. 73 and 72 are merely hinted at by the ancient authorities. Sertorius lost many towns; but there was no decisive battle. He began to abate his activity, to indulge in wine and women, and to become cruel and suspicious. (Appian, i. 119). There was, indeed, good reason for his suspicions; but as to the rest, Appian’s testimony is doubtful. He had taken Spaniards for his guard, because he distrusted his own countrymen. The Spaniards of higher rank were dissatisfied with not having the same distinctions as the Romans; and many were made indifferent to the cause of Sertorius by the success of Pompeius and Metellus. Many of the Romans “secretly damaged all his measures, and they oppressed the barbarians by severe treatment and exactions, on the pretext that it was by the order of Sertorius. This caused revolts and disturbances in the cities; and those who were sent to settle and pacify these outbreaks, returned after causing more wars and increasing the existing insubordination; so that Sertorius, contrary to his former moderation and mildness, did a grievous wrong to the sons of the Iberians (Spaniards) who were educating at Oscia, by putting some to death and selling others as slaves” (Plut. Sertor. 25). But the conspirators against the life of Sertorius were all Romans, and only ten in number. They sent to Sertorius a forged letter, which announced a victory gained by one of his generals. Sertorius offered a sacrifice for the happy tidings, and Perperna, after much entreaty, prevailed on him to accept an invitation to a banquet. The conspirators were afraid to do the deed that they had planned; they tried to provoke the anger of Sertorius by obscene language, which they knew that he hated, and by inciting his behaviour under the assumed guise of drunkenness. Sertorius changed his posture on the couch by throwing himself on his back and pretending not to listen to them. But on Perperna taking a cup of wine, and, in the midst of the draught, throwing it away, which was the signal agreed on, Manius Antonius struck him with his sword. Sertorius attempted to rise, but Antonius threw himself upon him, and held his hands while the rest of the conspirators despatched him. Thus ended the war of Sertorius B.C. 72. The termination brought no glory to Metellus and Pompeius, for the hands of assassins, and not their skill or courage, concluded the contest. The loss of all complete and authentic materials for the war of Sertorius is ill supplied by the life in Plutarch. Drumann (Pompeii) has collected and arranged the scattered fragments of the history, and he has done it with care and ability. A certain amount of conjecture or inference is, however, necessary to fill up even the scantiest outline of the war. Plutarch’s Life of Sertorius, translated by G. Long, contains a few notes. Corneille has made Sertorius the subject of a tragedy; and a modern writer, of a novel or romance, “The Fawn of Sertorius,” London, 1846.

Q. SERVAEUS, was appointed to the government of Cammagen in the reign of Tiberius, A.D. 18, having been previously praetor. He was a friend of Germanicus, and after the death of the latter he was one of the accusers of Cn. Piso, in A.D. 30 (Piso, No. 23). He was involved in the fall of Sejanus, was accused and condemned, but saved himself by turning informer, A.D. 32. (Tac. Ann. ii. 56, iii. 13, vi. 7.)

SERVIA’NUS, JULIUS, whose full name, as we learn from an inscription, was C. JULIUS SERVILIUS URSUS SERVIANUS, was the brother-in-law of Hadrian, having married his sister Domitia Paulina. This marriage took place before the accession of Trajan to the empire; and Servianus was so jealous of the favour of his brother-in-law with Trajan, that he attempted to stop him when he was hastening to Trajan in Germany to announce the death of Nerva in A.D. 96. Servianus afterwards became reconciled to Hadrian, and appears to have lived on good terms with him during the reign of Trajan. By this emperor he was twice raised to the consulsiphip, as we see from inscriptions, once in A.D. 107, and again in 111. It was also during the reign of Trajan that he married his daughter to Fuscius Solinarus, on which occasion Pliny wrote him a letter of congratulation. (Plin. Ep. vi. 26). Hadrian, on his accession in A.D. 117, appeared to have quite forgotten and forgiven the former enmity of Servianus, for he treated him with distinguished honour, raised him to the consulsiphip for the third time in A.D. 134, and gave him hopes of succeeding to the empire. But when he resolved to appoint L. Commodus Verus his successor, and made him Caesar in A.D. 136, he put Servianus and his grandson Fuscius to death, fearing that they might aspire to the throne. Servianus was then in his ninetyieth year. (Spart. Hadr. 1. 2, 8, 15, 23, 25; Plin. Ep. iii. 17, vi. 26; Dion Cass. liv. 2, 17, comp. lxxvi. 7.)

SERVILIA. 1. The wife of Q. Lutatius Catulus, consul, B.C. 103. Their daughter Lutatia married the orator Q. Hortensius, whence Cicero calls Servilia the sores of Hortensius (Cic. Ferr. ii. 8).

2. The mother of M. Junius Brutus, the murderer of Caesar. She was the daughter of Livia, the sister of the celebrated M. Livius Drusus, tribune of the plebs, B.C. 91. Her mother Livia was married twice; first to M. Cato, by whom she had M. Cato Uticensis, and next to Q. Servilius Caepio, by whom she became the mother of this Servilia, and of her sister spoken of below. Servilia herself was married twice; first to M. Junius Brutus [BRUTUS, No. 20], by whom she became the mother of the murderer of Caesar, and secondly to D. Junius Silanus, consul B.C. 62. This
SERVILLIUS. 793

The cognomens of the Servilli under the empire are given below. A few persons of the name are mentioned without any cognomen: they are spoken of under Servilius. The only surnames found on coins are those of Ahala, Carpio, Casca, Rullus. There are likewise several coins of the Servilia gens, which bear no surname upon them: of these two specimens are annexed, but it is quite impossible to determine to whom they refer. (Eckhel, vol. v. p. 303, &c.)

COINS OF SERVILIA GENS.

SERVILLA/NUS, an agnomen of Q. Fabius Maximus, consul b. c. 142, because he originally belonged to the Servilia Gens. [MAXIMUS FABIUS, NO. 11.]

SERVILIUS. 1. C. SERVILIUS, P. P., was one of the triumvirs for settling the colonies of Placentia and Cremona, and was taken prisoner by the Boii in the first year of the second Punie war, b. c. 218. He remained in captivity for fifteen years, and was eventually released by his own son, the consul C. Servilius, in b. c. 203. (Liv. xxi. 25, xxx. 19.)

2. C. SERVILIUS, C. F. P. N., son of the preceding, is first mentioned in b. c. 212, when he was sent into Etruria to purchase corn for the use of the Roman garrison in the citadel of Tarquinia, which was then besieged by Hannibal. He succeeded in forcing his way into the harbour, and supplying the garrison with the corn. In b. c. 210 he was elected pontifex in the place of T. Otacilus Crassus, in b. c. 209 plebeian aedile, and in b. c. 208 curule aedile. In the last year, while holding the office of curule aedile, he was appointed magister equitum by the dictator T. Manlius Torquatus. He was praetor b. c. 206, when he obtained Sicily as his province, and consul b. c. 203 with Cn. Servilius Caepio. Livy, in speaking of his consulsiphip (xxix. 38, xxxi. 1), as well as subsequently, calls him C. Servilius Geminus; but in the Capitoline Fasti his name is given C. SERVILIUS C. F. P. NUVOS. It is therefore probable that his cognomen Geminus is a mistake. C. Servilius obtained Etruria as his province, and from thence marched into Cisalpine Gaul, where he released his father from captivity, as has been already related. Livy mentions that a rogatio was proposed to the people to release Servilius from the consequences (sc C Servilio fratri esset) of having acted contrary to the laws in having been tribune of the plebs and aedile of the plebs, while his

SERVILIA GEN.

SERVILIA was the favourite mistress of the dictator Caesar, and seems to have fascinated him more by her genius than by her personal charms. Caesar's love for her is mentioned as early as b. c. 63 (Plut. Cat. 24, Brut. 5), and continued, apparently unabated, to the time of his death, nearly twenty years afterwards. The scandal-mongers at Rome related various tales about her, which we may safely disbelieve. Thus she is said to have introduced her own daughter, Juilia Tertia, to Caesar's embraces, when her own charms were growing faded; and it was further currently reported that Brutus was Servilia's son by Caesar. The latter tale, at least, we can prove to be false, as Caesar was only fifteen years older than Brutus, the former having been born in b. c. 100, and the latter in b. c. 85. Caesar made Servilia a present of several confiscated estates after the civil wars. She survived both her lover and her son. After the battle of Philippi Antony sent her the ashes of her son. The triumvirs left her unmolested, and Atticus assisted and consoled her in her troubles. (Suet. Caes. 59; Plut. Cat. 24, Brut. 2, 5, 58; Appian, B. C. ii. 112, iv. 155; Cic. ad Fam. xii. 7, ad Att. xiv. 21, xv. 11, 12; Corn. Nep. Att. 11; Drummam, Geschichte Roms, vol. iv. p. 15, &c.)

3. The sister of No. 2, was the second wife of L. Lucullus, consul b. c. 74, who married her on his return from the Mithridate War, after he had divorced his first wife, Clodia. She bore Lucullus a son, but, like her sister, she was faithless to her husband; and the latter, after putting up with her conduct for some time from regard to M. Cato Uticensis, her half-brother, at length divorced her. On the breaking out of the civil war in b. c. 49, she accompanied M. Cato, with her child, to Sicily, and from thence to Asia, where Cato left her behind in Rhodes, while he went to join Pompey. (Plut. Lucull. 38, Cat. 24, 54; Drummam, Geschichte Roms, vol. iv. p. 174.)

SERVILIA GENs, originally patrician, but subsequently plebeian also. The Servilia gens was one of the Alban houses removed to Rome by Tullus Hostilius, and enrolled by him among the patricians (Liv. i. 30.) It was, consequently, one of the moresque gens. In other Roman gens, the Servilia of course had their own sacra; and they are said to have worshipped a triena, or copper coin, which is reported to have increased or diminished in size at various times, thus indicating the increase or diminution of the honours of the gens (Plin. H. N. xxxiv. 13, s. 38). The Servilia gens was very celebrated during the early ages of the republic, and the names of few gentes appear more frequently at this period in the consular Fasti. It continued to produce men of influence in the state down to the latest times of the republic, and even in the imperial period. The first member of the gens who obtained the consulship was P. Servilius Priscus Structus, in b. c. 495, and the last of the name who appears in the consular Fasti is Q. Servilius Silanus, in a. d. 189, thus occupying a prominent position in the Roman state for nearly seven hundred years. The Servilius were divided into numerous families; of these the names in the republican period are:—Ahala, Axilla, Caepio, Casca, Geminus, Glaucia, Globulus, Priscus (with the agnomen Fidenas), Rullus, Structus, Tucca, Vatia (with the agnomen Isauriacus).
father was alive, who had sat in the curule chair, insomuch as he was ignorant of the existence of his father (Liv. xxx. 19, comp. xxvii. 1). No other ancient writer mentions any law which forbade such an election; the conjectures of modern writers on the point are given at length in Duker's note on the passage of Livy (xxx. 19). In b. c. 202, Servilius was appointed dictator by the consul M. Servilius Geminus for the purpose of holding the comitia, being the last person who was named dictator till the usurpation of the office by Sulla. In b. c. 201, he was one of the decemviri for distributing lands to the veterans who had fought in Africa under P. Scipio, and in b. c. 183 he was elected pontifex maximus in the place of P. Licinius Crassus. He died in b. c. 180. (Liv. xxv. 13, xxvii. 6, 21, 33, 36, xxviii. 10, 46, xxix. 38, xxx. 1, 15, 39, xxxi. 4, xxxix. 46, xl. 37, 42.)

3. Q. SERVILIUS, praenotul, was slain by the inhabitants of Asculum on the breaking out of the Social War; in b. c. 90. He is erroneously called Livius by some writers. (Appian, B. C. i. 38; Liv. Epit. 72; Vell. Pat. ii. 15; Oras. v. 13.)

4. P. SERVILIUS, a Roman eques, the magister of one of the companies that farmed the taxes in Sicily during the administration of Verres. (Cic. Verr. iii. 71.)

5. C. SERVILIUS, a Roman citizen in Sicily, publicly scourged by Verres. (Cic. Verr. v. 54.)

6. M. SERVILIUS, accused of repudiae in b. c. 51. (Cael. ad Fam. viii. 8 § 3; Cic. ad Att. vi. 3 § 10.)

7. M. SERVILIUS, tribune of the plebs, b. c. 44, is praised by Cicero as vir fortissimus. (Cic. ad Fam. xii. 7, Philipp. iv. 6.)

SER'VIIUS, a common Roman praenomen, also occurs as the gentile name of a few persons, though even in the case of these persons the gentile name may have been dropped, and Servius be simply a praenomen.

SER'VIUS. A tract, divided into eleven sections, entitled Servii Ars Grammatica, or more fully, Expositio Magistri Servii super Partes Minores, was published, for the first time, from a Berlin MS., by Lindemann, and annexed to his edition of "Pompeii Commentum Artis Donati," 8vo, Lips. 1820. The author is altogether unknown. [W. R.]

SERV'VIUS MAURUS HORONATUS, or SERV'VIUS MA'R'IIUS HONORA'TUS, as the name is variously written, the arrangement of its constituent parts being, moreover, varied in every possible way, was a celebrated Latin grammarian, contemporary with Macrobius, for the reasonably certain that he is the Servius introduced among the dramatis personae of the Saturnalia, and who is frequently mentioned with the greatest respect in that work, a warm tribute being paid not only to his learning and his talents, but also to his amiable disposition and unaffected modesty. His most celebrated production was an elaborate commentary upon Virgil, compiled from the labours of a multitude of earlier annotators. This is, nominally, at least, still extant; but from the widely differing forms in which it assumes in different MSS., it is clear that it must have been changed and interpolated to such an extent by the transcribers of the middle ages, that it is impossible to determine how much belongs to Servius and how much to the latter hands by whose performance has been overlaid. Even in its present condition, however, it contains so many quotations from lost works, and so much curious information on abstruse points connected with history, antiquities, and mythology, that it is deservedly regarded as the most important and valuable of all the Latin Scholia. It is attached to many of the earlier impressions of the poet, and by comparing a few of these the discrepancies alluded to above will be at once perceived. Much was done to improve and purify the text by R. Stephens (Paris, fol. 1532), and by Maslicius (Virgili Opera, 4to. Leovard. 1717), but it will be found under its best form in the celebrated edition of Virgil by Burmam. The recension by Lian (2 vols. 8vo, Gotting. 1825) is not of any particular value.

We possess also the following treatises which bear the name of Servius Maurus Honoratus.

SERV'VIUS TULLIUS. [TULLIUS.]

SESOSTRIS (Σεσωστρις), or, as Diodorus calls him, SESOOSIS (Σεσωσις), was the name given by the Greeks to the great king of Egypt, who is called in Manetho and on the monuments Rames or Rameses. Not only do Manetho and the monuments prove that Sesostris is the same as Rames, but it is evident from Tacitus (Ann. ii. 59) that the Egyptian priests themselves identified Rames with Sesostris in the account which they gave to Germanicus of the victories of their great monarch. Rameses is mentioned in several kings of the eighteenth, nineteenth, and twentieth dynasties; but Sesostris must be identified with Rameses, the third king of the eighteenth dynasty, the son of Seti, and the father of Menepthah, according to the restoration of the lists of Manetho by Bunsen. This king is frequently called Rameses II., or Rames the Great, to distinguish him from Rameses, the first king of the nineteenth dynasty. It was under the kings of the eighteenth and nineteenth dynasties that Egypt obtained her greatest splendour, and of these monarchs Ramses-Sesostris obtained the most celebrity. Herodotus relates that sailing with his fleet from the Arabian gulf, or Red Sea, Sesostris subdued the people dwelling on the coasts of the Erythraean Sea, until he came to a sea which was no longer navigable on account of the shallows. On his return to Egypt he levied a mighty army, with which he made an expedition by land, subduing all the nations that came in his way, till at length he crossed from Asia into Europe, where he conquered the Thracians and Scythians. In all the countries which he subdued he erected stelae, on which he inscribed his own name and those of his country, and how he had conquered the people by his might. The history of Sesostris is related more at length by Diodorus. According to his account the father of Sesostris ordered all the male children who were born on the same day as his son to be educated along with him and trained in martial exercises, that they might prove brave warriors and faithful companions to him in his future conquest of the world. As soon as they were grown up the monarch sent them, along with his son, with an army into Arabia, which they conquered, and next into the western parts of Africa, which they also subdued. As soon as Sesostris had ascended the throne, he divided all Egypt into thirty-six nomes or provinces, and appointed a governor over each, and then began to make preparations for the conquest of the world. He is said to have raised an army of 600,000 foot, 24,000 horse, and 27,000 war-chariots, and likewise to have caused a fleet of 400 ships to be built and equipped on the Red Sea. After first subduing Ethiopia, he conquered all Asia, even beyond the Ganges, and extended his conquests further than those of Alexander the Great; he then crossed over into Europe, where he subdued the Thracians; and eventually returned to Egypt, after an absence of nine years. On arriving at Pelusium he was nearly destroyed by the treachery of his brother Armais, whom he had left regent in his absence, and who attempted to burn him with his wife and children. The countless captives whom he brought back with him he employed in public works, many of which are executed both by Diodorus and Herodotus. Thus he is said to have surrounded many of his cities with high mounds, to protect them from the inundations of the Nile, traces of which are still visible; and also to have dug numerous canals to irrigate the country. He further erected splendid monuments in different parts of Egypt, in token of gratitude to the gods for the victories he had gained. Many of the great works of Egypt, the authors of which were unknown, are ascribed to this king. Thus he was said by the Egyptian priests to have built a wall on the east side of Egypt, from Pelusium to Heliopolis, according to Diodorus (i. 57), but which appears to have been continued as far as Syene, and many traces of which may still be seen. Severus is said by Manetho to have reigned sixty-six years, and we find on monuments the sixty-second year of his reign. He is reported to have put an end to his own life in consequence of becoming blind. (Herod. ii. 102—111; Diod. i. 53—59; Strab. xv. p. 686, xvi. pp. 769, 790; Joseph. c. Apion. i. 15; Tac. Ann. ii. 59; Plin. H. N. vi. 29, s. 33, 34, xxxiii. 15, xxxvi. 9. s. 14.) Although the Egyptian priests evidently exag- rated the exploits of Ramses-Sesostris, and probably attributed to him the achievements of many successive monarchs, yet it is evident, from the numerous monuments bearing his name still extant in Egypt, that he was a great warrior, and had extended his conquests far beyond the boundaries of Egypt. His conquest of Ethiopia is attested by his numerous monuments found in that country, and memorials of him still exist throughout the whole of Egypt, from the mouth of the Nile to the south of Nubia. In the remains of his palace-temple at Thebes we see his victories and conquests represented on the walls, and we can still trace there some of the nations of Africa and Asia whom he subdued. We have, moreover, another striking corroboration of the Asiatic conquests of this monarch, as well as of the trustworthiness of that prince of travellers, Herodotus. The latter writer relates that most of the stelae which Sesostris set up in the countries he conquered, were no longer extant in his time, but that he had himself seen those in Palestine of Syria, with the inscriptions upon them. He also adds that he had seen in Tonia two figures (τέρνοι) of the same kind, cut in the rock; one on the road from Ephesus to Phocaea, and another on the road from Sardis to Smyrna. Now it so happens that one of the stelae which Herodotus saw in Syria has been discovered in modern times on the side of the road leading to Beirut (the ancient Berytus), near the mouth of the river Lycus; and though the hieroglyphics are much effaced, we can still decipher the name of Ramses. The monument, too, which Herodotus saw on the road from Sardis to Smyrna, has likewise been discovered near Nymphi, the ancient Nymphaeum; and although some modern critics maintain that the latter is a Scythian monument, we can hardly believe that Herodotus could have been mistaken in the point. (Wilkinson, Manners and Customs of the Ancient Egyptians, vol. i. p. 98; Lepsius, in Anal. dell. Isti. di Corrisp. Archeol., vol. x. p. 12; Classical Museum, vol. i. pp. 82, 231, where a drawing is given of the monument near Nymphi.)

The name of Sesostris is not found on monuments, and it was probably a popular surname given to the great hero of the nineteenth dynasty, and borrowed from Sesostris, the son of some former kings of the twelfth dynasty, or perhaps from Sesostris, a king of the third dynasty. It appears from Manetho, that Ramses-Sesostris was also called Sethosis, which Bunsen maintains ought to be read Se-sothis, and that its meaning is the son of Sethos or Seti. (Bunsen, Ägyptens Stelle in der Weltgeschichte, vol. iii. pp. 97—114.)

SESTIA GENSI, originally patrician, afterwards plebeian also. This name is frequently confounded with that of Sextius, and the two names may originally have been the same; but the ancient writers evidently regard them as two distinct names, and they are accordingly so given in this work [SESTIA GENSI]. The only member of the gens who obtained the consulship, of the Roman republic, was P. Sextius Capitolinus Vatianus in n. c. 452, who was also decurior in the next year; and no other person of this name appears on the consular Fasti except L. Sextius, who was consul suffectus in n. c. 23. Coins of the Sextia gens are extant, of which some specimens are given below.

SESTIUS. 1. P. SESTIUS CAPITOLINUS VA-SESTIUS.

TICANUS, consul b. c. 452, is spoken of under CAPITOLINUS (Vol. I. p. 606, a.), where he is erroneously called Sestius.

2. P. SESTIUS, called by Livy a man of a patrician gens, but a different person from the preceding, was accused by C. Julius Julius, one of the decemvirs, in b. c. 451 (Liv. iii. 33; for further particulars, see JULUS, No. 2.)

3. P. SESTIUS, quaestor b. c. 414. (Liv. iv. 50.)

4. L. SESTIUS, the father of No. 5, did not obtain any higher dignity than that of tribune of the plebs. (Cic. pro Sest. 3.)

5. P. SESTIUS, also written P. SESTIUS in many MSS. and editions of Cicero, the son of No. 4, was defended by Cicero in b. c. 56, in an oration which is extant. Although the ancestors of Sestius had not gained any distinction in the state, he formed matrimonial alliances with two of the noblest families at Rome. His first wife was Postumia, the daughter of C. Postumius Albinus, by whom he had two children, a daughter and a son. On the death of Postumia he married a second time Cornelia, the daughter of L. Scipio Aesuticus, who was consul in b. c. 83, when his troops deserted to Sulla. He lived in exile at Massilia, where his daughter and Sestius paid him a visit. Sestius began public life in b. c. 63 as quaestor to C. Antonius, Cicero's colleague in the consulship. He warmly co-operated with Cicero in the suppression of the Catilinarian conspiracy. He defeated at Capua the attempts of the conspirators, and from thence hastened to Rome at Cicero's summons, who feared fresh comotions when the new tribunes entered upon their office on the 10th of December. But when this danger passed away, Sestius followed C. Antonius into Etruria, and it was chiefly owing to him and M. Petreius that Catiline's army was defeated. On the conclusion of the war, he accompanied Antonius to Macedonia as proconsul, and there distinguished himself, and brought to Chersonese by his upright administration. In b. c. 57, he was tribune, and took an active part in obtaining Cicero's recum from banishment. Like Milo, he kept a band of armed retainers to oppose P. Clodius and his partizans; and he was wounded in one of the many affrays which were then of daily occurrence in the streets of Rome. Cicero, on his return to Rome in the summer of this year, returned him thanks in the senate and also before the people for his exertions on his behalf. Still Cicero felt himself aggrieved by the way in which Sestius had proposed his recall, and still more because the latter had not taken sufficient care to indemnify him for the loss of his property, which Clodius had confiscated. A coolness thus arose between Cicero and Sestius. Still this did not affect the relation in which Sestius and Clodius stood to one another. Sestius was anxious to bring Clodius to trial before he could take his seat in the tribule; but he did not succeed in this: Clodius became aedile in b. c. 56, and caused two accusations to be brought against his enemy. Cn. Nerius accused him of bribery at the elections, and M. Tullius Albinovanus of vis during his tribunate. The former accusation appears to have been dropped; but he was brought to trial for vis before the court presided over by the praetor M. Aemilius Scaurus. He was defended by M. Crassus and Hortensius, as well as by Cicero, the latter of whom came forward on his behalf contrary to the expectation of many; but although Cicero, thought he had grounds of offence against Sestius, he did not, like, to incur the reproach of ingratitude which would have been brought against him, if he had refused to assist the tribune who had proposed his recall from banishment; and as Pompey was still at enmity with Clodius, he required Cicero to undertake the defence of the accused. Cicero could not deny the fact that Sestius had broken the public peace; but he maintained that his client deserved praise and not punishment, because he had taken up arms in defence of himself, the safety of the Roman state, and consequently in defence of the state itself. Sestius was unanimously acquitted on the 14th of March, chiefly, no doubt, in consequence of the powerful influence of Pompey. (Cic. pro P. Sestius, passim; Cic. in Cat. i. 6, ad Fam. v. 6, ad Att. iii. 19, 20, 25, ad Q. Fr. i. 4, ad Att. iv. 3, pro Mil. 14, post Red. in Sen. 9, post Red. ad Q. Fr. 5, ad Q. Fr. ii. 4; Drumm. Geschicht, Rom. vol. v. p. 664, &c.)

In b. c. 53, Sestius was praetor, and it appears from a passage of Cicero, in which he speaks (ad Fam. v. 20. § 5) of Sestius having taken some money which L. Mecinnius Rufius, Cicero's quaestor in Cilicia, had deposited in a temple, that Sestius afterwards obtained the province of Cilicia as praetor. On the breaking out of the civil war in b. c. 49, Sestius was with Pompey in Italy, and wrote Pompey's reply to the propositions of Caesar, at which Cicero expresses great vexation on account of the miserable style in which Sestius was accustomed to write, and declares that he never read any thing σπουδαστερον than the document which went forth in Pompey's name (Cic. ad Att. vii. 17, comp. ad Fam. vii. 32, "omnia omnium dicta, in his etiam Sestiana, in me conferri ausi"). He subsequently deserted the Pompeian party and joined Caesar, who sent him, in b. c. 46, into Cappadocia, where he remained some time. He was alive in b. c. 43, as appears from Cicero's correspondence. (Hirt. B. Alex. 34; Cic. ad Att. xiii. 2, 7, xv. 17, 27 xvi. 4, ad Fam. xiii. 8.)

6. L. SESTIUS, the son of No. 5, by his first wife, Postumia (Cic. ad Fam. xiii. 8). He is probably the same as the L. Sestius who served under M. Brutus in Macedonia, and distinguished himself by his devotion to the leader of the republican party. After the death of the latter, he preserved his images and cultivated his memory with pious care; but far from giving offence to Augustus by this conduct, the emperor admired his fidelity to his friend, and gave him a public token of his approval by making him consul suffect in his own place in b. c. 23 (Dion Cass. liti. 32). Appian (B. C. iv. 51) erroneously calls him Publius. One of Horace's odes is addressed to this L. Sestius (Car. i. 4). The only difficulty in supposing this L. Sestius to be the son of No. 5, arises from the circumstance of his being described in the Capitoline Fasti, as L. SESTIUS P. P. VIBIL S., whereas we know from Cicero that P. Sestius [No. 5] was the son of L. Sestius. It is, however, not impossible that the consul wished, like many other of the Roman nobles in the age of Augustus, to connect himself with the old Roman families, and therefore called himself the grandson of Vibius, because that was a prænomen in the old Sestius gens, as we see from the Capitoline Fasti, in which P. Sestins Capitolinus Vaticanus, consul in B. C. 452, is described as P. F. VIB. N.

The annexed coins refer apparently to this L. Sestius, as they were struck by a person of the same name who was the procurator of Brutus. The obverse of the first represents a woman’s head with L. SESTI PRO Q., and the reverse a tripod with a seccipita on one side, and a sippuvium on the other, and the legend Q. CARRIO BRYTOS PRO COS. The obverse of the second is nearly the same as the reverse of the first: the reverse contains a seat with a spear, in allusion to his being quenstor, and the legend L. SESTI PRO Q. (Eckhel, vol. v. p. 312.)

COINS OF L. SESTIUS.

7. P. Sestius P. F., to whom one of Cicero’s letters (ad Fam. v. 17) is addressed, was a different person from P. Sestius L. F. [No. 5.] It appears from this letter, which was probably written in B. C. 53, that P. Sestius P. F. had been condemned on account of some offence.

8. L. Sestius Pansa. [Pansa.]

9. T. Sestius Gallus, on whose estate P. Claudius was killed by Milo, in B. C. 52. (Cic. pro Mil. 51.)

SETHON (Σηθών), a priest of Hephæstus, is said by Herodotus to have made himself master of Egypt after the expulsion of Sabacon, king of the Ethiopians, and to have been succeeded by the Dodecarchia, or government of the twelve chiefs, which ended in the sole sovereignty of Psammitichus. Herodotus further relates that in his reign Sanacharibus, king of the Arabians and Assyrians, advanced against Egypt, at which Sethon was in great alarm, as he had insulted the warrior class, and deprived them of their lands, and they now refused to follow him to the war. In his perplexity he shut himself up in the temple of Hephæstus, where the god comforted him by a vision. Relying, therefore, on the assistance of the god, he collected an army of retail-dealers and artizans, and marched out boldly to Pelusium to meet the enemy. The god did not forget his promised aid; for while the two armies were encamped there, the field-mice in the night gnawed to pieces the bow-strings, the quivers, and the shield-handles of the Assyrians, who fled on the following day with great loss. The recollection of this miracle was perpetuated by a statue of the king in the temple of Hephæstus, holding a mouse in his hand, and saying, “Let every one look at me and be pious” (Herod. ii. 141). This Sanacharibus is the Sennacherib * of the Scriptures, and the destruction of the Assyrians at Pelusium is evidently only another version of the miraculous destruction of the Assyrians by the angel of the Lord, when they had advanced against Jerusalem in the reign of Hezekiah (2 Kings, xviii. xix. and particularly xix. 35; 2 Chronicles, xxvii.; Isaiah, xxxvi. xxxvii.). According to the Jewish records, this event happened in B. C. 711.

Herodotus speaks as if Sethon were king of all Egypt at this time; but we have shown in the article SABACon, that Upper Egypt at least was governed by the Ethiopian Tarmus or Tirhakah, who, as we learn from Isaiah, was ready to march against Sennacherib. The name of Sethon does not occur in Manetho, and it is probable that he only reigned over a part of Lower Egypt.

SEVERA, JULIA AQUIILA. [Aquilia.] SEVERA, MARCIA, T. F., a Roman artist in gold and precious stones (Auraria et Margaritaria), who lived in the Via Sacra (Doni, p. 319, No. 13; Muratori, Thes. vol. ii. p. cxxiv. No. 1; Orelli, Insocr. Lat. Sel. No. 4149). Her name is of some interest, on account of the small number of women who appear in the lists of ancient artists. (R. Rochette, Lettre à M. Schorm, p. 401, 2d ed.) [P. S.]

SEVERIA’NUS, son of the emperor Flavius Valerius Severus, was put to death by Licinius A. D. 313. (Auct. de Mort. Persev. 50.) [W. R.]

SEVERIANUS, JU’LIUS, a rhetorician who flourished under Hadrian, the author of a treatise Syntomatia s. Procepsa Artis Rhetoricae, which will be found in the “Antiqui Rhetores Latinae” of F. Pitou 4to. Paris, 1599, p. 302—312), and of Capperonius (4to. Argent. 1746). This piece was published at Cologne in 1569 by Sexus Pompa, as Auli Cornelii Celsi de Arte dicendi Laet. A retine. in the editions of Heumann, contained in the first volume of his Poecile (6vo. Hal. 1722, lib. iii. p. 370), and in that printed at Lunaeburg (12mo. 1745). There seems to be no doubt, however, that in the best MSS. the work is ascribed to Severius, and their testimony seems to be confirmed by Sidiomus Apollinaris (Ep. ix. 11, 15, Carm. ix. 312). Funcceius conjectures that the real name of the writer may have been Julius Celsus Severianus, who in this manner became confounded with Aulus Cornelius Celsus. (Funcceius, de Veget. L. L. secved. cap. v. § 2.) [W. R.]

SEVERIANUS VERUS, an artist in silver (Argentarius), mentioned in an inscription found in Dauphine. (Gruner, p. dextxxix. 6; R. Rochette, Lettre à M. Schorm, p. 401, 2d ed.) [P. S.]

SEVERI’NA, ULP’LIA, the wife of the emperor Aurelian, well known from medals, and from the English version, comes from the Septuagint (Σεβηρινα) The Hebrew is Sancherib (סניכריב). In Josephus it is Σαναχερεβ, in Herodotus Σαναχερεβος.
an inscription preserved by Muratori, Ulpiar. Severinac. Aug. Concil. d. n. Invict. Aurelian. Aug. No details regarding her history have been transmitted to us, but we learn from some Alexandrian coins that she survived her husband. (Eckhel, vol. vii. p. 437.) [W. R.]

SEVERUS (Σεβέρος), Greeks, literary and ecclesiastical. The name of Severus, though of pure Latin origin, passed into the East, and was borne by various writers, whose works, chiefly in Arabic, are still extant in MSS. Only three persons of the name, however, require notice here, the two haeresiarchs (Severus the Encratite and Severus of Antioch) and Severus the rhetorician. For the others the reader is referred to Assemani, Bibliotheca Orientalis; Cave, Hist. Litt. vol. ii. p. 106, ed. Oxford, 1740-43; and Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. x. p. 623, &c.

1. ACCEPHALORUM PRINCEPS [No. 2].

2. Of Antioch. An eminent leader of the Monophysites in the earlier part of the sixth century, whence he is designated Αἱρέσιαρχος and ACHEPHALUS (the Achehill, ἀκέφαλος, the headless), whose name is still preserved in the title given them because they renounced the communion of Peter Mongus, the trimming head of their party, not to enumerate the other reproachful epithets heaped upon him by the members of the orthodox Greek and Latin churches. As a compensation for all this abuse, it may be observed that he enjoys, to this day, the highest reputation among the Jacobites of Syria and other parts of the East. He was born at Sozopolis, a town of Pisdia, in Asia Minor; and was in early life a pleader at Berytus in Syria, being at that time a heathen. He is charged by his adversaries with having practised magic (Evagrius, H. E. iii. 35; Epistola Orthodoxor. Episcop. Orientalium, and Libellus Monarch. ad Memnon apud Concil. vol. v. c. 40, 120, 121, ed. Labbe). Having, however, embraced Christianity and been baptized in the church of St. Leontius, the Martyr, at Tripolis in Syria, he quitted the bar and devoted himself to a monastic life, in a monastery of Palestine (Alfean). On one occasion, he appears to have embraced the Monophysite doctrine and returned to it immediately after his conversion; for he is charged (Libellus Monarch. l. c.) with renouncing, before the days of his baptism were complete, the church into which he had been baptized; “calling the holy temples of God receptacles of heresy and impiety” (ibid.). It is probable, and indeed Theophanes distinctly asserts it (Chronog. p. 241, ed. Bonn.), that the monastery to which he withdrew, was a monastery of the Monophysites; and it was there that he met with Peter the Iberian, bishop of Gaza, a strenuous Monophysite and a follower of Timotheus Aelurus (Timothaeus), whose banishment he had shared. Severus was so earnest a Monophysite that he rejected the Henoticion of the emperor Zeno [Zeno], and anathematized Peter Mongus, the more moderate Monophysite patriarch of Alexandria [Petru, literary and ecclesiastical, No. 29].[1] Having received the Henoticion (Libellus Monarch. c. 19). Severus ridiciated the emperor’s edict in his writings, calling it not the “Henoticion” (ἕνωτικόν, “edict of union”), but Henoticion (ἑγενοτικόν, “edict of vanity”), and Daceticon (δακτητικόν, “edict of disunion”). From his monastery in Palestine, Severus appears to have removed to another monastery in Egypt, of which Nephilus was abbot. Possibly his ultra opinions had rendered him a dangerous or a disagreeable inmate of his Palestinian monastery, and he hoped to find a more cordial welcome or a safer shelter with Nephilus. In this hope he was disappointed: Nephilus embittered the side of Council of Chalcedon, and Severus and others were expelled from the monastery (Evagr. l. c.). Hereupon he fled to Constantinople, to plead his own cause and that of his fellow-sufferers; and in this way became known to the emperor Anastasius, who had (a. d. 491) succeeded Zeno. Severus is charged (Libellus Monarch. l. c.) with exciting troubles in the city of Alexandria, and occasioning the burning of many houses and the slaughter of many citizens, though the city had afforded him a shelter “in his adversity:” but it is difficult to fix the time to which these charges refer. If he was in Alexandria after leaving the monastery in Palestine, and before entering that of Nephilus, the expression “in his adversity” intimates that he had been driven from his monastery in Palestine: but it is not unlikely that the disturbances at Alexandria may have been consequent on his expulsion; and that he afterwards found shelter by Nephilus; and the term “his adversity” may be understood as referring to that expulsion.

In what year Severus went to Constantinople, or how long he abode there, is not clear. Tillemont places his arrival in a. d. 510; but he probably relied on a passage in Theophanes (Chronog. ad a. m. 6002) which is ambiguous. The fellow-monks for whom Severus came to plead, were partisans of Peter Mongus [Petru, No. 22]; and Severus, because he had formerly anathematized Peter, was reproached with inconsistency in taking their part (Liberat. l. c.). He appears to have been at Constantinople, a. d. 512; when, in consequence of the disturbances, excited on account of Flavian, patriarch of Antioch [Flavianus, Ecclesiastics, No. 2], that prelate was deposed and banished to Petra in Idumaea (Evagr. H. E. iii. 32), and Anastasius eagerly seized the opportunity afforded by this vacancy to procure the appointment of Severus to the patriarchate. The appointment was most offensive to the orthodox party. Whether Anastasius or Severus took any steps to abate its offensiveness is not clear. A letter of Ephiphanus, archbishop of Tyre, and some other prelates to the synod of Constantinople states it as a matter of common report, yet with a cautious expression of doubt as to its truth, that Severus, before his consecration as patriarch, renounced the ordination to the office of presbyter, which he had received when among the Monophysites. This renunciation, if it really took place, implies that he was re-ordained to the priesthood by some orthodox prelate. Theodore Anagnostes or Lector (Hist. Eclest., ii. 31) states, on the authority of Joannes Diacronimenos, or John the Dissector [comp. Joannes, literary and ecclesiastical, No. 2], that Anastasius obliged Severus to swear that he would not anathematize the Council of Chalcedon (comp. Synodicon apud Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. xii. p. 401, and apud Conneuia, vol. 7. p. 414); but that Severus on the very day of his consecration, which appears to have taken place at Antioch, yielded to the urgent solicitations of his Monophysite friends, and, ascending the pulpit, publicly anathematized the Council, and afterwards (a. d. 413) obtained the confirmation of the anathema by a council which he assembled at Antioch (Sy-nicon, l. c.). He anathematized Macedonius, the deposed patriarch of Constantinople [Macedonius, No. 4.], and his own predecessor at Antioch, Flavianus. But he accepted the Henoticum of Zeno, and declared himself to be in communion with Timotheus and other John III., the patriarch of Constantinople and Alexandria; and restored to the diptychs the name of Peter Mon-gus [Patrus, No. 22.], whom he had once anathematized. At the same time he received into communion Peter the Iberian, his old comrade in the monastery in Palestine, who had retained the more rigid Monophysite views which had marked the early years of Severus himself, and continued out of communion with the more moderate Mono-physites of Alexandria who had received the Ho-ninction. In fact, from the time of his going to Constantinople, Severus's policy appears to have been to unite all the Monophysites, whether moneres or ultras, into one great body, and to resist the orthodox or supporters of the Council of Chal-edon, by whom his appointment was not recognized, and against whom, if the representations of his opponents may be believed, he directed a fierce persecution with atrocious cruelty (Relatio Archimandriturum Syrac. apud Concil. vol. iv. coll. 1461, 1462; Libell. Monarch. l. c.; Supplicatio Clericor.
Antioch, and Epistola Epiphaniiv Tyrius, apud Concilia, vol. v. coll. 157, 194, &c.). He is especially charged, in conjunction with Peter of Apameia, with having engaged a "band of Jewish robbers," and placing them in ambush for a company of three hundred and fifty of the orthodox, who were all slain, and their limbs left unburied and scattered about the road. Many of the bishops of Severus's patriarchate fled from their sees, others were banished, and others apparently were compelled to conceal their real sentiments. Elias L., patriarch of Jerusalem [Elias, No. 1.], was deposed, and the Monophysite party became triumphant in most parts of the East. Their triumph indeed was not complete, nor of long duration. Soon the bishops of Severus's own patriarchate renounced communion with him: two of them, Cosmas of Epiphaneia, and Severianus of Arethusan, had the audacity to send to him a document declaring him deposed; and so strongly were they supported by the people of their dioceses, that the emperor, who had sentenced them to banishment for their contumacy, was obliged to leave them in possession of their sees, finding he could not remove them without bloodshed (Evagr. H. E. iii. 34). The patriarch of Jerusalem who succeeded Elias, prompted by the Anachorites Saba [SARA] and Theodosius, adhered to the orthodox faith, which was also supported by the pope and the Roman Church. Still, notwithstanding this opposition, the Monophysites having men of their own party in the patriarchal sees of Alexandria, Antioch, and Constantinople, possessed a decided superiority. But the accession of Justin I., who adhered to the Council of Chalcedon [Justinus I.], occasioned their overthrow; for in the balanced state of parties, and the servility or timidity of the ecclesiastics and people, the predominance of one side or the other depended on the individual filling the imperial throne. While the heretical Anastasius survived, heresy was in the ascendant; it succumbed to orthodoxy, on the accession of the orthodox Justin. Another circumstance which, perhaps, conduced to the overthrow of the Monophysites, was the re-action occasioned in many minds by their abuse of their pre-eminence.
Among those who were thus led to return to the orthodox faith was Mamas, abbot of the convent near Gaza, under whom Severus had passed the earlier part of his monastic life. Early in the reign of Justin I.
[Justinus I.], at the instigation perhaps of Vitalian, commanded that Severus should be deposed and apprehended: according to some accounts he ordered his tongue to be cut out, and he was anathematized in a council held at Constantinople (A. D. 518). Severus, however, eluded the emperor's severity; and taking ship at Seleucia, the port of Antioch, fled with Julian bishop of Halicarnassus, to Alexandria (A. D. 518 or 519). Paul was chosen patriarch of Antioch in his room (Evagrius, H. E. iv. 4.): and the change was followed by the secession from the church of the followers of the deposed patriarch, and by the pronouncing, in various ecclesiastical councils, of anathemas upon him (Concilis, vol. iv. coll. 1673; Librat. Brevar. c. 19). Meanwhile Severus remained at Alexandria, protected by the patriarch Timotheus: and, as if it was his destiny to be the troubler of the Church, Julian, on his accession, started the controversy on the corruptibility of Christ's human body before the resurrection, Severus affirming, and Julian denying, that it was corruptible; the patriarch Timotheus rather inclined to the side of Severus. After the death of Justin, and the accession of Justinian I., the prospects of Severus became more favourable;
for although the new emperor himself [Justinianus I.] supported the Council of Chalcedon, his empress Theodora favoured the Monophysite party, and by her influence Severus obtained the emperor's permission to return to Constantinople (Evagr. l. c.). On his arrival, Severus found that Anthimus, who had just obtained the patriarchate of Constantinople, A. D. 535, was a Monophysite, and he prevailed on him to avow his sentiments.
Timotheus of Alexandria was a Monophysite also,
and the avowal of that omnious heresy by the heads of the church, naturally excited the suspicion of the orthodox party. Anthimus and Timotheus were both deposed; and in the councils of Constantinople and Jerusalem (A. D. 536), and in an imperial edict, Severus was again anathematized;
his writings also were ordered to be burned.
These decisive measures secured the predominance of the orthodox: and Evagrius boasts that the church remained from thenceforth united and pure.
But this result was obtained by the separation of Monophysites, and the formation of the great Jacobite schismatical churches of Egypt and the East, by whom Severus has been ever regarded as, to his death, legitimate patriarch of Antioch.
Some authorities state that Severus was compelled through the interference of Pope Agapetus (A. D.
535, 536) to leave Constantinople and return to Alexandria. The date of his death is uncertain:
Jouannes, bishop of Tch, his contemporary, in his Liber Directionum (apud Assemani, Biblioth. Orient.
vol. ii. p. 54) places it in the year of the Greeks,
i.e. the Seleucides, 849 = a. d. 538; the Chronicogram of Gregorius Bar Hebræus, or Abupharagius (apud cundem, p. 321), in the year of the Greeks 830 =
A. D. 559; and Assemani himself (ibid. note), in A. D. 542. It is said to have taken place at Alexandria, where he lurked in the disguise of a monk.
The Jacobites recognize Sergius as his successor in the patriarchate. (Marcellinus, Chronicon; Victor
SEVERUS.

That Severus was a man of indomitable courage and perseverance is obvious from his history. He was, in fact, the leader of the Monophysite party, and may be regarded as the principal author of the great Jacobite schism. His career was consistent, and, to all appearance, guided by integrity; and if he largely partook of the bitter and uncharitable temper which the religious struggles of his day had generated, the general prevalence of his fault may be pleaded as extenuating the guilt of the individual. To which it must be added, that we know him almost entirely from the representations of his opponents. His life was written by a contemporary; but the work is lost, and is known to us only in the citations and references of Evagrius (H. E. iii. 33), and Liberatus (Breviar. c. 19).

A life of Severus in Syriac was noticed by Assemani among the MSS. of the Syriac convent of St. Mary, at Scete in the desert of Nitria, in Egypt; but it is not certain if it was the life of Severus of Antioch. (Assemani, Bibli. Orient. vol. iii. part 1, p. 19.) Some statements of very doubtful credit, made by the Nestorians respecting the numerous escamani (ibid. p. 394, &c.) remain. There are citations only frag- various Catena in Genesis, in Jobum, in Esdras, in Malachi, in Levitum, in Joaninem, in Acta Apostolorum et Catholicae Epistolae (Fabric. Bibl. Grac. vol. viii. pp. 646, 647, 676, 679, 694, 695, vol. x. p. 616) ; and on the ground, apparently, of these citations, Fabricius (vol. i. p. 616) ascribes to him, 1. Commentarii on these various books of Scripture, though the extracts may be from his Sermons, or some of his other works. A Commentary on the Psalms is indeed mentioned by Gregorius Bar Hnebrans or Abulpharagius (Cave, Hist. lit. p. 501), and a work, probably a Commentary, on St. Luke's Gospel, is cited in a Codinii MS. (Montfau. Bibl. Codin. p. 54).

Montfaucon published (Biblilot. Codin. p. 68), under the name of Severus, and under the impression that he had never before been printed, a fragment, which he entitled Severi Archiphresii Antiocheni Conclusio Evangelistarum circa eas quae in Seplulari Testamenti continguerunt: item de Sallotis et de Varietate Exemplarum S. Matrici Evangelistiae: but the fragment has been identified with a piece previously published among the works of Gregory of Nyssa, ed. Paris, pp. 1615 and 1633 [Gregorius Nyssenus], to whom, however, it does not belong; and A. D. 1648 again in the Auctarium Novum of Combes, by whom it was more correctly ascribed to Hesychius of Jerusalem [Hesychius, No. 7]. How the piece came to be ascribed to Severus is discussed by Galland in his Prelogomena (e. 3) to vol. xi. of his Bibliotheca Patrum, in which the piece is reprinted. An extract from a work of Severus is given under the title of 'Arsénochon, Responsum, to the question, Πάν νοτρέχ η τῆς τοῦ Κυρίου προμισών ταφοποιήσαται; Quomodo sit intelligenda trinitas Domini sepultura et resurrectio' was given in the Quaestiones (Qu. lii) of Anastasius Sinaita [Anastasius Sinaita, No. 3]; and was published by Gretser in his edition of that work. Fabricius has inaccurately conformed this extract with the fragment published by Montfaucon.

2. Severus wrote a vast number of letters, Sermons. Letters, Sermo C.L.X., is cited in a MS. Catena in Prophetas Majoris et Minores, in the King's Library at Paris (Montfaucon, c. p. 53), and there may have been many more than that number. Many of these Sermons are extant in MS. in a Syriac version, by Jacobus of Edessa [Jacobus, No. 8] and others (Assemani, Biblioth. Orient. vol. i. p. 494). Of the Letters of Severus some were designated ' Epidraenatii, Epistolas; and a second class of one of these letters is the so-called Le Quien, in his edition of the works of Johannes Damascenus (vol. i. p. 504), by whom it was cited in the Appendix to his Letter or Tract Peri τῶν αὐτών υπηγέρσεων, De Saucitis Jejunii [Damascenus, JOANNE]. Another citation from a discourse of Severus, entitled Homilia de Epiphronio, appears in the Latin version by Masius of the Paradoxos of Moyse Bar Cepha (Assemani, Biblioth. Orient. vol. i. p. 129), published first at Antwerp, A.D. 1569, and reprinted in various editions of the Bibliotheca Patrum (vol. vi. ed. Paris, 1575, vol. i. ed. Paris, 1599 and 1634, vol. x. ed. Cologne, 1618, and vol. xvii. ed. Lyons, 1677). The polemical works of Severus, as might be expected from his character and position, were numerous. Citations are extant in MS. from his writings. 3. Kata τοῦ Γραμμάτικου, Contra Grammaticum, or Karā Λεβαντίου τοῦ γραμματικοῦ τοῦ Καισαρείας, Contra Johannem Caeasarem Grammaticum, in three books, in a MS. written while in exile at Alexandria, after his deposition (Asiat. Sinait. Hiepeus, s. Vite Dux, &c. 6.). 4. Kata Filaximovos, Contra Ficeciscinovos, in four books at least. 5. Per Tonov othetis 'Αλεξάνδρα, Contra Julianum Heliopolitaninum, in six books, or more probably several successively written; from this work a short passage is quoted by Photius (Bibl. Cod. 225). 6. Kata 'Αλεξάνδρου του, Contra Alexandrum; or Kata kadiptelos 'Αρελεξάνδρου, Contra Codicileovs Alexander, in several i. t. books. 7. Kata την δι- ίσχυα Λαμπέτου, Contra p. Testamentum Lampeti, or the work of Lampetius the Massalian, entitled Ισχυα, which, as well as the reply of Severus, is noticed by Photius p. (Bibl. Cod. 52). Severus wrote this work before his elevation to the Patriarchate; Severus wrote also two works against the Council of Chalcedon: one, unto, 'O Φιλάθλης, Philalethe; Dice † Anstavit Ferro (comp. Anastas. Sinait. l. c.); thilgi, in defence of the former, under the title την δι- ίσχυα του Φιλάθλου, Philalethe Apologeticus. Perhaps the Philalethus is only another title for: No. 3. 10. Fabricius mentions a work of Severus in eight books, if not more, Per των δυο φημιστικων, De duabus Naturis, but does not give its authority. Of the other works of Severus the principal were: 11. his 'Επιστολαι, Epistolas, of which Montfaucon enumerates nearly sixty, without including those to the Emperor Justinian and the Empress Theodora, and to the patriarch Theodorus of.
Alexandria, cited by Evagrius (H. E. iv. 10) and Nicephorus Callisti (H. E. xxvii. 8), the Synod of Synod, Synodia, or Εὐσεβὴς συνόδος, Epistula Sy- nodica, or Εὐσέβης εὐσυνοικίας, Epistolas In- augurales, issued by him on his promotion to the patriarchate, in which he anathematized the council of Chalcedon, and all who supported the doctrine of the two natures of Christ. (Evag. H. E. iii. 33, 34; Niceph. Callist. H. E. xvii. 2.) Of his other works the following are cited in various MSS.: 12. Τακτική εἰς τοὺς μάρτυρας, Hæræica in Martyres, or simply Τακτική, Hæræica. 13. Πρὸς Ἀναστάσιον διά- λογος, Dialogue ad (s. Contra) Anastasium. 14. Πρὸς Ἐπικράτειον κοινοκλήσιαν ἀποκρισίας, Re- sponsiones ad Ἐπικράτειον Cubilicularium. 15. Εἰς τὸ 'Τίραννον ὁ Θεὸς,' σύνταγμα, Syntagma in ilid, Sanctus Deus; and, 16. Βίβλος τῶν ὑποσημειωθέντων Ἰωάννου διαφόρων κεφαλαίων, Liber epistulæ eurymauri mana præstia subainato- rum, of which Joannes Damascenus cites a passage in the Appendix to his De Æcumenica (Le Quenien's ed. l.c.). Several citations of the works of Severus are given in the Hædæges s. De Deo Vincæ of Anastasius Sinaita, and by Photius (Biblioth. Cod. 230) and in the Concilia; but they are chiefly, if not wholly, from his Sermones and Epistolæ. A work, Liber de Ritus Baptismi et Sacrarum Synoxis apud Syros receptus, published in Syriac, with a Latin version, 4to. Antwerp, 1572, under the name of Severus, patriarch of Alexandria, is, ascribed in some MSS. to our Severus; and Cave inclines to assign it to him. Dionysius Bar Salibi, a Syrian writer, cites a work of "Severus patriarcha oecumenicus," which he entitles Canticum Crucis (Assemani, Bibl. Orient. vol. ii. p. 205). The works of Severus are enumerated imperfectly by Cave (Hist. Litt. ad ann. 513, vol. i. p. 499, and more fully by Montfaucon (Biblioth. Chésin. p. 53, &c.), and Fabricius (Biblioth. Graec. vol. x. p. 616, &c.).

3. ENCRIPTA. There were two Severi emi- nent as leaders of bodies accounted heretical. The earlier was a leader of one of the divisions of the Gnostic body; the latter, and far more cele- brated was the Monophysite Patriarch of Antioch [See No. 2.] We speak here of the former, who appears to have lived in the latter part of the second century. Little is known of his personal history. Eusebius (H. E. iv. 29), speaking of the sect of the Encr tasti, and their founder Tatian (Tatianus), says that a certain person named Severus having strengthened the sect, gave occasion to their being called, after his own name, Severian. Theodor- dore also makes Severus posterior to Tatian (Haeret. Fabul. Comp. i. 21). Epiphanius, on the other hand, makes Severus anterior to Tatian. But the silence of Irenæus, who mentions Tatian, but not Severus, makes it probable that Tatian was the earlier. Our account of the opinions of the Severiani is very obscure. According to Euse- bius they admitted the Law and the Prophets (Euseb. H. E. iv. 29), while according to Augustin they rejected them (De Haeres. c. xvi.). It is not improbable that they admitted them as an authentic record of the Old or Mosaic Dispensa- tion, promulgated by the Demiurgos, and as such may have used them, and argued from them; but yet denied their authority as binding upon themselves, who had embraced the New Dis- pensation, which rested not on the authority of the Demiurgos, but on the higher and opposite authority of the Supreme and All-merciful God. This explanation of two apparently opposite state- ments is at any rate consistent with the leading principles of Gnosticism. The curious opinions of Severus, at least of the Severian, as to the gene- ology of the Devil, and the origin of the vine, and of the formation of woman and man, are noticed elsewhere [Tatianus]. Severus denied the apostolic office of Paul, and consequently the authority of his writings; going in these respects beyond Tatian. His followers also denied, according to Augustin, the resurrection of the body, which is likely enough. It is not impossible that these differences may have led to the temporary division of the sect of the Encrastiti to which Severus and Tatian both belonged, and to the formation of separate bodies under the respective names of Tatiani and Severiani, who afterwards reunited under the old and generic name of Encrastiti. The ascetic features, abstinence from marriage and from the use of animal food and wine, appear to have been common to the whole body, whether designated Tatiani, Severiani, or Encrastiti. 6. RHECTOR. Of this writer nothing certain is known. Fabricius is disposed to identify him with the Σέβερος σωφροτης 'Ρομαδος, Severus Sophista Romanus, mentioned by Suidas (s. r.) and by Pho- tius, in his abstract of the life of Isidorus by Damas- cius (Biblioth. Cod. 242). The Severus of Photius resided at Alexandria in the latter part of the fifth century, in the enjoyment of an ample library, and of literary leisure, and was a great patron and encour- eger of learned men, circumstances which bespeak him to have been a man of fortune. The prospect of the revival of the Western Empire during the brief reign of the Emperor Anthemiou [Anthemi- us], led him to visit Rome, where he obtained the honour of the consulsiphip (a. d. 470), which honour, according to Damascius, was portended by the circumstance, deemed a prodigy, that a sick horse, when washed down from skin an abundance of sparks. Severus, the rhetorician, wrote the following works: —

1. Τοῦ Χριστοῦ, Etho- poeia, a series of fictitious speeches, supposed to be uttered by various historical or poetical per- sonages at particular conjunctures. There are extant eight of these Ethopoia. Some of them were first printed, with a Latin version, by Fed. Morel, 8vo. Paris, 1616: viz., 1. Herculis, Per- dicymeno in certamine sese commutante. 2. Menalea, rupty a Paride Helena. 3. (but in an imperfect form) Hectoris, quam compersisse Primum apud inferos cum Achilles coniunxisset: and, 4. with title merely of Fragmentum alterius Ethopoia, a fragment of a fourth, which was afterwards given in a complete form by Alattius; viz. Pictoria, depictae a se puellae amore correeti. Morel himself published it complete; under the name of the sopist Aristides; 5. Achillius, apud sueros dextem a Pyrrho Trojans esse. The foregoing, but in a more ample form and in a different order, were included, with a new Latin version, in the Exegeta varia Graecorum Sophistae urum et Rhetorum of Allatius, 8vo. Paris, 1641. Gale included those already published, with these additional ones, 6. Aeschines, cum redeprehendet Philippi imaginem apud Demosthenem, 7. Eusdeum, in exultm abutinum, cum est Demosthenes viaticum daret. 8. Bria's, cum Praecoon eam abducent; in his Rhetores Selecti, 8vo. Oxford, 1676. No. 7 had been published in the collection of Allatius, but under the name of Theodorus Cypolitectes. Gale added a new Latin version of his own, and gave a revised, at least a different, text. The whole eight are included in the Rhetores Graeci of Winz, vol. i. p. 593, 8vo. Stuttgart and Tubingen, 1692. 9. Hipp. Narrationes. 1. De Viola; 2. De Idiaeo; 3. De Nubieso; 4. De Arione; 5. De Icario; 6. De Oto et Epitale. These were first published by Iriarte. (Regius Biblioth. Matthiassis Cod. Graeci MS., vol. i. p. 462, fol. Madrid, 1769,) and are reprinted with a new edition published in London in 1803. From Ep. cx. of the same collection it appears that Severus died before the object of his love and reverence. [W. R.]

SEVERUS, bishop of Milenum in Numidia, the friend and ardent admirer of St. Augustine, composed in the fervour of overflowing affection a panegyric epistle still extant, inscribed Venerabilis ac desiderabilis et toto sinu charitatis amplexando episcoe Augustino. It will be found among the correspondence of the Bishop of Hippo, n. cix. ed. Bened. From Ep. cx. of the same collection it appears that Severus died before the object of his love and reverence. [J. C. M.]

SEVERUS, bishop of Minorea in the early part of the fifth century, at a time when a great number of the Jews settled in that island were suddenly converted to Christianity. This happy change was ascribed to the prelate to the presence of the relics of St. Stephen, the proto-martyr, which had been deposited in the church at Mago (Makon) by Orosius, upon his return from the East [Orosius], and the event was solemnly announced to all ecclesiastics throughout the world in a circular letter written and inscribed Epistola ad omnes orbis terrarum Episcopos, Presbyteros, et Diaconos. This piece was first brought to light from among the MSS. in the Vatican by Baronius, who published it in his annals, and it will be found also in the Appendix to the seventh volume of the Benedictine edition of St. Augustine, under the title of Sevcri Epistola ad omnem Ecclesiam de Virtutibus in Minoriensis insula facta per religiosas Sancti Stephani Martyrias.

SEVERUS (Συμβος or Σωτηρ), the name of two physicians, who have been supposed to be the same person by Bandini, in his excellent catalogue of the Library of Florence (see the Index), and one of whom (probably the former) is mentioned in a list of those who were most eminent in medical science. (Cramer's Anecd. Graecae Paris, vol. iv.) 1. A physician who is mentioned by Archigenes (ap. Gal. De Compos. Medicin, sec. Loc. iii. i. vol. xii. p. 623), and in terms which seem to imply that he was dead when Archigenes wrote. The name occurs several times in Aetius, who has preserved some rather large extracts from the writings of Severus. These may possibly belong to the other Severus; but upon the whole it seems better to attribute them to this one, and to suppose those passages where mention is made of Archigenes (iii. 1. 34, pp. 489, 481), Oribasius (iii. 3. 102, iii. 1. 34. pp. 484, 481), and Severus (iii. 3. 43, 98, 102, pp. 319, 341, 342, 347), were written by Aetius himself. If the places where Antoninus Musa (iii. 3. 30. p. 612), Apollonius (ibid. and ii. 3. 43, p. 319), and Asclepiades Phacesianus (ii. 3. 85, p. 334), are quoted, belong to Severus, he must have lived towards the end of the first century after Christ. One of his medical formulae is quoted by Alexander Trallianus (ii. 5. p. 174). Fabricius mentions (Bibl. Gr. vol. xiii. p. 394, ed. vet.) a physician named Seretius, as quoted by Aetius; but this is probably a mistake either in the Greek text or in the Latin translation. He also mentions a physician named Theodosis Severus; but "Theodotium" is only the title given by Severus to one of his medicines. (See Bibl. Gr. vol. viii. p. 329.)

2. The author of a short Greek treatise Περὶ Ἑστῆρων ἔτοι Καλόστρων, De Clysteribus, which was first published by F. R. Dietz, 8vo. Regim. Pruss. 1836. He is called by the title of Iatro-sophist, and from some of the words he uses (e.g. ἀκτιληποαις) may be supposed to have lived in the sixth or seventh century after Christ. There is nothing in the work itself that deserves particular notice here. [W. A. G.]

SEVERUS, the architect, with Celer, of Nero's golden house. (Tac. Ann. xv. 42; Suet. Ner. 31; Celer.) [P. S.]

SEVERUS, ACILIUS, consul a. d. 323, with Vetius Rufinus, in the reign of Constantius. (Fasti.)

SEVERUS, T. ALLEIDUUS, a Roman eques, married his own niece to Agrippina, because he married her uncle the emperor Claudius. (Tac. Ann. xii. 7; comp. Suet. Claud. 26.)

SEVERUS, ANNIUS, father of Fabia Orestilla, who was great grand-daughter of Antoninus, and wife of the elder Gordan. (Capitolin. Gord. trec. c. 6.)

SEVERUS, AQUILLIUS, a Spaniard, lived under Valentinus, and wrote a work, partly in prose and partly in poetry, which is thus described by Hieronymus (de Vir. ill. c. 8): "volumen, quasi Οἰσοιμορφον, totius sine vitae statum continens, tam proa, quam versibus, quod vocavit καταστροφιν, sive Πειρα." (Wernsdorf, Poetae Latin. Miniore, vol. v. p. 1491.)

SEVERUS, M. AURELIUS ALEXANDER, usually called ALEXANDER SEVERUS, Roman emperor, a. d. 222-235, the son of Gessius Marcianus and Julia Mamaea, and first cousin of Elagabalus [see genealogy under CARACALLA], was born at Arco, in Phoenicia, in the temple of Alexander the Great, to which his parents had repaired for the celebration of a festival. There is some doubt as to the year and day of his birth; but the 1st of October, a. d. 205, is probably the correct date, although Herodian places the event so low as a. d. 208. His original name appears to have been Alexianus Bassianus, the latter appellation having derived from his maternal grandfather. Upon the elevation of Elagabalus, he accompanied his mother and the court to Rome, a report having been spread abroad, and having

and that he also, as well as the emperor, was the son of Caracalla. This connection was afterwards recognised by himself, for he publicly spoke of the divine Antoninus as his sire; and the same fact is asserted by the genealogy recorded on ancient monuments. In A.D. 221 he was adopted by Elagabalus and Caracalla, pontiff, consul, elect, and princes proconsuls, at the instigation of the acute and politic Julin Maesa, who, foreseeing the inevitable destruction of one grandson, resolved to provide beforehand for the quiet succession of the other. The names Alexianus and Bassianus were now laid aside, and those of M. Aurelius Alexander substituted; M. Aurelius in virtue of his adoption; Alexander in consequence, as was asserted, of a direct revelation on the part of the Syrian god. Elagabalus speedily repented of his choice, and made many efforts to remove one upon whom he now looked with jealousy as a dangerous rival; but his repeated efforts, open as well as secret, being frustrated by the vigilance of Mamæa and the affection of the soldiers, eventually led to his own death, as has been related elsewhere. [Elagabalus; MAESA; MANIARA].

Alexander was forthwith acknowledged emperor by the praetorians, and their choice was upon the same day confirmed by the senate, who voted all the customary distinctions; and thus he ascended the throne, on the 11th of March, A.D. 222, in his seventeenth year, adding Severus to his other designations, in order to mark more explicitly the descent which he claimed from the father of Caracalla.

For the space of nine years the sway of the new monarch was unmarked by any great event; but a gradual reformation was effected in the various abuses which had so long preyed upon the state; men of learning and virtue were promoted to the chief dignities, while the city and the empire at large began to recover a healthier tone in religion, morals, and politics. But during the period of tranquillity in Italy, a great revolution had taken place in the East, whose effects were soon felt in the Roman provinces, and gave rise to a series of convulsions which shook the world for centuries. The Persians, after having submitted to the sway of Alexander the Great, of the Seleucidae, and of the Parthians in turn, had made a desperate effort to regain their independence: after a protracted and sanguinary struggle, their chief, Artaxerxes, overcame the warlike Artabanus, and the sovereignty of Central Asia passed for ever from the hands of the Aracidae. The conquerors, flushed with victory, now began to form more ample schemes, and fondly hoped that the time had now arrived when they might thrust forth the Western tyrants from the regions they had so long usurped, and, recovering the vast dominion once swayed by their ancestors, again rule supreme over all Asia, from the Indus to the Euphrates. Accordingly, as early as A.D. 229, Mesopotamia and Syria were threatened by the victorious hordes; and Alexander, finding that peace could no longer be maintained, set forth from Rome in A.D. 231 to assume in person the command of the Roman legions. The opposing hosts met in the level plain beyond the Euphrates, in A.D. 232. Artaxerxes was overthrown in a great battle, and driven across the Tigris; but the emperor did not prosecute his advantage, for intelligence having reached him of a great movement among the German tribes, he hurried back to the city, where he celebrated a triumph in the autumn of A.D. 233.

Such is the account given of the result of this campaign by all ancient writers, with the exception of Herodian, who draws a frightful picture of the losses sustained by the sword and by disease, and represents Severus as having been obliged to retreat ingloriously into Syria, with the mere skeleton of an army. But the well-known hostility of this historian to Severus would, in itself, throw discredit upon these statements, unless corroborated by more impartial testimony; and the character of the prince forbids us to suppose that he would have deliberately planned and executed a fraud which could have imposed upon no one, and would have been commended by speeches to the senate and people, by medals, by inscriptions, and finally by a glorious triumph, that which in reality was a shameful and most disastrous defeat. Although little doubt, therefore, can be entertained with regard to the main facts of the expedition, the determination of the dates is a matter of considerable difficulty, and has given rise to much controversy among chroniclers; for the evidence is both complicated and uncertain. On the whole, the opinion of Eckhel (vol. vii. p. 274) seems the most probable. He contends that Alexander left the city for the Persian war, at the end of A.D. 230, or the beginning of A.D. 231; that the battle with Artaxerxes was fought in A.D. 232; and that the triumph was celebrated towards the end of A.D. 233.

Meanwhile, the Germans having crossed the Rhine, were now devastating Gaul. Severus quitted the metropolis with an army, in the course of A.D. 234; but before he had made any progress in the campaign, he was waylaid by a small band of mutinous soldiers, instigated, it is said, by Maximinus, and slain, along with his mother, in the early part of A.D. 235, in the 30th year of his age, and the 14th of his reign.

All ranks were plunged in the deepest grief by the intelligence of his death, and their sorrow was rendered more poignant by the well-known coarseness and brutality of his successor [MAXIMINUS]. Never did a sovereign better merit the regard of his people. His noble and graceful presence, the gentleness and courtesy of his manners, and the ready access granted to persons of every grade, produced, at an early period, an impression in his favour, which became deeply engraven on the hearts of all by the justice, wisdom, and clemency which he uniformly displayed in all public transactions, and by the simplicity and purity which distinguished his private life. The formation of his character must, in a great measure, be ascribed to the high principles instilled by his mother, who not only guarded his life with watchful care against the treachery of Elagabalus, but was not less vigilant in preserving his morals from the contamination of the doubled-yed profligacy with which he was surrounded. She so deeply felt the obligations which he owed to such a parent, and repaid them by the most respectful tenderness and dutiful submission to her will. The implicit reliance which he reposed on her judgment, is said to have led to his untimely end; for Mamæa incited excessive and ill-timed parsimony, which conjoined with the strict discipline enforced, at length alienated the affections of the troops, who were at one time deeply attached to his person. So sensible was he of this fatal error, that he is said to have reproached his mother, with his dying breath, as the cause of the catastrophe. (Herodian. v. 5, 17—23, vi. 3 & 2)

COIN OF ALEXANDER SEVERUS.

SEVERUS, A. CAECINA. [CAECINA, No. 4.]

SEVERUS, CA'SSIUS, a celebrated orator and satirical writer, in the time of Augustus and Tiberius, is supposed by Weichert to have been born about A.D. 50. He is called in the Index of Authors to the thirty-five book of Pliny Longina-mus, that is, a native of Longula, a town of Latium. He was a man of low origin and dissolute character, but was much feared by the severity of his attacks upon the Roman nobles. He must have commenced his career as a public slanderer very early, if he is the person against whom the sixth epode of Homcre is directed, as is supposed by many ancient and modern commentators. He a-tracted particular attention by accusing of poisoning, in B.C. 9, Nonius Aspernas, the friend of Augustus, who was defended by Asinius Pollio (Suet. Aug. 56; Plin. H. N. xxxv. 12. 46; Quintil. x. i. § 23; Dion Cass. iv. 4). Towards the latter end of the reign of Augustus, Severus was banished by Augustus to the island of Crete on account of his libellous verses against the distinguished men and women at Rome; but as he still continued to write libels, he was deprived of his property in the reign of Tiberius, A.D. 24, and removed to the desert island of Seriphos, where he died in great poverty in the twenty-fifth year of his exile. Hieronymus places his death in A.D. 33, and if this be correct he was banished in A.D. 8. Cassius Severus introduced a new style of oratory, and is said, by the author of the Dialogue on Orators (cc. 19, 26), to have been the first who deserted the style of the ancient orators; and accordingly Meyer observes, that dividing the history of Roman oratory into three epochs, Cato would be the chief of the older school, Cicero of the middle period, and Severus of the later. The works of Severus were proscribed, but were permitted by Caligula to be read again. (Tac. Ann. i. 72, iv. 21, de Orat. 19, 26; Senec. Controcr. iii. init.; Quintil. x. 1. § 116; Suet. Calig. 16, Vieill. 2; Plin. H. N. vi. 10. s. 12; Macrobr. Sat. ii. 4; Hieron. in Euseb. Chron. 2040; Weichert, De Lucii Varii et Cassii Parmenii Vita, Grimae. 1837, p. 190—217, where the reader will find every thing that is known about Cassius Severus; Drumm, Geschichtle Romans, vol. ii. p. 161; Meyer, Oratorum Romanorum Fragmenta, pp. 545—551, 2d ed.)

SEVERUS, CATHLIUS. 1. Consul in A. D. 120, was made by Hadrian governor of Syria, and subsequently praefectus urbi, but was removed from the latter post in A. D. 139, because he expressed disapprobation at the adoption of An-toninus Pius, in consequence of his being anxious to gain the empire for himself. He was the maternal great-grandfather of the emperor M. Aurelius [see Vol. I. p. 438]. Severus was a friend of the younger Pliny, several of whose letters are addressed to him. (Capitolin. Sparr. 5, 15, 24, M. Anton. 1; Plin. Ep. i. 22, iii. 6, v. 1, et alibi.)

2. A relation of the emperor Alexander Severus, and a member of his consilium, is described as vir omnium doctissimus. (Lamprid. Alex. Sever. 68.)

SEVERUS, CESTIUS. [CESTIUS, No. 5.]

SEVERUS, C'NClUS, slain by the emperor Septimius Severus (Spartian. Sever. 13), is probably the same as the pontifex Cninius Severus, who is mentioned in connection with the burial of Commodus. (Lamprid. Comm. 20.)

SEVERUS, CLAUDIUS. 1. The leader of the Helvetii, A. D. 69. (Tac. Hist. i. 68.)

2. CN. CLAUDIUS SEVERUS, consul with Sex. Ercucius Clarius, in A.D. 146, in which year the emperor Severus was born. (Spartian. Sever. 7; Cod. Just. tit. 26. s. 1.)

3. TI. CLAUDIUS SEVERUS, consul A. D. 200, with a. d. Victorinus. (Cod. Just. tit. 45. s. 1. et alibi.)

SEVERUS, CORNELIUS, according to the criticism of Quintilian, more distinguished as a verse-maker than as a poet, was contemporary with Ovid, by whom he is addressed in one of the Epistles written from Pontus. He was the author of a poem entitled Bellum Siculum, which he was prevented by death from completing. Senea has preserved (Suasor. vii.) a fragment by Severus, on the death of Cicero; and in one of his Epistles he speaks of him as having written upon Aeata; but whether this was an independent piece or was included in the Sicilian War, we cannot tell. [See Lucilius Junior.]

The above-mentioned fragments, and a few inconsiderable scraps, collected chiefly from the grammarians, will be found in Wernsdorf, Ploët. Lat.

SEVERUS, CURTIUS, a Roman officer in Syria, in A.D. 52. (Tac. Ann. xii. 55.)

SEVERUS, FLAVIUS VALERIUS, Roman emperor, A. D. 306—307. After the abdication of Diocletian and Maximian, followed by the elevation of Galerius with Constantius Chlorus to the rank of Augusti, it became necessary, in order to maintain the scheme of the empire, to appoint new Caesars [DIOCLETIANUS]. The right of nomination was conceded to Galerius, who selected two creatures of his own, devoted, as he believed, to his interests, Maximinus Daia and Severus. The latter, an obscure Illyrian adventurer, altogether unknown, save as the dissolute, although faithful, adherent of his patron, was invested with the insignia of his new dignity at Milan, on the 1st of May, A.D. 305, by Valerian in person and obtained Italy, and probably Africa and Upper Pannonia also, as his provinces. But as soon as intelligence was received of the death of Constantius Chlorus, which happened at York, in July, A. D. 306, Severus was forthwith proclaimed Augustus in his stead, by Galerius, and soon after was instructed to quell the disturbances excited by the usurpation of Maxentius. The details of this disastrous campaign, the advance of Severus upon the capital, the defection of his troops, his hasty retreat, and his surrender at Ravenna to Hereniis, upon the most solemn assurances of ample protection, have been related in a former article [MAXENTIUS]. In spite, however, of all the promises of the conqueror, the vanquished prince was conveyed as a prisoner of war to the vicinity of Rome, and detained in captivity at Tres Tabernae, on the Appian road, where, upon receiving intimation that he might choose the manner of his death, he opened his veins, and was entombed in the sepulchre of Gallienus, A. D. 307. (Paneg. Vet. i. v.; Auct. De Mort. Persec. 18, 19, 20, 25, 26; Victor, de Cas. 40. Epit. 40; Eutrop. x. 2; Excerpta Valesian. 6—10; Zosim. ii. 6, 10;)

CIN OF FLAVIUS VALERIUS SEVERUS.

SEVERUS, HERENNIUS, a friend of the younger Pliny, who speaks of him as "vir doctissimus." (Plin. Ep. iv. 28.)

SEVERUS, JULIUS, a legatus of Hadrian, was first governor of Britain, from which he was summoned by the emperor to take the command of the war against the Jews. After the conclusion of this war he was placed over Bithynia, which he governed with great wisdom and justice. He must not be confounded with the Severus, whom Pliny addresses in several of his letters, as Glan- dorp has done in his Onomasticon; for the friend of Pliny was Catilius Severus, as has been shown above. (Dion Cass. ix. 13, 14.)

SEVERUS, JULIUS, a Roman grammarian, of whom nothing is known, is the author of a small treatise entitled De Pedibus Exposito, which was first published by Heusinger, together with the work of Flavius Mullius Theodorus on the same subject, Quell. 1755, and Lulg. Bat. 1766. It is also included in Gaisford's Script. Lat. Rei Metric. Oxon. 1837.

SEVERUS, LIIBIUS, Roman emperor from A. D. 461—465. He was a Lucanian by birth, and owed his accession to Ricimer, who placed him on the throne of Rome after the assassination of Majorian. His proclamation took place at Ravenna, on the 19th or 20th of November, 461, and the Roman senate confirmed the election soon afterwards. He was an obscure man, and his name is not mentioned previously to the murder of Majorian, of which he was one of the principal agents. No acts of his reign are recorded but one, namely his condemnation of Agrippinus, and the subsequent pardon which he granted to him in 462. Leo, the Eastern emperor, declined to acknowledge him, but afterwards complied with the wishes of the powerful Ricimer, to whom we refer for the political events of the time. Severus died in Rome on the 15th of August, 465, or perhaps some weeks later. (Iatius, Chronic.; Chronicon Alexandr.; Evagr. ii. 7; Theoph. p. 97; Jornand. De Heb. Goth. c. 45.)

COIN OF LINIUS SEVERUS.

SEVERUS SANCTUS, the writer of an amoe- bean pastoral of considerable merit, extending to 132 lines, in choriambic metre, first published by P. Pithou in his "Veterum aliquot Galliae Theologorum Scripta" (4to. Paris, 1586) as, Severi Rhetotoris et Poetae Christiani Carmen Bucolicum. The subject relates to a murrain among cattle, which, after sweeping over Pannonia, Illyria, and Bocica, was devastating the pastures of the country where the scene is laid; that is, probably Gaul (see v. 22). The speakers who open the dialogue are Buculus and Aegon, both pagans; and these are afterwards joined by Tityrus, a Christian. Buculus recounts, with deep grief, the disease and death by which his oxen had been visited. While Aegon is condoling with him, and marvelling that, although many of their neighbours had been afflicted by this calamity, some had remained altogether uninjured, Tityrus, one of those who had escaped, comes up, and, on being questioned, declares that he attributed the preservation of his property to the sign of the cross impressed upon the foreheads of his flocks, and to the worship of Jesus, which he himself practised, at the same time recommending his friends to adopt the faith which he professed, as the only sure safeguard and remedy. Buculus, convinced by his arguments, and hoping to avert the pestilence from his herds, agrees to become a convert, Aegon also expresses his willingness to receive the truth, and both, conducted by Tityrus, proceeded to the city, for the purpose of offering homage at the shrine of Christ. With regard to the author little, or rather no-	hing, is known; for every particular recorded with regard to him, resolves itself into a vague concep-ture. Ausonius mentions a Flavius Sanctus as his kinsman (Parental. xviii. xix.), and Sidonius Apollinaris (Ep. viii. 11) speaks of his friend Sanctus, who had been bishop of Bordeaux; but the composer of the eclogue now under consideration, is commonly supposed to be the same with Sanctus, a friend of Paulinus Nolanius, to whom that prelate addresses his twenty-sixth epistle, while Pithou proceeds a step farther, and maintains that he is also the rhetorician Endelichius, whom Paulinus names in a letter to Sulpcius Severus (Ep. ix. comp. Sinuema, ad Sidon. Apoll. Ep. iv. 8). Accordingly, he published the second edition of the pastoral in his "Epigrammata et Poemata Vett.," &c. (Paris, 1590), as Carmen Severi Sancti, id est, Endelicheti Rhetorici, de Mortibus Bonum; and, since that period, scholars, according to their conviction, have adopted one or other, or both of these titles.

From the internal evidence afforded by the piece itself, we are led to conclude that it belongs to the
of power was to take vengeance on the actual murderers of Pertinax. He then collected the rest of the guards, surrounded them with his legions, compelled them to lay down their arms, and banished them from Rome, forbidding them upon pain of death to approach within a hundred miles of the metropolis. This act of justice and of policy being performed, he proceeded to enter the city, where all orders in the state now vied with each other in welcoming him with joyous acclamations. Cæcilius Albinus, whose rivalry he dreaded, Cæsar, -- celebrated the obsequies of Pertinax with the utmost splendor, -- distributed an enormous donation to his soldiers, amounting we are told to 30,000 sesterces for each man, and having arranged all matters connected with the internal government of the state, quitted Rome within thirty days after his triumphal entry, and hurried to the East in order to prosecute the war against Niger. While he marched direct towards Syria at the head of a portion of his forces, he despatched some legions into Africa, lest the enemy passing through Egypt, or along the coast, might gain possession of the great granary of the empire and starve the metropolis. So eagerly did he watch over this department of the public service in after life, that when he died the storehouses of Rome were found to contain a stock of corn sufficient for the consumption of seven years, and as much oil as would have supplied the wants of all Italy for five years.

The progress of the campaign, which was terminated by the capture of Niger after the battle of Issus, A.D. 194, need not be recapitulated [NIGER, PESCENNIIUS]. But Severus was not yet satisfied. Some of the border tribes still refusing to acknowledge his authority, he crossed the Euphrates in the following year (A.D. 195), wasted their lands, captured their cities, forced all whom he encountered to submit, and won for himself the titles of Allobogicius, Ararolicus, and Particius. In A.D. 196 Byzantium, after an obstinate resistance, protracted for nearly three years, was taken, to the great joy of the emperor, who treated the vanquished with little moderation. Its famous walls were levelled with the earth, its soldiers and magistrates were put to death, the property of the citizens was confiscated, and the town itself, deprived of all its political privileges, made over to the Perinthians. Meanwhile, in Africa, Albinus, who, although created Caesar, found that after the destruction of Niger he was treated with little consideration, had accepted the imperial dignity proffered by the troops in Gaul. Severus being thus compelled to return to Europe, endeavoured, in the first instance, to remove his antagonist by treachery, but his schemes having been baffled, he procured a decree of the Senate, pronouncing him a public enemy, and then hastened on to Gaul to prosecute the war. On the nineteenth of February, A.D. 197, the contending hosts encountered near Lyons, the rivals commanding in person, each at the head of 150,000 men. The battle was fiercely contested, and for a time fortune seemed to waver. Severus, when rallying his men, lost his horse and narrowly escaped being slain; but eventually his superior skill and experience prevailed. The loss upon both sides was terrible. The whole plain was covered with the dead and wounded, and streams of blood mingled with the waters of the Rhone. Albinus took refuge in a house near the river; but finding himself hotly pursued and his retreat cut off, perished by his own hand. The conqueror, after resting upon the spectacle of his enemy's corpse, ordered the head to be cut off and despatched to Rome, whither he quickly followed, and put to death many senators suspected of having been in correspondence with the foe. Games were exhibited, and largesses bestowed on the people; but as soon as the first excitement of success had passed away Severus, still thirsting for military renown, resolved to return to Asia, and again assail the Parthians, who, taking advantage of the civil strife in the West, had spread over Mesopotamia. Accordingly he set forth accompanied by his sons Caracalla and Geta, crossed the Euphrates early in the year A.D. 198, and commenced a series of operations which were attended with the most brilliant results. Seleucia and Babylon were evacuated by the enemy; and Ctesiphon, at that time their royal city, was taken and plundered after a short siege. The campaign against the Arabs, who had espoused the cause of Niger, was less glorious. The emperor twice assailed their chief town Atra, and twice was compelled to retire with great loss.

The next three years were spent in the East. Severus entered upon his third consulship in Syria (A.D. 202), Caracalla being his colleague; visited Arabia, Palestine, and Egypt; and having made all the necessary arrangements in these countries, returned to Rome in the same year, in order to offer the decennial vows, and to celebrate the marriage of his eldest son with Plautilla. The shows in honour of the return of the prince, of the commemoration of the tenth year of his reign, of his victories, and of the royal nuptials, were unparalleled in magnificence; that is to say, the bloodshed and butchery of men and animals were greater than ever. On one occasion, four hundred wild beasts were let loose in the amphitheatre at one moment, and seven hundred, at the rate of a hundred for each day, were slaughtered during the course of the games. At this time, also, each citizen whose poverty entitled him to obtain corn from the public store, and each of the praetorians received ten aurei; a largess which consumed about sixteen millions and a half sterling, the greatest sum which had ever been bestowed in such a manner on any one occasion.

For seven years Septimius remained tranquilly at Rome; but in A.D. 207, either because a rebellion in northern Britain had assumed an aspect so serious that his presence was deemed requisite, or for the purpose of giving active employment to his sons, who were leading a life of profligacy, and to the legions, whose discipline had become relaxed, he determined again to take the field. Accordingly, passing through Gaul, he reached his destination, early in A.D. 208. Marching at once to the disturbed districts, he entered Caledonia, and penetrated, we are told, to the very extremity of the island, the inhabitants offering no steady or formidable opposition, but rather luring the invaders onward, in the expectation that they might be destroyed in detail, by want and misery. Nor do these anticipations appear to have been altogether disappointed: after having received necessaries and cutting supplies over barren, pathless mountains, in raising causeways across swampy plains, and in throwing bridges over unfavourable rivers, the troops retraced their steps, worn out with hardships of every description, without having accomplished any great object, or secured any permanent advantage. In this expedition inconsiderable misery was inflicted; the prince lost fifty thousand men, and gained the title of Britannicus. That no moral impression even was made is evident from the fact that, scarcely had the legions withdrawn towards the south, and commenced the famous wall which still bears the name of their commander, when a fresh insurrection broke out among the Medes and the Caledonians. Enraged by this audacity, Severus declared his resolution to exterminate the whole race, and instantly began to make preparations for a new campaign. But his designs were cut short by death. He was attacked by a violent disease in the joints, and expired at York, on the 4th of February, A.D. 211, in the sixty-fifth year of his age, and the eighteenth of his reign. His ashes were conveyed to Rome, and deposited in the tomb of M. Aurelius. As a matter of course, his apotheosis was decreed by the senate, and Herodian has preserved a detailed account of the ceremonies performed.

Although the character of Severus appears in a most favourable light when viewed in contrast with those rulers who immediately preceded and followed him, there is in it not much to admire, and nothing to love. He was, it must be admitted, a stranger to their brutal vices; he was free from all capricious tyranny; under ordinary circumstances he governed the state with integrity, and did all that might best promote the interests of the community at large. He devoted himself with great zeal to the administration of justice, and to the reform of public abuses: he was, moreover, an admirable general; and the strict discipline maintained by him among the troops, effectually repressed, for a season, military insolence and excess. Nor can we refuse to acknowledge that he possessed a large, keen, and vigorous intellect, such as might well befit the ruler of such an empire in such unhappy times. But he was utterly devoid of all high moral principle, totally destitute of gentleness and generosity of temper. When he had once resolved to gain an object, he entertained no scruples with regard to the means by which his purpose was to be accomplished; and although not naturally cruel, was perfectly indifferent to human suffering and life. Nor did success soften this hardness of heart, or qualify the bitter resentment which he cherished against all who in any way opposed or thwarted his designs. Not content with victory, he ever sought to glut his vengeance on his fallen foes, and was always most odious in the hour of triumph. In private life it is said that he was a warm friend, simple and domestic in his habits, and fond of literary pursuits.

Although undoubtedly possessed of a masculine tone of mind, we find one singular trait of weakness, so much at variance with his shrewdness, sagacity, and strong sense in other matters, that we must regard it as a most remarkable example of the paralysing influence of vanity. He endeavoured to establish a connection between himself and his predecessors in the purple, and most posthumously announced that he was the adopted son of M. Aurelius, fifteen years after the death of that prince. In this manner he set up a claim to a long line of imperial ancestors, which he formally and

SEVERUS, SULPICIUS, chiefly celebrated as an ecclesiastical historian, was a native of Aquitaine (Dialog. i. 29.), and flourished towards the close of the fourth century under Arcadius and Honorius, being a few years younger than his friend Paulinus of Nola, to whose letters, of which fourteen are addressed to Severus, we are principally indebted for any information we possess regarding his career. Descended from a noble family he was carefully trained in all the learning of the age and country to which he belonged, distinguished himself as an orator at the bar, and married early in life a high-born and very wealthy bride. The untimely death of this lady produced so deep an impression on his mind that, while yet in the flower of his years, he resolved to abandon the pursuit of worldly pleasures and honours, and in company with a few pious friends, to seek tranquility in seclusion and holy exercises. To this determination he steadfastly adhered notwithstanding the opposition of his father, by whom he was in consequence disinherited, a circumstance compensated, however, to a great extent by the liberality of his mother-in-law Bassula. He eventually became a presbyter of the church, and attached himself closely to St. Martin of Tours, whom he ever cultivated with peculiar reverence, imbibing from him many wild and fantastic notions respecting dreams, visions, miraculous manifestations, and the millennium, which in some measure suffused the brightness of his orthodoxy. Genadius, in a passage, whose authenticity has been somewhat unreasonably disputed, positively asserts that Severus, towards the close of his life, was tainted with the Pelagian heresy, but that having become sensible of his error, and feeling convinced that he had been betrayed by a too great love of speaking, maintained silence ever afterwards as an appropriate atonement for his sin. The precise date of his birth and of his death are alike unknown. The former has been referred to A. D. 363, the latter variously to A. D. 410, 420, 422, 452, an argument in favour of the earliest of these epochs being derived from the fact that he is never mentioned by Paulinus subsequent to that year. His retirement from the world took place about A. D. 392. We must carefully avoid confounding this Sulpicius Severus with another ecclesiastical writer. Sulpicius Severus, surnamed Pius, who was the twenty-seventh bishop of Bourges, in the middle of the seventh century, and contemporary with Gregory of Tours, who dedicated to him his tract on the Seven Sleepers.

The extant works of Severus are,

I. Vita S. Martini Tunosensis, drawn up towards the end of A. D. 400, soon after the death of the holy man, whose virtues and miracles it commemorates.

II. Epistolæ. These three letters are immediately connected with the preceding biography, being severally entitled, 1. Ad Euthemium Presbyterum contra acinulos virtutem beati Martini. 2. Ad Aurelium Diaconum de obitu et apparitione ejusdem. 3. Ad Bassalum solem suam de transitu illius (sc. B. Martini) ex hac vita ad immortalem.

III. Historia Sacra. An epitome of sacred history, extending from the creation of the world to the consilship of Sticho and Aurelius, A. D. 400. It was concluded about A. D. 403.

IV. Dialogi duo, generally divided into three, although that termed the second forms in reality a portion of the first. They contain a temperate review of the bitter discussions and dissensions which had arisen among ecclesiastics in the East regarding the tendency of the works of Origen. Composed about A. D. 403.

V. Spectacula. 1. Ad Claudiam Sororem—on the last judgment. 2. Ad evanesc—on virginity. 3. Ad Paulinum Episcopum. 4. To the magistrates (decureiones) of a town which he does not name. 5. Ad Salvium. 6. A note, without address, extending to a few lines only.

Several letters to Paulinus and others have been lost, as we gather from the words of Genadius.

A letter addressed to Paulinus, and published along with those of Severus in the collection of Dacherius is by some other hand.

Sulpicius Severus was greatly admired by his contemporaries, and his fame stood high with all classes of readers in the middle ages. Their estimate of his merits was far too favourable, for none of his productions exhibit much strength of mind or critical sagacity, nor do they furnish matter possessing any particular interest. His history, moreover, abounds with chronological errors and blunders of all kinds, copied from the old chronicles, whose mistakes he adopted with unsuspicious confidence. But, notwithstanding these grave defects, the polished terseness of his style, and the general purity of his language, have served to maintain his reputation even in modern times. From the general characteristics of his phraseology he has been termed the Christian Sallust, and the resemblance is unquestionable. He has, however, judiciously avoided the obscurity and affectation which so often deform the pages of his model, while on the other hand he not unfrequently permits himself to employ the ordinary jargon of ecclesiastical Latinity, instead of seeking for more graceful and classical forms of expression.

The life of St. Martin, the three epistles connected with it, and the Dialogues, were first printed at Milan about 1490 by Donnus Membruzzi in the second volume of his Vitæ Sæculorum, from whence they were transferred into the collection of Christian poets published by Aldus Manutius, 4to. Venet. 1502, and reprinted at Paris in 1511. But so completely had these tracts been overlooked and forgotten, that when found by Wolfgang Lazzis, in a MS. belonging to the Imperial Library at Vienna, he gave them to the world as a new discovery in his collection, "Thesaurus apocryphon de vita Christi et Apostolorum" (fol. Basel, 1551), and his mistake was not discovered for two centuries.

The Historia Sacra was first printed at Basle (8vo. 1556) by Matthaeus Flaccus. Among the numerous editions which have appeared from time to time the most notable are those with the commentary of Sagonius (8vo. Bonon. 1561, 1581), and with that of Drusius. (8vo. Arnhem. 1607.)

The Epitodes were collected from various sources at different times. Two were first printed in the Lectiones Antiquae of Canisius, vol. v. p. 540, 4to. Ingolds. 1604; two, with others of doubtful authenticity in the Spicilegium Veteranum Scriptorum of Dacherius, vol. v. p. 532, 4to. Paris, 1661, and the two to Claudia in the Miscellanea of Baluzius, fol. Paris. 1673.

The collected works were first printed at Basle (1619, 1563), but the first impression with any pretensions to critical accuracy was that of Victor Giselinus, 8vo. Ant. 1674, accompanied by notes, and an elaborate life of Sulpicia. Considerable improvements were introduced by Hornius, 8vo. Lug. Bat. 1647; by Vorstius, 8vo. Merol. 1668; and Lips. 1705, by Mercierus, 8vo. Paris, 1675; by far the most complete and satisfactory edition is that of Hieronymus de Prato, 4to. 2 vols. Veron. 1741—1754, which has always, since its appearance, been regarded as the standard, although not absolutely complete, since the six epistles are omitted. It was reprinted, with the addition of the epistles, by Galland, in his Bibliotheca Patrum, vol. viii. fol. Venet. 1772. (German. Viris Illustri. 19; Honorius Augustod. de Script. Eccles. iii. 19; Trithemius, de Script. Eccles. 3.; Gregor. Turon. de Mirac. S. Mart. i.; Histor. Franc. x. 31; Paulin. Nol. Ep. v. 1, xi. 3, xxiii. 3, &c.; Hieronym. Comment. in Exod. 36; Augustin. Ep. 295.) [W. R.]

SEVERUS, VERULAMIUS, a legatus of Corbulus, under whom he served in the East, in a.d. 60—62 (Tac. Ann. xiv. 26, x. 3). The L. Verulanus Severus, who was consul successively under Trajan in a.d. 108, was perhaps a son of the preceding.

SEUTHEs (Σέουθες). 1. A king of the Thracian tribe of the Odrysians, was a son of Spardocus or Spardaucus, and nephew of Sitalces, king of the Odrysians, whom he accompanied on his great expedition into Macedonia, n.c. 429. On that occasion he was gained over by Perdiccas, king of Macedonia, who promised him his sister Statronice in marriage; and in consequence exerted all his influence with Statronice to induce her to withdraw his army from Macedonia. His efforts were successful, and after his return to Thrace, he was married to Statronice according to the agreement (Thuc. ii. 101). In n.c. 424 he succeeded Sitalces on the throne, and during a long reign raised his kingdom to a height of power and prosperity which it had never previously attained, so that his regular revenues amounted to the annual sum of 400 talents, in addition to contributions of gold and silver in the form of presents to a nearly equal amount (Thuc. ii. 97, iv. 101). From a passage in the letter of Philip to the Athenian people (op. Demosth. p. 161, ed. Reiske) it would appear that Seuthes was accused of having had some hand in the death of Sitalces; but this is wholly at variance with the account given by Thucydides [SITALCES]. From the same passage we learn that he maintained friendly relations with the Athenian people, by whom he was admitted to the privileges of citizenship.

2. Another Odrysian prince, a son of Maesaides, who had reigned over the tribes of the Molon- dite, Thyini, and Trampisae, but had been expelled from his kingdom before his death, on which account Seuthes was brought up at the court of Me docus, or Amados, king of the Odrysians (Xen. Anab. vii. 2. § 32). He was, however, admitted to a certain amount of independent power, and we find him in n.c. 405 joining with Amados, in promising his support to Alcibiades, to carry on the war against the Lacedaemonians (Diod. xiii. 103). In n.c. 400, when Xenophon with the remains of the ten thousand Greeks that had accompanied Cyrus, arrived at Chrysopolis, Seuthes applied to him for the assistance of the force under his command to reinstate him in his former power. His proposals were at first rejected; but he renewed them again when the Greeks had been expelled from Byzantium, and found themselves at Perin thus without the means of crossing into Asia; and they were now induced, principally by Xenophon himself, to accept the offers of the Thracian prince. By the assistance of these new auxiliaries, Seuthes obtained an easy victory over the mountain tribes, and recovered the whole of his father's dominions. But when it came to the question of paying the services of the Greeks, great disputes arose, and Seuthes, at the instigation of Heraclides, endeavoured by every subterfuge to elude his obligations. He was at length, however, compelled to pay the stipulated sum, and the Greeks thereupon crossed into Asia (Xen. Anab. vii. 1. § 5, 2—7). Not long afterwards, n.c. 393, we find him sending an auxiliary force to the Spartan general, Deryllidas, in Bithynia (Ib. Hellen. iii. 2. § 2). At a subsequent period (n.c. 393), he was engaged in hostilities with his former patron Amados; but the quarrel between them was terminated by the intervention of Thrasybulus; and Seuthes, at the suggestion of that general, concluded an alliance with Athens. (Ibid. iv. 8. § 26; Diod. xiv. 94.)

3. A king of Thrace, or more properly of the Odrysians, contemporary with Alexander the Great, to whom he was tributary. But in n.c. 325, Zo pyrion, who had been left by the Macedonian king as governor in Thrace, having fallen in an expedition against the Getae, Seuthes raised the standard of revolt (Curt. x. 1. § 45). He appears to have been for the time repressed by Antipater; but after the death of Alexander (n.c. 323), we find him again in arms, and opposing Lysimachus, the new governor of Thrace, with an army of 20,000 foot and 8000 horse. An obstinate struggle ensued, without any decisive result; and both parties withdrew, we are told, to prepare for a renewal of the contest. (Diod. xviii. 14.) No further account of this has been transmitted to us, but it is clear that Seuthes was ultimately compelled to acknowledge the authority of Lysimachus. In n.c. 313, however, he took advantage of the war between the Thracian king and Antigonus to declare in favour of the latter, and occupied the passes of Mount Haemos with an army, but was once more defeated by Lysimachus, and finally reduced to submission. (Id. xix. 73.) [E. H. B.] SEXTI'LIUS. 1. The wife of M. Aurelius Aemilius Scurrus, who killed herself, along with her husband, in A. D. 34. (Tac. Ann. vi. 29.) [Vol. I. p. 733, a.]

2. The mother-in-law of L. Antistius Vetus, along with whom she was put to death by Nero in A. D. 65 (Tac. Ann. xvi. 10, 11).

SEXTI'LIUS GENS, plebeian. This name is frequently confounded with that of Sestius. [Sestia Gens.] On coins we find only Sestius, never Sextius. The first member of the Sextia gens who obtained the consulsip was L. Sextius Sestianus Lateranus in B. C. 366, who was the first plebeian that obtained this honour, after one place in the consulsip was secured for the plebeian order, by the Licinian laws [Lateranus]. The only other person in the gens who was consul under the republic was C. Sextius Calvinus, in B. C. 124 [Calvins]; but the names of a few Sextii appear on the consular Fasti in the imperial period. Most of the Sextii are mentioned without any cognomen: those are given below. [Sestius.]

Sextia. 1. A Vestal; virgin, was condemned of incest, and buried alive in B. C. 273. (Liv. Epit. 14.)

2. The mother of the emperor Vitellius, was a virtuous Roman matron of the old school. She lived to see her son emperor, but died a few days before his fall. (Tac. Hist. ii. 64, 89, iii. 67; Suet. Vitell. 3.)

SEXTI'LLIA, called in public, was condemned, and was put to death by Nero in B. C. 54. (Liv. Annal. 29.)

SEXTI'LLIA, was given to have been a negotiator or money-lender in Armonia, a town in the Greater Phrygia.

9. C. Sextius, the son of the sister of M. Iunco, a man "et pudens et constantis et graviss." (Cic. pro Flor. 36.) He may perhaps be the same as the praetor Sextilius mentioned by Varro (L. R. i. 10).

10. P. Sextius, quaeator B. C. 61. (Cic. pro Flor. 13.)

11. Q. Sextius, a friend of Milo. (Cic. ad Q. Fr. ii. 1. § 3.)

12. Sextius ANDRO, of Pergamum. (Cic. pro Flor. 34.)

SEXTI'LLIUS HENA, of Corduba in Spain, a Roman poet of no great merit, wrote a poem on the death of Cicero, of which the first line is quoted by M. Seneca. (Stas. 6, pp. 45, 46, ed. Bip.)

SEXTI'LLIUS FELIX. [Felix.]

SEXTI'LLIUS Rufus. [Rufus.]

SEXTIUS. Some persons whose names occur under this form, in several editions of the ancient writers, are given under Sestius.

1. Sextius, tribune of the plebs B. C. 414, proposed that a colony should be sent to Bolae. (Liv. iv. 49.)

2. M. Sextius Sabinus, plebeian aedile B. C. 203, and praetor in the following year, B. C. 202, when he obtained Gaul as his province. (Liv. xxx. 26, 27.)

3. Sextius, quaestor of the consul L. Calpurnius Bestia, in Numidia, B. C. 111. (Sall. Jug. 29.)

4. P. Sextius, praetor designatus B. C. 100, was accused of bribery by T. Junius, and condemned. (Cic. Brut. 48.)

5. Sextius, the proximus lictor of C. Verres, in Sicily, and his favourite executioner. (Cic. Verr. iii. 67, iv. 43, 54.)

6. P. Sextius Baculus, a primipili centurio in Caesar's army in Gaul, distinguished himself on many occasions by his great bravery. (Caes. B. G. ii. 35, iii. 5, iv. 38, 39.)

7. T. Sextius, one of Caesar's legates in Gaul, took an active part in the campaign against Ver’ingetorix in B. C. 52, and was stationed for winter-quarters, with one legion, among the Bituriges (Caes. B. G. vi. 1, vii. 49, 50). On the death of Julius Caesar in B. C. 44, Sextius was in possession of the province of Numidia, or New Africa, while Q. Cornificius held that of Old Africa. The two governors became involved in war with one another, the causes and details of which are related differently by Appian and Dion Cassius. The latter writer represents Sextius as governing New Africa for Antony, and Cornificius Old Africa for Octavian; and Appian at one time speaks of Sextius as holding his province for one triumvir, and at another time for the other. But the real fact seems to have been that Sextius availed himself of the troubles in Italy to extend his own power in Africa, and, accordingly, in the name of the triumvirs, re-quires Cornificius, who was a partisan of the senate, to evacuate his province. Upon the refusal of the latter, Sextius marched against him. He was at first unsuccessful, but eventually defeated and slew Cornificius, and thus obtained possession of both provinces (Dion Cass. xlviii. 21; Appian, B. C. iii. 85, iv. 55—56; Liv. Epit. 123). In the new division of the Roman provinces after the battle of Philippi, B. C. 42, Octavian obtained New Africa; and Sextius was therefore ordered by L. Antonius to hand over this province to C. Pango, the legate of Octavian. He obeyed, but still remained in Old Africa, hoping that the present harmony between Octavian and Antony would not be of long continuance. He had not to wait long; for on the breaking out of the Peruvian war, soon afterwards, Fulvia and L. Antonius urged him to take possession of New Africa. He accordingly marched against Fango, whom he defeated and drove into the hills, where he put an end to his life [Fango]. Thus Sextius again obtained the command of both provinces, but he was unable to keep them long; since Lepidus, after the conclusion of the Peruvian war, received both Old and New Africa as his share of the Roman world, and landed in the country with an army of six legions. Sextius could not resist this force, and accordingly resigned the government to the triumvir. (Dion Cass. xlviii. 22—24; Appian, B. C. v. 12, 26, 75.)

8. Sextius Naso, b. c. 44. [Naso.]

9. Q. Sextius, one of the conspirators against Q. Cassius Longinus, quaeor of Further Spain, in b. c. 48. On the suppression of the conspiracy, he purchased his life from Longinus, by giving him a sum of money (Hirt, B. Alex. 55). He is called M. Silius by Valerius Maximus (ix. 4. § 2).

10. Q. Sextius, a contemporary of Julius Caesar, and a Stoic philosopher, whose praises are frequently celebrated by Seneca. The latter particularly admired one of his works (Senec. Ep. 64). For further information respecting him see Senec. Ep. 73, 98, de Ira. iii. 36, and Sextus, No. 11.

SEXTUS. PACONIA/NUS. [Paconianus.]

SEXTUS (Σεκτος), Greek writers. 1. Africanus or Libybus (Αθβος), a philosopher mentioned by Suidas and Eudocia (s. v.), who ascribes to him Ἑρμηνείας ἐν ἕβδομος, Ἑρμηνείας in Libris decem, καὶ Πολλάκις, Πυρρωνίας, thus evidently confounding him with Sextus Empiricus; or, which is more probable, speaking altogether of Empiricus, but under an unusual and probably inaccurate name. [Sextus Empiricus.]

3. Of Chaeroneia, a Stoic philosopher, nephew of Plutarch, and one of the instructors of the emperor Marcus Aurelius (Jul. Capitolin. Vita M. Anton. Philos.; Suid. s. v. Μαξαρός; comp. Antonin. De rebus suis, l. 9). According to Suidas it was during the reign, and indeed in the latter part of the reign of Marcus, and when Sextus was teaching at Rome, that the emperor attended his instructions. He is the perhaps "Sextus the Philosopher," mentioned by Synæclus as flourishing under the reign of Hadrian. Suidas (s. v. Σεκτος Χαέρος) confounds the nephew of Plutarch with a contemporary or nearly contemporary philosopher, Sextus Empiricus [Sextus Empiricus, No. 3]. And this is supported by the fact that several modern critics have also fallen, makes it difficult to determine to which of the two the particulars mentioned by him in the article are to be referred. When he states that Sextus was the disciple of Herodotus of Philadelphia, and was so high in the favour of the emperor Marcus Aurelius, that he was invited to share with him the judgment-seat, it is probable that our Sextus is spoken of. To him also we may suppose the account to refer, that an impostor, who resembled him in features, attempted to personate him, and thus to obtain possession of his honours and property. The impostor is said to have been discovered, through his ignorance of Greek learning, by the emperor Portinax. Suidas ascribes to our Sextus two works, Βίοθοεσις, Ἐθικας, and Ἐπιστοματικα, Ἐπιστοματικα, Ἐπιστοματικα, for which some propose to read Ἑρμηνείας, Ἑρμηνείας, or Ἑρμηνείας. Libris decem. Menace (vid. Kuster, Not. in Suid.) suspects that the mention of the second work has been inserted by some transciber, who confounded the two Sexti above mentioned; but the mistake (if such it be) is probably to be attributed to Suidas himself or the authority from whom he took it, for we find it also in the Ionia of the empress Eudocia. But it is not impossible that one, perhaps both of these titles, were intended to apply to certain Διαλέκτικα, Dissertationes, written in the Doric dialect, and which Fabricius describes as Dissertationes Anticotheca. They are five in number, and very short. The subjects are:—1. Περὶ γυνεων καὶ κακων, De Bono et Malo. 2. Περὶ κακων καὶ αληθων, De Honesto et Turpi. 3. Περὶ δικαιου καὶ δικων, De Jus et Injus. 4. Περὶ δικαιωσυνας καὶ φειδων, De Veritate et Falsitate.

5. Au Virtus et Sapientia doceri possint. These were published by Hes. Stephanus (Henri Etienne), among the Fragmenta Pythagorarum, without an author's name; and appeared, still anonymously, but with a Latin version and notes, by John North, in the Opuscula Mythologica, Physica, Ethica, of Gale, 8vo. Cambridge, 1670, and Amst. 1688. John North, in his first note, asserts that the author's name was Mimas, founding his assertion on a passage in the fourth Disseratio, of which the reading has since been corrected. They were again printed, with North's version, but without his notes, by Fabricius (Bibl. Graec. vol. xii. p. 617, ed. vet.). These dissertations, it has been conjectured, were written by Sextus of Choroneia: but whether the conjecture is well founded, and if so, whether they are the Βίοθοεσις, or the Ἑρμηνείας of Suidas, is altogether uncertain. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. v. p. 528, note b. ed. Harles; Idem, Notae in Testimonia proefusa Operibus Sex. Empirico.

5. Empiricus. [See below, Sextus Empiricus.]

8. Libybus. [No. 1; and Sextus Empiricus, below.]

9. Medicus. [See below, Sextus Empiricus.]

10. Platonicus. [Placitus.]

11. Pythagoraeus; otherwise Sextus, Sixtus, or Xystus. There is extant a little book of moral and religious aphorisms, translated by Rufinus into Latin, and probably interpolated by the translator, who is known to have been sufficiently unscrupulous in such matters, and who has admitted, in his preface to the work, that he had made certain additions from the advice of a religious father to his son, "electa quaedam religiosi parentis ad filium." The author is called by Rufinus in the preface, Sixtus; and Rufinus adds that he was identified by some persons with Sixtus, bishop of Rome and martyr; but it is to be observed that Rufinus does not express any opinion of his own as to their identity. Whether the name Severus is, who was bishop early in the second century, and whose martyrdom is doubtful, or Sixtus II., who lived about the middle of the third century, and was certainly a martyr, is not clear. Origen, however, twice (Contra Celsum, lib. viii. p. 30, and In Matt. tom. x. vol. i. p. 763, vol. iii. p. 654, ed. Delarue) cites the Gnomae s. Sententiae of Sextus (Ὑμιάς Σεξτού), as a work well known among Christians; but he does not mention either the episcopal rank or the martyrdom of the writer, whom, therefore, we can hardly identify with Sixtus I. And as Origen makes no reference to his being a contemporary writer, and speaks of his book as already in extensive circulation, it is difficult to suppose that he has been Sixtus II., whose elevation to the episcopate and martyrdom were a few years subsequent to Origen's own death. It is not clear whether the Latin of Rufinus is a Christian. Jerome cites the Sententiae of Xystus (as he writes the name, Adv. Jovinian. lib. i. c. 49, and In Exciel. c. xviii. vs. 5, 6, seq.), enumerating him in one place among writers, all the rest of whom are heathens, and in the other place he expressly calls him a Pythagorean. In two other places he charges Rufinus with prefixing the name of a martyr and bishop to the productions of "a Christ-less and heathenish" (abaque Christo et ethnicii, and in another place, a "most heathenish" (gentilissimi) man (Hieron. In Jerem. c. xxii. vs. 24, 25, &c., and Ad Ctesiphont, c. 3, Epist. 43, ed. Benedict, 133, ed. Vallarsi). Augustin, who had at first admitted the identity of the author of the Sententiae with one of the Sixti, bishops of Rome, afterwards retracted his opinion (comp. De Natura et Gratia, c. 77, and Retractat. lib. ii. c. 42). Pelagius (apud August. Retractat. l.c.) appears to have admitted the identity, and a Syrian version, prefixed from the Latin of Rufinus which appears to have been extant in the time of Ebed-Jesus, a. d. 1300 (Assemanii, Bibli. Oriental. vol. i. p. 429), still bears the name of "Mar Xystus Episcopus Romae." Maximus the Confessor, in the seventh century (Schol. ad Dionys. Arocp. Mysticum Theologian, cap. 5, apud opp. Dionys. vol. ii. p. 55, ed. Antwerp, 1634), applies to our Sextus the epithet ἐκκλησιαστικός φιλόσοφος, "Ecclesiastical Philosopher;" and Damascenus, in the eighth century (Succa Parallclla, Opera, vol. ii. p. 362, ed. Lequien), calls him Ζέγηρ Ποπος, Zestus of Rome. Gennadius (De Viris Illustr. c. 17) merely calls the work "Xysti Sententiae." In the Decretum ascribed to Pope Gelasius the work is mentioned as reputed to be by Saint Xystus, but is declared to be spurious, and to have been written by heretics. In the anonymous Appendix to the De Scriptorio. Ecclesiasticus of Iliofonos of Toledo, it is ascribed to Sixtus of Rome without hesitation. The testimony of the ancients as to the authorship is thus doubtful. An opinion mentioned by, and therefore older than, Rufinus (who was unjustly charged with fraud in the matter by his bitter enemy Jerome, and the charge has been repeated from age to age), ascribed it to Pope Sixtus, and the opinion was held by some persons, perhaps by most, in subsequent ages. Jerome appears to have first ascribed it to a heathen author; and Jerome's opinion, which would have had more weight but for his eagerness to fasten a charge of fraud upon Rufinus, was taken, perhaps without examination, by Augustin. Modern critics have been divided; some (e.g. Sibertius) retain the opinion which identifies the author with Pope Sixtus II.; others, e.g. Lequien, Not. ad Damascen. l.c. regard the author as at any rate a Christian: but Gale, Mosheim, Brucker (Hist. Philos. period. ii. pars i. lib. i. cap. ii. sect. ii. § 34), Fontanini (Hist. Litt. Aquileiensis, p. 302, &c.), to whom we have been much indebted, and Fabricius, identify the author with the elder Quintus Sextus (Quinti Sextii Patris), a Roman philosopher, mentioned with great encomiums by Seneca (Epistol. 64, c. 2). Seneca delighted much in a work of this Sextius, the title of which he does not give but which he praises as written with great power. "Quantus in illo, Dii boni, vigor est, quantum animi! Hoc non in omnibus philosophi invenies. Quorumdam scripta clarum habent tantum nomen, caetera exsangua sunt. Instituant, disputent, non tollantur, non faciant animum quia non habent. Quum a school of philosophy, viget, liber est, suprema hominum est; dimitte me plemonium ingentia fiduciae. In quacunque positione mentis sim, quam hunc lego, fatebor tibi, libet omnes casus provocare, libet exsangue, Quid cessas, Fortuna; congrede et paratum vides" (ibid.). It is observable that Seneca speaks of Sextus as a Stoic in reality but not in name. From other Epistles of Seneca (lx. 6, lxiii. 11, 13, xxvii. 13, 18, and 17, De Ira, ii. 36, iii. 36) we learn that Sextius, though born of an illustrious family, had declined the dignity of senator when offered him by Julius Caesar; that he abstained from animal food, though for different reasons than those ascribed to Pythagoras; that he subjected himself to a scrupulous self-examination at the close of each day; and that his philosophy, though expressed in the Greek language, was of Roman severity: —"Sextium ecce ... virum acerem, Graecias verbis, Romanis moribus, philosophis semper inchoatum." It appears that Sextius attempted, but in vain, to found a school of philosophy, combining some features of the Pythagoreans with others of the Stoics; and which was consequently classed sometimes with one, and sometimes with the other of those sects. Seneca (Natur. Quaest. vii. 32) says, "Sextiorum nova et Romani roboris secta, inter initia sua, quum magnum impetu coepisset, extincta est." "Xystus Pythagoricus philosophus" is recorded in Jerome's version of the chronicon of Eusebius as flourishing at the time of Christ's birth. He is also mentioned by Plutarch (De Profect. Virtut. Sentent. Opp. vol. vi. p. 238, ed. Reiske), and by the elder Pliny (H. Nat. xviii. 63, alibi). The contents of the Sententiae harmonize, on the whole, sufficiently well with this supposition of their authorship; the portions which seem to approximate most closely to the morality of the Christian religion, may perhaps have been interpolated or altered by Rufinus. The question of authorship, however, cannot be regarded as settled. There is difficulty in believing that a work once established in reputation as the work of a heathen writer, could have come to be so generally regarded as of Christian origin; though perhaps the difficulty would be somewhat diminished by the suggestion, that the work in its present form is not an original work of Sextius, but a selection of apophthegms culled from its writings, and that possibly by a Christian. The MSS. of the work vary much both in the number and order of the aphorisms.

The first edition of the Sententiae is that of Sym...
phorianus Championer, 4to. Lyon, 1507, under the title of Enchiridion Sistii Philosophi Pythagoricii. The volume contains various pieces, of which the first is the work of Championer, de Quadruplii Vita. This edition is incorrectly described by Fabricius as entitled Sistii Annulius. The title Annulius was given to the work by Rufinus, as equivalent to the Greek Enchiridion (Hand-book), because it should be always "in manibus," in (or on) the hands. The text of Championer is said by Fontinini to be from one of the best MSS. The Sententiae were again printed at Wittenberg, 4to. 1514, with the Avrea Carmina of Pythagoras; and again with various other pieces, by Beatus Rhenanus, 4to. Basel, 1516, under the title of Systii Pythagorici Sententiae. Various editions followed, but they omitted Rufinus's Prologus. The work was also comprehended in the various editions of De la Bigne's Bibliotheca Patrum, where it appears as the work of Pope Sixtus, down to the Lyon edition of 1677. It was included, still without the Pro- logue, in the Opuscula Mythologica, Ethica, et Physica of Gale, 12mo. Cambridge, 1670, 8vo. Amsterdam, 1689. The text of Rhenanus was reprinted, with Observations, designed to vindicate the title of Pope Sixtus II. to the authorship, by Urbanus Godofredus Silberus, 4to. Lipsiae, 1725. The original Greek of some of the Sententiae has been traced in Origen, Nilus, Maximus, in the Sentences of Demophilus and Democritus, and in Stobaeus. An edition of the Latin text with a French version was published, 12mo. Paris, 1843, by Le Comte C. P. de Lastarzie, with the view of showing that as pure and elevated morality was to be found elsewhere as in the Christian Scriptures: the editor seems to have forgotten that the unsettled authorship of the work, and the interpolations of Rufinus rendered the work unsuitable for his purpose. (Fabricius, Bibl. Graec. vol. i. p. 870, &c.; Fontinini, Brucker, &c.; Gale, Pragmat. ad Opuscula Mythologica, &c.)

SEXTUS EMPYRICUS, was a physician, and received his name Empyricus from belonging to the school of Empirici. He was a pupil of Herodotus of Tarsus (Diog. Laërt. i. 17) Timon, who was a physician, and apparently a contemporary of Galen. Sextus may, therefore, have lived in the first half of the third century of the Christian era. Nothing is known of his life. He belonged to the Sceptici.

Two works of Sextus are extant. The Προβοδοθεία Τυποτονωσις εν εκκετην ινυσματα, contains the doctrines of the Sceptici, in three books. The second work, entitled, Προς των μαθηματικων ωρητηριω, against the Mathematici, in eleven books, is an attack upon all positive philosophy. The first six books are a refutation of the six sciences of grammatic, rhetoric, geometry, arithmetical, astronomy, and music. The remaining five books are directed against logicians, physical philosophers, and ethical writers, and form, in fact, a distinct work, which may be viewed as belonging to the Σωτευς. The two works are a great repository of doubts; the language is as clear and peremptory as the subject will allow.

H. Stephens published the first Latin translation of the Hypotyposes, in 1502, 8vo. The first Latin translation of the work against the Mathematici is by G. Her bert, Antwerp and Paris, 1569, 1601, fol. The first edition of the Greek text of both works was that of Paris, 1621, fol.; but Geneva is often stated to be the place of publication: it is probable that some copies were printed with Paris on the title page, and others with Geneva. The second edition was that of J. A. Fabricius, Leipzig, 1718, fol. which contains the Latin version and some emendations; but the text has not yet been revised with sufficient care. The edition of J. G. Mund is a reprint of the text of Fabricius, with a commentary; but only one part has appeared, which contains the text of the Hypotyposes, Halle, 1798, 4to. Bühle translated the Hypotyposes, Lepine, 1801, 8vo. There is a French translation of the Hypotyposes, in 1725, 12mo., which was probably published at Amsterdam. The anonymous translator is said to be the Sieur Hurat, a teacher of mathematics; but the translation is not highly spoken of.

None of the medical works of Sextus are extant, though it appears from his own writings that he did write on medical subjects.

Sextus is the only Greek sceptic whose complete works we possess; and we may probably assume that he has collected all that could be said against the Dogmatik, and all that the Sceptici had to say for themselves. He does not present what he says as his own, but as the exposition of the sceptical school. Ritter (Gesch. der Philosophie, vol. iv. p. 299. &c.) has a long dissertation on Sextus, which as usual is not favourable. His philosophy of negations is certainly not satisfactory, nor is Ritter's judgment on Sextus. Much that he finds fault with, is precisely that which some thinkers will set a value on. The chief objection that Ritter makes against him is, that he does not keep his exposition of Scepticism free from such assertions as destroy Scepticism itself. He "denies that there is any general moral rule of life which can be prescribed (Adv. Math. xi. 203), because every man must order his life according to chance and circumstances, whereas, however, this general rule of life is excepted, that a man must direct himself according to circumstances." But it seems no contradiction to say that there is no general rule to guide us in all circumstances, and yet to say that we must do as well as we can without such a rule. Sextus maintains that scepticism alone can make a man happy, because it teaches that nothing is naturally good or bad (Adv. Math. xi. 208). The meaning of the proposition depends on the meaning that is to be given to Nature, that much abused word. Nature is nothing more than the constitution of all things by the will of God; and the notion of good and bad, which is a notion of limited practical application, is not applicable to the general constitution of all things. Such contradictions as these, however, though in truth they do not necessarily involve contradictions, Ritter observes, are only in part to be attributed to the unskilfulness of Sextus: the greater part are to be attributed to the direction that Greek scepticism in general took, or to its tendency particularly among the later Sceptici.

Ritter observes that the old sceptical objections were mainly designed to oppose the reasons founded on the intellect to the purely sensuous view of things. But the objections of the Sceptici, as they appear in Sextus, are solely directed against philosophical systems: the Sceptici are disposed to consider phaenomena as true for practical purposes, but to reject all scientific investigation of them as idle inquiries. Accordingly, they assume a kind of protical art, which is based on experience; and admit that a useful art of life may be derived from the observation of many particular cases. (Adv. Math. viii. 8.)

It was an exemplification of the nature of the sceptical doctrines, as exhibited by Sextus, that the objections to mathematical science are not directed against reckoning by number and against mensuration, but against the scientific form of mathematics, and mainly against its fundamental notions; against the admissibility of proof, and against axioms, against the notion of body, divisibility into equal parts, and the like. The object of the modern scepticism thus appears to be to stop all progress in science which has not utility for its object, and to treat it as a pestilent luxury; in which view there is both wisdom and folly; wisdom, inasmuch as some purpose of utility is the end of all science, and folly, inasmuch as utility is not always best attained by proceeding directly towards it. The Sceptici did not go so far as to deny that much useful knowledge was traditional, and might be communicated by speech and writing; for to him, experience is sufficient to give him all useful knowledge.

Ritter admits that the Sceptici have urged many things that are well worthy of consideration, both against the form and the matter of the sciences; and this is true. Their notion of the relation of cause and effect was connected with their notion of the being of God, whom they acknowledged to be the supreme activity (Pyrrh. Hyp. iii. 2, ἀφαντικὼτατον αἰτίαν). They showed clearly the contradictions which existed in all attempts to define the nature of God after the measure of human notions: that passions and motives are attributed to him, which passions and motives imply some change in the patient, and this is inconsistent with the nature of God. Even the attributing of particular virtuous qualities to God is an inconsistency, inasmuch as God, a perfect being, cannot be said to exercise virtues which in themselves imply the possibility of vice. The sum of their objections, properly viewed, is this, that God is incomprehensible.

It is difficult to form a just estimate of the value of what Sextus has collected. A good translation and a careful analysis of the work would be worth a man's labour. The sceptical arguments were directed against proof; but there is evidence which is not demonstration, and yet is sufficient, not only for practical purposes, but for a philosophical conviction. All conviction is not and cannot be founded on demonstration. The ultimate truths do not, in their nature, admit of demonstration, for there is nothing from which the demonstration can proceed. If a man, then, cannot have a conviction of these ultimate truths, he must reject them, or live in doubt. [G. L.]

SEXTUS RUFUS. Onuphrius Panvinius published at Frankfort in 1556, along with his work on the Roman Republic, a tract bearing the name of Sextus Rufus, and entitled De Regionibus Urbs Romae, which he professed to have found in an ancient MS. It corresponds closely with the catalogue of Publins Victor [Vecht.], but is less complete, and is much mutilated. The MS. of Panvinius has disappeared, and no codex containing either of these productions is known to exist of a date earlier than the fifteenth century. They are believed by the best topographers to have been compiled at a late period, are not regarded as documents of authority, and have even been stigmatized as modern forgeries.

BROOKE-RUTHERFORD, in his Roma Instaurata (Ven. 1492), quotes from an old description of Rome by Sestus Rufus Vir Consularis, a copy of which he had seen in the library attached to the monastery of Monte Casino. There can be little doubt that the piece thus described is the same with that printed by Panvinius; but there are no grounds whatever for establishing a connection between this personage, whoever he may have been, and Sextus Rufus the historian.

The De Regionibus will be found in Graevius, Thesaurus Antiquitatum Romanarum, vol. iii. p. 23, and was published separately with notes by Münich, 8vo. Hannover, 1815.

(See the remarks on the Regionarii appended to Mr. Bunbury's paper on the Topography of Rome, in the tenth number of the Classical Museum, p. 373.) [W. R.]

SEXTUS RUFUS. The name prefixed to an abridgment of Roman History, entitled Scuti Rufi Brevarium de Victoriis et Provinciis Populi Romani, executed by command of the emperor Valens, to whom it is dedicated. The prince had instructed the author to be brief (brevem fieri Clementia tua procepsit), and the injunction was most scrupulously obeyed, for the events of more than eleven hundred years, from the foundation of the city until the death of Jovianus, are compressed within the limits of twenty-eight short chapters, couched in plain and unpretending language. A more lofty exposition, however, of contemporary achievements is promised in the concluding sentence, "Quam magno deinceps ore tua, O princeps invictae, facta inclita sunt personanda? quibus me, ille imparem dicendi nifi, et aequo gravior, praeparabo;" but whether this project was ever carried into effect we have no means of discovering, since nothing is known with regard to the personal history of the writer.

The Brevarium was first printed by Sextus Rutilius near Rome, about 1470, and many editions appeared before the close of the fifteenth century. The text was established upon a satisfactory basis by Cuspinianus, who collated many MSS. and published it with annotations in his Commentaria de consulis Romanis, fol. Franc. 1601. Since that time it has generally been included in the larger editions of Eutropius, and of the minor Roman historians. A new recension, by Raffaello Meecone, from the Vatican and other MSS., was published at Rome, 8vo. 1819. [W. R.]

SIBURIUS, a physician of Burdigala (Bordeaux) in the fourth century after Christ, mentioned, along with Ausonius and Eutropius, by Marcellus Empiricus (De Medicam. praef. p. 242), as being one of his fellow-citizens and immediate predecessors. He wrote a pharmaceutical work, which is noticed by Marcellus, but is not now extant. Fabricius (Bibl. Gr. vol. xii. p. 425, ed. 1737) conjectures that in the passage referred to we should read Scribonius instead of Siburius; but this is certainly an oversight; as 1. Scribonius is mentioned (by the name Designationis) as a different person in a former clause of the same sentence; 2. he lived in the first century, not in the fourth; and 3. there is no reason for believing that he was a native of Bordeaux. [W. A. O.]

SIBYLLA (Σίβυλλα) is the name by which several prophetic women are designated who occur

in various countries and at different times in antiquity. The name is said to be formed from Διόδωρος and Βουκών, so that it would signify the counsel of Zeus (Plut. Phaedr. p. 244; Serv. ad Aen. iii. 445). The first Sibyl, from whom all the rest are said to have derived their name, is said to have been a daughter of Dardanus and Aeno. Some authors mention only four Sibyls, the Erythraean, the Samian, the Egyptian and the Sardian (Aelian, V. H. xii. 35); but it was more commonly believed that there were ten, namely the Babylonian, the Libyan, the Delphian (an elder Delphian, who was a daughter of Zeus and Lamia, and a younger one, Paus. x. 12, § 1), the Cimmerian, the Erythraean (here too we find an elder and a younger one, who is called Herophil, Strab. xiv. p. 645), the Samian, the Cumaean (who is sometimes identified with the Erythraean, Aristot. Mirab. 97), the Hellespontian or Trojan (comp. Tibull. ii. 5, 19), the Phrygian and the Tibrune (Paus. x. 12; Lactant. Instil. i. 6). The most celebrated of these Sibyls is the Cumaean, who is mentioned under the names of Herophil, Demo, Phthimone, Delphoe, Demonclus (Paus. l. c.; Serv. ad Aen. lii. 445, vi. 72; Tibull. ii. 5, 67; Suidas, s. v.). She was consulted by Aeneas before he descended into the lower world (Orv. Met. xiv. 104, &c., xv. 712; Virg. Aen. vi. 10). She is said to have come to Italy from the East (Liv. i. 7), and she is the one who, according to tradition, appeared before king Tarquinius, offering him the Sibylline books for sale (Plin. H. N. xiii. 28; Gell. i. 19). Pausanias also mentions a Hebrew Sibyl of the name of Sabbe, who is called a daughter of Beorson and Eryamanthe. [L. S.]

SIBYNTIUS (Σίβιντιος), a reader and a slave of the orator Theodeutus of Phaselis, who died before B.C. 533, was the first slave who professed the art of oratory. He wrote some works on rhetoric, which are mentioned by Suidas (s. v.). [Comp. Stoermer's Geschichte der Griech. Beredsamkeit, § 50, n. 6.]

SIBYRTIUS (Σίβρτιος), a Macedonian officer in the service of Alexander the Great, who was appointed by him, on his return from India (B.C. 326), governor of the province of Carmania. This post he shortly after exchanged for the more important satrapy of Arachosia and Gedrosia, to which he succeeded on the death of Thoas (Arrian, Anab. vi. 27; Curt. ix. 10, § 20). At the death of Alexander, Sibyrtius, in common with most of the other governors of the remote eastern provinces, retained possession of his satrapy, which was again confirmed to him in the second partition at Trigadiatadis, B.C. 321 (Diod. xvii. 3; Justin. xiii. 4; Arrian, ap. Phot. p. 71, b.; Dexippus, ibid. p. 64, b.). In the subsequent divisions which arose among the eastern satraps, Sibyrtius was one of those who supported Ptolemy against Python and Seleucus, and afterwards accompanied that leader when he joined Eumenes in Susiana, B.C. 317. His attachment was, however, to Ptolemy, and not to Eumenes, and in the intrigue of the former against his commander-in-chief, Sibyrtius supported him so strongly that he incurred the especial resentment of Eumenes, who threatened to bring him to trial; a fate from which he only escaped by a hasty flight. But this open rupture with Eumenes had the advantage of securing him the favour of Antigonus, who, after the defeat of his rival, confirmed Sibyrtius in his satrapy, and placed under his command a large part of the select body of troops termed Argyraspids; a measure adopted with the ostensible object of guarding these provinces against the neighbouring barbarians, but in reality with a view to the gradual destruction of the troops in question, whose turbulent and disaffected spirit was well known. (Diod. xiv. 23, 48; Polyena. iv. 6, § 18.) No further mention is found of Sibyrtius. [E. H. B.]

SICANUS (Σικανός), son of Exceceatus, was one of the three generals of the Syracusans (Herocrates being another), who were appointed at the time of the Athenian invasion, B.C. 415. In B.C. 413, after the repulse of the Athenians from Epipolea, he was sent with 13 ships to Agrigentum, to endeavour to obtain assistance; but, before he could reach the city, the party there, which was favourable to the Syracusans, was defeated and driven out. In the sea-fight of the same year, in which the Athenians were conquered and Eurymedon was slain, Sicanus, according to Diodorus, was the author of the plan for setting fire to the enemy's ships, which had been driven into the shallow water near the shore; and shortly after we find him commanding one wing of the Syracusan fleet in the last and decisive battle of the Athenians in the great harbour of Syracuse. (Thuc. vii. 73, viii. 46, 50, 53, 70; Diod. xiii. 13.)

SICCA, a friend of Cicero, who took refuge at his estate at Vibo, in the country of the Bruttii, when he left Rome in B.C. 58. Here he received intelligence of his banishment, and forthwith set out for Brundisium, where he expected to meet Sicca, but was disappointed, as Sicca had left Brundisium before he arrived there. (Cic. ad Att. iii. 2, 4, ad Fam. iv. 4, § 6.) Plutarch (Cic. 32) appears to refer to the same person, but calls him Οὐθίδης Σικανὸς ὁδήφ, "Vibus, a Sicilian," as if he had mistaken the name Sicca; but he relates that this Vibus refused Cicero hospitality at Vibo. Sicca is next mentioned at the breaking out of the civil war in B.C. 49, when L. Domitius sent him with a letter and orders to Pompey. In B.C. 44 Cicero again took refuge in Sicca's house at Vibo. (Cic. ad Att. viii. 12, c. xii. 23, xiv. 19, xvi. 6, 11.)

SICHAEUS. [SYCHAEUS.]

SICINIA GENS, patrician and plebeian. The only patrician member of the gens was T. Sicinius Sabinus, who was consul B.C. 437. [SABINUS, p. 691, a.] All the other Sicinius mentioned in history were plebeians; and although none of them obtained the consulship, they gained great celebrity by their advocacy of the rights of the plebeians in the struggles between the two orders. One or two of the plebeian Sicinius bore cognomens, which are given below. There are a few coins of this gens,

COIN OF THE SICINIA GENS.
of which a specimen is given on the preceding page. On the obverse is a female head, with "FORT. P. R." I. e. Fortuna Populi Romani, and on the reverse a caduceus and a palm branch, with "Q. SICINIIUS IIIVIR." This Q. Sicinius is not mentioned by any ancient writer. (Eckhel, vol. v. p. 313.)

SICINIUS. 1. L. SICINIUS BELVUTUS, the leader of the plebeians in their secession to the Sacred Mount in b. c. 494, which led to the institution of the office of tribune of the plebs. Sicinius was chosen one of the first tribunes, the original number of whom is variously stated in the ancient authorities (Livy. ii. 32, 33, iii. 54; Dionys. vi. 45, 70, &c., 89; Ascon. in Cornel. p. 76, ed. Orelli; Niebuhr, Hist. of Rome, vol. i. p. 617.) Dionysius further relates (vii. 14) that Sicinius was plebeian aedile in b. c. 492, when he joined the tribune Sp. Icilius in attacking the senate on account of the dearness of provisions, and that he was elected tribune a second time in b. c. 491, on account of his vehement hostility to the patricians. The proceedings of his second tribunate are related at length by Dionysius (vii. 33—39).

2. C. SICINIUS, tribune of the plebs, b. c. 470, when the tribunes are said to have been for the first time elected in the comitia tributa. He and his colleague B. Lentulus were accused before the people, on account of his opposing the agrarian law. In many editions of Livy he is called Siccius, and Alschefski, the last editor of Livy, reads Ca. Siccius. (Livy. i. 58, 61.)

3. L. SICINIUS DENTATUS, also named Siccius in the manuscripts and editions of several ancient authors, is called by A. Gellius and others the Roman Achilles. He is said to have fought in a hundred and twenty battles, to have slain eight of the enemy in single combat, to have received forty-five wounds on the front of his body, the scars of which remained, to have earned honorary rewards innumerable, and to have accompanied the triumphs of nine generals, whose victories were principally owing to his valour. He was tribune of the plebs in b. c. 454, in which year he brought to trial before the people T. Romilius, the consul of the preceding year, and procured his condemnation. After the defeat of the Samnites in the campaign against them in the second decade, b. c. 450, since the troops were discontented with the government, and therefore did not fight with their usual valour, Sicinius endeavoured to persuade them to secede to the Sacred Mount, as their forefathers had done. His death was accordingly resolved upon by the decemvirs, and Q. Fabius, who commanded the army, sent him along with a band of assassins to view the country. In a lonely spot they fell upon him and slew him, but not until he had destroyed most of the traitors. His comrades, who were told that he had fallen in an ambush of the enemy, discovered the foul treachery that had been practised upon him, by seeing him surrounded by Roman soldiers, who had evidently fallen by his hand. The decemvirs endeavoured to pacify the soldiers by burying Sicinius with great pomp, and they succeeded to some extent; but men did not forget or forgive the treacherous deed. (Dionys. x. 48—52, xl. 25—27; Liv. iii. 43; Gell. ii. 11; Plin. H. N. vii. 27; Val. Max. ii. 3 § 24; Niebuhr, Hist. of Rome, vol. ii. p. 346.)

4. C. SICINIUS, was elected tribune of the plebs after the secession of the plebeians to the Aventine, and the abolition of the decemvirate, in b. c. 449.

He is called by Livy a descendant of the Sicinius who was first created tribune on the Sacred Mount [No. 1]. (Livy. iii. 54.)

5. T. SICINIUS, tribune of the plebs b. c. 395, brought forward a bill for removing part of the Roman people to Veii, and thus making, as it were, two capitals of the republic. (Livy. v. 24.)

6. L. SICINIUS, tribune of the plebs b. c. 387, brought before the people an agrarian law respecting the ager Pompinitus. (Livy. vi. 6.)

7. CN. SICINIUS, was aedile in b. c. 185, and was an unsuccessful candidate for the praetorship in the following year, to supply the place of C. Decimius, who had died while in office. He was, however, successful in b. c. 183, in which year he was elected praetor, and obtained Sardinia as his province. (Livy. xxxix. 39, 45.)

8. CN. SICINIUS, one of the triumvirs for founding a colony at Luna in b. c. 177, is probably the same person either as No. 7 or No. 9. (Livy. xii. 13.)

9. CN. SICINIUS, praetor b. c. 173, was sent into Apulia, when praetor designatus, to destroy the locusts which had alarmed in Apulia in enormous crowds. On the division of the provinces among the praetors he obtained the juridictiaco inter peregrinos. On the breaking out of the war with Persia, at the beginning of the next year, his imperium was continued, and Macedonia was assigned to him as his province, where he was to remain till his successor arrived. (Livy. xlii. 9, 10, 27.)

10. C. SICINIUS, sent as ambassador, with two colleagues, to the Gauls, in b. c. 170. (Livy. xliii. 5.)

11. C. SICINIUS, the grandson of Q. Pompeius, censor b. c. 131, by his daughter, died before he had held any higher office in the state than the quasestorship, but obtained a place in Cicero's Brutus (c. 76), as one of the Roman orators.

12. CN. or L. SICINIUS, tribune of the plebs b. c. 76, was the first magistrate who ventured to attack the law of Sulla, which deprived the tribunes of their former power. He abused the leaders of the aristocracy very freely, and especially C. Curio. His only qualification as an orator, says Cicero, was being able to make people laugh. It has been thought that he, like Catiline, was killed at Salust, that he was murdered by the ruling party. (Cic. Brut. 60; Pseudo-Ascon. in Divin. p. 103, ed. Orelli; Quintil. xi. 3 § 129; Plut. Cress. 7; Sall. Hist. iii. 22; Drumann, Geschichte Romes, vol. iv. p. 385.)

13. SICINIUS, mentioned by Cicero in b. c. 51. (Cic. ad Att. v. 4 § 3.)

SICINUS or SICINUS (Σικινος, Σικνος), a Persian, according to Plutarch, was a slave of Themistocles and παδαγγελος to his children. In b. c. 480, he was employed by his master to convey to Χερσονες the intelligence of the intended flight of the Greeks from Salamis. Soon after, the Greeks, victorious at Salamis, pursued the Persian fleet as far as Andros, but then came to the resolution to continue the chase no further, lest they should inspire the enemy with the courage of despair. Hereupon Themistocles, according to Herodotus, again sent Sicinus, with others on whom he could depend, to Χερσονες, to claim merit with him for having dissuaded the Greeks from intercepting his flight. As a reward for his services, Themistocles afterwards enriched Sicinus, and obtained for him the citizenship of Ebusus.
Some have identified the subject of the present article with the Sicipus who is mentioned by Athenaeus as the reputed inventor of the dance named Σίκυος. Athenaeus tells us that, according to some, he was a barbarian, according to others, a Cretan (Herod. viii. 73, 110; Plut. Them. 12, 16; Ath. i. 20, e, xiv. 630, b; Casaub. ad Ath. l. e. [E. E.])

SICINUS (Σίκυος), a son of Thous and a Naïad, from which the small island of Sicipus, near Euboea, was believed to have derived its name. (Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. i. 624; comp. Strab. x. p. 494.)

SICULUS, CALPURNIUS. [CALPUR-

SICULUS, CLOELIUS, the name of a patrician family of high rank in the early history of the republic.

1. Q. Cloelius Sicipus, consul b.c. 498, with T. Larcius. According to Dionysius, Cloelius appointed his colleague Larcius dictator, and fought under him in the battle against the Latinis; but Livy and other authorities make Larcius dictator three years earlier, namely in b.c. 501. (Liv. ii. 21; Dionys. v. 59, 71, 72, 75, 76.)

2. T. Cloelius Sicipus, one of the first consular tribunes elected in b.c. 444. The manuscripts of Livy have Saxellus; but as Dionysius has Σίκυος Σίκυος Σίκυος, and the Saxelli were plebeians, Signonius changed Saxelius into Cloelius, which alteration Alsceis retains in the text. In b.c. 442 Cloelius was one of the triumvirs for founding a colony at Ardea. (Dionys. xii. 61, 62; Liv. iv. 7, 11.)

3. P. Cloelius Sicipus, one of the consular tribunes b.c. 378. (Liv. vi. 31.)

4. Q. Cloelius Sicipus, censor b.c. 378, with Sp. Servilius Priscus. (Liv. vi. 31.)

5. P. Cloelius Sicipus, was consecrated rex sacrificus in b.c. 180. (Liv. xi. 42.)

SICULUS FLACCUS. [FLACCUS.]

S'CYON (Σίκυος), a son of Marathon, Motion, Erechtheus or Pelops, was the husband of Zeuxippe and the father of Chthonophyle. The town of Sicyon, which before him was called Mecone or Aegialae, was said to have received its subsequent name from him. (Paus. ii. 1, § 1, vi. 2, § 3; Strab. viii. p. 392.) [L. S.]

SIDA (Σίδα). 1. The wife of Orion, who was sent by Hera into Hades, because she pretended to be more beautiful than the goddess. (Apoll. i. 4, § 3.)

2. A daughter of Danaus, from whom a town of Laconia was believed to have derived its name. (Paus. iii. 22, § 9.) [L. S.]

SIDETRO (Σίδητρο), the wife of Salomedes, and step-mother of Tyro, was killed by Pelias at the altar of Hera. (Apollod. i. 9, § 8; Soph. Fragm. 573; comp. Peltias.) [L. S.]

SIDONIUS (Σιδόνιος), a grammarian quoted in the Etymologicum Magnum (p. 124), and by the scholiasts on Homer and Pindar (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. vi. p. 379). There was an Athenian sophist of this name, a contemporary of Democrit. (Lucian, Demon. 14.)

SIDONIUS, C. SOLLUS APOLLINARIS, to whom some authorities give the additional appellation of Modestus, was born, in all probability, at Lyons, about the year A.D. 431. His father and grandfather both bore the name Apollinaris, and both filled the office of prætorian prefect in the Gaulish provinces. Gifted by nature with great quickness, Sidonius devoted himself with adoration to literary pursuits, and by assiduous application rapidly acquired such high fame, that while still very young he was ranked among the most learned and eloquent of his contemporaries. At an early age he married Papamilla, the child of Flavius Avitus, and upon the elevation of his father-in-law to the imperial dignity (A.D. 456), accompanied him to Rome, and celebrated his consulship in a poetical effusion still extant. The grateful prince raised the husband of his daughter to the rank of a senator, nominated him prefect of the city, and caused his statue to be placed among the effigies which graced the library of Trajan. The downfall of Avitus threw a cloud over the fortunes of the courtly bard, who having been shut up in Lyons, and having endured the hardships and perils of the siege, resolved, after the capture of the city by Egidius, to purchase pardon for the past and security for the future by a complimentary address to the victorious Majorian, whose exploits and virtues were extolled in strains still more hyperbolical than those inscribed to his predecessor. The propitiatory offering was graciously accepted; the author was not only forgiven, but was rewarded with a laureled bust, and with the title of count. After having passed some years in retirement during the reign of Severus, Sidonius was despatched to Rome (A.D. 467) in the character of ambassador from the Arverni to Anthemius, and on this occasion delivered a third panegyric in honour of a third prince, which proved not less successful than his former efforts, for he was now raised to the rank of a patrician, again appointed prefect of the city, and once more honoured with a statue. But a still more remarkable tribute was soon afterwards rendered to his talents; for although in no way connected with the clerical profession, the vacant see of Clermont in Auvergne was forced upon his reluctant acceptance (A.D. 472) at the death of the bishop Eparchius. The task at first undertaken unwillingly, was faithfully performed. During the remainder of his life he devoted himself conscientiously to the duties of his sacred office, and especially resided with energy the progress of Arianism, which was rapidly extending its influence. Although generally respected and beloved, his career was by no means tranquil; for when the Goths became masters of his diocese, he was compelled to withdraw for a season, and at a subsequent period, after his restoration, in consequence of the calumnious representations of two factious priests, he was for a time suspended from the exercise of his episcopal functions. The malice of his enemies, however, having been speedily exposed, he was triumphantly reinstated, and died not long afterwards on the 21st of August, A.D. 482, or, according to others, A.D. 484.

The works of Sidonius transmitted to modern times consist of Poems and Letters.

I. Carmina. Twenty-four pieces, composed in various measures upon various subjects. Of these the most important are:—1. Panegyricus Aviti Augusto Augusto socero dictus, extending to 602 hexameters, with a prologue (praefatio) in eighteen and an epilogue (editio) in eight elegiac couplets. Delivered A.D. 456. 2. Panegyricus Julio Valerio Maioriano Augusto dictus, extending to 603 hexameters, with a prologue in nine elegiac couplets. Delivered A.D. 458. 3. Panegyricus dictus Athensco is described by Tacitus as distinguished by her birth, her beauty, and her wantonness. She had formerly been an intimate friend of Agrippina, but afterwards quarrelled with her, because Agrippina had prevented Sextius Africanus from marrying her. Accordingly when Agrippina displeased her son Nero in A.D. 53, Silanion endeavoured to have her revenge by accusing Agrippina of having intended to marry Rubellius Plautus, and then to raise him to the throne in the place of Nero. But Agrippina had not yet lost all her influence over her son; and Silanion, in consequence of her accusation, was driven into exile. She returned to Italy, where she died, but not before receiving the penalty of her declining, and being driven to commit suicide. She was buried at Tarentum before the murder of the latter in A.D. 59. (Tac. Ann. xi. 12, xiii. 19, 22, xiv. 15). Tacitus does not mention the father of this Junia Silanion. She may, however, have been the daughter of M. Silanus, consul A.D. 19 (Silanus, Junius, No. 8), and the sister of Junia Claudia, who married the emperor Caligula.

SILANION (Σιλανίος), a distinguished Greek statuary in bronze, is mentioned by Pliny among the contemporaries of Lyssippus at Ol. 114, b. c. 324 (H. N. xxxiv. v. 8. s. 19). He probably belonged, however, not to the school of Lyssippus, but to the later Attic school; for we learn from Pausanias (vi. 4. § 3) that he was an Athenian. The passage of Pliny, as commonly understood, represents Silanion as a wonderful instance of a self-taught artist; but perhaps the words "in hoc mirabile, quod nullo doctore nobilitatis" may be referred to Lyssippus, rather than to Silanion. So, also, in the next clause, "ipsa discipulam habuit Zeuxiodam," there is a doubt left, whether Zeuxiades was the disciple of Silanion or of Lyssippus. It should here be observed that the word Zeuxiodam, which is the reading of all the best MSS., is corrupted, in the inferior MSS. and the common editions, into Zeuxin et Iadem. (See Sillig, Cat. Artif. s. v. and edition of Pliny: the reading Zeuxiodam, which some of the best MSS. give, is the same thing, for it is extremely common to find σ for the Greek ξ.)

The statues of Silanion belong to two classes, ideal and actual portraits; the former again including heroes and men. Of these the most celebrated was his dying Jocasta, in which a deadly paleness was given to the face by the mixture of silver with the bronze; a remarkable example of the technical refinement, and of the principle of actual imitation which characterised the art of this period. We cannot conceive of Phedias or Polykleitus descending to such an artifice (Plut. de Aud. Poet. 3, Quest. Conv. v. 1; comp. de Pyth. Or. 2; respecting the general subject of the colouring of bronze statues, see Müller, Archäol. d. Kunst, § 306. n. 3, ed. Weleker). He also made a fine statue of Achilles (Plin. l. c. § 21), and one of Theseus (Plut. Thec. 4). Tatian ascribes to him statues of the lyric poetesses Sappho and Corinna (Tatian, ad Graec. 52, pp. 113, 114, ed. Worth; where by Σαπφώ την ἐρασιν Tatian undoubtedly means the poetess and not, as some fancy, another person, a courtezan of Eresos, of whose existence there is no proof; see Sappho, p. 708, a.). His statue of Sappho stood in the prytaistum at Smyrna in the time of Verres, who carried it off; and Cicero alludes to it in terms of the highest praise (Verr. v. 57).

Silanion also made a statue of Plato, which SILANUS.
Mithridates, the son of Rhododatus, set up in the Academy. (Diog. Laërt. iii. 2.)
Among the actual portraits of Silanus, the most celebrated appears to have been that of the statuary Apollodoros, who was so habitually dissatisfied with his own works, that he frequently broke them in pieces. The vexation of the disappointed artist was so vividly expressed in Silanion's statue, that Pliny says "nec hominem ex aere fecit, sed iracundium" (i. c. § 21). Pliny also mentions his statue of a superintendent of the palaestra exercising the athletes. He made also three statues of Olympic victors; namely Satyros of Elis, and Telestes and Demaratus of Messene. (Paus. vi. 4 § 3, 14 §§ 1, 3.)

Probably this Silanion was the same as the one whom Vitruvius (vii. prae. § 14) mentions among those who wrote pracepta symmetriae; for, although that phrase no doubt refers especially to the proportions of the architectural orders, yet it must also be understood as including the wider subject of proportion in art generally, as is evident both from the mention of Euphranor in the list, and also from the manner in which Vitruvius discusses the subject of architectural proportions in connection with the laws of proportion derived from the human figure (i. 2. iii. 1). [P. S.]

SILA'NUS (Σίλανος), an Ambracian soothsayer, who accompanied Cyrus the Younger in his expedition against his brother Artaxerxes, in B.C. 401. For a successful prediction Cyrus rewarded him with 3000 drachas, or 10 talents. This money Silanus carefully preserved throughout the campaign and subsequent retreat, and was very anxious to return with it to his country. Accordingly, when Xenophon consulted the children of Cyrus, on the plan which he had formed of founding a Greek colony on the coast of the Euxine, he revealed the project to the Cyrenians, and did all in his power to thwart it. On this Xenophon publicly professed to have abandoned the design, and proposed that no one should be permitted to remain behind the rest of the army, or to sail away before it. The latter part of this proposition was most disagreeable to Silanus, who loudly remonstrated against it, but to no purpose, the soldiers threatening to punish him, should they catch him in any attempt to depart by himself. Not long after, however, he contrived to make his escape in a ship which he hired at Heraclea. (Xen. Anab. i. 7 § 18, v. 6 §§ 16, 18, 29, 34, vi. 4 § 13.) [E. E.]

SILA'NUS, the name of several Roman families, appears to be merely a lengthened form of Silas, which occurs as a cognomen in the Sertorius and Terentia gentes [SILIT.], and is not connected with the Greek name Silanus. Instead of the Roman name Silanus we frequently find in manuscripts Syllanus and Silanus.

SILA'NUS, APPIIUS. [SILANUS, JUNIUS, No. 11.]

SILA'NUS, CA'SSIIUS, the avunculus of Germanicus Caesar (Plin. H. N. xxxiv. 7. s. 18).

SILA'NUS, CRE'TICUS, as he is called by Tacitus, is mentioned as governor of Syria in A. D. 16, but was removed from the government by Tiberius in the following year on account of the connection of his family with Germanicuses, inasmuch as a daughter of Silanus had been betrothed to Nero, the eldest of the children of Germanicus (Tac. Ann. ii. 4, 43). From his name Creticus Silanus it has been conjectured that he originally belonged to the Junia gens, but was adopted into the Caelia gens. It has been further supposed that he is the same person in the consul of A. D. 9 (Dion Cass. iv. 30). [METELLUS, No. 29.]

In that case his full name would have been Q. Caelius Metellus Creticus Silanus.

SILA'NUS, JU'NIIUS. 1. M. JUNIUS SILA'NUS, took the command of Neapolis, at the wish of the inhabitants, in the second Punic war, B. C. 216, in order to defend it against Hannibal. In B.C. 212 he was praetor, and obtained Etruria as his province, where he was chiefly employed in purchasing corn. In B.C. 210 he accompanied P. Scipio to Spain, and served under him with great distinction during the whole of the war in that country. His most brilliant exploit was the defeat of Hanno and Mago in Celibia in B.C. 207. When Scipio quitted Spain in the following year, he left Silanus in command of the army till the arrival of his successor. In B.C. 196 Silanus fell in battle against the Boii, where he fought under the consul M. Marcellus. (Liv. xxii. 15, xxv. 2, 3, xxvi. 1, 19, xxviii. 1, 2.; Polyb. x. 6, xi. 20, 23, 26, 33.; Appian, Hisp. 28, 32.)

2. D. JUNIUS SILANUS, was commissioned by the senate about B.C. 146, in consequence of his knowledge of the Punic language, to translate into Latin the twenty-eight books of Mago on Agriculture. (Plin. H. N. xviii. 3. s. 5.)

3. D. JUNIUS SILANUS MANLIANUS, a son of the jurist T. Manlius Torquatus, consul B.C. 163, but adopted by a D. Junius Silanus. He was praetor B.C. 142, and obtained Macedonia as his province, where he was guilty of so many acts of robbery and oppression, that the inhabitants accused him before the senate on his return to Rome in B.C. 140. The senate referred the investigation of the charges to his own father Torquatus at the request of the latter. Torquatus condemned his son, and banished him from his presence; and when Silanus hung himself in grief, his father would not attend his funeral. (Cic. de Fin. i. 7.; Liv. Epit. 54.; Val. Max. v. 8 § 3.)

4. M. JUNIUS SILANUS, consul B.C. 109, with M. Cæcilius Metellus, fought in this year against the Cimbri in Transalpine Gaul, and was defeated. He was accused in B.C. 104, by the tribune Cn. Domitius Ahenobarbus, out of revenge, because he had injured an hereditary friend of Ahenobarbus. The latter charged him with having fought without any commission from the people (injussu populi), and with having thus been the principal cause of the calamities which the Romans had experienced in this war; but he was acquitted almost unanimously, as only two tribes out of the thirty-five voted for his condemnation. Cicero (Brut. 35) praises his oratorical powers. (Liv. Ep. 65.; Sall. Jug. 43.; B. J. iv. 11. s. 27.; Flor. iii. § 34.; Cic. Div. in Cæcil. 20., Verr. ii. 47.; Ascon. in Corn. pp. 63, 80, ed. Orelli.)

5. D. JUNIUS SILANUS, probably a younger son of No. 4, was the step-father of M. Brutus, the murderer of Caesar, having married his mother Servilius. He was acedile about B.C. 70, when he exhibited very magnificent games, and notwithstanding was unsuccessful in his application for the consulate in the year B.C. 64. He was elected consul in the comitia held in the summer of B.C. 63, and in consequence of his being consul designateus was first asked for his opinion by Cicero in the debate in the senate on the punishment of the Catilinarian conspirators. He declared himself in favour of inflicting the extreme punishment upon the conspirators; but after the speech of Caesar, he said that he should vote in favour of the proposition of Tib. Nero, who had recommended that they should be kept in prison till Catiline was conquered, affirming that he had not recommended that they should be put to death, but that they should be imprisoned, as this was the extreme of punishment to a Roman senator. (Cic. de Off. ii. 16, ad Att. i. 1; Sall. Cat. 50; Cic. in Cat. iv. 4, ad Att. xii. 21. § 7; Appian, B. C. ii. 5; Suet. Cæs. 14; Plut. Cic. 20, 21, Cat. 22). Silanus was consul b. c. 63, with L. Licinius Murena, along with whom he proposed the Lex Licinia Junia, which enacted that a rogatio must be promulgated three nundines before the people voted upon it. It confirmed the Lex Cecilia Didia (Cic. pro Sent. 64, in Valin. 14, Phil. v. 3, ad Att. ii. 9, iv. 16). Pliny (H. N. ii. 35) speaks of Silanus as proconsul. As an ontor Silanus owed more to nature than to study. (Cic. Brut. 68.)

6. M. Junius Silanus, son of No. 5 and of Servilia, served in Gaul as Caesar's legatus in b. c. 53, but does not appear to have been employed in any undertaking of importance. After Caesar's murder in b. c. 44, he accompanied his brother-in-law M. Lepidus over the Alps; and in the following year Lepidus sent him with a detachment of troops into Cisalpine Gaul, as the senate had urgently pressed Lepidus to assist the consuls Hirtius and Pansa, who were advancing against Antony to compel him to raise the siege of Mutina. Lepidus, however, gave Silanus no precise instructions as to his line of conduct; and the latter guessing the real wishes of his general, espoused the side of Antony. After the defeat of Antony Silanus recrossed the Alps and returned to Lepidus, who affected to be displeased with his conduct, and would not at first allow him to come into his presence. Silanus afterwards became obnoxious to the triumvirs, though the reason is not mentioned, and fled to Sex. Pompey in Sicily. At the peace of Misenum, in b. c. 39, he returned to Rome, and eventually won the favour of Octavian so completely that he raised him to the consulsipship in b. c. 25. (Caes. B. G. vi. 1; Dion Cass. xlii. 38, 51; Cic. ad Fam. x. 30, 34; Vell. Pat. ii. 77; Dion Cass. lii. 25.) Silanus had two sisters, one married to M. Lepidus, the triumvir, and the other to C. Cassius, one of Caesar's murderers. ([Junia, Nos. 2 and 3].)

7. C. Junius C. F. Silanus, consul b. c. 19 with C. Furnius, may perhaps have been a consul of No. 6. (Dion Cass. liv. 18.)

8. M. Junius M. F. Silanus, son of No. 6, consul under Tiberius, a. d. 19, with L. Norbanus Balbus.
Such consuls gave their name to the Lex Junia Barbana, which enacted that slaves manumitted without the requisite formalities should, in certain cases, have the status of Latini: such persons were called Latinii Juniani (see Dict. of Antiq. p. 693, a, 2d ed.). Tacitus speaks of Silanus as pre-eminently distinguished by his high nobility and eloquence. In A.D. 20 he obtained from Tiberius the real of his brother [No. 9] from exile. Like the other senators he endeavoured to gain the favour of the emperor by flattery. He proposed in A.D. 22 that all public and private documents should not bear in future the names of the consuls, but the names of those who possessed the tribunician power, that is, of the emperors. In A.D. 33 his daughter Claudia, or Junia Claudilla, as she is called by Suetonius (Col. 12), was married to C. Caesar, afterwards the emperor Caligula. Silanus was governor of Africa in the reign of Caligula; but the suspicious tyrant feared his father-in-law, and accordingly first deprived him of all power in the province by compelling him to share the government with an imperial legatus, and afterwards compelled him to put an end to his life. Julius Graecinus, the father of Agrigens, had been ordered by Caligula to accuse Silanus, but he declined the odious task. (Tac. Ann. ii. 59, iii. 24, 57, vi. 20, Hist. iv. 48, Agr. 4; Dion Cass. lii. 18, i. 8; Suev. Coll. 12, 23.)

9. D. Junius Silanus, a brother of No. 8, was one of the paramours of Julia, the granddaughter of Augustus, and voluntarily withdrew into exile when the adulteries of Julia were discovered. Tiberius allowed him to return to Rome in A.D. 20 on the intercession of his brother Marcus, but did not advance him to any of the honours of the state. (Tac. Ann. iii. 24.)

10. C. Junius Silanus, described as Flamen Martialis in the Capitoline Fasti, was consul in A.D. 10, with P. Cornelius Dolabella. Judging from his praenomen we may suppose him to have been a son of No. 7; but this is opposed to the Capitoline Fasti, in which he is described as C. P. M. N. Silanus was afterwards procensor of Asia, and in A.D. 22 was accused of malversation by the provincials. To this crime his accusers in the senate added that of treason (majestas), and it was proposed to banish him to the island of Gyaro; but Tiberius changed the place of his exile to the less inhospitable island of Cypinus, which his sister Torquata had begged might be the place of his punishment. (Tac. Ann. iii. 66—69, iv. 15.)

11. App. Junius Silanus, was consul in A.D. 28 with P. Silius Nerva. He was accused of majestas in A.D. 32, but was saved by Celsus, one of the informers. Claudius soon after his accession re-called Silanus from Spain, of which he was at that time governor, gave him in marriage Domitia Lepida, the mother of his wife Messalina, and treated him otherwise with the greatest distinction. But shortly afterwards, having refused the embrases of Messalina, he was put to death by Claudius on the accusations of Messalina and Narcissus, both of whom said that they had in their dreams seen Silanus attempting to murder the emperor. (Tac. Ann. iv. 68, vi. 9, xi. 29; Suev. Claud. 29, 37; Dion Cass. ix. 14, who calls him Coius Appius Silanus.) One of the sons of Appius is called by Tacitus (xiii. 1) the abnepos or great-grandson of Augustus. It would therefore appear that App. Silanus married Aemilia Lepida, the pronepis or great-granddaughter of Augustus. The genealogy would therefore stand thus: —

1. Augustus.
2. Julia, filia, m. M. Agrippa.

Aemilia Lepida, the wife of App. Silanus, was at an early age betrothed to the emperor Claudius long before his accession to the throne, but was divorced soon afterwards [Lepida, No. 3, where her subsequent marriage to App. Silanus ought to have been stated]. By his second wife Domitia Lepida, the mother of Messalina, App. Silanus of course had no children. Suetonius (Claud. 29) calls App. Silanus the consulor of Claudius, because his son L. Silanus was betrothed to Octavia, the daughter of Claudius.

12. M. Junius Silanus, a son of No. 11, was consul under Claudius A.D. 46 with Valerius Antias. He was born in the same year in which Augustus died, A.D. 14, and it is mentioned by Pliny as a singular fact that Augustus lived to see his great-great-grandson. Silanus was proconsul of Asia at the accession of Nero in A.D. 54, and was poisoned by command of Agrippina, who feared that he might avenge the death of his brother [No. 13], and that his descent from Augustus might lead him to be preferred to the youthful Nero (Dion Cass. lx. 27; Plin. H.N. vii. 11; Tac. Ann. xiii. 4). Tacitus relates (l.c.) that Silanus was so far from being ambitious, that Caligula used to call him his "pocus aerae," but Dion Cassius (lx. 8) with more probability refers this epiteth to the father-in-law of Caligula [No. 8].

13. L. Junius Silanus, likewise a son of No. 11, was betrothed to Octavia, the daughter of the emperor Claudius, in A.D. 41. The emperor conferred upon him the triumphal ornaments when he was still a boy, and exhibited in his name magnificent gladiatorial games. But as Agrippina had resolved to marry Octavia to her own son Domitius, afterwards the emperor Nero, it was necessary to put Silanus out of the way. It was easy to persuade the foolish emperor of any thing, and he therefore readily believed the charges brought against Silanus. Accordingly in A.D. 48 Silanus, who was then praetor, though he had not yet attained the legal age for the office, was expelled from the senate by Vitellius, as censor, on the ground of incest with his sister Julia Calvina [Calvina]; and he was further compelled by Claudius to resign the office of praetor. At the same time the marriage between him and Octavia was dissolved. At the beginning of the following year Octavia was married to Nero; and Silanus, who knew that he would not be allowed to live much longer, put an end to his life on the day of their marriage. (Tac. Ann. xii. 3, 4, 8; Suev. Claud. 24, 29; Dion Cass. ix. 5, 31.)

14. D. Junius Torquatus Silanus, probably also a son of No. 11, was consul under Claudius A.D. 53 with Q. Haterius Antoninus. He was compelled by Nero in A.D. 64 to put an end to his life, because he had boasted of being descended from Augustus. Tacitus says that he had boasted of Augustus being his avus; but if he was really the abnegos of Augustus, the latter was his abnegus, and not his atrexus. (Tac. Ann. xii. 58, xv. 35; Dion Cass. xii. 27.)

15. L. JUNIUS TORQUATUS SILANUS, the son of No. 12, and consequently the atrexus, or great-great-grandson of Augustus. In consequence of the early death of his father, he was brought up in the house of the jurist Cassius, who had married his aunt Lepida; but his descent from Augustus, as well as his virtues, rendered him an object of suspicion to Nero. He was accordingly accused in A.D. 65, along with Cassius and his aunt Lepida. The crimes laid to the charge of Silanus were that he was aspiring to the empire, and that he had committed incest with his aunt Lepida. Silanus was sentenced to banishment, and was removed to Ostia, as if for the purpose of being carried over to Naxus; but from Ostia he was conveyed to Barium, a municipium of Apulia, and was there shortly afterwards put to death. The name of the month of Junius was now changed into that of Germanicus, because the two Torquati had by their crimes rendered this name infamous. (Tac. Ann. xv. 92, xvi. 7—9, 12.) This L. Silanus is probably the same as the L. Silanus whose statue was erected in the forum in the time of the younger Pliny (Ep. i. 17). This Silanus appears to have been the last descendant of Julia, the granddaughter of Augustus.

16. C. JUNIUS SILANUS, consul suffectus under Domitian in A.D. 92 (Fasti).

17. JUNIUS SILANUS, consul under Commodus in A.D. 189 with Q. Servilius Silanus (Fasti).

18. JUNIUS SILANUS, consul suffectus under Maximinus in A.D. 237 (Fasti).

There are several coins of the Junia Gens with the name of Silanus upon them. We annex two specimens. On the obverse of the first is the head of Salus, and on the obverse of the second the head of a barbarian with a torquis round the coin. The torquis was inserted in order to mark the connection of the Silani with the Manlii Torquati. We have already seen that the son of the jurist T. Manlius Torquatus was adopted by a D. Junius Silanus. [See above, No. 3.] In consequence of this connection between the Silani and Torquati, we find the name of Torquatus assumed by several of the Silani. [See above, Nos. 14, 15.] Who the D. Silanus is, referred to on these coins, cannot be determined; the two coins probably refer to two different persons of the name.

SILA'NUS, LICI'NIUS, consul n. c. 20, is a false reading in Dion Cassius (lv. 30) for Silanus. The full name of this consul was A. Licinius Nerva Silanus [Ner'va, Licinius, No. 7].

SILA'NUS, SERVILI'TUS, the name of two consuls under Commodus, namely, M. Servilius Silanus in A.D. 186, and Q. Servilius Silanus in A.D. 189 (Fasti).

SILA'NUS, T. TURPI'LIUS, was appointed by Metellus in n. c. 108 commander of the town of Vaga or Vacca, in Numidia; but the inhabitants, urged on by Jugurtha, treacherously massacred all the Roman garrison, with the exception of Turpilius Silanus, who escaped to the main body of the Roman army. The conduct and escape of Turpilius were suspicious; he was brought to trial before Metellus, and condemned; and, as he was a Latin and not a Roman citizen, was scourged and put to death. Plutarch relates that the innocence of Turpilius was afterwards established; and that Marcus, who was present at the trial as an assessor, had strongly urged Metellus to put him to death, in order thus to bring upon his commander the odium of having condemned an innocent man (Sall. Aug. 66—69; Plut. Mar. 8).

SILENTIARIUS, PAULIUS [Paulus, literary.]

SILE'NUS or SEILE'NUS (Σηλήνος). It is remarked in the article Satyrs, that the older Satyrs were generally termed Sileni (comp. Schol. ad Nicand. Alex. 31), but one of these Sileni is commonly the Silenus, who always acts a prominent part in the retinue of Dionysus, from whom he is inseparable, and whom he is said to have brought up and instructed. (Diod. iv. 14; Orph. Hymn. 53. 1.) Like the other Satyrs he is called a son of Hermes (Serv. ad Virg. Eclog. vi. 13), but others call him a son of Pan by a nymph, or of Gaea (Nonn. Dionys. xiv. 97, xxix. 262; Aelian, V. H. iii. 18; comp. Porphyry. Vit. Pythag. 16; Clemens, Cohort. ad Gent. p. 24.) Being the constant companion of Dionysus, he is, like the god, said to have been born at Nysa (Catull. 64, 258), and Dio- rius (iii. 72) even represents him as king of Nysa; he moreover took part in the contest with the Giants, and slew Enceladus, putting an end to his life. (Ep. i. 13.) He is described as a jovial old man, with a bald head, a puck nose, fat and round like his wine bag, which he always carried with him, and generally as intoxicated. As therefore he cannot trust to his own legs, he is generally riding on an ass (Ov. Fast. i. 399, iii. 749), or he is supported by other Satyrs and Satyriancsi. (Virg. Eclog. vi. 13; Lucian, Deor. Conc. 4.) In every other respect he is described as resembling his brethren in the fondness for sleep, wine and music. He is mentioned along with Marsyas and Olympus as the inventor of the flute which he is often seen playing (Strab. x. p. 470), and a special kind of dance was called after him Silenus, while he himself is designated as the dancer. (Anacre. 38. 11; Paus. iii. 25. § 2; Lucian, Icarom. 27.) But it is a peculiar feature in his character that he was conceived also as an inspired prophet, who knew all the past and the most distant future (Aelian, V. H. iii. 18; Virg. Eclog. vi. 31, &c.), and as a sage who despised all the gifts of fortune (Cic. Tuscul. i. 48; so that he becomes the representative of that wisdom which conceals itself behind a rough and uncouth external appearance, whence

although a person of this name is mentioned as early as b.c. 409. The first member of the gens who obtained the consulship was P. Silius Nerva, in b.c. 20. The different cognomina of the Sili are given below in alphabetical order. Nerva is the only cognomen that occurs on coins of the gens.

SylIUO, UmbOINUS, governor of Baetica under Claudius, was recalled from his province, and expelled from the senate because he had offended some of the emperor's freedmen, though accused, for the sake of form, of another crime (Dion Cass. ix. 24).

SILIIUS. 1. Q. Silius, one of the quaestors elected for the first time from the plebs in b.c. 409 (Liv. iv. 54).

2. T. Silius, served under Caesar in Gaul, and was sent by him against the Veneti in b.c. 56 (Caes. B. G. iii. 7).

3. A. Silius, a friend of Cicero, is frequently mentioned by him in his correspondence with Atticus in b.c. 45. (Cic. ad Att. x. 13, xii. 18, 22, 24, 25, xiii. 50.)

4. P. Silius, governed Bithynia and Pontus as propraetor in b.c. 51, at the same time as Cicero governed Cilicia as proconsul, Bibulus Syria, and Thermus Asia. Silius was a friend of Atticus (Cic. ad Att. vii. 1 § 14, vii. 1 § 8). Several of Cicero's letters are addressed to this Silius. He consulted Cicero on a legal point in b.c. 44, the explanation of which has exercised the ingenuity of modern jurists. (Cic. ad Fam. vii. 21, ad Att. xv. 23, 24; P. E. Huschke, De Caesu Silianu, Rostochii, 1824, and also in his Studien, Breslau, 1830, vol. i.) This Silius was probably the father of P. Silius Nerva, consul in b.c. 20. [Silius Nerva.]

5. C. Silius P. P. N., was consul a.d. 13, with L. Munatius Plancus (Dion Cass. lvi. 28; Suet. Aug. 101; Frontin, de Aqaud. 102; Fasti Capitol.). He was appointed at the end of his year of office legatus of Upper Germany, where he was at the death of Augustus, in the month of August in the following year. He served under Germanicus in his campaigns in Germany, and on an account of his successes obtained the triumphal ornaments in a.d. 15. Germanicus sent him against the Chatti in the following year, but the result of that expedition is not mentioned by Tacitus. In a.d. 21 he defeated Julius Saccorv, who, in conjunction with Julius Florus, had excited an insurrection in Gaul, and had collected a formidable army among the Aedui and the surrounding people [SACCOVIR]. But his friendship with Germanicus caused his ruin. He had also excited the suspicions of the jealous emperor by the successes he had obtained, by the long continuance of his command, and by the boastful manner in which he had spoken of his services. He was accordingly accused of repetendae and majestas in a.d. 24, and anticipated his condemnation by a voluntary abdication. His wife Sosia Galia was involved in the accusations brought against him, and was sentenced to banishment. [Galla, Sosia.] (Tac, Ann. i. 31, ii. 6, 7, 25, iii. 42—45, iv. 18, 19; Dion Cass. lx. 31.)

6. C. Silius, son of No. 5, the most beautiful of the Roman youths, was passionately loved by Messalina, the wife of the emperor Claudius. She made no secret of her affection for him, and visited his house openly, with a large retinue. She com—

he is likened to Socrates. (Plat. Sympos. 32; Xenoph. Sympos. 5. § 7.) When he was drunk and asleep, he was in the power of mortals who might compel him to prophesy and sing by surrounding him with chains of flowers. (Aelian, V. H. iii. 18; Philos. Imag. i. 22, Vit. Apoll. vi. 27; Ov. Met. xi. 91.) Silenus had a temple at Elis, where Methhe (Drunkenness) stood by his side handing him a cup of wine. (Hirt, Mythol. Bilderk. p. 164, &c.; C. O. Müller, Ancient Art and its Remains, § 296.; [L. S.])

SILE/NUS (ΣΙΛΕ'ΝΟΣ or ΣΙΛΕ'ΝΟΣ), literary. 1. A native of Calatia (Σιλε'νος ορ Καλατιανος), an historical writer. Athenaeus (xii. p. 542, a), quotes from the third book of a work by him, entitled Σιλε'νακα. The same work is probably referred to by Diogenes Laërtius (ii. 3, 11). He also wrote upon Roman history, and is mentioned by Dionysius of Halicarnassus (Ant. Rom. i. 6), who charges him with a want of care and accuracy, and by Livy (xxxvi. 49) when speaking of the operations of Scipio Africanus the elder, in Spain.

This Silenus is, doubtless, identical with Σιλε'ναος ορ συγγραφευς, mentioned by Strabo (iii. p. 172), who remarks that he, as well as Artemidorus, was ignorant of the reason why the fountain in the temple of Hercules at Gades rose when the tide fell, and fell when the tide rose. It is probably this writer who is also quoted by Stephanus (s. v. Παλιτος), and by Pliny (H. N. iv. 22). Photius also (s. v. Σαρδαύνος γέγεντος), mentions what Silenus says έν τω' τοις περ Συρακοσια. Cicero (de Div. i. 24) quotes from Sile/num (of whom he remarks: is autem dileptissime res Hannibali persecutus est) an account of a dream that Hannibal had after the capture of Saguntum. (Comp. Corn. Nep. Hannib. extr.)

2. It was probably a different writer from the last who is quoted several times by Athenaeus and others as the author of a work on foreign words (γλώσσα). Athenaeus mentions him frequently along with Cleitarchus. (Athen. xi. pp. 486, a, 473, d, 478, e 482, f. xiv. p. 644, &c.; comp. Schol. ad Apoll. Rhod. i. 1299; Eustath. ad Od. vii. 102, 1571.) Silenus also compiled a collection of fabulous histories. (Textes et Livres, 786; Schol. Hom. Od. i. 75, where he is called a Chian, as he is also by Eustathius, ad Od. x. 407, p. 1871, and Eudoci, pp. 43, 312, 394; Vossius, de Hist. Graec. p. 996, ed. Westermann.) [C. P. M.]

SILE'NUS, an architect who wrote a work on the Doric order, de Symmetris Doricorum. He was apparently of an early age and a little later than the scene painter Agatharchus, who was contemporary with Aeschylus. (Vitruv. vii. p. 336. § 12.) [P. S. J]

P. Sili/cius, as he is called by Plutarch, or Silicius Coronas, as Dion Cassius names him, a Roman senator, and one of the judices appointed to try the conspirators against the life of Caesar in b.c. 43, in accordance with the Lex Pediae [Pedie/s, No. 1]. Although Octavius was present with his army, Silicius ventured to vote for the acquittal of M. Brutus, in consequence of which he was afterwards proscribed by the triumvirs, and put to death. Appian erroneously calls him Icilius (Dion Cass. xiv. 49; Plut. Brut. 27; Appian, B. C. iv. 27).

SILIA GENS, plebeian, did not attach much importance till quite the latter end of the republic, SILIUS.

SILIUS BASSUS. [BASSUS.]

C. SYLVIUS ITALICUS, the most voluminous among the Roman writers of heroic verse, was born about A.D. 25. From his early years he devoted himself to oratory and poetry, taking Cicero as his model in the former, and Virgil in the latter. He acquired great reputation as a pleader at the bar, and acted for some time as a member of that body of judicial umpires who were known as the Centumvirs. His life, in so far as we can trace it, presents a course of unbroken prosperity. He was elevated to the consulship in A.D. 68, the year in which Nero perished; he was admitted to familiar intercourse with Vitellius, and subsequently discharged the duties of proconsul of Asia with high renown. After enjoying for a lengthened period the dignities of political and literary fame without incurring the envy which is for the most part the lot of distinguished statesmen and authors, he determined to retire from the busy world, and to pass his old age among his numerous villas, which were abundantly furnished with books and works of art. His two favourite residences were a mansion near Puteoli, formerly the Academy of Cicero, and the house in the vicinity of Naples once occupied by Virgil; and so enamoured did he become of seclusion, that upon the accession of Trajan he refused to repair to Rome, and pay homage to the new prince. In these happy retreats he passed his time in tranquillity until he had completed his 75th year, when, in consequence of the pain caused by an incurable tubercle (insanabilis clausus) of some kind, he starved himself to death; and it was remarked that as he was the last consul nominated by Nero, so he survived all those who had held that office in the same reign. The only stain upon his character arises from the imputation that he pandered to the cruelties of the tyrant, by acting as a voluntary accuser; but if this charge was true, his guilt was in a great measure expiated by the blamelessness of his subsequent career. He had two sons, one of whom died when young; the other attained to the consulship before his father's death.

Much discussion has taken place with regard to the import of the word Italicus, which no one has as yet explained in a satisfactory manner. According to the opinion most generally adopted, it was derived from the place of his birth which is imagined to have been either Italic near Hispalis in Baetica, or Corfinium, in the country of the Peligni. Neither of these suppositions will bear investigation. It is extremely improbable that he was a Spaniard, for Martial, who repeatedly celebrates his praises, nowhere claims him as a countryman, although he frequently alludes with pride to the men of genius whom his native province had produced. On the other hand, although there is no doubt that the allies in the Social War gave the name of Italica to Corfinium, because they intended to make it the metropolis of their league, there is no reason to believe that it retained this title after the conclusion of the struggle. There is also a grammatical objection of some weight; for according both to analogy and to the authority of inscriptions, the local adjectival derived from Italica near Hispalis would not be Italicus, but Italicensis. (See also Gell. xvi. 13.) This however in itself would not be conclusive. (Hispanus, Hispanensis.) It has been erroneously inferred from a line in Martial (viii. 66).

that Silius had been thrice consul, but the words imply merely that there had been three consuls in the family—Silius himself, his son, to celebrate whose accession to office the epigram was written, and a third person, perhaps that C. Silius who was consul A.D. 13 (Sueton. Octav. 101), and who may have been the father of the poet: but this is a mere conjecture. Our authorities for this biography are sundry epigrams in Martial (especially vii. 62, viii. 65, xi. 51), and an epistle of the younger Pliny (cit. Paff. or ii. 3, ed. Titr.) See also Tacit. Hist. iii. 65.

The great work of Silius Italicus was an heroic poem in seventeen books, entitled Punicus, which has descended to us entire. It contains a narrative of the events of the second Punic War, from the capture of Saguntum to the triumph of Scipio Africanus, together with various episodes relating to the more remarkable achievements in the first contest with Carthage, and to the exploits of champions in still earlier ages, such as Senevola, Camillus, and the three hundred Fabii. Just as Virgil did not think that he degraded the majesty of the epic by making it a vehicle for flattering the Julian line, so his imitator has interwoven with his verses a panegyric upon the Flavian dynasty. The materials are derived almost entirely from Livy and Polybius. With regard to the merits of the piece, those few persons who have perused it from beginning to end will scarcely think the criticism too severe which pronounces it to be the least attractive poem within the range of classical antiquity; and this judgment is by no means incompatible with the praises awarded by Cellarius. We may freely admit that many passages may be adduced which throw light upon the historical events of that remarkable epoch, upon the origin, fortunes, and geographical position of different nations in Italy, Sicily, Spain, and Africa, and upon various points connected with mythology and ancient usages. But these are not the commendations we bestow on a great poet; the information which, after all, might be compressed within a very limited compass is certainly not destitute of value, but it is conveyed through the medium of the coldest, heaviest, and most lifeless composition that ever was misnamed a heroic poem. Notwithstanding the eulogistic apostrophe of Martial (Sili. Castuli- dum deus sororum), dictated perhaps by personal friendship, or more probably by the desire of fawning upon one who possessed so much power at court, the merits of Silius seem to have been fairly appreciated by his contemporaries, as we perceive from the words of Pliny "Seribebat carmina majori"

eura quam industria;" and soon after death he appears to have fallen into complete oblivion, for he is neither quoted nor named by any writer, not even by the grammarians, until the time of Apollinaris. (Excusator, ad Felic. 260.)

The work of Silius Italicus was first brought to light after the revival of letters by Poggio the Florentine, having been discovered by him while attending the council of Constance.

The Editio Princeps was printed at Rome by Sweynheym and Pannartz under the inspection of Andrew, bishop of Aleria, fol. 1471, and again at the same place, fol. 1471, 1474, 1480. The best editions are those of Cellarius, 8vo. Lips. 1695, and Drakenborn, 4to. Traj. ad Hen. 1717, especially the latter. That by Ruperti, 2 vols. 8vo. Gotting. 1795, contains a considerable quantity of useful matter, but displays little scholarship or judgment.

There is a complete translation into English verse, bearing the title "The Second Punic War between Hannibal and the Romans: the whole xvii. books Englished from the Latin of Silius Italicus, with a continuation from the triumph of Scipio to the death of Hannibal, by Tho. Ross." Fol. London, 1661; and reprinted fol. Lond. 1672.

The commencement was translated into French verse by Mich. de Marolles, and was appended to his "Considérations sur une Critique de l'Enéeide," 4to. Paris (no date), and to his translation of the Achilleis of Stattius, 4to. Paris, 1678. Select passages have been rendered into German by K. P. Kretschmann, to be found in the collection called "Meissner's Apollo," 1797, Heft. 5. There is also a version into Italian by Buzio, which is contained in the Raccolta di tutti gli antichi poeti Latin, 4to. Milan 1765, vol. 34—55. [W. R.]

SILIUS MESSALLA. [MESSALLA, p. 1053.]

SILIUS NERVA. 1. P. SILIUS NERVA, was consul under Augustus B. c. 20, with M. Appuleius, and afterwards subdued the Cammii and Veneti (ad Venones), Gallic tribes. (Dion Cass. liv. 7, 20.)

3. SILIUS NERVA, consul under Nero in A. D. 65, with Vestinus Atticus (Tac. Ann. xxv. 48). He is described in the Fasti as A. Licinius Nerva Silianus; whence it would appear that he was adopted by A. Licinius. He was probably the son of No. 2.

There are several coins bearing on the reverse P. NERVA, which are referred by modern numismatologists to the Silia gens, and not to the Licinia gens, as older writers had done. A specimen of these coins is annexed. The reverse represents the sepa of the comitia: one citizen is placing his tabella in the ballot-box, while another is receiving his tabella from the officer. (Eckhel, vol. v. p. 313.)

flourished about B.C. 500, since he was mentioned by Simonides and Epicarmus. He adorned with his paintings the Polemarchium portico (την πολε-μαρχίου πορτικόν) at Philius. (Polemo, ap. Ath. v. p. 210, b ; Simon, Fr. cxxii. Schneidewin.) [P. S.]

SILO, ABRONIUS. [ABRONIUS.]

SILO, GAUVIUS. [GAVIUS, No. 3.]

SILO, POMPÆUS, is constantly mentioned by M. Seneca among the illustrious rhetoricians of his age. (Sen. Suet. 1, 2, &c.)

SILO, Q. POMPAEÆDIUS, the leader of the Marsi in the Social War, and the soul of the whole undertaking, at first endeavoured to obtain for the Socii the Roman franchise, by means of M. Livius Drusus, the celebrated tribune of the plebs in B.C. 91. He came to Rome to concert his plans with Drusus, and remained in his house several days; and it is related by Diordorus that he subsequently marched upon Rome at the head of 10,000 men, with weapons concealed beneath their clothes, in order to extort the franchise by force, but that he was persuaded by Domitius, perhaps the censor of the preceding year, to give up his enterprise (Plut. Cat. Min. 2; Diod. xxxvii. p. 612, ed. Wess.). With the death of Drusus the allies lost all hope of obtaining their demands peaceably, and forthwith took up arms. The history of the war which ensued is given in too confused and fragmentary a manner to enable us to follow the operations of Pompeaedis Silo step by step; but all accounts agree in representing him as the most distinguished of the Italian generals. His most brilliant exploit seems to have been the defeat of Q. Cæpio, whom he decoyed into an ambush; but he was unable, either by his stratagems or his sarcasms, to force Marius to an engagement (Plut. Mar. 33). After most of the allies had laid down their arms and submitted to the Romans, Pompeaedis still continued the struggle. He regained Bovianum, which had been taken by Sulla, and entered this capital of Sunnium in triumph (Obsequ. 116). But this was his last success. He was first defeated by Mam. Aemilius, and subsequently by Q. Metellus Pius. In the latter battle he perished, and with his death the war came to an end, A. D. 88 (Appian, B. C. i. 40, 44, 53; Diod. xxxvii. p. 539, ed. Wess.; Liv. Epit. 76; Flor. iii. 18; Oros. v. 18; Vell. Pat. ii. 16). Several writers have Popedius, and others give Silo or Silo as the cognomen, but Pompeaedis Silo is the correct orthography.

SILO, POMPAEÆDIUS, fought under Venti- dius, the legatus of Antony, in his campaign against the Parthians in B.C. 29 (Dion Cass. xlvii. 41). The proceedings of Silo in Judæa are related at length by Josephus (Antiq. xiv. 15, B. J. i. 15).

SILVANUS, a Latin divinity of the fields and forests, to whom in the very earliest times the Tyrrenian Pelasgians are said to have dedicated a grove and a festival (Virg. Aen. vii. 600). He is described as a god watching over the fields and husbandmen, and is also called the protector of the boundaries of fields (Horat. Epod. ii. 22). Hyginus (De Limit. Const. Prael) tells us that Silvanus was the first to set up stones to mark the limits of fields, and that every estate had three Silvani, a Silvanus domesticus (in inscriptions called Silvanus Larum and Silvanus sanctus sacer Larum), Silvanus agraris (also called salutaris), who was worshipped by shepherds, and Silvanus orientalis; that is, the god presiding over the point at which an estate begins. Hence Silvani are often spoken of in the plural. In connection with woods (sylvestris deus), he especially presided over plantations, and delighted in trees growing wild (Tibull. ii. 5. 30; Lucan, Phars. iii. 402; Plin. H. N. xii. 2; Ov. Met. i. 193); whence he is represented as carrying the trunk of a cypress (Συγκαφος, Virg. Georg. i. 28). Respecting the cypress, however, the following story is told. Silvanus, or according to others, Apollo (Serv. ad Aen. iii. 680; Ov. Met. x. 106, &c.), was in love with the youth Cyprisius, and once by accident killed a hind belonging to Cyprisius. The latter died of grief, and was metamorphosed into a cypress (Serv. ad Virg. Georg. i. 20, Eclog. x. 26, Aen. iii. 680). He is further described as the divinity protecting the flocks of cattle, warding off wolves, and promoting their fertility (Virg. Aen. viii. 601; Tibull. i. 5. 27; Cato, De Re Rust. 83; Nonn. ii. 324).

Being the god of woods and flocks, he is also described as fond of music; the syrinx was sacred to him (Tibull. ii. 5. 30), and he is mentioned along with the Pans and Nymphs (Virg. Georg. i. 21; Lucan, l.c.). Later commentators even identified Silvanus with Pan, Faunus, Inius and Aegipan (Plin. Nat. Hist. ii. 22). Cato (l.c.) calls him Mars Silvanus, from which it is clear that he must have been connected with the Italian Mars, and it is further stated that his connection with agriculture referred only to the labour performed by men, and that females were excluded from his worship (Schol. ad Juven. vi. 446).

In the Latin poets, as well as in works of art, he always appears as an old man, but as cheerful and in love with Pomona (Virg. Georg. ii. 494; Horat. Epod. ii. 21, Carm. iii. 8; Ov. Met. xiv. 639). The sacrifices offered to him consisted of grapes, corn-ears, milk, meat, wine and pigs. (Horat. Epod. ii. 22, Epist. ii. 1. 143; Tibull. i. 5. 27; Juven. vi. 446; comp. Voss, Mythol. Briefe, ii. 68; Hartung, Die Religion der Römer. vol. ii. p. 170, &c.)

[Li. S.]

SILVANUS, a general of infantry in Gaul, where he completely succeeded in quelling a formidable insurrection of the barbarians during the reign of Constantius (A.D. 355). He had rendered military service on a former occasion by deserting, with a large body of cavalry, from Magnentius, immediately before the great battle of Mursa. Having been falsely accused of treason by an informer who produced forged documents in support of the charge, he was urged by despair to commit the crime of which he had been so villainously imprecated, and assumed the purple at Cologne, about the end of July A.D. 355, almost at the very moment when his innocence had been triumphantly established before the imperial tribunal at Milan. Ursicinus having been despatched with a few followers to crush this rebellion as best he might, effected by treachery the destruction of Silvanus, who was murdered twenty-eight days after he had been proclaimed Augustus. He is represented by a contemporary historian as an officer of great experience and skill, and not less remarkable for his gentle temper and amiable manners, than for his warlike prowess. It is not improbable that he may be the Silvanus named in the Codex Theodosianus (Chron. A.D. 349) as a commander of infantry and cavalry under Constans.

SILVANUS.

(1. M. PLAUTIUS SILVANUS, tribune of the plebs, B.C. 89, proposed a law that fifteen persons should be annually elected by each tribe, out of its own body, to be placed in the Album Judicum (Ascon. in Cornel. p. 79, ed. Orelli). In conjunction with his colleague, C. Papirius Carbo, he also proposed a law conferring the Roman franchise upon the citizens of the federate cities. (Cic. pro Arch. 4; comp. Dict. of Antiq. p. 293, a, 2d ed.).

2. M. PLAUTIUS M. F. A. N. SILVANUS, was consul B.C. 2. He afterwards served with great distinction under Tiberius in the Pannonian and Illyrian wars, and obtained in consequence, as we learn from an inscription, the triumphal ornaments (Vell. Pat. ii. 112; Dion Cass. iv. 34, ivi. 12; Gruter, p. 452 6).

3. PLAUTIUS SILVANUS, praetor A.D. 24, threw his wife Apronia out of the window, and having been accused of the crime, anticipated his condemnation by a voluntary death. (Tac. Ann. iv. 22).

4. TI. PLAUTIUS SILVANUS ARIELUS, offered up the prayer as pontifex when the first stone of the Capitol was laid, in A.D. 70 (Tac. Hist. iv. 53). We learn from an inscription (Gruter, p. 453; Orelli, n. 750) that he held many important military commands, and that he was twice consul. The date of these consulships, in both of which he was consul succeps, is uncertain. Baier, in his Fasti Consulares, places the first in the reign of Claudius, A.D. 47, and the second in the reign of Vespasian, A.D. 76.

5. M. PLAUTIUS SILVANUS, consul suffectus in A.D. 68 (Fasti).

SILVANUS, POMPEIUS, consul suffectus under Claudius, A.D. 45 (Fasti), is perhaps the same as the Pompeius or Poppeus Silvanus, a man of consular rank, who governed Dalmatia at the death of Nero, and is described by Tacitus as rich and aged. He espoused the side of Vespasian, but prosecuted the war with little vigour. He entered Rome along with the other generals of Vespasian, and was appointed by the senate to superintend the loan of money which the state was to obtain from private persons. (Hist. ii. 26, iii. 50, iv. 47).

SILVANUS, POMPO'NIUS, was proconsul of Africa, and was accused by the provincials in the reign of Nero, A.D. 58, but he was acquitted in consequence of his being an old man possessing great wealth and no children (Tac. Ann. xiii. 52). This Pomponius Silvanus is perhaps the same as the Pompeius or Poppeaeus Silvanus mentioned above, as the names are frequently confounded, and the latter is described by Tacitus (Hist. ii. 86) as rich and aged.

SILVANUS, POPPAEUS. [Silvanus, Poppeus against Silius, the son of Ascanius, is said to have been so called because he was born in a wood. All the succeeding kings of Alba bore the cognomen Silvius. The series of these mythical kings is given somewhat differently by Livy, Ovid, and Dionysius, as the following list will show (Livy, i. 3; Ov. Met. xiv. 609, &c.; Dionys. i. 70, 71).

4. Aeneas Silvius.
5. Latinus Silvius.
6. Alba.
7. Epytus.
8. Capys.
9. Capet.
10. Tiberinus.
11. Remulus.
12. Romulus Silvius.
13. Aventinus.
15. Amulius.

SILVUS, a Roman cognomen, properly signified a person whose nose turned up (Festus, s. v.; Cic. de Nat. Deor. i. 29). The names Silo, Silius, and Silvanus appear to be all connected with this name. SILVUS, C. ALBUCIUS, a Roman rhetorician, a native of Novaia, in the north of Italy, was aedile in his native town. He quitted Novaia in consequence of being dragged down from his tribunal on one occasion while administering justice, and repaired to Rome in the time of Augustus, where he obtained great renown by his oratory in the school of Plautus. He afterwards pleaded in the courts with considerable success, but having failed in one of his causes he left Rome and settled at Mediolanum, where he continued to exercise his profession as an advocate. He at length retired to his native town, and there put an end to his own life. (Suet. de Clar. Rhetor. 6; Senec. Controv. iii. proem.; Westermann, Geschichte der Römischen Beredsamkeit, § 86.)

SIMIUS, DOMITIUS, the former husband of Arria Gallia, whom he quietly surrendered to Piso. (Tac. Ann. xv. 59.)

SIMIUS, SERGIUS. 1. M. SERGIUS SILVUS, the great-grandfather of Catiline, distinguished himself by his extraordinary bravery in the second Punic war. Although he had lost his right hand, and received twenty-three wounds in two campaigns, he continued in the army, and fought four times against the Carthaginians with his left hand alone. He was praetor urbanus in B.C. 197, in which year six praetors were elected for the first time (Plin. H. N. vii. 28. a. 29; Liv. xxxvi. 27. 28. 31. xxxiii. 21). The annexed coin of the Sergia gens was probably struck in honour of this Sergius Silvus by his son. The reverse represents a horseman in full gallop, holding in his left hand the head of a foe. (Eckhel, vol. v. p. 306.)

COIN OF M. SERGIUS SILVUS.

2. M. SERGIUS SILVUS, son of the preceding, and grandfather of Catiline, was legatus of Aemilius Paulus in the war with Perseus in B.C. 168. (Liv. xliv. 40.)

3. SERGIUS SILVUS, son of No. 2, and father of Catiline. He does not appear to have held any of the public offices, and we do not even know his praenomen. He left his son no property. (Q. Cic. de Pet. Cons. 2; Sall. Cat. 5.)

4. CN. SERGIUS SILVUS, was condemned on the accusation of Metellus Celer, because he had promised money to a factorfamilias for the enjoyment of her person. (Val. Max. vi. 2. § 8.)

SIMARIUSTUS (Σιμαριστος), a grammatical, or lexicographical writer, mentioned several times by Athenaeus. Whether he was the author of more than one work, does not appear; but Athenaeus quotes frequently from one entitled "Quœrœvs" (ii. p. 39, d. ix. p. 395, f. xi. p. 478, e.). (C. P. M.)

SIMENUS, a statuey in bronze, mentioned by Pliny among those who made "athletea et armatos et venatores sacrificantes" (H. N. xxxiv. 8. s. 19. § 34). There is no other mention of this artist; and even the form of the name occurs nowhere else. (P. S.)

SIMeon. [Symeon.]

SIMILIS, a centurion under Trajan, and praefectus praetorio under Hadrian, who erected a statue to his honour. Dion Cassius says that Simillis received the praefecture against his will, and that he with difficulty prevailed upon Hadrian to let him resign it; but Spartanus on the contrary states, that Hadrian removed Simillis from his office, although he was partly indebted to him for the empire, and appointed Septicius Clarus his successor. (Dion Cass. lxxix. 18. 19; Sparr. Hâdr. 9.)

SIMMIAS (Σιμμιας), historical. 1. A Macedonian, father of Polyperchon, the general of Alexander. (Arr. Anab. ii. 12.)

2. A Macedonian, son of Andromenes, and brother of Attalus and Amyntas, the officers of Alexander. He probably served in the division of the phalae, commanded by his brother Amyntas, as we find him taking the command of it at the battle of Arbela during his brother's absence. On this occasion his division was one of those which bore the chief brunt of the battle. (Arr. Anab. iii. 11. 14.) In B.C. 330 he was accused, together with his brothers, of having been concerned in the conspiracy of Philotas; but the vigorous defence of Amyntas before the Macedonian army procured their joint acquittal. (Arr. iii. 27; Curt. vii. 1. § 10, 2. § 1—10.)

3. An officer in the service of Ptolemy III. (Euergetes), king of Egypt, who was sent by him to explore the shores of the Red Sea and the coasts of Ethiopia. Much of the information recorded by Agatharchides was derived from his authority. (Diod. iii. 18.) (E. H. B.)

SIMMIAS (Σιμμιας, or, in the MSS. of Diog. Laërt., Σιμμιας) literary. 1. Of Thebes, first the disciple of the Pythagorean philosopher Philolaus, and afterwards the friend and disciple of Socrates, at whose death he was present, having come from Thebes, with his brother Cebes, bringing with him a large sum of money, to assist in Criton's plan for the liberation of Socrates (Plat. Crit. p. 43 b., Phaed. pp. 59 c, 92 a, et passim; comp. Ael. V. H. i. 16). At this time he and Cebes were both young men (Phaed. p. 89 a.). The two brothers are the principal speakers, beside Socrates himself, in the Phaedrus; and the skill with which they argue, and the respect and affection with which Socrates treats them, prove the high place they held among his disciples, not only in the judgment of Plato, but in the general opinion. In the Phaedrus (p. 242 a., b.) also, Socrates is made to refer to Simmias as one of the most powerful reasoners of his day.

According to Plutarch, who introduces Simmias as a speaker in his dialogue de Genio Socratis (p. 578 a, &c.), he studied much in Egypt, and became conversant with the mystical religious philosophy of that country.

There is a very brief account of him in Diogenes Laërtius (ii. 124), who states that there was a collection of twenty-three dialogues by him, in one volume. The titles of these dialogues are also given, with a slight variation, by Suidas (s. v.); they embraced a large range of philosophical subjects, but are chiefly ethical.

Two epitaphs on Sophocles, in the Greek Anthology, are ascribed to Simmias of Thebes in the Palatine Codex (Brunck, Anal. vol. i. p. 168; Jacobs, Anth. Graec. vol. i. p. 100, Anth. Pal. vii. 21, 22, vol. i. p. 312). There is also an epitaph on Aristocles, among the epigrams of Simmias of Rhodes, which Brunck would refer to Simmias of Thebes; proba-bilis coniectura, says Jacobs. (Brunck, Anal. vol. i. p. 204, No. 2; Jacobs, Animad. vol. i. pt. ii. p. 4.)

2. Of Syracuse, is mentioned by Diogenes Laërtius (ii. 113, 114) as a hearer, first of Aristotle the Cyrenaean, and afterwards of Stilpon, the Megaric philosopher, but nothing further is known of him.

3. Of Rhodes, a poet and grammarian of the Alexandrian school, which flourished during the early Polemides. He was earlier than the tragic poet Philius, whose time is about 49-120 B.C. (at least if we except the assertion of Hephaestion (p. 31), that the choriambic hexameter, of which Philius claimed the invention, had been previously used by Simmias. Suidas (s. v.) tells us that he wrote three books of γλώσσαι, and four books of miscellaneous poems (τοιούτα διάφορα; the latter part of the article in Suidas is obviously misplaced, and belongs to the life of Simoides of Amorgus). Of his grammatical works nothing more is known; but his poems are frequently referred to, and some of them seem to have been epic. His Τοργός is quoted by Athenaeus (xi. p. 491); his Μίρης and Ἀντάλων by Stephanus Byzantinus (s. v. Αμώλας, Ἁμωλόνης) and a fragment of thirteen lines from the latter poem is preserved by Tzetzes (Chil. vii. 144), and has been edited by Brunck (Anal. vol. ii. p. 525, comp. Lect. vol. iii. p. 235).

As an epigrammatist, Simmias had a place in the Garland of Meleager, and the Greek Anthology contains six epigrams ascribed to him, besides three short poems of that fantastic species called γρύπη or carmina figura, that is, pieces in which the lines are so arranged as to make the whole poem resemble the form of some object; those of Simmias are entitled, from their forms, the Ψιγκής (πτέρυγας), the Εγγύ (δόν), and the Ηατσή (τέλευς). There are several other poems of the same species in the Anthology, as the Παν-πίππες (ἀνώτητος) of Theocritus, the Άλταρ of Dosidias, and the Εγγύ and Ηατσή of Besantius. (Brunck, Anal. vol. i. pp. 205, 210; Jacobs, Anth. Graec. vol. i. pp. 139-143, vol. iii. pp. 913, 952; Anth. Pal. xv. 21-27, vol. ii. pp. 603-609, ed. Jacobs; Fabric. Bibli. Graec. iii. p. 808, iv. pp. 494, 495.)

SIMO'IS (Σίμων), the god of the river Simois, which flows from mount Idas, and in the plain of Troy joins the Xanthus or Scamander (Hom. Il. v. 774, xii. 22; Virg. Aen. v. 261). He is described as a son of Oceanus and Tethys (Hes. Theog. 342), and as the father of Astyoche and Hieromemon. (Apollod. iii. 12. § 2.) [L. S.]

SIMON (Σίμων), a Thracian prince, was connected by marriage with Amadocus, who appears to have been a son of Cotys (No. 2), and brother to Cersobleptes and Berisades. On the death of the latter, when Cersobleptes wished, with the aid of Charidemes, to seize all the dominions of Cotys, and to exclude Amadocus and the children of Berisades from their inheritance, Simon was prepared to assist Amadocus against the intended usurpation; and, according to Demostenes, the remarkable decree of Aristocrates in favour of Charidemes (a. c. 352) was framed with the view of disarming this opposition, especially as Simon had been honoured with the Athenian franchise. (Dem. c. Aristoc. pp. 624, 625, 630, 683.) [CER-SOBLEPTES; CHARIDEMUS.]

SIMON (Σίμων), literary and ecclesiastical. I. APOLLONIDES. By a misunderstanding of a passage in Diogenes Laërtius (ix. 109), founded on an erroneous reading of the text, that author has been supposed to cite a Simon Apollonides of Nicea, when his citation is from Apollonides of Niccaea [APOLLONIDES, No. 5]. The name Simon is in other and more correct MSS. Timon (Τίμων), and is not a part of the text, but the title of the section the subject of which is Timon of Philus [TROX. (Allatins. p. 425)]. [C. 3. Of Athens, one of the disciples of Socrates, and by trade a leather-cutter (ακτοτόμος), which is usually Latinised Coriarius. Socrates was accustomed to visit his shop, and converse with him on various subjects. These conversations Simon afterwards committed to writing, as far as he could remember them; and he is said to have been the first who recorded, in the form of conversations, the words of Socrates. His philosophical turn attracted the notice of Pericles, who offered to provide for his maintenance, if he would come and reside with him; but Simon refused, on the ground that he did not wish to surrender his independence.

The favourable notice of such a man as Pericles may be considered as overbalancing the unfavourable or anecdotest judgment of those who characterised his Dialogues as "leather." He reported thirty-three conversations, Διάλογοι, Dialogi, which were contained in one volume. Diogenes Laërtius (ii. 122, 123), from whom we derive our knowledge of Simon, enumerates the subjects, the variety of which shows the activity and versatility of Simon's mind. The twelfth of the so-called Socrateis et

14. MAGU. In the various accounts of this remarkable man, who has been very commonly regarded as the earliest of the heretics that troubled the Christian church, fable is so largely intermingled, that it is difficult to tell what there is in any that has been ported of him, beyond the brief notice in the New Testament (Acts, viii. 9–13, 18–24). According to Justin Martyr (Apolog. Prima, c. 26, p. 190, ed. Hefele), the next authority in point of time, and, from his being also a Samaritan by birth, probably the next also in point of trustworthiness, Simon was a Samaritan, born in the village of Gitti or Gitthi; Γίττων or Γίττιώ in the Genitive, as Justin and Eusebius (H. E. ii. 13) write it, Γίττιως, as Theodoret (Haeret. Fabul. Compend. i. 1) writes it. If, as some think, he is the Simon mentioned by Josephus (Ant. Jud. xx. 7 § 2), he was, according to that writer, a Jew by religion and a Cyprian by birth. The discrepancy between this statement and that already cited it has been proposed to reconcile, by the supposition that Justin’s statement originated in the substitution or mistake of Γιττιως for Γεττιως, and consequently that Simon was really a native of Cyttium in Cyprus. But we are disposed to prefer the statement of Justin as it now stands, and to think that either Josephus was mistaken, or, which is more likely, that the Simon mentioned by him was a different person altogether. According to the account in the Recollectiones and the Clementina of the pseudo Clemens [Clemens Romanus], which account is professedly given by Aquila, who had been a friend and disciple of Simon, the latter was the son of Antonius and Rachel, and was a native of the “vicus Gythorum,” in the district of Samaria. He is described as well versed in Greek literature and in magic; and as being vainglorious and boastful to an extraordinary degree. According to the same very dubious authorities, he had professed himself a follower of Dositheus, an heretical teacher who first promulgated his doctrines about the time of John the Baptist’s death, and who was accompanied by a female, whom he designated Luna, “the Moon,” and by a chosen band of disciples, whose number, thirty, corresponded to the number of days in a lunar month. Into this chosen number, on a vacancy occurring, Simon obtained admission. According to the Clementina Simon had studied at Alexandria, and both he and Dositheus had been disciples of John the Baptist. In the same work we find also many fabulous tales about Simon; but it is likely that the representation, which we find in this work, that Simon was first the disciple and afterwards the successor of Dositheus, as the leader of a sect, is founded on truth (comp. Origen, In Mattheum Commentar. c. 33. s. ut aliis, tract. xxvii., Contra Celsum, lib. i. c. 57, lib. ii. c. 11, Periplus, &c. De Principiis, lib. iv. c. 17, ed. Dela- rue; Euseb. II. E. iv. 22). In the Constitutiones Apostolicæ (lib. vi. c. 8) Simon is represented as a disciple of Dositheus, and as having, with the aid of a fellow-disciple, Cleobius, deprived him of his leadership.

These notices furnish nearly all that is reported of Simon previous to the time at which the deacon Philip met him at a Samaritan city, of which the name is not given, and those transactions occurred which are noticed in the New Testament (l. c.), and which need not be repeated here. The latter part of Simon’s career appears to have been passed at Rome. Here, according to Justin Martyr (l.c. and c. 56), he arrived in the time of Claudius, and obtained such high credit, both with senate and people, as to have been appointed, and to have had a statue erected to him in the river Tiber. “in the river Tiber” (usually interpreted to mean, in the island formed by the division of the channel of the river), “between the two bridges,” with the inscription in Latin, Simon de Sancto. The minuteness of Justin’s description, and his distinct appeal (c. 56) that the statue might be removed, render it difficult to dispute his statement; yet the fact that an inscription existed in the island of the Tiber (where it was seen and read, A.D. 1662 by Marquardus Gudius), Simon de Sancto fidio sacerum, has given reason to suspect that Justin inadvertently mistook a statue of the Sabine deity, Semo Sancus or Sango [Sancus Semo], to whom several inscriptions have been found, for one of Simon the Samaritan (Gruter, Inscriptiones, vol. i. p. xcvi. No. 5, comp. 6, 7, 8, ed. Graev.). Irenaeus, who says it was reported that Claudius Caesar had erected a statue to Simon (Adv. Haeres. lib. i. c. 20), Tertullian (Apologia, c. 13), and the other fathers, who repeat the statement, can be regarded only as re-echoing the account of Justin (see, however, Burton, Bampton Lectures, note 42). Whether Simon ever encountered Peter after their interview in the Samaritan city, cannot be determined; it is not impossible that they may have met, and that some conference or discussion may have taken place between them. The Recognitions (lib. ii. &c.) and the Clementina (Hom. iii.) give a long report of disputations between the two; but the scene is laid at Caesarea Palaestina (Recog. i. 12; Clem. Hom. i. 15). The Clementina (Hom. iv. &c.), and the New Testament, also place the conference at Caesarea. According to the Clementina (Homil. iv. &c.), Simon, being overcome by Peter, fled from the Apostle, who, eager to renew the contest, followed his flying opponent from town to town along the Phoenician coast. According to an account which may be traced from Arnobius (Adv. Gentes, ii. 7), through the Constitutions Apostolicae (ibid. and lib. ii. c. 14), Cyril of Jerusalem (l.c.), and later writers, Simon came to his death through another encounter with Peter; for, having at Rome raised himself into the air, by the aid of evil spirits, he was, at the prayer of Peter and Paul, who were then at Rome, precipitated from a great height, and died from the consequences of his fall. Whether this legend has any foundation in fact it is hard to say. Dr. Burton (Bampton Lectures, lect. iv. p. 94, and note) attempts to get some truth out of the indubitably fabulous circumstances with which the death of Simon has been interwoven. The ancient authorities for the history of Simon have been cited in the course of this article. Among modern writers Tillemont (Mémories, vol. ii. p. 35 &c.), l'Épiscopologie, sect. i. c. ii.), Mойке (De Rebus Christian. ante Constantinum, sect. i. §§ lxi. lxvii), Burton (Bampton Lectures, lect. iv.), Milman (Hist. of Christ, vol. ii. p. 96, &c.). Simon is usually reckoned the first heresiarch: but the representation is not correct, if heresy be understood, in its modern acceptance, to mean a corrupted form of Christianity; for Simon was not a Christian at all, except for a very short period, and his doctrines did not include any recognition of the claims of Jesus Christ, of whom Simon was not the disciple, but the rival. Origen is clear on this point; for, in reply to Celsius, who had confounded the Simonians with the Christians, he says (Contra Celso, v. 62), “Celsius is not aware that the Simonians by no means acknowledge Jesus to be the son of God; but they say that Simon is the power of God.” The representation has become erroneous, from the change in the meaning of the word ἀπερής, haeresis, which anciently meant “sect;” and was applied (e.g. by Epiphanius) to the religious sects of the Jews, and the philosophical sects of the heathens, as well as to the bodies which split off from the so-called Catholic Church. (Comp. Burton, Bampton Lectures, lect. iv.) Simon appears to have written some works, the titles of which are unknown. The author of the Constitutions Apostolicae, lib. vi. c. 16, says that Simon and Cleobius, with their followers, forged and circulated books in the name of Christ and his disciples. Jerome (Comment. in Matt. xxiv. ad vs. 5) gives a brief citation, and Moses Bar Cepha, a Syrian writer of the tenth century, quotes several passages from Simon. The Praejectio Arabica ad Concilium Nicaenum (Concilia, vol. ii. col. 336, ed. Labbe) speaks of a spurious Gospel of the Simonians, or perhaps a corrupted copy of the Canonical Gospels, divided into four parts, and named after the four cardinal points of the compass. (Grabe, Spicilegium Patrum, vol. i. p. 305, &c.; Fabric, Codex Apocryph. N. T. vol. i. pp. 140, 377, ed. lamb. 1719.)

20. Sophista. Aristophanes (Nubes, 350) has advertised Simon as guilty of robbing the public treasury, but without mentioning of what city. According to Eupolis (Apud Scholast. in Aristoph. l. c.) he robbed the treasury of the city of Hemaleia. The rapacity thus held up by two of the great comic dramatists of Athens passed into a proverb, Σίμωνος ἄρτακτικός. Suidas, who gives the proverb (σ. κ. Σίμων) adds the information that Simon was a sophist, and the Scholast on Aristophanes (Nubes, l. c.) adds that he was one of the persons then conspicuous in political affairs (τῶν ἐν πολιτείᾳ βασιλεύσαντων τότε), we may presume at Athens. Aristophanes also brands Simon, apparently the same person, as guilty of perfidy (Nubes, 330). (Allatius, De Simonibus, pp. 196, 197; Fabric, Bibl. Græc. vol. xi. p. 901.)

22. Of Thebes. Allatius (De Simon, p. 292) speaks of Simon Constantopolitanus, or Simon of Constantinople, an ecclesiastical of the order of preachers, as having, in three treatises, strenuously maintained the doctrine of the Western Church of the procession of the Holy Spirit from the Son as well as from the Father, in opposition to the divines of the Greek Church. The treatises were inscribed respectively, 1. To Manuel Holobulus, or Holobulus, a different person from Manuel Holobulus mentioned elsewhere. [Manuel, literary and ecclesiastical, No. 8.] 2. To Sophocles. 3. To Ioannes Nomopolax. From the last of these treatises Allatius has given long extracts (Ad. Hottinger, p. 334 and 502; De Octave Synodo Pho-
SIMON.

Simonides. p. 453.) Allatius identifies the writer with the "Simon Hieromonachus ex ordine Praedictorum," mentioned by Georgius Trapezuntius, or George of Trebizond [Georgius, literary and ecclesiastical, No. 49], as being a native of Crete, ardent for the divine doctrines (sc. those of the Western Church), who went to Rome, and obtained of the Pope the office of Inquisitor and Judge of Heretics in Crete (Georg. Trapezunt. ad Cretenses Epistolae, apud Allat. Graecia Orthodoxa, vol. i. p. 537.) Allatius supposes that he got his name Constantinopolitanus from the circumstance of his family having belonged to that city, just as Georgius, who mentions him, was called Trapezuntius, for a similar reason. Allatius (De Simon, p. 202) further identifies him with the Simon Iatmaeus (Possennio, in his Apparatus Sacer, misquotes the name as Iacumaeus, and Allatius (i. c.) further misquotes it as Tacumaeus) mentioned by Sixtus of Sena (Bibloth. Sancta, lib. iv.), as having been first bishop of Gyranium, and afterwards archbishop of Thebes, and as having flourished about A.D. 1400. It is to be observed that Sixtus says Simon Iatmaeus was born at Constantinople; but perhaps Sixtus was misled by the epithet Constantinopolitanus. He speaks of him as versed in Latin, Greek, and Hebrew literature, and as an assiduous student of the Bible; and states that he prepared a revision of the Greek text of the New Testament; translated it most faithfully, word for word (verbum de verbo) into Hebrew and into Latin; and formed a trilingual Testament, by arranging the Greek text and the two versions in three parallel columns on the same page, so that lines corresponded to line, and words to word. (Sixtus Simon Iatmaeus (L. c. p. 203) says he had read some poems addressed to Joannes Cantacuzenus, with the inscription Ζιωμωρ φροντιστής Οθων, "Simonis Archiepiscopi Thessalorum." Of these poems he quotes a few lines: from which they appear to have been addressed to Cantacuzenus about the time of his abdication, in the middle of the fourteenth century. If, therefore, Simon flourished, as Sixtus of Sena states, in A. D. 1400, he must have attained a considerable age. Cave inclines to the opinion that the Simon who wrote the three treatises on the Holy Spirit was a distinguished person from the Simon Iatmaeus (he adds 'alias Iacumaeus'), of Sixtus of Sena. He thinks that if they were the same, the date given by Sixtus, A.D. 1400, is incorrect. (Allatius (i. c.); Fabriicius, Bibl. Graec. vol. xi. pp. 301, 334; Cave, Hist. Lit. ad ann. 1276 and 1400, vol. ii. p. 322; and Appendix, p. 87, ed. Oxford, 1740—1743.)

23. Thren. Scriptor. Harpoeratius (Lexicon, s. v. Tachyri), mentions Simon as the author of a poem entitled or described as Els λοξευσας του 'Ερυθρα Θερμος, In Lysimachium Eretrienum Theronis. It is probable that Simon is a mistake for Simonides. [SIMONIDES.] (Allat. De Simon, Script. p. 200.) [J. C. M.]

SIMON (Σιωμ), a physician of Magnesia, who was mentioned by Herophilus (ap. Soran. De Arte Osteitr. p. 100) and who lived, therefore, in or before the fourth century B.C. He is probably the same person who is mentioned by Diogenes Laërtius (ii. 120), and said by him to have lived in the time of Leucus Nicom. [W. A. G.]

SIMON (Σιωμ), of Aegina, a celebrated statute in bronze, who flourished about Ol. 76, n. c. 475, and made one of the horses and one of the charioteers, in the group which was dedicated at Olympia by Phormis, the contemporary of Pheidias and Hieron; the other horse and charioteer were made by Dionysius of Argos (Paus. v. 27, § 1). Pliny states that he made a dog and an archer in bronze. (H. N. xxxiv. 8. s. 19. § 33.) He is also mentioned by Diogenes Laërtius (ii. 123).

To these passages should probably be added two others, in which the name of Simon is concealed by erroneous readings. Clemens Alexandrinus (Protrept. p. 31, Sylburg) mentions, on the authority of Polemon, a statue of Dionysus Morychus, at Athens, made of the soft stone called φάλαλητας, as the work of Sico, the son of Eupalamus; and the same statue is ascribed by Zenobius (v. 13) to Sinimus, the son of Eupalamus. We know nothing either of Sico or of Siminias; but in the former passage nothing can be simpler than the correction of Ζιωμωρ into Ζιωμωρ, and in the latter it is obvious how easily the two names may have been confounded, each beginning with the syllable Ζιω, especially if, as is frequently the case in old MSS., that syllable only was written as an abbreviation for Ζιωμωρ. These corrections are supported by the authority of Müller (Aegina, 104) and Thiersch (Epochen, p. 127), and no sound critic will hesitate to prefer them to Siliig's method of correcting the passage of Clement from that of Zenobius, and reading Ζιωμωρ in both.

Thiersch supposes Simon, the son of Eupalamus, to have lived at an earlier period than Simon of Aegina, and to have been one of the Attic Daidalids. This is possible, but by no means necessary; for although the manner in which the statue of Dionysus is mentioned, and the significant name Eupalamus concur to place Simon with the so-called Daidalid, or archaic period of art, yet that period comes down so far as to include the age immediately before that of Pheidias, and Onatas, the contemporary of Simon of Aegina, is expressly mentioned as belonging to it. [DAIDALUS. ONATAS.] [P. S.]

SIMONIDES (Σιωμωνίδης), literary. 1. Of Samos, or, as he is more usually designated, of Amorgos, was the second, both in time and in reputation, of the three principal iambic poets of the early period of Greek literature, namely, Archilochus, Simonides, and Hipponax (Proclus, Chrestom. 1; Lucian. Pseudol. 2). The chief information which we have respecting him is contained in two articles of Suidas (σ. Σιωμωνίδης, Σιωμαίας; the greater part of the latter article is obviously misplaced, and really refers to Simonides;) from which we learn that his father's name was Crines, and that he was originally a native of Samos, whence, by a curious parallel to the history of Archilochus, he led a colony to the neighbouring island of Amorgos, one of the Cyclades or Sporades, where he founded three cities, Minoa, Aegialus, and Arcesine, in the first of which he fixed his own abode. (Comp. Strab. b. 4. p. 487; Steph. Byz. s. v. 'Αμοργος; Tzetzes. Chil. xii. 52.) He is generally said to have been contemporary with Archilochus; and the date assigned to him by the chorographers is Ol. 29. 1 or 3, n. c. 664 or 665 (Syncell. p. 215; Hieronym. ap. A. Maium, Script. P. 833; Clem. Alex. Strom. vol. i. p. 333; Cyril. c. Julian. vol. i. p. 120.) The statement of Suidas that he flourished 490 years after the Trojan War, would, according to the vulgar era, the epoch of Eratosthenes, place him at (1185 — 496 B.C.) n. c. 693; or, according to the era of Democritus, at (1150 — 490 B.C.) n. c. 660, which agrees with the chronographers. (See Clinton, F. H. vol. i. s. a. 712, 665, 662; and Welcker, as cited below.)

The works of Simonides, according to Suidas (s. v.), consisted of an elegy in two books, and iambic poems; or, according to the other notice in Suidas (s. v. Ζωίλας), iambic and other miscellaneous poems, and an Archaeology of the Samians (ἐργασία τῶν Σαιμωνίων). From the comparison of these two passages, Welcker thinks that the elegiac poem mentioned in the first is the ἐργασία τῶν Σαιμωνίων of the second, and not, as others have thought, a gnomic poem, at least not chiefly such. The gnomic poetry of that early period was so highly esteemed and so often quoted, that it is scarcely credible that if so celebrated a poet as Simonides had written elegiac verses of that species, not one of them should have been preserved. All his gnomic poetry is iambic. On the other hand, it was not uncommon for the early poets to write metrical histories of their own native countries or cities, and such a history of Samos, chiefly of a genealogical character, had been composed in hexameter verse, long before the time of Simonides, by Asius, the son of Amphitopelous. It is therefore quite natural, Welcker contends, that when the elegiac metre had been established, Simonides should have applied it to the same subject, intermixing perhaps in his narrations councils and opinions on public affairs, and thus forming a poem akin to the Eunomia of Tyrtaeus or the Ionia of Bias. The existing fragments of his iambic poems have a decidedly gnomic character, and afford evidence that he was reckoned among the sages who preceded the Seven Wise Men. To confirm this view by parallel examples, Welcker quotes the poems of Xenophon, of Cophon, on his native city and on the colonization of Elea, and other similar works of other poets.

It was, however, the iambic poems of Simonides that made his reputation. These were of two species, gnomic and satirical. His verses of the latter class were very similar to those of Archilochus, inasmuch as his sarcasms were directed at a particular person, named Orodocides, who has thus obtained a celebrity like that conferred upon Lyambeus by Archilochus, and upon Bupalus by Hippox (Lucian. l. c.); although the unlucky reputation of Orodocides was by no means so extensive as that of Lyambeus and Bupalus, who became a pair of proverbial victims, just as their persecutors, Archilochus and Hippox, are spoken of together as great sages; hence Welcker infers that, in the department of iambic poetry, the fame of Simonides was by no means equal to that of Archilochus and Hippox. But, whatever defect there may have been in the pungency of his satire, it was amply compensated by the wisdom and force of his gnomic poetry, in which he embodied sentiments and precepts, referring to human character and the affairs of human life, in language, in which antique simplicity was combined with fitness and fulness of expression, intermixed occasionally with that quiet irony or satire, in which he seems to have succeeded better than in personal sarcasm. This part of his poetry Welcker considers to have formed, without doubt, a continuous series of verses, in the shape of precepts addressed to youths in general, or to any individual youth, not, like the precepts of Hesiod, to some particular one. A great part of the poem referred, as in Hesiod, Theog尼斯, and Phoíclydes, to the relations of men to the other sex, and the characteristics of women are described in that satirical vein, which prevails in these and other poets, but the spirit of which was, perhaps, not so much to displease the whole sex as to exalt the standard by which they should be judged, especially with regard to industry, economy, and the other household virtues. "For this purpose he makes use of a contrivance which, at a later time, also occurs in the gnomes of Phoíclydes; that is, he derives the various, though generally bad, qualities of women from the variety of the age, by which fiction he gives a much livelier image of female characters, than he could have done by a mere enumeration of their qualities. The uncleanly woman is formed from the swine; the cunning woman, equally versed in good and evil, from the fox; the talkative woman, from the dog; the lazy woman, from the earth; the unequal and changeable, from the sea; the woman who takes pleasure only in eating and in sensual delights, from the ass; the perverse woman from the weasel; the woman fond of dress, from the horse; the ugly and malicious woman, from the ape; there is only one race created for the benefit of men, the woman sprung from the bee, who is fond of her work, and keeps faithful watch over her house." (Müller, Hist. of the Lit. of Anc. Greece, vol. i. p. 140.) The greater number, however, of the passages relating to women in the fragments of Simonides seem to belong to his satiric, rather than to his gnomic iambics. It is doubtful whether he wrote all his poems in choliambic verse. One line of that metre is preserved, but an easy alteration of the last word converts it into an ordinary iambic verse; and there is only one other fragment which has any appearance of being choliambic (See Meineke, Choliamb. Poës. Graec. pp. 134, 135.) Like the other early iambic poets, Simonides also used the trochaic metre, which is most closely connected in rhythm with the iambic. (Grammat. ap. Censorin. c. 9.) Besides their poetical interest, the fragments of Simonides are very valuable for the numerous forms of the old Ionic dialect which they preserve: the principal examples are collected by Welcker.

Great confusion has been made by modern scholars, as well as ancient grammarians, between Simonides of Amorgos and his more celebrated namesake of Ceos. "The only safe rule for distinguishing them is to ascribe all the iambic and satirical fragments to the former, and all the lyric remains to the latter, except some few which belong perhaps to a younger Simonides of Ceos. (See below, No. 3.) As to the numerous elegic and epigrammatic remains, which we possess under the name of Simonides, there is no good reason for assigning any of them to Simonides of Amorgos, although, as we have seen, he is said to have written an elegy.

The fragments of Simonides of Amorgos have been edited, intermixed with those of Simonides of Ceos, and almost without an attempt to distinguish them, in the chief collections of the Greek poets; in Bruneck's Analecta, vol. i. pp. 129, foll.; and in Jacob's Anth. Graec. vol. i. pp. 57, foll.
SIMONIDES.

2. Simonides, of Ceos, one of the most celebrated lyric poets of Greece, was the perfected of the Elegy and Epigram, and the rival of Lasus and Pindar in the Dithyramb and the Epinician Ode. He lived at the close of that period of two centuries, during which lyric poetry advanced from the earliest musical improvements of Terpander, to that high stage of development which it attained in his own works, and in the odes of Pindar and the choruses of Aeschylus; in which form the could be no further improved without injuring the true spirit of poetry; and from which, after a brief rest at the point of perfection in the choruses of Sophocles, it rapidly degenerated in the hands of Euripides and of the Athenian dithyrambic poets, whom Aristophanes so severely satirized. His genius must have received, also, no small impulse from the political circumstances of his age. When young, he formed a part of the brilliant literary circle which Hipparchus collected at his court. In advanced life, he enjoyed the personal friendship of Themiostocles and Pausanias, and celebrated their exploits; and in his extreme old age, he found an honored retreat at the court of Syracuse. His life extended from after the first usurpation of Peisistratus to the end of the Persian wars, from Ol. 56. 1, to Ol. 78. 1, b.c. 556—467. The chief authorities for his life, besides the ancient writers, and the historians of Greek literature (Müller, Ulrici, Bode, Bernhardy, &c.) are the two works of Schneidewin (Simonides Oet Carmina Rerumque, Bruns. 1833, 8vo.) and Richter (Simonides der uelt. von Kree, nach seinem Leben beschrieben und in seinem poetischen Uberresten ubersezt, Schlesingen, 1836, 4to), in which the ancient authorities are so fully collected and discussed, that it is unnecessary to refer to any except the most important of them.

Simonides was born at Julius, in the island of Ceos, in Ol. 56. 1, b.c. 556, as we learn from one of his own epigrams (No. 203*), in which he celebrates a victory which he gained at Athens, at the age of 80 years, in the archonship of Adeimantus, that is, in Ol. 75. 4, b.c. 476; and this date is confirmed by other authorities, and by the date of his death, which took place at the age of 89 (Suid.) or 90 (Mar. Par.), in Ol. 76. 1, b.c. 467; Lucian (Macrob. 29) extends his life beyond 90 years. (Schol. pp. iii. iv.; Clinton, F. H. s. aat. 556, 466, 467.)

His father was named Leoprepes, and his grand-father Hyllichus; but this must have been his maternal grandfather, if, as there is reason to believe, his paternal grandfather was also named Simonides, and was also a poet. (Murm. Par. Ep. 49; Böckh, C. I. vol. ii. p. 312.) The poet Bacchylides was his nephew; and another Simonides, distinguished by the epithet of Genealoys, was his grandson. (See below, No. 3.) The following is the whole genealogy.

Simonides.

- Hyllichus.
- Leoprepes. (Daughter.)
- Simonides. (Daughter) = Midon, or Midylus.
- Bacchylides.
- Simonides.

It seems, from a story related by Chamaeleon (Ath. x. p. 456, c.), that the family of Simonides held some hereditary office in connection with the worship of Dionysus, and that the poet himself officiated, when a boy, in the service of the god at whose festivals he afterward gained so many victories. He appears also to have been brought up to music and poetry as a profession. The preceding genealogy furnishes strong presumption that the art, according to the then common custom, was hereditary in his family; and it is stated that he instructed the choruses who celebrated the worship of Apollo at Carthaea, where, as also in the rest of his native island, that god was especially honoured. (Chamael. l.c.) Pindar, who was a bitter rival of Simonides, makes this early poetic discipline a subject of reproach, designating him and Bacchylides as τοὺς μαθήμας, as if they had been poets merely by instruction, and not by inspiration. (See further, Schneidewin, pp. vi.—viii.)

From his native island Simonides proceeded to Athens, probably on the invitation of Hipparchus, who attached him to his society by great rewards (Plat. *Hipparch. p. 228, c.; Aelian, V. H. viii. 2). The reign of Hipparchus was from b.c. 526 to 514, so that Simonides probably spent the best years of his life at the tyrant's court. Anacreon lived at the court of Hipparchus at the same time, but we have no evidence of any intimate relations between the two poets, except an epitaph upon Anacreon, which is ascribed to Simonides (Fr. 171, Schol.); Bruni, *Anal. vol. i. p. 136, No. 49. s. 55). Another of the great poets then at the court of Hipparchus was the dithyrambic poet Lastus, Pindar's teacher, who engaged in poetical contests with Simonides; and the rivalry between them appears to have been carried on in no friendly spirit. (Aristoph. Vesp. 1410, c. Schol.)

We have no positive information respecting the poet's life between the murder of Hipparchus and the battle of Marathon. It appears not improbable that he remained at Athens after the expulsion of Hippia, of whom he speaks as 'Ανδρός αματοῦς ἐν Ἐλάδι τῶν ἄρωτος, in his epitaph on the tyrant's daughter Archedice (No. 170), which bears, however, internal evidence (vv. 3, 4) of having being written after the expulsion of the Peisistratids. But the favours he had received from the Peisistratids, and especially from Hipparchus, did not prevent him from speaking of the death of his patron as "a great light arising upon the Athenians," in an epigram (No. 187), which we may suppose to have been inscribed upon the base of the statues set up to Harmodius and Aristogeiton after the expulsion of Hippias, b. c. 510. (Paus. i. 8. § 5.)

It was probably the next period of his life which Simonides spent in Thessaly, under the patronage of the Aleuads and Scopas, whose names, according to Theocritus (Id. xvi. 34) are preserved from the Attic hortators. His love of beautiful poems in which the great Cean bard celebrated the victories gained by their swift horses in the sacred games. Of these poems we still possess a considerable portion of the celebrated Epinician Ode, on the victory of Scopas with the four-horsed chariot (No. 15), which is preserved and commented upon by Plato in the Protagoras; and fragments of the Threnes on the general destruction of the Scopas (No. 46), and on the Aleuad Antiochus (No. 48); and it is not improbable that the magnificent Lament of Danae (No. 50) was a Threnes composed for one of the Aleuads. If we may believe Plutarch, the poet was obliged to confess that the charms of his song failed to humanize the rough spirits of the Thessalians, "αμαθέστερα γάρ εισιν, ή ὦ ὁ ποιον δεξιάταθα" (Plut. de Aud. Poet. p. 15, c.). Even the tyrants whom he celebrated are said to have grudged him his just reward. (Soson. ii. E. p. 4.)

Regarding these relations of the Ode, preserved from the hortators of Thessaly, a most interesting story is told by several of the ancient writers. The best form of it is probably that which Cicero gives, on the authority of Callimachus (de Oret. ii. 86). At a banquet given by Scopas, when Simonides had sung a poem which he had composed in honour of his patron, and in which, according to the custom of the poets (in their Epinician Odes), he had adorned his composition by devoting a great part of it to the praises of Castor and Pollux, the tyrant had the meanness to say that he would give the poet only half of the stipulated payment for his Ode, and that he might apply for the remainder, if he chose, to his Tyndarids, to whom he had given an equal share of the praise. It was not long before a message was brought to Simonides, that two young men were standing there, and earnestly demanding to see him. He rose from his seat, went out, and found no one; but, during his absence, the building he had just left fell down upon the fallen spectators, and crushed to death Scopas and all his friends, whom we may suppose to have laughed heartily at his barbarous jest. And so the Dioscuri paid the poet their half of the reward for the Ode. Callimachus, in a fragment which we still possess, puts into the poet’s mouth some beautiful elegiac verses in celebration of the event (Fr. 71, Bentley). It is not worth while to discuss the variations upon the story as related by other writers, and especially by Quintilian (xi. 2. § 11 ; comp. Val. Max. i. 8 ; Aristeid. Orat. iv. p. 584 ; Phaed. Fab. iv. 24 ; Ovid. ix. 513, 514, &c.; see Schneidewin, pp. xi. fll.). It appears that the Ode believed to have been sung on this occasion was that same Epinician Ode to which allusion has been already made, and of which we possess the half relating to Scopas himself, though we have lost the other half, which referred to the Dioscuri.

That the story is altogether fabulous can by no means be maintained; although, in the form in which it has now come down to us, it must be classed with those legends which embodied the pre-vailing sentiment, that the poet was the beloved servant of the gods, who would interpose to preserve him from injury, or to avenge his wrongs; as in the cases of Arion, saved by the dolphin, and Ibycus, avenged by the cranes. That some overwhelming and general calamity, amounting to an almost total extinction, befell the family of the Scopas about this time, is evident from the threnes composed for them by Simonides (No. 49), and from the absence of any mention of them in those events connected with the Persian invasion, in which the Aleuads took so prominent a part (Herod. vii. 6); not to mention the testimony of Phavorinus (ap. Stob. Serm. c. ev. 62) and other writers, which is perhaps derived only from the threnes itself (Schn. p. xii.). Schneidewin suggests an ingenious explanation of the story, but conceived in too rationalistic a spirit to be hastily admitted; namely, that Scopas, whose tyrannical character is shown, both by the story itself and by the apologetic tone in which Simonides speaks of him in his Ode, was so odious to the people, that they plotted his destruction by undermining the building in which he was about to hold the festival in commemoration of his victory at the games; but that they saved Simonides, by a timely warning, on account of his sacred character as a poet. Schneidewin quotes, in confirmation of this view, the verses in which the modern painter of Eresos (ap. Fr. x. p. 438, c.), who painted the death of Scopas under the head of the Destruction of Tyrants through Revenge. (Schn. p. xv.)

Whether in consequence of this calamity, or on account of the impending Persian invasion, or for some other reason, Simonides returned to Athens, and soon had the noblest opportunity of employing his poetic powers in the celebration of the great events of the Persian wars. At the request of Miltiades, he composed an epigram for the statue of Pan, which the Athenians dedicated after the battle of Marathon (No. 189). In the following year, in the archonship of Aristocrates, b. c. 489, he conquered Aeschylus in the contest for the prize which the Athenians offered for an elegy on those who fell at Marathon (Fr. 58, Epig. 149). Ten years later, he composed, at the request of the Amphilictyons, the epigrams which were inscribed upon the tomb of the Spartans who fell at Thermopylae, as well as an encomium on the same heroes (Epig. 150—153, Fr. 9) ; and he also celebrated the battles of Artemision and Salamis, and the great men who commanded in them (Fr. 2—8, Epig. 157—160, 190—194). He lived upon intimate terms with Themistocles, and a good story is told of the skill with which the statesman rebuked the immoderate demands of the poet (Plut. Them. 5 ; Proc. sect. Polit. p. 807, a.; Reg. et Imp. Apothe. p. 185, c.; for another story see Cic. Fin. ii. 32). One of his epigrams (No. 197) was written on the occasion of the restoration of the sanctuary of the Lycomidae by Themistocles. Respecting the enmity between Simonides and the poet Timo creon of Rhodes, see Schneidewin, p. xvii.

The battle of Plataea (b. c. 479) furnished Simonides with another subject for an elegy (Fr. 59; comp. Epig. 189), and gave occasion for the celebrated epigram (No. 180), which he composed for Pausanias; it was inscribed on the tripod dedicated to the Greeks at Delphi out of the Persian spoils; but which, on account of its arrogant ascription of all the honour of the victory to Pau-
SIMONIDES. 335

His sepulchre is said by Suidas (s. v.) to have been ruthlessly destroyed by Phoenix, a general of the Agrigentines, who used its materials for the construction of a tower, when he was besieging Syracuse.

Little space is left to describe the personal and poetical character of Simonides, and this has already been done so well by Ottfried Müller, that it hardly needs to say very much. (Hist. Lit. Anc. Greece, vol. i. pp. 208, foll.) Belonging to a people eminent for their orderly and virtuous character (Plat. Protag. p. 341, c., see Stallbaum's note), Simonides himself became proverbial for that virtue which the Greeks called σωφροσύνη, temperance, order, and self command in one's own conduct, and moderation in one's opinions and desires and views of human life; and this spirit breathes through all his poetry. (Schn. p. xxxiii.) His reverence for religion is shown in his treatment of the ancient myths. His political and moral wisdom has already been referred to; it often assumed a grand and sublime form, and he appears to have been especially anxious to emulate the fame of the Seven Wise Men, both for their wisdom itself, and for their brief sententious form of expressing it; and some ancient writers even reckoned him in the number of those sages. (Plat. Protag. p. 343, c.; comp. Schn. p. xxxvi. foll.) The leading principle of his philosophy appears to have been the calm enjoyment of the pleasures of the present life, both intellectual and material, the making as light as possible of its cares, patience in bearing its evils, and moderation in the standard by which human character should be judged. He appears to have taken no pleasure in the higher regions of speculative philosophy. (See especially, Plat. l.c. and foll.; Schn. pp. xxxiv. xxxv.) Of the numerous witty sayings ascribed to him, the following may serve as an example: to a person who pre served a dead silence during a banquet, he said, "My friend, if you are a fool, you are doing a wise thing; but if you are wise, a foolish one." (Plutarch, Conv. iii. Prooem.)

Though he was moderate and indulgent in his views of human life, yet the moral sentiments embodied in his poems were so generally sound, that, in his own age, he obtained the approval of the race of men who fought at Marathon and Salamis, and in the succeeding period of moral and poetical decline his gnomic poetry was extolled by the admirers of that earlier age, in contrast to the licentious strains of Gnesippus, and his scola still continued to be sung at banquets, though the "young generation" affected to despise them. (Aristoph. Nub. 1355—1362; Ath. xiv. p. 638, e.; Schol. ad Aristoph. Vesp. 1217.) Even the philosophers were indebted to Simonides and the other gnomic poets for their most admired conceptions; thus Prodicus, in his celebrated Choice of Hercules, followed an Epinician Ode of Simonides, which again was a paraphrase of the well-known lines of Hesiod (Op. et Di. 265), τῇ ἐφέτει τῷ ἠθῶν, &c. (See Schn. p. xxxix. and Fr. 32.) Simonides is said to have been the inventor of the mimemonic art and of the long vowels and double letters in the Greek alphabet. The latter statement cannot be accepted literally, but this is not the place to discuss it.

The other side of the picture may be described almost in one word: Simonides made literature a profession, and sought for its pecuniary rewards in a spirit somewhat inconsistent with his proverbial moderation. He is said to have been the first who took money for his poems; and the reproach of avarice is too often brought against him by his contemporary and rival, Pindar, as well as by subsequent writers, to be altogether discredited. (Schn. pp. xxiv.—xxvii.) The feelings of the poet himself upon the subject can be gathered from his own expressions, if we may believe the stories related of him. His sense of the emptiness of mere fame, his conviction that he deserved all he obtained, mingled with the bitter consciousness to which he sarcastically gave utterance, that mind was at the command of money, may be illustrated by the following anecdotes. In the height of his prosperity, he used to say that he had two coffers, the one for thanks, the other for money; the former always empty, and the latter always full. (Plut. de Ser. Num. Vind. p. 555, 1.; Schol. ad Aristoph. Pac. 681; the latter writer tells the story with a prudent reserve as to its truth.) On one occasion (if the details of the story be correct, it must have been near the commencement of his career), he had wandered about in Asia, seeking to relieve his poverty by his art, and had collected a considerable sum with which he was about to return home, when the ship was wrecked on the coast of Asia Minor. Simonides remained unconcerned, while all his fellow-voyagers were collecting their goods, and, being asked the reason, he replied, "I carry all my property about me." When the ship broke up, many, encumbered with their burthens, perished in the waves, the rest were plundered by robbers as soon as they reached the shore, and had to go a-begging; while the poet at once obtained shelter, clothing, and money, in the neighbouring city of Ciaziomenae (Plaedr. Fab. iv.). On being asked, by the wife of Hiero, which was the more powerful, the wealthy or the wise man, he replied, "The wealthy; for the wise may always be seen hanging about the doors of the rich." (Aristot. Rhet. ii. 6.)

These and similar stories may not be literally true, but they embody the feelings natural to the man who makes a traffic of his genius too well to be lightly passed over.

That the system of patronage under which the poet flourished, and that independence of his spirit and the uprightness of his conduct, is plain, not only from the nature of the case, and from various anecdotes, but also from the express and important statement of Plato, who makes Socrates say that "Simonides was often induced to praise a tyrant, or some other of such persons, and to write encomiums upon them, not willingly, but by compulsion," as in the case, already referred to, of Scopas, the son of Creon. (Protag. p. 346, b. Our space does not permit us to discuss the criticism of Socrates on that Epichinian Ode; our conviction is, after repeatedly studying it, in its connection both with the whole dialogue and with the life of Simonides, that it is meant for a bona fide exposition, and not a mere sophistical darkening of a poem already obscure, for the purpose of perplexing or confounding Protagoras; the latter end had already been sufficiently attained.) It is also clear that the bitter enmities between Simonides and Pindar were chiefly the fruit of their unclely competition for the favour of Hiero. (See Schneidewin, p. xxx.)

The chief characteristics of the poetry of Simonides were sweetness (whence his surname of Melicertes) and elaborate finish, combined with the truest poetic conception and perfect power of expression; though in originality and fervour he was far inferior, not only to the early lyric poets, such as Sappho and Alcaeus, but also to his contemporary Pindar. He was probably both the most prolific and the most generally popular of all the Grecian lyric poets. The following is a list of those of his compositions of which we possess either the titles or fragments:—1. A Poem, the precise form of which is unknown, on "The Empire of Cambyses and Darius" (καὶ Καμβίσου καὶ Δαρείου βασιλείας). 2, 3. Elegies on the battles of Artemision and Salamis (ἐν Ἀρτεμίσιον καὶ Σαλαμίνων μάχαις). 4. Eulogistic Poems in various metres (ἐγκώμια). 5. Epichinian Odes (ἐπίκουροι ὁδαῖ). 6. Hymns or Prayers (θυμά, καταχώρια). 7. Paeans (παίαινες). 8. Dithyrambs (δίθραμβοι, also called τραγῳδία, see Schmidt, Diubrite in Diithrymb. p. 131). 9. Drinking songs (σκώλες). 10. Parthenia (παρθένια). 11. Lyric poems (ὑποχρήσματα). 12. Laments (Ἀργόνθια). 13. Elegies (ἐλεγεῖαι). 14. Epigrams (ἐπιγράμματα, ἐπισκευασματα). The most remarkable of these fragments is his Epichinian Odes and The fragment of his Lament of Danae; is one of the finest remains of Greek lyric poetry that we possess. The general character of the dialect of Simonides is, like that of Pindar, the Epic, mingled with Doric and Aeolic forms. Respecting the minute peculiarities of his language and of his metres, see Schneidewin, pp. xlv.—lxxii.

Of the ancient commentaries on his life and writings, by far the most important was that of Chamaeleon, notices from which are preserved by Athenaeus (x. p. 456, ε., xii. p. 611, a. xiv. p. 656, ε.). The Egyptian or Athenian grammatical Palæographus wrote ὄνομασιν εἰς Σίμωνιν. His fragments are contained in the chief collections of the Greek poets, in Brunck's Analecta, vol. i. pp. 120—147, who gives with them those which belong to the other poets of the same name, in Jacobs's Anthologia Graeca, vol. i. pp. 57—80, in Schneidewin's standard edition, and in his Delectus Paeonius Graecorum, pp. 376—426, and in Bergk's Paeonia Lyrae Graeci, pp. 741—806. (For the editions of portions see Hoffman, Lexicon Bibli. Script. Graec.)

3. The younger Simonides of Ceos is said by Suidas to have been, according to some, the son of the daughter of the former, to have flourished before the Peloponnesian War, and to have written a Πενελοπία in three books, and Εὔφραμα in three books.

4. A Magnesian epic poet of the time of Antiochus the Great, whose exploits, and especially his battle with the Gauls, he celebrated in a poem. (Suid. s. v.; Vossius, Hist. Graec. p. 161, ed. Westermann.)

5. Of Caryus or Eretria, an epic poet, only mentioned by Suidas (s. v.), who gives a most confused account of his works.

6. An historian, contemporary with the philosopher Speusippus, to whom he wrote an account of the acts of Dion and Bion (Diog. Laërt. iv. 5). He must therefore have flourished in the latter half of the fourth century B.C. He also wrote a work upon Sicily, which is quoted in the Scholia to Theocritus (i. 65).
SIMPPLICIUS. 527

But, disappointed in their hopes, they returned home, after Kosroes, in a treaty of peace concluded with Justinian, probably in A.D. 533, had stipulated that the above-mentioned philosophers should be allowed to return without risk, and to practise the rites of their paternal faith (Agathias ii. 30; comp. C. G. Zumpt, Ueber den Bestand der philosophischen Schulen in Athen, in the Schriften der Berl. Akademie, 1843). Of the subsequent fortunes of the seven philosophers we learn nothing. As little do we know where Simplicius lived and taught. That he not only wrote, but taught, is proved by the address to his hearers in the commentary on the Physica Ausculatio of Aristotle (f. 175), as well as by the title of his commentary on the C. Morea. He had removed his training partly in Alexandria, under Ammonius (see especially Simplicius in II. de Coelo, f. 113), partly in Athens, as a disciple of Damascus; and it was probably in one of these two cities that he subsequently took up his abode; for, with the exception of these cities and Constantinople, it would have been difficult to find a town which possessed the collections of books requisite for the composition of his commentaries, and he could hardly have had any occasion to betake himself to Constantinople. As to his personal history, especially his migration to Persia, no definite allusions are to be found in the writings of Simplicius. Only at the end of his explanation of the treatise of Epicetus (p. 331, ed. Heins.) Simplicius mentions, with gratitude, the consolation which he had found under tyrannical oppression in such ethical contemplations; from which it may be concluded, though uncertain, that a small amount of probability, that it was composed during, or immediately after, the above-mentioned persecutions. Of the commentaries on Aristotle, that on the books de Coelo was written before that on the Physica Ausculatio, and probably not in Alexandria, since he mentions in it an astronomical observation made during his stay in that city by Ammonius (L. c. f. 113; Brandis, Scholia in Arist. p. 496. 28). Simplicius wrote his commentary on the Physica Ausculatio after the death of Damascus, and therefore after his return from Persia (in Arist. Phys. Aue. f. 184, &c.). After the Phys. Aue. Simplicius seems to have applied himself to the Metaphysica, and then to the books on the soul (de Anima). In the commentary on the latter he refers to his explanations on the Physica Ausculatio and on the Metaphysica (in Arist. de Anima, 55, b. 7, 61). When it was finished, the translation of which was no longer possible because the text had become too obscure, and the translation which was made was not considered correct, then the commentary on the above-mentioned Aristotelian treatises is impossible to ascertain.

Simplicius, in his mode of explaining and understanding his author, attaches himself to the Neo-Platonists; like them, he endeavours, frequently by forced interpretations, to show that Aristotle agrees with Plato even on those points which he contradicts, and contradicts them only that, by setting aside superficial interpretations, he may lead the way to their deeper, hidden meaning. In his view not only Plutus, but also Sýrians, Proclus, and even Ammonius, are great philosophers, who have penetrated into the depths of the wisdom of Plato. Many of the more remarkable Greek philosophemata also he brings into much too close a connection with Platonism. He is, however, advantageously distinguished from his predecessors, whom he so extravagantly admires, partly in confounding and jumbling things together much less than they do, especially in making very much less frequent application of spurious Orphic, Hermetic, Chaldaic, and other Theololagomena of the East, and in not giving himself up to a belief in the magical theurgic superstition; partly in proceeding much more carefully and modestly in the explanation and criticism of particular points, and in striving with unwearied diligence to draw from the original sources a thorough knowledge of the older Greek philosophy. His commentaries may, therefore, without hesitation, be regarded as the richest in their contents of any that have come down to us bearing on the explanation of Aristotle. But for them, we should be without the most important fragments of the writings of the Eleatics, of Empedocles, Anaxagoras, of Aristotelian Apollonius, and others, which were at that time already very scarce (in Phys. Aue. c. 31), as well as without many extracts from the lost books of Aristotle, Theophrastus and Eudemus; but for them we should hardly be able to unriddle the doctrine of the Categories, so important for the system of the Stoics. It is true he himself complains that in his time both the school and the writings of the followers of Zeno had perished (in Arist. de Cuelo, 79, b). But where he cannot draw immediately from the original sources, he looks round for guides whom he can depend upon, who had made use of those sources. In addition, we have to thank him for such copious quotations from the Greek commentaries from the time of Andronicus Rhodos down to Ammonius and Damascius, that, for the Categories and the Physics, the outlines of a history of the interpretation and criticism of Aristotelian writings may be composed (comp. Ch. A. Brandis, liber der Reihenfolge der Bücher des Aristotelischen Organon und ihre Griechischen Ausleger, 1833). With a correct idea of their importance, Simplicius has made the most diligent use of the commentaries of Alexander Aphrodisiensis and Porphyrus; and although he often enough combats the views of the former, he knew how to value, as it deserved, his (in the main) sound critical exegetical sense. He has also preserved for us intelligence of several more ancient readings, which now, in part, have vanished from the manuscripts without leaving any trace, and in the paraphrastic sections of his interpretations furnishes us here and there with valuable contributions for correcting or settling the text of Aristotle. Not less valuable are the contributions towards a knowledge of the ancient astronomical systems for which we have to thank him in his commentary on the books de Cuelo. We even find in his writings some traces of a position for the observation of nature. (Comm. in Phys. Aue. 173, 176; de Anima, 35, b, 36.)

That Simplicius continued averse to Christianity cannot be doubted, although he abstains from as- sizing peculiarly Christian doctrines, even when he combats expressly and with bitterness the work of his contemporary, Johannes Grammann or Philoponus, directed against the Aristotelian doctrine of the eternity of the universe (in Arist. de Cuelo, 6, b, &c., 72; in Phys. Aue. 257, 262, &c., 312, &c., 320); whether it was that he feared the church, which had now attained to unrestricted dominion, or that he no longer felt himself firmly enough rooted in the heathen faith. In Ethics he seems to have abandoned the mystical pantheistic purification-theory of the Neo-Platonists, and to have found full satisfaction in the ethical system of the later stoics, which approximated to that of Christianity, however little he was disposed towards their logical and physical doctrines, which indeed were almost given up by Epictetus.

Of the commentaries of Simplicius on Aristotle which have come down to us, that on the books de Anima is palpably inferior to the rest in the copiousness of its information respecting the doctrines of earlier philosophers, as well as in the care shown in making use of preceding interpreters, though there is no reason for considering it spurious. Besides these commentaries of Simplicius which have been preserved, he himself mentions explanations on the metaphysical books (see above), and an epitome of the Physica of Theophrastus. (Simplicius, in Arist. de Anima, 31.)

Editions.—Simplicius's commentary on the Categories was the first that was published (by Zacharias Calligerus, Venet. 1499, fol.), under the title, Συμπληκτικὸς διδασκαλία τοῦ μεγάλου σχέδου ἀπὸ φωνῆς αὐτοῦ εἰς τὰς Ἀριστοτελέων κατηγορίας. A second edition was published at Basle, in 1551, by Michael Isingrin. A Latin translation of this work, by Guili Dorotheus, was published at Venice, 1541, by Hieron. Scotus. An anonymous translation was published in the same place in 1550 and 1567. Fabricius mentions two other translations, published at Venice in 1500 and 1516. The earlier translation of Guili de Moerbekae appears to be still unprinted. Then, in 1526, Franciscus Asulaneus, the heil of the Aldi, published the commentary on the Physica Aueclatdio, and, in the same year, the commentary on the books de Cuelo (Venet. fol.). The Latin translation of the former by Luclius Philalethus was published at Venice, by Hieron Scotus, in 1543, 1565, 1567, and 1587, and at Paris in 1545, fol.; the translation of the latter by Guili de Moerbeka was published at Venice in 1540, fol., that by Guili Dorotheus at the same place in 1544, and, without the name of the translator, at the same place, in 1548, 1555, 1563, and 1584, fol. That the printed Greek text of the commentary on the books de Cuelo is probably a re-translation from the Latin version of Moerbeka, was first suggested by Amad. Peyron, who at the same time gave specimens of the genuine Greek text, in the fragments of Empedocles and Parmenides (Empedocellis et Parmenidum fragmenta ex codice Taurinensis Bibliothecae restituta et illustrata, ab A. Peyron, Lips. 1810.) Extracts from this commentary, according to the genuine text, which exists in a number of manuscripts, may be found in the Scholia in Aristotelis, ed. Ch. A. Brandis, Berol. 1836., pp. 465–518. A complete and amended edition of the commentaries of Simplicius on the Physica Aueclatdio and the treatise de Cuelo, is being prepared by C. Gabr. Cobet, in conjunction with Simon Karsten. The commentary on the books de Anima was published, together with the explanations of Alexander Aphrodisiensis on the book de Sensu et Sensibilii, and the paraphrase of Michael Ephesius on the so-called Parva Naturalia, in Greek, also by Asulaneus, Venet. 1537. The Latin translation by Joh. Fasolus was published at Venice in 1543, fol., and another by Emanuel. Lungs, in 1564 and 1567. The introduction (prooemium), which is wanting in the Greek edition, is printed separately in Iriarte, Cat.

[Ch. A. B.]

SIMUS (Σίμως), or Simon, of Magnesia, a lyric poet, to whom is ascribed the invention of that sportive and licentious species of poetry, which was called from its character λαρεμία, and from its author Σιμωθ. The time at which he lived is not stated. The chief followers of Simus in this description of poetry were Lysias and Magus; and they had many imitators, who were called Σιμωθι, Λαυραθι, and Μαγραθι. (Strab. xiv. p. 616, a.; Ath. xiv. p. 620, d.; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. ii. p. 151; Bode, Gesch. d. Hellen. Literatur, ii. p. 323.) [Ch. A. B.]

SIMUS, artist. 1. A painter, of second-rate merit, to whom Pliny ascribes the following works: a youth resting in a fuller's workshop; a person celebrating the festival called Quinquatrus; and an excellent picture of Nemesis. (Plin. H. N. xxv. 11. s. 40. § 39.)

2. A statuary of Salamis, the son of Themistocrates, whose name is known to us by two extant inscriptions. The one of these is upon a base in the Louvre, brought from Thera, which, from the marks upon it, evidently supported a bronze statute; and we learn from the inscription that the statue, which was probably that of some private person, was dedicated to Dionysus; not, as Sillig states, a statue of Dionysus. (Clarac. No. 660; Osann, Syllag. p. 365, No. xxvi.; Böckh, C. I. No. 2465; R. Rochette, Lettre à M. Schora, p. 402.) The other inscription, in which this artist is mentioned, is published by R. Rochette (p. 409), from a copy published by Ross in a letter from Athens, dated Dec. 23, 1843. It is on a base found in Rhodes, which supported the statue of a certain Hippomachus, the son of Stratippus, who had discharged the offices of agothete and choragus; the statue was dedicated to the gods by Simyctius of Athens. From the nature of this monument and the form of both inscriptions, R. Rochette infers that Simus belonged to the Alexandrian period, which was marked by the erection of such honorific statues. [P. S.]

SIMULUS (Σίμους), 1. An Athenian comic poet of the middle comedy, who is known by an extant inscription to have exhibited a play in the archonship of Diotimus, Ol. 106. 2, n. c. 334. (Böckh. C. I. vol. i. p. 353.) Of the title of the play in the inscription, only the last three letters, σιμ, remain; Böckh conjectures that it was Σιμικατον. His Marsyas is cited by Pollux (x. 42), and there are a few other references to him. (Meineke, Frag. Com. Graec. vol. i. pp. 424, 425; Edito Minor, Adenda ad p. 794, p. xviii.)

2. An inferior tragic actor in the time of Demosthenes, who charges Aeschines with having hired himself to Simylus and Socrates, as their triagonist. (Demosth. de Coron. p. 314, comp. Anon. Vit. Aeschin.; Harpocr. and Suid. s. v.) The old editions of Demosthenes have Σιμικατον, but Maussacus (ad Harpoc. l. c.) has clearly shown that Σιμίκατον is the true reading, and the editors, from Reiske downwards, have adopted it. Athenaeus (viii. p. 349) quotes from Theophrastus a curious epithet aimed at Simylus by the musician Stratonicus, the point of which can hardly be given in English. (See Maussacus, l. c.) The tragic actor has been confounded with the comic poet; but Meineke observes (l. c.) that such a combination of professions is very improbable both in itself, and on account of the express testimony of Plato, that the same persons were never both tragic and comic actors. [P. S.]

SINATRUS or SINTRICUS, a king of Parthia. [Arsaces XI.]

SINIS or SINNIS (Σίνις or Σίννος), a son of Polyphem, Pemon or Poseidon by Sylea, the daughter of Corinthus. He was summoned according to some Ptolemycaptives, and according to others Procrustes. He dwelt on the isthmus of Corinth as a robber, destroying the travellers whom he had conquered, by fastening them to the top of a fir-tree, which he curbed, and then let spring up a spring of blood from his own throat in the manner by Theseus (Apollod. iii. 16. § 2; Plut. These. 3; Paus. ii. § 3, &c.; Diod. iv. 59; Eurip. Hippol. 977; Ov. Met. vii. 440, &c.; Hygin. Fab. 38; Schol. Pind. Hippoth. Isid.)

When Theseus had accomplished this, he caused himself to be purified by Phytalus at the altar of Zeus Mellichios, because Theseus himself was related to Sinis (Paus. i. 37. § 3), or according to others, he propitiated the spirit of Sinis by instituting in his honour the Isthmian games (Schol. Pind. l. c.; Pint. Thes. 25; Wcker, Nachtrag, p. 153). The name is connected with σίνωμα, expressing the manner in which he tore his victims to pieces. [L. S.]

SINNACHES, one of the leading nobles in Parthia, dissatisfied with the reigning monarch, Artabanus III. (Arsaces XIX.), sent an embassy to Rome in a. d. 65, in conjunction with the enmich Abdes, praying Tiberius to send to Parthia one of the sons of Artabanus IV. to become a king. Sinnaches subsequently took an active part in the wars against Artabanus. (Tac. Ann. vi. 31, 32, 36, 37.) [Arsaces XIX.]

SINOE (Σίνω), an Arcadian nymph, brought up the god Pan, who derived from her the surname Sineus. (Paus. viii. 30. § 2.)

SINON (Σίνων), a son of Aesimus, or according to Virgil (Aen. ii. 79) of Siyaphus, and a grandson of Autolycus, was a relation of Odysseus, and is described in later poems as having accompanied his kinsman to Troy (Tzetz. ad Lyceoph. 344; Heyne, Excurs. iv. ad Virg. Aen. ii.). According to these traditions, he allowed himself to be taken prisoner by the Trojans, after he had mutilated himself in such a manner as to make them believe that he had been ill-treated by the Greeks. He told the Trojans that he was hated by Odysseus, and had been selected by him to be sacrificed, because Apollo had ordered a human sacrifice to be offered, that the Greeks might safely depart from the coast of Troy, and added that he had escaped death by flight. When he was asked what was the purport of the wooden horse, he told them that it had been constructed as an atonement for the Palladium which had been carried off, and that if the Trojans ventured to destroy it, their kingdom should fall, but that SIRENES.

if they would draw it with their own hands into their own city, Asia would gain the supremacy over Greece (Verg. Aen. ii. 57, &c.; Tzetz. Pont. hom. 600, &c.). The Trojans took his advice, and when the horse was drawn into the city, he gave the preconceived signal, opened the door of the horse, and the Greeks rushing out took possession of Troy (Verg. Aen. ii. 259; Dict. Cret. v. 12; Hygin. Fab. 108). Quintus Smyrnaeus and Tryphiodorus have somewhat modified this tradition, respecting which see Heyne, l.c. In the Lesche at Delphi he was represented as a companion of Odysseus. (Paus. x. 27.) [L. S.] SINOPLE (Σινώπη), a daughter of Aeson by Metope, or of Ares by Aegina or Parnassa. Apollo carried her off from Boeotia, and conveyed her to Paphlagonia on the Euxine, where she gave birth to Cyrus, and where the town of Sinope was named after her. (Diod. iv. 72; Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. ii. 946.) [L. S.]

SYPYRUS (Σιπύρος), one of the sons of Amphion and Niobe. (Apollod. iii. 5; &c.; Od. vi. 231; comp. Niobe.) [L. S.]

SYPYRRHICAS. [Πυρρήθας].

SIRENES or SIRENEUS (Σηρινεός), mythical beings who were believed to have the power of enchanting and charming, by their song, any one who heard them. When Odysseus, in his wanderings through the Mediterranean, came near the island on the lovely beach of which the Sirens were sitting, and endeavouring to allure him and his companions, he, on the advice of Circe, stuffed the ears of his companions with wax, and tied himself to the mast of his vessel, until he was so far off that he could no longer hear their song (Hom. Od. xii. 39, &c., 166, &c.). According to Homer, the island of the Sirens was situated between Aeaean and the rock of Scylla, near the south-western coast of Italy. Homer says nothing of their number, but later writers mention both their names and number; some state that they were two, Aghaphene and Thekxiopia (Eustath. ad Hom. p. 1709); and others that there were three, Peisinoe, Aghape, and Thekxiopia (Tzetz. ad Lysip. 712), or Parthenoike, Ligeia, and Leucosia (Eustath. l.c.; Strab. v. pp. 246, 252; Solin. de prid. diis ii. 14), of Acheoleus and Sterope (Apollod. i. 7, § 10), of Terpsichore (Apollon. Rhod. iv. 893), of Melpomene (Apollod. i. 3, § 4), of Calliope (Serv. ad Aen. v. 364), or of Gaia (Eurip. Hec. 168). Their place of abode is likewise different in the different traditions, for some place them on cape Pelorum others in the island of Anthemusa, and others again in the Sirenusian islands near Paestum, or in Capreae (Strab. i. p. 22; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 1709; Serv. l.c.). The Sirens are also connected with the legends about the Argonauts and the rape of Persephone. When the Argonauts, it is said, passed by the Sirens, the latter began to sing, but in vain, for Orpheus rivalled and surpassed them; and as it had been decreed that they should live only till some one hearing their song should pass by unmoved, they threw themselves into the sea, and were metamorphosed into rocks. Some writers connected the self-destruction of the Sirens with the story of Orpheus and the Argonauts, and others with that of Odysseus (Strab. v. p. 252; Orph. Arg. 1234; Apollod. i. 9, § 25; Hygin. Fab. 141). Late poets represent them as provided with wings, which they are said to have received at their own request, in order to be able to search after Persephone (Ov. Met. v. 552), or as a punishment from Demeter for not having assisted Persephone (Hygin. t. c.), or from Aphrodite, because they wished to remain virgins (Eustath. l.c.; Aelian, H.A. xvii. 23; Apollon. Rhod. iv. 896). Once, however, they allowed themselves to be prevailed upon by Hera to enter into a contest with the Muses, and being defeated, they were deprived of their wings (Paus. ix. 34. § 2; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 85). There was a temple of the Sirens near Surrentum, and the tomb of Parthenope was believed to be near Neapolis. (Strab. i. p. 23, v. p. 246.) [L. S.]

SIRICIUS. Upon the death of Damascus in A. D. 384, Siricius, a Roman presbyter, was nominated his successor by the united suffrages of all classes of the community, and his conduct throughout the fourteen years during which he occupied the papal chair proved the wisdom of the choice. Of simple habits and gentle disposition, he laboured incessantly to preserve the purity and unity of the Church over which he presided, his efforts being chiefly directed against the growing heresy of the Priscillianists, who had made great progress in Gaul, against Jovinianus, and against the heresies of the sea of Antioch by the perjured Flavianus, with whom, however, he was eventually reconciled, through the mediation of Chrysostom. His death happened towards the close of the year A. D. 398.

Six epistles by this prelate have been preserved, being, as Du Pin observes, the first decretales which truly belong to the pope whose name they bear.

I. Ad Himericum Tarraconensem Episcopum, written A. D. 385, in reply to several questions which had been proposed to Damascus, in reference to the re-admission of Arians; to the period at which baptism ought to be administered; to the forgiveness of contrite apostates; to the lawfulness of marrying a woman already promised to another; to the treatment of penitents who had relapsed into sin; to the necessity of celibacy in the clergy; to the conduct to be observed by those ecclesiastics who were married before they entered the priesthood; to the ordination of monks; and to penance among the clergy. There is one instructional and sage epistle to the bishops on the subject. As it is contained in the distinct discipline of the see of Antioch, the rules here laid down were probably never strictly observed. A youth, we are told, intended for Holy Orders, ought to be baptized when very young, and placed among the readers; at the age of thirty, if he has conducted himself with propriety, he may become an acolyte and sub-deacon, provided always he does not marry more than once, and does not marry a widow; five years afterwards he may be ordained deacon, when he must bind himself to celibacy; after another period of five years has elapsed he may be admitted to the priesthood, that is, he may become a presbyter; and in ten years more may be made a bishop.

II. Ad Angium Thessalonicensem Episcopum, of uncertain date, but belonging probably to A. D. 385, requesting information with regard to the state of the Churches in Illyria.

III. Ad Episcopum Africae, written on the 6th of January, A. D. 386. It has always been regarded with suspicion and almost proved to be a forgery by the researches of Quenel (Append. ad Leonis Magni Opera Diss. xv.), although its authenticity has found a warm advocate in Baluze. (See his Dissertatio de Concilio Teleptensi.)

IV. Ad diversos Episcopos. The original title is lost. Written, probably, about A.D. 386, exhorting the prelates to whom it is addressed to observe closely the rules laid down by the Council of Nice regarding the choice and ordination of bishops.

V. Ad diversos Episcopos contra Joviniannum, written about the commencement of A.D. 393, announcing to the Church at Milan the condemnation of Jovinian by the unanimous voice of the whole Roman clergy assembled in judgment (omnia nostrum tam Presbyterorum et Diacorum, quam etiam totozis Cleri una sententia). The reply of Ambrose is still extant.

VI. Ad Amapium Thessalianensem Episcopum et alios Illryici Episcopos de Bonoso. Written at the very end of A.D. 391, or in the early part of A.D. 392, in reply to the application of the Illyrian bishops, who had requested his advice with regard to Bonosus, charged with having maintained that the Virgin Mary had borne children after the birth of our Lord. A reference is here made to the deliberations upon this very question at the Council of Capua, held in November, A.D. 391. This letter was ascribed at one time to Ambrose, and by some, most ignorantly, to Damasus, but has been fully proved by Justellos, in his Code of Canons (Bvo. Par. 1610, 1615, 1660, Not. ad Canon. 40, Cod. Venet. Afric.), and by others to be the production of Sisenna.

Several epistles have been lost, such as:—Ad Maximum Imperatorem, A.D. 385, praying for the discouragement of the Priscillianists; De Ictacianorum Causa, A.D. 386; Ad Theodosium Imperatorem, against Flavianus; Ad Rufinum, A.D. 398, an account of which, as well as of those falsely attributed to Sisenna, will be found in Constant.

SISENNA, P. CORNELIUS, praeutor urbanus in b.c. 183. (Livy.xxxix.43.)

SISENNA, CN. CORNELIUS occurs only on coins, a specimen of which is annexed. The obverse represents the head of Pallas with sisenna and roma, the reverse Jupiter in a quadriga hurling his thunderbolt at the prostrate giants. The sun, the moon, and a star are also seen on the reverse; the legend is CN. CORNEL. L. F.

COIN OF CN. CORNELIUS SISENNA.

SISENNAN, A. GABNIUS. [GABNIUS, No. 6.]

SISENNA, NUMMIUS, consul under Hadrian, A.D. 133, with M. Antonius Hiberus (Fasti.)

SISENNA TAURUS, STATIIUS. [TAURUS.]

SISINES (Σισίνης), a Persian, who, according to Curtius (iii. 4), was sent on an embassy to Philip of Macedon by the satrap of Egypt, and was induced to remain in the Macedonian service. He accompanied Alexander the Great on his expedition into Asia; and, while the army was in Cilicia, in B.C. 333, he received a letter from Nabarzanes, a Persian officer, urging upon him the assassination of Alexander. The letter, however, had previously fallen into the king's hands, who had re-sealed it, and caused it to be delivered to Sisines, with the view of testing his fidelity.

Sisines intended to acquaint Alexander with its contents, but several days elapsed without his finding an opportunity of doing so, and Alexander, therefore, feeling sure of his treachery, ordered him to be put to death.

The name Sisines appears to be only another form of Assines. (See Art. Aenab. i. 25.) [E. E.]

SISINNA was, according to Appian (B.C. v. 7), the name of the son of Glaphyn, to whom Antony gave the kingdom of Cappadocia. Other writers, however, call him Archelaus, under which head an account of him is given. [ARCHELAUS, No. 4.]

SISPEL. [SOPES.]

SISYGAMBIS (Σισυγάμμης), mother of Dareius Codomannus, king of Persia, appears to have been a daughter of Ostanes, a younger brother of Artaxerxes Mnemon, though some writers consider her as a daughter of Artaxerxes himself. (See Wesseling ad Diod. xvii. 5.) She was married to her brother (or cousin) Arsamenes, and bore seven children, of whom Dareius was the only one that grew up to manhood. (Curt. v. 5, § 23.) After the accession of her son, Sisygambis was treated with the utmost reverence and honor, according to the Persian custom, and accompanied Dareius on his campaign against Alexander in B.C. 333, which terminated in the disastrous battle of Issus. After that defeat she fell, together with the wife and daughters of Dareius, into the hands of the conqueror, who treated them with the greatest generosity and kindness, and displayed towards Sisygambis, in particular, a reverence and delicacy of conduct, which is one of the brightest ornaments of his character. (Arrian. Anab. ii. 11, 12; Plut. Alex. 21; Diod. xvii. 37, 38; Curt. iii. 3. § 22, 11. § 21—26, 12; Justin. xi. 9.) So great, indeed, was the influence which she continued to enjoy, that she ventured, on one occasion, to intercede in favour of Madates, a Persian, who had especially incurred the wrath of Alexander, and her prayer was immediately granted. (Curt. v. 3. § 12.) It is probable that the generous and magnanimous character of Sisygambis herself,—of which she afforded a striking proof by refusing to avail herself of the confusion during the battle of Arbela to make her escape,— contributed much to maintain the respect and affection with which Alexander appears to have regarded her, and which he displayed on various occasions by the most delicate and deferential attentions. (Curt. iv. 10, § 20, 15. § 10, v. 2. § 17—21; Diod. xvii. 59.) On her part, the captive queen had conceived so strong an attachment for her conqueror, that she felt his death as a blow not less severe than that of her own son; and overcome by this long succession of misfortunes, put an end to her own life by voluntary starvation. (Diod. xviii. 118; Curt. x. 5. § 19—24; Justin. xiii. 1.)

SISYPHUS (Σισυφός), a son of Aeolus and Enarete, whence he is called Aeolides (Hom. Il. vi. 154; Horat. Carm. ii. 14. 20). He was accordingly a brother of Cretheus, Athamas, Salmonesus, Deion, Magnes, Perieres, Canace, Alcyone, Peisidice, Calcye and Perimede (Apollod. i. 7, § 3; Paus. x. 31. § 2). He was married to Merope, a daughter of Atlas or a Pleiad (Apollod. i. 9, § 3; Ov. Fast. iv. 175; comp. Merope), and became by her the father of Glaucus, Ornyntion (or Parphyron, Schol. ad Apollon. Rhode. iii. 1094), Thersandrus, and Halimus (Paus. ii. 4. § 3, ix. 34. § 5). In later accounts he is also called a son of Autolyces, and the father of Simon (Serv. ad Aen. ii. 79) and Odyssseus, who is hence called Sisyphides (Ov. Met. xiii. 31; Serv. ad Aen. iv. 532; Theoph. ad Lycean. 314; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 1701). He is said to have built the town of Ephyra, afterwards Corinth (Hom. Il. vi. 153; Apollod. i. 9. § 3), though, according to another tradition, Medea, on leaving Corinth, gave him the government of that city (Paus. ii. 3, in fin.). As king of Corinth he promoted navigation and commerce, but was fraudulent, avaricious, and altogether of bad character, and his whole house was in as bad repute as he himself (Hom. Il. vi. 153; Theogn. 703, 712; Schol. ad Aristoph. Acharn. 390, ad Soph. Aj. 190; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 1701; Tzetz. ad Lyceol. 980; Ov. Her. xii. 204; Horat. Sat. ii. 17. 12). He is said to have found the body of Melicertes on the coast of Corinth, to have buried it on the isthmus, and to have founded the Isthmian games in honour of him (Iro and Palamon, Paus. ii. 1. § 3; Apollod. iii. 4. § 3; Schol. ad Apollon. Rhode. iii. 1240; Tzetz. ad Lyceol. 107, 229). His wickedness during life was severely punished in the lower world, where he had to roll up hill a huge marble block, which as soon as it reached the top always rolled down again (Cic. Tusc. i. 5; Virg. Georg. iii. 39; Ov. Met. iv. 429, 11. 175; Luctret. iii. 1013). The special reasons for this punishment are not the same in all authors; some say that it was because he had betrayed the designs of the gods (Serv. ad Aen. vi. 616; Schol. ad Hom. Il. i. 180, vi. 153), others because he attacked travellers, and killed them with a huge block of stone. He was slain, according to some, by Theseus (Schol. ad Stat. Theb. ii. 330), while other traditions relate that Sisyphus lived in enmity with his brother Salmonesus, and consulted the oracle how he might get rid of him. Apollo answered, that if he begat sons by Tyro, the wife of his brother, they would avenge him. Sisyphus indeed became the father of two sons by Tyro, but the mother killed them immediately after their birth. Sisyphus took cruel vengeance on her, and was punished for it.
in the lower world (Hygin. Fab. 60). Another tradition states that when Zeus had carried off Aegina, the daughter of Asopus, from Phlius, Sisyphus betrayed the matter to Asopus, and was rewarded by him with a well on Acrocorinthus, but Zeus punished him in the lower world. (Apollod. i. 9. § 3, iii. 12. § 6; Paus. ii. 5. § 1; Tzet. ad Lyceph. 176.) Others, again, say that Zeus, to avenge his treachery, sent Death to Sisyphus, who, however, succeeded in putting Death into chains, so that no man died until Ares delivered Death, whereupon Sisyphus himself also expired (Eustath. ad Hom. pp. 631, 1702). Before he died he desired his wife not to bury him. She was accordingly compelled to render the body to Sisyphus, and the soul of the lower world complained of his being neglected, and desired Pluto, or Persephone, to allow him to return to the upper world to punish his wife.

When this request was granted, he refused to return to the lower world, until Hermes carried him off by force; and this piece of treachery is said to be the cause of his punishment (Eustath. l. c.; Theogn. 700, &c.; Schol. ad Pind. Isthm. i. 97, ad Soph. Aeg. 625; Horat. Carm. ii. 24. 20). His punishment was represented by Polygnotus in the Lesce at Delphi (Paus. x. 31. § 2). He is believed to have been buried on the isthmus, but very few even among his contemporaries knew the exact place. (Paus. ii. 2. § 2; comp. Völcker, Mythol. des Tapet. Gesch. p. 241.)

SITALCES (Σιτάλες), king of Thrace, or rather of the powerful Thracian tribe of the Odrysians, was a son of Teres, whom he succeeded on the throne. His father had deserted the latter to the latter, in order to make him a powerful and extensive monarchy (Τερές), but he himself increased it still further by successful wars, so that his dominions ultimately comprised the whole territory from Abdera to the mouths of the Danube, and from Byzantium to the sources of the Strymon (Thuc. ii. 29, 97; Diod. xii. 50). The date of his accession is unknown, but it seems certain that Diodorus (l. c.) is in error in representing it as immediately preceding the Peloponnesian War: and Sitalces must at that period have been long seated on the throne, as he had already raised his power to the height of greatness at which we then find it. It was in the first year of that war (b. c. 431) that he was persuaded by Nymphoodoros, the son of Pythes, a citizen of Abdera, whose sister he had married, to enter into an alliance with Athens (Thuc. ii. 29); and in the following year he showed his zeal in support of his new ally, by seizing and giving up to the Athenians the Corinthian and Macedonian ambassadors, who had repaired to his court on their way to Asia to ask assistance of the king of Persia (Herod. vii. 137; Thuc. ii. 67). The Athenians, on their part, appear to have cultivated his friendship by repeated embassies, which were received in the most friendly manner, both by the king himself and his son Sadocus, who had been admitted to the rights of Athenian citizenship (Thuc. l. c.; Aristoph. Acharn. 134—150, and Schol. ad loc.). The great object of the Athenians was to obtain the powerful assistance of Sitalces against Perdiccas, king of Macedonia, with whom the Thracian monarch was already on terms of hostility on account of the support which the latter had afforded or promised to Philip, the brother of Perdiccas, The Macedonian king had for a time bought off the hostility of his powerful neighbour by large promises, but these had never been fulfilled, and Sitalces now determined at once to avenge himself and support his Athenian allies, by invading the dominions of Perdiccas. The army which he assembled for this purpose was the most numerous that had been seen in Greece since the Persian invasion, amounting to not less than 50,000 horse and 100,000 foot. With this mighty host he crossed the passes of Mount Cerene, in the autumn of b. c. 429, and descended to Doberus in Paeonia. Perdiccas was wholly unable to oppose him in the field, and allowed him to ravage the open country, almost without opposition, as far as the river Axios. From thence he advanced through Mygdonia into Chalcidice, laying waste every thing on his passage. But he was disappointed of the expected co-operation of an Athenian fleet, and his vast army began to suffer from want of provisions and the approach of winter, so that he was induced to listen to the representations of his nephew Seuthes (who had been secretly gained over by Perdiccas), and withdrew into his own dominions, after having remained only thirty days in Macedonia. (Thuc. ii. 95—101; Diod. xii. 50, 51.)

Of the remaining events of his reign we have scarcely any information. We learn, indeed, that he was at one time on the eve of a war with the Scythians, in support of Syles, king of that country, who had taken refuge with him [Sylses]: but hostilities were prevented by a treaty between Sitalces and Octamasades, who had been chosen king by the Scythians, and who was himself son of a sister of the Thracian monarch. Sitalces created the former of these Scythians, in exchange for a brother of his own, who had taken refuge with Octamasades (Herod. iv. 89). But the date of these events is wholly uncertain, and we know not whether they occurred previously or subsequent to the great expedition of Sitalces into Macedonia. The last event of his reign was an expedition against the Triballi, in which he engaged in b. c. 424, but was totally defeated, and himself perished in the battle. (Thuc. iv. 101.)

2. The leader of a body of Thracian light-armed troops, which accompanied Alexander the Great as auxiliaries on his expedition to Asia, and which rendered important services on various occasions, among others, at the battles of Issus and Arbela (Arr. Anab. i. 28, ii. 5, 9, iii. 12). He was one of those officers who were left behind in Media under the command of Parmenion, and to whom the mandate for the death of the aged general was afterwards delivered for execution. In this province he remained until after the return of Alexander from India, when he repaired, together with Cleander and Heraco, to meet that monarch in Carmania, b. c. 326. Ilithere he was followed by many persons from Media, who accused him of numerous acts of rapine, extortion, and cruelty, and on these charges he was put to death by order of Alexander. (Arr. tb. iii. 26, vi. 27; Curt. x. 1.)

SITHON (Σίθων), a son of Poseidon and Asa, or of Ares and Achirôç, the daughter of Nelles, was married to the nymph Mendes, by whom he became the father of Pallene and Rhotheia. He was king of the Hadomantes in Macedonia, or king of Thrace (Tzet. ad Lyceph. 142). Pallene, on account of her beauty, had numerous suitors, and Sithon, who promised her to the one who should conquer him in single combat, slew many.
At length he allowed Dryas and Cleitus to fight for her, promising to give her to the conqueror. Pallene, who loved Cleitus, caused her own instructor Persyntes to induce the charioteer of Dryas to draw out the nails from the wheels of his master's chariot, so that during the fight he broke down with his chariot, and was killed by Cleitus. Sithon, who was informed of the trick, erected a funeral pile, on which he intended to burn the corpse of Dryas and his own daughter; but when the pile was ready, Aphrodite appeared, a shower of rain extinguished the fire, and Sithon altered his mind, and gave his daughter to Cleitus. (Proclus in Com. xiv. 10; Tzetz. ad Leopoal. 583, 1161; comp. Cleitus.)

SITTIUS or SIXTUS. 1. P. SITTIUS, of Nuceria in Campania, was one of the adventurers, bankrupt in character and fortune, but possessing considerable ability, who abounded in Rome during the latter years of the republic. He was connected with Catiline, and went to Spain in b.c. 64, from which country he crossed over into Mauritania in the following year. It was said that P. Sulla had sent him into Spain to excite an insurrection against the Roman government; and Cicero accordingly, when he defended Sulla, in b.c. 92, was obliged also to undertake the defence of his friend Sittius, and to deny the truth of the charges that had been brought against him. The orator represented Sittius as his own friend, and pointed out how his father had remained true to the Romans during the Marsic war. (Cic. pro Sull. 20.) Sittius, however, did not return to Rome. His property in Italy was sold to pay his debts, and he continued in Africa, where he fought with great success in the wars of the kings of the country, selling his services first to one prince and then to another. The reputation he had acquired gradually attracted troops to his standard; and at the time that Caesar landed in Africa, in b.c. 46, he was at the head of a considerable force both by land and by sea. Although Sittius had not previously had any connection with Caesar, he resolved to espouse his cause, foreseeing that Caesar would be victorious in Africa as elsewhere, and that he himself would be liberally rewarded for his services. Sittius came to the assistance of Caesar at the time when his aid was most needed, for he had landed in Africa with only a small number of his troops, and ran the risk of being overwhelmed by the licentious and peremptory orders of the Bochus, king of Mauritania. Sittius invaded Numidia, took Cirta, the capital of the kingdom, and laid waste the Gaetulian dominions of Juba. The latter monarch, who was advancing with a large army to assist Scipio against Caesar, forthwith returned to the defence of his own dominions, contenting himself with sending thirty elephants to the support of Scipio. This retreat of Juba saved Caesar from destruction, as the latter had no forces sufficient to resist the united armies of Scipio and Juba. Of the operations of Juba against Sittius and Bochus, we know nothing; but the Numidian king soon afterwards joined Scipio, at the earnest request of the latter, leaving his general Saburra to oppose Sittius and Bochus. While Caesar defeated Scipio and Juba in the decisive battle of Thapsus, Sittius was equally successful against Saburra, whom he defeated and slew. Shortly afterwards L. Afranius and Faustus Sulla, who had fled from Utica with 1500 cavalry into Mauritania, with the intention of crossing over into Spain, were intercepted by Sittius, who was marching with a small body of troops to join Caesar, were taken prisoners, and sent to Caesar. About the same time the fleet of Sittius, which was stationed at Hippo Regius, captured the ships in which Scipio and other fugitives were endeavouring to quit the country. On leaving Africa, Caesar rewarded the services of Sittius and Bochus by granting to them the western part of Numidia, which had been previously under the sway of Masinissa, a friend and ally of Juba. Sittius settled down in the portion which had been assigned to him, and distributed the land among his soldiers. After the death of Caesar, Arabio, the son of Masinissa, who had fought in Spain under the sons of Pompey, returned to Africa, drove Bochus out of his hereditary dominions, and killed Sittius by stratagem. (Cic. pro Sull. 20; Sall. Cat. 21; Hirt. B. Afr. 25, 30, 36, 95, 96; Dion Cass. xliii. 3, 4, 8, 9, 12; Appian, B. C. iv. 54; Cic. ad Att. xv. 17, "Arabionë de Sittio nihil irascor.")

2. Sittius, of Caesarae in Campania, was proscribed by the triumvirs in b.c. 43, but at the request of his townsmen was allowed to live as an exile at his native place. (Appian, B. C. iv. 47.)

SIXTUS, the third of that name who occupied the papal chair, succeeded Coelestinus in a. d. 432, and died a. d. 440. He is known as an author merely from some formal letters possessing no particular interest. They will be found in the Par. tol. Pontiflcm Romanorum, vol. i. p. 1229. fol. Paris, 1721, and in the Bibliotheca Patrum of Galland, vol. ix. p. 518, fol. Venet. 1773.

SLECAS, a gem-engraver, only known by a gem inscribed with the name CAEKAΣ, which is, however, of a very suspicious form. (Bnccci, i. p. 234.)

SMERDIS (Σμερδης), the son of Cyrus, the founder of the Persian empire, accompanied his elder brother Cambyses to Egypt, but was sent back by the latter to Susa, because he was the only one of all the Persians who was strong enough to bend the bow which the king of the Ethiopians had sent to the Persian monarch. Shortly afterwards Cambyses dreamt that a messenger came to him from Persia, announcing that his brother was seated on the royal throne with his head reaching to the skies. Alarmed at this dream portending his brother's greatness, he sent a confidential ser vant named Prexasopes to Susa with express instructions to put Smerdis to death. Prexasopes fulfilled his commission, murdered Smerdis secretly, and buried him with his own hands. Among the few persons who were privy to the murder was Patzeithes, a Magian, who had been left by Cambyses in charge of his palace and treasures. This person had a brother who bore the same name as the deceased prince, and strongly resembled him in person; and as most of the Persians believed Smerdis to be alive, and were disgusted and alarmed at the frantic tyranny of Cambyses, he resolved to proclaim this brother as king, representing him as the younger son of the great Cyrus. Cambyses heard of the revolt in Syria, but he died of an accidental wound in the thigh, as he was mounting his horse to march against the usurper. Before his death he assembled the Persians, confessed to them that he had murdered his brother, and conjured them not to submit to a Mede and a Magian. But the words of Cambyses did not meet with much belief; and Prexaspes positively denied that he had put Smerdis to death, as it would not have been safe for him to have admitted that he had murdered one of the sons of Cyrus. The false Smerdis was thus acknowledged as king by the Persians, and, with the assistance of his brother Patizethes, reigned for seven months without opposition. But the leading-Persian nobles seem never to have been quite free from suspicion; and this suspicion was increased by the king never inviting any of them to the palace and never appearing in public, as well as by his wish to con- ciliate the subject nations by granting them ex- emption from taxes and military service for three years. Among the nobles who entertained these suspicions was Otanes, whose daughter Pheraedia had been one of the wives of Cambyses, and had been transferred together with the rest of the royal harem to his successor. The new king had some years before been deprived of his ears by Cyrus for some offence; and Otanes now persuaded his daughter to ascertain whether her master had really not been deprived of his ears. Pheraedia undertook the dangerous task, ascertained that the king had no ears, and communicated the decisive information to her father. Otanes thereupon organized a con- spiracy to get rid of the pretender, and in conjunc- tion with six other noble Persians, succeeded in forcing his way into the palace, where they slew the false Smerdis and his brother Patizethes in the eighth month of their reign, B. C. 521. Their death was followed by a general massacre of the Magians. The events which followed, the dissen- sion between the seven conspirators respecting the form of government which should be established in Persia, and the accession of Darius son of Hystas- pes, are related elsewhere. [DARKUS.] (Herod. iii. 30, 61—79.)

The account of Ctesias is very different from that of Herodotus. Ctesias gives the name of Tanyoxares to the brother of Cambyses, and relates that Cyrus had slain the brothers of Cambyses in the surrounding countries. He further says, that a Magian of the name of Spandadates accused Tanyoxares to the king of an intention to revolt, in consequence of which he was secretly put to death, but in order to deceive Amytis, the mother of Cambyses, Spandadates, who bore a striking re- semblance to the deceased prince, was ordered to personate him, and governed Bactria for five years as if he were the real brother of Cambyses. The fraud was at length discovered by Amytis, who put an end to her own life by poison, after impri- mating curses on Cambyses. The king died soon after of a wound at Babylon, whereupon Spandad- dates mounted the throne, and reigned for a time under the name of Tanyoxares. His im- posture, however, was at length discovered, and he was put to death in his palace by seven noble Persians, who had conspired against him (Ctesias, Pers. cc. 8, 10—14). Xenophon (Cy- rop. vii. 7. § 11) calls the brother of Cambyses Tanyoxares, which is merely another form of the name in Ctesias, but assigns to him the sattories of the Medes, Armenians, and Cadusi. On the other hand, the names given to him by Aeschylus (Prom. 780), and Justin (i. 9), are merely other forms of Smerdis. The former writer calls him Merdis, the latter Merdis or Mergus.

Both Herodotus and Ctesias, however, agree in the most important part of the history, namely, that the usurper was a Magian. The true nature of the revolution has been pointed out by Heeren and Grote. It was attempted in the name of the Medes, to whom the Magians belonged, to obtain the supremacy, of which they had been deprived by Cyrus. This appears from the words which Herodotus (iii. 65) puts into the mouth of Cambyses on his death-bed, in which he ad- jures the Persians not to allow the sovereignty to revert again to the Medes, as well as from the speeches of Gobryas, one of the seven Persian conspirators (Herod. iii. 73), and of Prexaspes (iii. 75). Plato (de Leg. iii. p. 695) in like man- ner, says that Cambyses was deprived of the sove- reignty by the Medes. The assassination of the false Smerdis and the accession of Dareius Hys- taspis again gave the ascendancy to the Persians; and the anniversary of the day on which the Ma- gians were massacred, was commemorated among the Persians by a solemn festival, called Magopho- nia, on which no Magian was allowed to show himself in public. The real nature of the trans- action is shown by the revolt of the Medes, which followed the accession of Dareius. (Heeren, Historical Researches, vol. i. p. 346, Engl. Transl.; Grote, Hist. of Greece, vol. iv. pp. 296—304.)

SMERDOMEINES (Σμερδομένης), son of Otanes, was one of the generals who had the supreme command of the land forces of Xerxes in his invasion of Greece (Herod. vii. 82, 121).

SMILIS (Σμιλίς), the son of Encleides, of Aegina, a sculptor of the legendary period, whose name appears to be derived from σμιλήν, a knife for carving wood, and afterwards a sculptor’s chisel. In the accounts respecting this artist, there is a great confusion between the mythical and histori- cal elements; but the only safe conclusion to be drawn from those accounts is that the name is purely mythical, and that Smilis is the legendary head of the Aeginetan school of sculpture, just as Daedalus is the legendary head of the Attic and Cretan schools. Pausanias speaks of him as the trans- portary of Daedalus, but inferior to him in fame, and states (§ 5. s. 7) that the Eleians and the Samians were the only people to whom he trave- lled, and that he made for the latter the statue of Hera in her great temple in the island. From this tradition, coupled with another preserved by Clemens Alexandrinus (Prodræt. 4, p. 40), which referred the statue of Hera to the time of Procles, an attempt has been made to fix the date of Smilis to the period of the Ionian migration, which took place, according to the chronologers, about 100 years after the Trojan War, or about B. C. 1044, er. Eratosth., or 856, er. Callim. (Clinton, F. H. vol. i. pp. 119, 140), and in which migration it is assumed that Smilis accompanied the colonists from Epidaurus, under Procles, who settled at Same (Müller, Aegän. p. 98; Thiersch, Epochen, pp. 45, 46, 194). Few examples could be better, of the absurdities which result from the attempt to make up chronological history by piecing together different legends. In the first place the statement of Pausanias, that Smilis was contemporary with Daedalus, has to be modified to suit a conclusion for which Pausanias himself is made the chief authority; and then, when this has been done, another piece of chronological evidence has to be dealt with, totally inconsistent with either of the other accounts; for Pliny tells us that the architects of the labyrinth at Lemnos were Smilis, Rhoeus, and Thedorus (Plin. H. N. xxxvi. 13. s. 19; adopting the correctly certain emendation of Heyne, Smilis, Rhoeus, for Zmilis, Rhosus). Now, although there is much difficulty about the precise date of Rhoeus and Thedorus, yet it is tolerably clear that they were historical personages, and that they lived after the commencement of the Olympic games. How Pliny (or the Greek writer from whom he derived the statement) came to associate Smilis with these artists, whether it was because he found Rhoeus and Thedorus mentioned as the architects of the Heraeum, and Smilis as the maker of the statue in it, or whether their names were already thus associated in some native legend respecting the labyrinth at Lemnos,—it is now hopeless to determine; but, at all events, the historical existence of Smilis cannot be admitted on the authority of this passage; nor can we accept his name as a legend subsequent to the conjecture of Müller, followed by Thiersch, that Smilis meant to Pliny was a real person belonging to a family which, like the Daedalids at Athens, pretended to derive its descent from the mythical artist Smilis; much less can we even admit into the discussion the miserably uncritical expedition proposed by Sillig. (Cat. Art. s. v.), namely, to assume that the Lemnian labyrinth was commenced by Smilis, and finished about 200 years later by Rhoeus and Thedorus!

The true state of the case seems to be something of the following kind. Long before the historical period and even before the state of society contemplated in some of the later legends, the necessities of an idolatrous worship had given rise to the art of carving rude statues of divinities out of wood. This art, according to a general analog, soon became established at particular spots, among which Athens and Aegina were conspicuous; at such places schools of art grew up, and the art itself made rapid progress; so that the skill of the artists of these schools established their schools more and more firmly at those spots, which soon became centres from which the art was diffused. Now it was in most perfect keeping with the common Greek mode of embodying legends, that a personal representative should be imagined for each school, whose native place is its native home, and whose travels represent the diffusion of the art from that centre. Thus, like Daedalus at Athens, Smilis represents at Aegina the early establishment of a school of sculpture (wood-carving), and his visits to Samos and the Eleians represent the early employment of the Aeginetan sculptors at two of the chief centres of Grecian worship. But more than this: as the Greeks had the most perfect faith in the reality of their legendary personages, it became the custom to ascribe actually existing works to these mythical artists; and among those were ascribed to them were of course those extremely ancient wooden images (Gêa), which the care of a succession of priests had preserved from a period beyond any historical record, which were regarded with more reverence than original symbols, than even the gold and ivory statues of a Phidian of the real origin of which was so entirely forgotten that some images of the same character, like that of Artemis at Ephesus, were even believed to have fallen straight from heaven, [comp. DAEDALUS].

To this class of works belonged the statue of Hera in her temple at Samos. Pausanias, indeed, (loc. c.) appears to fall into the error of assuming the contemporaneousness of the temple and the statue; but, in the very same words, he gives us the means of correcting his mistake, for he infers the high antiquity of the temple from the high antiquity of the image; and he goes on to explain what precise degree of antiquity he means, by stating that Smilis was contemporary with Daedalus. A still more decided testimony to the extreme antiquity of the image is furnished by the tradition, referred to by Pausanias just before, that the Argives brought it with them, when they first established at Samos the worship of their own great goddess Hera. The statue is also expressly called a wooden one by Clemens Alexandrinus (Proorp. p. 13), and by Callinachus (Fr. 105, Bentley), as quoted by Eusebius (Prop. Evang. iii. 8); and from the words used in these passages to describe the image (εἶδος and εἶδων ἑος), it may be inferred that it was a wooden statue in a sitting posture, one of the most ancient types of the statues of divinities. Of the same class were, no doubt, the statues of the Hours sitting upon thrones in the Heraeum at Elis, which were also ascribed to Smilis (Paus. v. 17. § 1, where the common reading ἔμηλος is undoubtedly wrong, and the alteration of it into ζωις is supported, besides other arguments, by the statement of Pausanias in the other passage referred to, that Smilis visited the Eleians).

SAEMUS.

SMINTHEUS (Σιμνήθεος), a surname of Apollo, which is derived by some from σιμνήθος, a mouse, and by others from the town of Sminthe in Troas (Hom. H. i. 39; Or. Fast. vi. 425, Met. xii. 595; Strat. in Hom. p. 34). The mouse was regarded by the ancients as inspired by the vapours arising from the earth, and as the symbol of prophetic power. In the temple of Apollo at Chrysea there was a statue of the god by Scopas, with a mouse under its foot (Strab. xiii. p. 604, &c.; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 34), and on coins Apollo is represented carrying a mouse in his hands (Müller, Ancient Art and its Rem. § 361, note 5). Temples of Apollo Smintheus and festivals (Sminthea) existed in several parts of Greece, as at Tenedos, near Hamaxitos in Aeolis, near Parion, at Lindos in Rhodes, near Coressa, and in other places. (Strab. x. p. 496. xiii. pp. 604, 603.)

SMYRNA (Σμύρνα), a daughter of Theseus and Oreithyia, or of Cinyras and Conchreis; she is also called Myrhe, and is said to have given the name of the town to Smyrna. (Apollod. iii. 14. § 1; Or. Fast. vi. 493; Anton. Lib. 34). Strabo (xiv. p. 633) mentions an Ammon who bore the same name.

SOASMUS or SOHAEMUS. 1. King of Irunae, received the kingdom from Caligula. On his death, which Tacitus places in A. D. 49, Irunae was annexed by Claudius to the province of Syria (Dion Cass. lix. 12; Tac. Ann. xii. 23.). 2. King of Sophene, a district in Armenia, be-of Sophroniscus. He belonged to the deme Alapee, in the immediate neighbourhood of Athens, and according to the statement of Demetrius Phalerus and Apollodorus, was born in the 4th year of the 77th Olympiad (n.c. 468). The assumption that he was born ten years later (Diog. Laërt. ii. 45) is confuted by his expression in the Apology of Plato, that, though he was more than seventy years old, that was his first appearance before a judicial tribunal, since the date of the conviction that ensued is well established (Ol. 93.1). Whether in his youth he devoted himself to the art of his father, and himself executed the group of colossal Minos which was shown on the Acropolis as a work of Socrates (Paus. ix. 35, comp. i. 22; Diog. Laërt. ii. 19; Porph. ap. Cyrill. cont. Julian. p. 208, Spanh.), we must leave undecided; the statements that in his youth he had in turn given himself up to an employment unworthy of a freeman, or even to a licentious life (Aristoxenus, ap. Diog. Laërt. ii. 20, comp. 19; Porphyr. ap. Theodoret. Gr. Affect. Cur. xii. 174, ed. Sylb.; comp. Luzac, Lect. Att. p. 240, &c.), we cannot regard as authenticated. Nevertheless it appears that it was not without a struggle that he became master of his naturally impatient appetites (Cic. de Fato, 5; Alex. Aphrod. de Fato, p. 30, ed. Lond.; comp. Aristox. ap. Plut. de Herod. Mal. pl. 856, c.). That he was a disciple of the physiologists Anaxagoras and Arethusa, rests on the evidence of doubtful authorities (Diog. Laërt. ii. 18, &c., 23, i. 14; Porph. ap. Theodoret. l.c. p. 174; Clem. Alex. Strom. i. 1001; Cic. Tusc. Diap. 4; Sext. Emp. Meteor. 360, &c.; C. F. Hermann, de Socratis Magistris et Disciplina juvenile, Marb. 1837). Plato and Xenophon know nothing of it; on the contrary, in the former (Plaed. p. 97) Socrates refers his knowledge of the doctrine of Anaxagoras to the book of that philosopher, and in the latter (Xen. Symp. i. 5) he designates himself as self-taught. But that, while living in Athens, at that time so rich in the means of mental culture, he remained without any instruction, as the disparaging Aristoxenus maintains (Plut. l.c.; comp. Cyrill. c. Julian. p. 186; Porph. ap. Theodoret. i. p. 8), is confuted by the testimony of Xenophen (Men. iv. 7, § 3) and Plato (Meno, p. 82, &c.) respecting his mathematical knowledge, and the thankfulness with which he mentions the care of his native city for public education (Plato, p. 50). Although he complains of not having met with the wished for instruction at the hands of those whom he had regarded as wise (Plat. Apol. p. 21; comp. Xen. Oecon. 2. 16), intercourse with the most distinguished men and women of his age could not remain entirely without fruit for one who was continually striving to arrive at an understanding with himself by means of an understanding with others (Plat. Charm. p. 166). In this sense he boasts of being a disciple of Prodicus.
and Comms, of Aspasia and Diotime (Plat. Memo, p. 96, Cratyl. p. 304, Menex. p. 235, Symp. p. 201), and says that the reason why he so seldom went outside the walls of the city was, that it was only within it that he found instruction by means of intercourse (Plat. Phaedr. p. 230, comp. Memo, p. 80, Crit. p. 52; Diog. Laërt. ii. 22). Devoted as he was to his native city, he loved philosophy (Plat. Crit. p. 50, §1; Apol. 29; Xen. Mem. iii. 3 § 12, 3 § 2, &c., 18, &c.), and faithfully as he fulfilled the duties of a citizen in the field (at Potidaea, Delion, and Amphipolis, Ol. 87, 2 and 89. 1, b. c. 432 and 431) and in the city, he did not seek to exert his influence either as a general or as a statesman; not that he shunned a contest with unbridled democracy (Plat. Apol. p. 31, &c., Gorg. pp. 531, 473, de Rep. vi. p. 496),—for he thoroughly proved his courage, not only in the above-mentioned expeditions (see especially Plat. Symp. p. 219, &c., comp. Alcib. p. 194, Apol. p. 26, Charm. p. 153, Lach. p. 181; Diog. Laërt. ii. 22, &c., ib. Menage), but also by the resistance which he offered, first, as president of the Prytanæa, to the unjust sentence of death pronounced against the victors of Arginusae, and afterwards to the order of the Thirty Tyrants for the apprehension of Leon the Salaminian (Plat. Apol. p. 52; Xen. Mem. i. 1 § 16, iv. 4 § 22; Diog. Laërt. ii. 24, comp. ib. p. 39, &c., 131) —but because he entertained the most lively conviction that he was called by the Deity to strive, by means of his teaching and life, after a revival of moral feeling, and the laying of a scientific foundation for it (Plat. Apol. pp. 30, 31, 33, Euthyp. p. 2, Gorg. p. 521; Xen. Mem. i. 6 § 15). For this reason an internal divine voice had warned him against participating in political affairs, (Plat. Apol. pp. 31, 36, Gorg. pp. 473, &c., 521), and therefore the skill requisite for such pursuits had remained un-developed in him (Plat. Gorg. p. 474). When it was that he first recognised this vocation, cannot be ascertained; and probably it was by degrees that, owing to the need which he felt in the intercourse of minds of coming to an understanding with himself, he betook himself to the active duties of a teacher. Since Aristophanes exhibited him as the representative of the witlings and sophists in the "Clouds," which was exhibited for the first time in 423, but must already have obtained a widespread reputation. But he never opened a school, nor did he, like the sophists of his time, deliver public lectures. Everywhere, in the market-place, in the gymnasium, and in the workshops, he sought and found opportunities for awakening and guiding, in boys, youths, and men, moral consciousness and the impulse after self-knowledge respecting the end and value of our actions. On those whom he had convinced that the care of continually becoming better and more intelligent must take precedence of all other cares, he was sure he had conferred the greatest benefit (Plat. Apol. p. 36, comp. pp. 28, 29, 36, 30, 31, 33, Symp. p. 216, Lach. p. 183; Xen. Mem. i. 2 § 64). But he only endeavoured to aid them in developing the germ of knowledge which were already present in them, not to communicate to them ready-made knowledge; and he therefore professed to practise a kind of mental midwifery, just as his mother Phæamante exercised the like, (Laws, c. pp. 306, &c., comp. the璨. p. 149, ib. Heindorf.) Unwearyingly and inexorably did he fight against all false appearance and conceit of knowledge, in order to pave the way for correct self-direction, and therewith, at the same time, true knowledge. Consequently to the mentally proud and the mentally idle he appeared an intolerable bore, and often enough experienced their bitter hatred and calumny (Plat. Apol. pp. 22, 23, Symp. p. 215, Gorg. pp. 482, 491, 522, Memo. p. 95; Xen. Mem. p. 235 § 19; Diog. Laërt. ii. 21, ib. Menage). Such personages might be punished by the "Clouds" of Aristophanes into regarding Socrates as the head of the sophists, although he was their victorious opponent. Although the story that it was after entering into a bargain with the accusers of Socrates that he proposed to them to he public scorn and ridicule (Aelian, V. H. ii. 13; comp. Fréret, Observations sur les Causes et sur quelques Circonstances de la Condamnation de Socrate, Mémoires de l'Académie des Inscrip. xlvii. p. 209, &c.), is a palpable invention, since the first exhibition of the "Clouds" (in Ol. 89.1, b. c. 423) preceded the prosecution and condemnation of Socrates by twenty-four years, still that the comedy produced a lasting unfavourable impression respecting the philosopher, he himself declared in the speech which he made in his own defence on his trial (Plat. Apol. pp. 19, 29, 25; comp. Xen. Symp. 6 § 6). Yet it does not appear that personal enmity, forced their way into the motives for the production of the comedy (Plutarch, Socrates, iv.), engaged in the most confidential conversation with the poet, Symp. p. 223). As little can we tax the poet with a calumny proceeding from maliciousness, or with meaningless buffoonery, since almost all his comedies exhibit great moral earnestness and warm love for his country (see especially Acharn. 676, &c., Vesp. 1071, &c., 1022, Pac. 782, &c., Nub. 537, &c.; comp. Schnitzer's German translation of the "Clouds," Stuttgart, 1842, p. 19, &c.). It appears rather to have been from a conviction that the ancient faith and the ancient manners could be regained only by thrusting aside all philosophy that dealt in subtleties, that he represented Socrates, the best known of the philosophers, as the head of that sophistical system which was burying all morals and piety (comp. Siuwer, Ueber die Walden des Aristophanes, p. 24, &c.; & Rötcher, Aristophanes und sein Zeitalter, p. 268, &c.). In adopting this view we do not venture to decide how far Aristophanes regarded him as the perfect representative responding to the peculiarities of Socrates, or contented himself with portraying in his person the hated tendency.

Attached to none of the prevailing parties, Socrates found in each of them his friends and his enemies. Hated and persecuted by Critias, Charicles, and others among the Thirty Tyrants, who had a special reference to him in the decree which they issued, forbidding the teaching of the art of oratory (Xen. Mem. i. 2 §§ 31, 37), he was impeached after their banishment and by their opponents. An orator named Lycon, and a poet (a friend of Thrasylus) named Melitus, had united in the impeachment with the powerful demagogue Anytus, an embittered antagonist of the sophists and their system (Plat. Memo, p. 91), and one of the leaders of the band which, setting out from Phyle, forced their way into the Peiraean, and drove out the Thirty Tyrants. The judges are also described as persons who had been banished, and who had returned with Thrasylus (Plat. Apol. p. 21). The chief articles of impeachment were, that Socrates was guilty of corrupting the youth, and of despising the tutelary deities of the state, putting in their place another new divinity (Plat. Apol. pp. 23, 24; Xen. Mem. i. 1. § 1; Diog. Laërt. ii. 40, ib. Menag.). At the same time it had been made a matter of accusation against him, that Critias, the most ruthless of the Tyrrhæns, had come forth from his school (Xen. Mem. i. 2. § 12; comp. Aeschin. adv. Tim. § 173, Bekker). Some expressions of his, in which he had found fault with the democratical mode of electing by lot, had also been brought up against him (Xen. Mem. i. 2. § 9, comp. 38); and there can be little doubt that use was made of his friendly relations with Theronæs, one of the most influential of the Thirty, with Plato's uncle Charmides, who fell by the side of Critias in the struggle with the popular party, and with other aristocrats, in order to irritate against him the party which at that time was dominant; though some friends of Socrates, as Chaerephon for example (Plat. Apol. pp. 20, 21), were to be found in its ranks. But, greatly as his dislike to unbridled democracy may have nourished the hatred long cherished against him, that political opposition was not, strictly speaking, the ground of the hatred; and the impeachment sought to represent him as a man who in every point of view was dangerous to the state.

In the fullest consciousness of his innocence, Socrates repels the charge raised against him. His constant admonition in reference to the worship of the gods had been, not to deviate from the maxims of the state (Xen. Mem. iv. 3. § 15, comp. i. 1. § 22); he had defended faith in oracles and portents (ib. iv. 8. § 12, i. 1. § 6, &c., iv. 7. § 16); Plat. Apol. pp. 23, 26, 35, comp. Pland. pp. 60, 118, Crito, p. 44); and with this faith that which he placed in his Daemnonium stood in the closest connection. That he intended to introduce new divinities, or was attached to the atheistical meteoroosophia of Anaxagoras (Plat. Apol. p. 26, comp. 18), his accusers could hardly be in earnest in believing; any more than that he had taught that it was allowable to do anything, even what was disgraceful, for the sake of gain (Xen. Mem. i. 2, § 56), or that he had exhorted his disciples to despise their parents and relations (Mem. i. 2. § 19, &c.), and to disobey the laws (ib. iv. 4. § 12, 6, § 6), or had sanctioned the maltreatment of the poor by the rich (Xen. Mem. i. 2. § 56, &c.). Did then all these accusations take their rise merely in personal hatred and envy? Socrates himself seems to have assumed that such was the case (Plat. Apol. pp. 23, 28, comp. Mem. p. 94; Plut. Aët. c. 4; Athen. xii. p. 534). Yet the existence of deeper and more general grounds is shown by the widespread dislike towards Socrates, which, five years after his death, Xenophon thought it necessary to oppose by his apologetic writings (comp. Plat. Apol. pp. 18, 19, 23). This is also indicated by the antagonism in which we find Aristophanes against the philosopher, an antagonism which, as we have seen, cannot be deduced from personal dislike. Just as the poet was influenced by the conviction that every kind of philosophy, equally with that of the sophists, could tend only to a further relaxation of the ancient morals and the ancient faith, so probably were also a considerable part of the judges of Socrates. They might imagine that it was their duty to endeavour to check, by the condemnation of the philosopher, the too subtle style of examining into morals and laws, and to restore the old hereditary faith in their unrestricted validity; especially at a time, when, after the expulsion of the Thirty, the need may have been felt of returning to the old faith and the old manners. But the assertion with regard to a well-known depreciatory opinion of Cato, that that opinion is the most just that was ever uttered (Forchhammer, die Athenen und Socrates, die Gesetzlichen und der Revolutionär, 1838), cannot be maintained without rejecting the best authenticated accounts that we have of Socrates, and entirely misconceiving the circumstances of the time. The demand that the individual, abjuring all private judgment, should let himself be guided by his maxims, the maxims of the state, could no longer be made at the time of the prosecution, when poets, with Aristophanes at their head,—ardently desirous as he was for the old constitution and policy,—ridiculed, often with unbridled freedom, the gods of the state and old maxims; and when it never occurred to any orator to uphold the demand that each should unconditionally submit himself to the existing constitution. If it was brought to bear against Socrates, it could only be through a passionate misconception of his views and intentions.

In the case of some few this misconception might rest upon the mistake, that, by doing away with free, thoughtful inquiry, the good old times might be brought back again. With most it probably proceeded from democratical hatred of the political maxims of Socrates, and from personal dislike of his troublesome exhortation to moral self-examination. (Comp. P. van Limburg Brewer, Apologia contra Melit. restitutio Catullumon, Groningae, 1838; Preller, in the 'Itiiler Altheimme Literatur Zeitung,' 1838, No. 87, &c., ed. Zeiller, die Philosophie der Griechen, ii. 73—104. Respecting the form of the trial, see Meier and Schönmann, Attisch. Process, p. 182.)

While Socrates, in his defence, describes the wisdom which he aimed at as that which, after conscientious self-examination, gets rid of all illusion and obscurity, and only obeys the better, God or man, and God more than man, and esteems virtue above everything else (Plat. Apol. p. 28, &c., comp. 35, 36, 39, 39), he repudiates any acquittal that should involve the condition that he was not to inquire and teach any more (ib. p. 29). Condemned by a majority of only six votes, and called upon to speak in mitigation of the sentence, while he defends himself against the accusation of stiff-necked self-conceit, he expresses the conviction that he deserved to be maintained at the public cost in the Prytanæum, and refuses to accept any imprisonment for a fine large, or banishment. He will accept to nothing more than a fine of thirty minae, on the security of Plato, Crito, and other friends. Condemned to death by the judges, who were incensed by this speech, by a majority of eighty votes, he departs from them with the protestation, that he would rather die after such a defence than live after one in which he should have betaken himself to an endeavour to move their pity; and to those who had voted for him he justifies the openness with which he had exhibited his contempt of death (p. 38, &c.). The sentence of death could not be carried into execution until after the return of the vessel which had been sent to Delos on the periodical Theoric mission. The thirty days which intervened between its re turn and the condemnation of Socrates were devoed by the latter, in undisturbed repose, to poetic attempts (the first he had made in his life), and to the usual conversation with his friends. One of these conversations, on the duty of obedience to the laws even in the case of an unjust application of them, Plato has reported in the Crito, so called after the faithful follower of the condemned man, who bore that name, and who, although he himself had become bail for Socrates, had endeavoured with success to persuade him to make his escape.
In another, imitated or worked up by Plato in the Phaedo, Socrates immediately before he drank the poison developed the grounds of his immovable conviction of the immortality of the soul. The manner in which the assembled friends, in the alternation of joyful admiration and profound grief, lauded him as one who, by the divine appointment, was going to a place where it must fare well with him, if with any one:—how he departed from them with the one wish, that, in their care for themselves, that is, for their true welfare, they would cherish in their memories his latest and his earlier sayings:— and how, with his last breath, he designates the transition to the life that lies beyond death as the true recovery from a state of impurity and disease, —all this is set before us with such vividness, that we gladly accord with the closing words of the dialogue:—"Thus died the man, who of all the people were the wisest and the truest, and in life the

To the accusations which were brought against Socrates in his impeachment subsequent enquirers and haters added others, of which that impeachment takes no cognizance, and which are destitute of all credibility on other grounds. The accusation that he was addicted to the vice of paederastia (Lucian de Domino, c. 4, and in contradiction Maxim.
Tyr. Dissert. xv. xxvi. xxvii.; J. M. Gesner, Socrates sanctus paederastia, Trauj. ad Athen. 1769), we do not hesitate, supported by his unambiguous expressions respecting the essence of true, spi-rilic love in Xenophon (Symp. § 2, 19, 32, &c., Mem. i. 2, § 29, &c., 3, § 8, &c.) and Plato (Symp.
p. 292, &c.), to reject as a calumny. Also the account that in consequence of a resolution of the people allowing bigamy, which was passed during the Platonism, when he was married to two women at the same time (Plut. Aristid. p. 335; Athen. xii. p. 555, &c.; Diog. Laërt., &c.), is to be set aside as unfounded, since the existence of any such resolution of the people cannot be proved, while the Socrates know of only one wife, Xan-thippé, and the account itself is not free from contradictions. J. Luzac, following Bentley and others, completely refutes it (Lecl. Att. de Béjanis Socritis, Lugd. Bat. 1809).

Whether, and how soon after the death of Socrates, repentance seized the Athenians, and his accusers met with contempt and punishment; and whether and when, to expiate the crime, a brazen statute, the work of Lysippus, was dedicated to his memory (Plut. de Iuv. et Ode, p. 537, &c.; Diog. Laërt. ii. 43. f. Menag.; it is not easy to determine with any certainty, in consequence of the indefinite-ness of the statements.
Five years after his execution, Xenophon found himself obliged to compile the Memorabilia, in vindication of Socrates. (Comp. A. Boeckh, de Si-multate quam Plato cum Xenophonte exercitaverat, p. 19.)

11. Among those who attached themselves with more than ordinary intimacy to Socrates, some were attracted mainly by the spiritual power which he exercised over men. To learn this power from him, that they might apply it in the conduct of the affairs of the state, was probably the immediate object of men like Critias (for Alcibiades, who is mentioned in connection with him—Xen. Mem. i. 2, § 14, &c.) was doubtless actuated by nobler admiration for the whole personal character of the philosopher; see especially Plat. Symp.
p. 213, &c.), and such remained attached to him
only till ambition hurst them in other directions.
Others sought to dive into the teaching and life of Socrates, in order to obtain for themselves and others an enduring rule of morality (comp. Xen.
Mem. i. 2, § 48). How his image had exhibited itself to them and impressed itself upon them, several among them endeavoured to render manifest by noting down the conversations at which they had been present. Among such Xenophon and Aeschines hold the chief rank, though they could hardly have been the only ones who composed such memorials. Others felt themselves urged to develop still further the outlines of the Socratic doctrine, and, according to their original heit and their different modes of apprehending and expounding the principles, they composed works. But, persuaded that they were only advancing on the path marked out by Socrates, they referred to him their own peculiar amplifications of his doctrines. Just as in the dialogues of Plato, even in the Timaeus and the Laws, we find Socrates brought forward as lending, or at least introducing the conversations and investigations, so also Euclides, Antithenes, and others seem to have endeavoured in their dialogues to glorify him, and to exhibit him as the originator of their doctrines.
(Athen. v. p. 216, c.; A. Gallius, N. A. ii. 17; comp.
Ch. A. Brandis, Uber die Grundlinien der Lehre des Socrates, in the Rhein. Museum, 1827, i. p. 120, &c.)
In this way arose two essentially different representations of Socrates, and in antiquity it was already disputed whether Plato or Xenophon (Sext. Emp.
adv. Math. vii. 8), or even whether Plato or Aes-had sketched the more accurate picture of the man.
He himself left either absolutely nothing in a written form (Ch. de Orat. iii. 16; Plut. de Ale. fort. p. 329; Diog. Laërt. i. 16), or only a rhyth-monic version of some of Aeseop's fables and the introduction to a hymn to Apollo, which he had composed during his imprisonment, when for the first time in his life he made any attempts in verse (Plat. Phaedo. p. 61). The quotations that antiquity possessed of it were of doubtful authenticity (Diog. Laërt. ii. 42; Themist. Orat. xiv.
p. 321). What we possess from Aeschines, that is well authenticated, is limited to fragments. We have therefore only to decide for Xenophon, who exhibited considerable mental affinity with Socrates, or for Plato. Now Plato manifestly makes Sorcrates occupy his own place, and transfers to him the doctrines that were peculiar to himself. Xenophon on the contrary exhibits no other intention than that of communicating information with fitness and refinement, by mixing up with his representation anything that was peculiar to himself.
This was so much the easier for him, as it was not his purpose to develop the Socratic doctrine, and as he was not capable of penetrating into the peculiarity of a philosophic mode of thinking. But for that very reason his representation, with all its fidelity, is not adapted to give us a sufficient picture of the man whom all antiquity regarded as the originator of a new era in philosophy, and whose life each of his disciples, especially Plato, the most distinguished of them, regarded as a model. Moreover it was the object of Xenophon, by way of defence against the accusers of Socrates, not to praise him but to paint him as a man who distinctly put his feet on an upright and clear-sighted, unjustly condemned man, not as the founder of new philosophical inquiry. It may easily be understood therefore that there were various opinions in antiquity as to whether the more satisfactory picture of Socrates was to be found in Plato, in Xenophon, or in Aeschines. Since the time of Brucker however it had become usual to go back to Xenophon, to the exclusion of the other authorities, as the source of the only authentic delineation of the personal characteristics and philosophy of Socrates, or to fill up the gaps left by him by means of the accounts of Plato (Meiners, Geschichte der Wissenschaften, ii. p. 420, &c.), till Schleiermacher started the inquiry, "What can Socrates have been, besides what Xenophon tells us of him, without contradicting that authority, and what must he have been, to have justified Plato in bringing him forward as he does in his dialogues?" (Über den Werth der Sokrates als Philosophen, in die Abhandlungen der Berliner Akademie, iii. p. 59, &c., 1818, reprinted in Schleiermacher's Werke, vol. iii. pt. 2, p. 295, &c.; translated in the Philosophical Museum, vol. ii. p. 538, &c.) Disseen, too, had already pointed out some not inconsiderable contradictions in the doctrines of the Xenophontic Socrates (de Philosophia morali in Xenoephontis de Socrate Commentariis tradita, Gotting. 1812; reprinted in Disseen's Kleine Schriften, p. 87, &c.). Now we know indeed that Socrates, the teacher of human wisdom, who, without concerning himself with the investigation of the secrets of nature, wished to bring philosophy back from heaven to earth (Cic. Acad. i. 4, Tusc. v. 4; comp. Aristot. Metaph. i. 6, de Part Anim. i. p. 642. 28), was far from intending to introduce a regularly organised system of philosophy; but that he made no endeavours to go back to the ultimate foundations of his doctrine, or that that doctrine was vacillating and not without contradictions, as Wiggers (in his Life of Socrates, p. 184, &c.) and others assume, we cannot possibly regard as a well founded view, unless his almost unexampled influence upon the most distinguished men of his time is to become an inexplicable riddle, and the conviction of a Plato, a Euclides, and others, that they were indebted to him for the fruits of their own investigations, is to be regarded as a mere illusion. Now we fully admit that in the representation of the personal character of Socrates Plato and Xenophon coincide (see Ed. Zeller's Philosophie der Griechen, vol. ii. p. 16, &c.); and further, that Socrates adjusted his treatment of the subject of his conversation according as those with whom he had to do entertained such or such views, were more or less endowed, and had made more or less progress; and therefore did not always say the same on the same subject (Xenophon, by F. Delbrück, Bonn, 1829, pp. 64, &c., 132, &c.).

But, on the other hand, in Xenophon we miss every thing like a penetrating comprehension of the fundamental ideas of the Socratic doctrine to which he himself makes reference. The representations of Plato and Xenophon however may be very well harmonised with each other, partly by the assumption that Socrates, as the originator of a new era of philosophical development, must have made the first steps in that which was its distinctive direction, and the immediate manifestation of which consisted in bringing into more and prominent relief the idea and form of scientific knowledge (Geschichte der griech.-römischen Philosophie, ii. 1. p. 20, &c.). These remarks, though not numerous, are decisive on account of their acuteness and precision, as well as by their referring to the most important points in the philosophy of Socrates.

III. The philosophy of the Greeks before Socrates had sought first (among the Ionians) after the inherent foundation of generated existence and changing phenomena, and then (among the Eleatics) after the idea of absolute existence. Afterwards, when the ideas of being and coming into being had come into hostile opposition to each other, it had made trial of various insufficient modes of reconciling them; and lastly, raising the inquiry after the absolutely true and certain in our knowledge, had arrived at the assumption that numbers and their relations are not only the absolutely true and certain, but the foundation of things. Its efforts, which had been pervaded by a pure appreciation of truth, were then exposed to the attacks of a sophistical system, which concerned itself only about securing an appearance of knowledge, and which in the first instance indeed applied itself to the diametrically opposite theories of eternal, perpetual coming into existence, and of unchangeable, absolutely simple and single existence, but soon directed its most dangerous weapons against the ethico-religious consciousness, which in the last ten years before the Peloponnesian war had already been so much shaken. Whoever intended to oppose that sophistical system with any success would have, at the same time, at least to lay the foundation for a removal of the contradictions, which, having been left by the earlier philosophy without any tenable mode of reconciling them, had been employed by the sophists with so much skill for their own purposes. In order to establish, in confusion of the sophists, that the human mind sees itself compelled to press on to truth and certainty, not only in the general but also in reference to the rules and laws of our actions, and is capable of doing so, it was necessary first of all that to the inquiries previously dealt with there should be added a new one, that after knowledge, as such. It was a new inquiry, inasmuch as previously the mind, being entirely directed towards the objective universe, had regarded scientific knowledge respecting it as a necessary selection of it, without paying any closer regard to that element of knowledge which is essentially subjective. Even the Pythagoreans, who came the nearest to that inquiry, had perceived indeed that the existence of something absolutely true and certain must be presupposed, but without investigating further what knowledge is and how it may be developed. It was the awakening of the idea of knowledge, and the first utterances of it, which made the philosophy of Socrates the turning-point of a new period, and gave to it its fruitifying power. Before we inquire after the existence of things we must establish in our own minds the idea of them (Xen. Mem. iv.
6 § 1, 13, iv. 5 § 12; Plat. Apol. p. 21, &c.; Arist. Metaph. i. 6, de Part. Anim. i. 1, p. 642 B. 29); and for that reason we must come to an understanding with ourselves respecting what belongs to man, before we inquire after the nature of things in general (Xen. Mem. i. 11, comp. 4 § 7; Arist.
Metaph. i. 6, de Part. Anim. i. 1). Socrates accordingly takes up the inquiry respecting knowledge in the first instance, and almost exclusively, in reference to moral action; but he is so penetrated with a sense of the power of knowledge, that he maintains that where it is attained to, there moral action will of necessity be found; or, as he expresses it, all virtue is knowledge (Xen. Mem. iii.
9 § 4, iv. 6; Plat. Protag. p. 329, &c. 349, &c.; Arist. Eth. Nic. vi. 13, iii. 11, Eth. Eudem. i. 5, iii. 1, Magn. Mor. i. 1, 35); for knowledge is always the strongest, and cannot be overpowered vi. 13; Plat. Protag. p. 352, &c.). Therefore no man willingly acts wickedly (Arist. Magn. Mor. i.
9, comp. Xen. Mem. iii. 9 § 4, iv. 6 § 6, 11; Plat.
Apol. p. 23, e. &c.) for will appeared to him to be inseparably connected with knowledge. But just as knowledge, as such, that is without regard to the diversity of the ideas, the knowledge in itself, in the power to distinguish between the differeent things single, so also he could admit only a single virtue (Xen. Mem. iii. 9 § 2; Arist.
Eth. Nic. iii. 1, Eudem. iii. 1); and as little he could recognise an essential diversity in the directions which virtue took, as in the practice of it by persons of different station and sex (Arist.
Polit. i. 13). It may easily be conceived, therefore, that he did not venture to separate happiness from virtue, and that he expressly defined the former more accurately as good conduct (ἐνοχογεία) in distinction from good fortune (εὐτυχία, Xen. Mem.
iii. 9 § 14); a distinction in which is expressed the most important diversity in all later treatment of ethics, which sets down either a certain mode of being or acting, as such, or else the mere enjoyment that results therefrom, as that which is in itself valuable.

But how does knowledge develop itself in us?
In this way: the idea, obtained by means of induction, as that which is general, out of the individual facts of consciousness, is settled and fixed by means of definition. These are the two scientific processes, which, according to the most express testimonies of Aristotle and others, Socrates first discovered, or rather first pointed out (Arist. Met.
iii. 4; comp. Xen. Mem. iv. 6 § 1; Plat. Apol.
p. 22, &c.); and although he did not attempt to develop a logical theory of them, but rather contented himself with the masterly practice of them, he may with good reason be regarded as the founder of the theory of scientific knowledge.
Socrates, however, always setting out from what was immediately admitted (Xen. Mem. iv. 6 § 15), exercised this twofold process on the most different subjects, and in doing so was led to obtain an insight into this or that one of them, not so much by the end in view as by the necessity for calling forth self-knowledge and self-understanding. For this end he endeavoured in the first place, and chiefly, to awaken the consciousness of ignorance; and inasmuch as the impulse towards the development of knowledge is already contained in this, he maintains that he had been declared by the Delphic god to be the wisest of men, because he did not delude himself with the idea that he knew what he did not know, and did not arrogate to himself any wisdom (Plat. Apol. pp. 21, 25, Theas.
p. 150). To call forth distrust in pretended knowledge he used to exercise his peculiar irony, which, directed against himself as against others, lost all offensive poignancy (Plat. de Rep. i. p. 337, Mem. iv. 2). Convinced that he could obtain his object only by leading to the spontaneous search after truth, he throughout made use of the dialogical form (which passed from him to the most different ramifications of his school), and designates the inclination to supply one's deficiencies in one's own investigation by association with others striving to-towards the same end, as true love (Brandis, Gesch. der griechisch-römischen Philos. ii. p. 64). But however deeply Socrates felt the need of advancing in self-development with others, and by means of them, the inclination and the capability for wrap-pling himself up in the abstraction of solitary meditation and diving into the depths of his own mind, was equally to be found in him (Plat. Symp. pp. 174, 220). And again, side by side with his incessant endeavour thoroughly to understand himself there stood the sense of the need of illumination by a higher inspiration. Thus, he was convinced was imported to him from time to time by the ominations or warnings of an internal voice, which he designated his ἱαμβων. By this we are not to understand a personal genius, as Plutarch (de Genio Socratis, c. 20), Apuleius (de Deo Socrat.
p. 111, &c. ed. Basil.), and others, and probably also the accusers of Socrates, assumed; as little was it the offspring of an enthusiastic phantasy, as moderns have thought, or the production of the Socratic irony, or of cunning political calculation.
It was rather the yet indefinitely developed idea of a divine revelation. (See especially Schleiermacher, in his translation of the works of Plato, i.
2, p. 432, &c.) On that account it is always described only as a divine something, or a divine sign, a divine voice (ὅμηχος, φαντασία, Plat. Phaedr.
This voice had reference to actions the issue of which could not be anticipated by calculation, whether it manifested itself, at least immediately, only in the voice of warning against certain actions (Plat. Apol. p. 31), or even now and then as urging him to their performance (Xen. Mem. i. 4.
iv. 3 § 12, &c.). On the other hand this daemoniana was to be perceived as little in reference to the moral value of actions as in reference to subjects of knowledge. Socrates on the contrary expressly forbids the having recourse to oracles on a level with which he places his daemon, in reference to that which the gods have enabled men to find by means of reflection. (Xen. Mem. i. 1.
§ 6, &c.)

Thus far the statements of Xenophon and Plato admit of being very well reconciled both with one another and with those of Aristotle. But this is not the case with reference to the more exact definition and carrying out of the idea of that knowledge which should have moral action as its immediate and necessary consequence. What is comprised in, and what is the source of, this knowledge? Is it to be derived merely from custom and the special ends and interests of the subject which acts? Every thing, according to the Xenophonic Socrates, is good and beautiful merely for that to which it stands in a proper relation (Mem. iii. 8 § 3, 7). The good is nothing else than the useful, the beautiful nothing else than the serviceable (Mem. iv. 6 § 8, &c., Symp. 5 § 3, &c.), and almost throughout, moral precepts are referred to the motives of utility and enjoyment (Mem. i. 5, § 6, ii. i. § 1, iv. 2 § 9, &c.; comp. ii. i. § 57, &c. i. 6 § 9, iv. 6 § 9); but while the contrary the Platonic Socrates never makes use of an argument founded on the identity of the good and the agreeable. In the passages which have been brought forward to show that he does (Prolag. pp. 353, &c. 333), he is manifestly arguing ad hominem from the point of view of his sophistical antagonist. Now, that the doctrine of Socrates must have been a self-contradictory one, if on the one hand it laid down the above assertions respecting knowledge, and undertook to prove that only good conduct, and not good fortune (εὐδημία not εὐδοκία), was valuable in itself (Xen. Mem. iii. 9 § 11), and yet on the other hand referred the good to the useful and the agreeable, even the defenders of the representation given by Xenophon admit, but suppose that this contradiction was an unavoidable consequence of the abstract and merely formal conception of virtue as knowledge (see especially Zeller, i. c. ii. p. 63, &c.). But however little Socrates may have been the occasion for, or been capable of, analysing what was comprised in this knowledge, i.e. of establishing a scientifically organised system of ethics (and in fact, according to Aristotle, Eth. Eudem. i. 5, he investigated what virtue was, not how and whence it originated), he could not possibly have subordinated knowledge, to which he attributed such unlimited power, and of which he affirmed that opposing desires were powerless against it, to enjoyment and utility. A man who himself so manifestly annulled his own fundamental maxim could not possibly have permanently enchaincd and inspired minds like those of Alcibiades, Euclides, Plato, and others. In fact Socrates declared in the most decisive manner that the validity of moral requirements was independent of all reference to welfare, nor even to life and death, and unlimited (Plat. Apol. pp. 28, 39, Críta. p. 49; comp. Xen. Mem. i. 2 § 64, 6 § 9), and in these dialogues of Plato in which he knows Socrates is more particularly exhibited, as in the Protagoras, Charmides, Laches, and Euthyphro, we find him offering the most vigorous resistance to the assumption that the agreeable or useful has any value for us. That Socrates must rather have had in view a higher species of knowledge, inherent in the self-consciousness, as such, or developing itself from it, is shown by the expressions selected by Aristotle (ἐπιστήμη, λόγος, φρόνησις), which even still make their appearance through the shallow notices of Xenophon (Brandsis. i. c. ii. p. 43). But in connection with this, Socrates might, may must have endeavoured to show how the good is coincident with real utility and real enjoyment; and it is quite conceivable that Xenophon's unphilosophical mind may on the one hand have confounded sensual enjoyment and utility with that of a more exalted and real kind, and on the other comprehended and preserved the externals and introductions of the conversations of Socrates rather than their internal connection and objects. Besides, his purpose was to refute the prejudice that Socrates aspired after a hidden wisdom, and for that very reason he might have found himself still more induced to bring prominently forward every thing by which Socrates appeared altogether to fall in with the ordinary conceptions of the Athenians.

Whether and how Socrates endeavoured to connect the moral with the religious consciousness, and how and how far he had developed his convictions respecting a divine spirit arranging and guiding the universe, respecting the immortality of the soul, the essential nature of love, of the state, &c., we cannot here inquire. [Ch. A. B.]

S'OCRATES, designated in the title of his Ecclesiastical History Scholasticius, from his following the profession of a scholasticus or pleader, was, according to his own testimony (Hist. Eccles. v. 21), born and educated in the city of Constantinople, in which also he chiefly or wholly resided in after life. When quite a boy (κοαιδὴ χνοὺς 6w) he studied (Hist. Eccles. v. 16) under the grammarians Ammonius and Helladius, who had been priests at Alexandria, the first of the Egyptian Ape, the second of Jupiter, and had fled from that city on account of the tumults occasioned by the destruction of the henthen temples, which took place, according to the Chronicon of Marcellinus, in the consulsip of Timasius and Promotus, A. D. 389 [Ammonius Grammaticus]. From these data Valesius calculates that Socrates was born about the beginning of the reign of Theodosius the Great (A. D. 379); his calculation is based on the assumption that Socrates was placed under their charge at the usual age of ten years, and that he attended them immediately after their removal from Alexandria to Constantinople; and it is confirmed by the circumstance that Socrates writing of some discourses among the Macedonians and Eunomians of Constantinople about A. D. 394 (II. E. v. 24), mentions as one reason for his particularity in speaking of these, and generally of events which had occurred at Constantinople, that some of them had occurred under his own eyes; a reason which he would hardly have urged in this place had it not applied to the particular events in question; and had he been younger than Valesius' calculation would make him, he would hardly have been old enough to feel interested in such matters; indeed he must, on any calculation, have given attention to them at a comparatively early age. And had he been much older than Valesius makes him, he must have commenced his attendance on his masters after the usual age, and then he would hardly have said that he went to them κοαιδὴ χνοὺς 6w, "when quite young." Valesius suspects from the very high terms in which Socrates speaks of the rhetorician Trolus, and the acquaintance he shows with his affairs, that he studied under him also, which may be true. Beyond this, little seems to be known of the personal history of Socrates, except that he followed the profession of a pleader at Constantinople, and that he survived the seventh enthalsip of the emperor Theodosius the YOUNGER, A. D. 439, to which period his Ecclesiastical History extends (H. E. vii. 48). In fact, he probably survived that date several years, as he published a second edition of his history (H. E. ii. 1), and had opportunity between the first and second editions to procure access to several additional documents, to weigh their testimony, and to re-write the first and second books. Photius, in his brief notice of Socrates and his history (Bibloth. Cod. 28), and Nicephorus Callisti (H. E. i. 1) in a still briefer notice, do not speak of his profession of a scholasticus or pleader; from which some have inferred (e.g. Hamberger, apud Fabric. Bibloth. Graec. vol. vii. p. 429, note g; comp. Cellier, Auteurs Sorcés, vol. xii. p. 669), that the title of his work is inaccurate in giving him that designation: but we think that no such inference can be justly drawn from the omission of so unimportant a circumstance in notices so brief as those of Photius and Nicephorus. The general impartiality of Socrates may be taken as an indication that he was not an ecclesiastic; while his literary habits and his balancing of evidence (e.g. H. E. ii. 1) are in harmony with the forensic pursuits in which the title scholasticus shows him to have been engaged.

Another much disputed point is, what were his religious opinions, or, to state the question more accurately, did he belong to the church claiming to be "Catholic," and which comprehended the bulk of the Homoiouian or orthodox community, or to the smaller and "schismatical" body of the kataphoi, "Puritans" or Novatians. From the general accordance of the Novatians with "the Church" in religious belief and ecclesiastical constitution, the only difference between the two bodies being the sterner temper and stricter discipline of the dissenting community [NOVATIANS], it is difficult to trace any decisive indications from the writings of Socrates to which body he gave his adherence. The testimony of Nicephorus Callisti (H. E. i. 1) would be decisive, had it been the testimony of a contemporary, and more impartial in tone. He speaks of him as "Socrates the pure [kataphoi, i.e. Puritan] in designation, but not also in principle." To the testimony of Nicephorus we may oppose the silence of earlier writers, as Cassiodorus (De divinis Lecion. c. 17, and Praefat. Historiarum Trispartitarum), Liberus (Breviar. c. 2), Theodore Anagnostes or Lector (Epistula Histor. Eccles. praefat.), Evagrius (H. E. i. 1), some one or other of whom would have probably mentioned his being a Novatian, had he really belonged to that sect. (See the Veterum Testimonia collected by Valesius, and prefixed to this edition of Socrates.) It is argued that he has carefully recorded the succession of the Novatian bishops of Constantinople; has spoken of these prelates in the highest terms, and has even recorded (H. E. vii. 17) a miracle which occurred to Paul, one of them; and that he appears to have taken a peculiar interest in the sect, and to have recorded various incidents respecting them with a particularity which would hardly be expected except from a member of their body. But these things, as Valesius justly contends, may be accounted for by his avowed purpose of recording events occurring in Constantinople more minutely, because he was a native and resident of that city (H. E. v. 24), and by sympathy with the stricter morality of the Novatians, or by some family connection or intimate friendship with some of their members (comp. Socrat. H. E. i. 13).

When, however, Valesius adduces as positive evidence of his adherence to the "Catholic" church, that he repeatedly mentions it without qualification as "the church," and classes the Novatians with other sectaries, he employs arguments as little valid as those which, just before, he had refuted. Socrates, though a Novatian, might speak thus in a conventional sense, just as Protestants of the present day often speak of "Catholics," or "Catholic church," Dissenters of "the church" or "the church of England," and persons of reputed heterodox views of "Orthodoxy" or "the Ortho dox:" such terms, when once custom has determined their application, being used as conventional and convenient without regard to the essential justness and propriety of their application. The question of the Novatianism of Socrates must be regarded as undetermined; but the preponderance of the various arguments is in favour of his connection with the "Catholic church."

The "Ekklesiastikh Istoria, Historia Ecclesiastica," of Socrates extends from the reign of Constantine the Great to that of the younger Theodosius, A. D. 439, and comprehends the events of a hundred and forty years, according to the writer's own statement (H. E. vii. 48), or more accurately of a hundred and thirty-three years, in one of the most eventful periods of the history of the Church, when the doctrines of orthodoxy were developed and defined in a succession of creeds, each step in the process being occasioned or accompanied and followed by commotions which shook the whole Christian community and rent it into sects, some of which have long since passed away, while others have continued to exist. Three general councils, the first Nicene, the first Constantinopolitan, and the first Ephesian are recorded in the history, and two others, the second Ephesian, and the Chalcedonian, were held at no great interval from the period at which it ends. The interest and importance of the period may be further inferred from the fact that we have three histories of it by contemporary writers (Socrates, Sozomen, and Theodoret) which have come down to us in a complete form, and which furnished materials for the Historia Tri dicipation of Cassiodorus [CASSIODORUS; EPIPHANIUS, No.11], and that we have fragments of another (that of Philostorgius) written about the same period. Of these histories that of Socrates is perhaps the most impartial. In fact he appears to have been a man of less bigotry than most of his contemporaries, and the very difficulty of determining from internal evidence some points of his religious belief, may be considered as arguing his comparative liberality. His history is divided into seven books. Commencing with a brief account of the accession and conversion of Constantine the Great, and the civil war of Constantine and Licinius, he passes on to the history of the Arian controversy, which he traces from its rise to the banishment of Athanasius, the recall and death of Arius, and the death, soon after, of Constantine himself, a. D. 366—377 (Lib. i.). He then carries on the history of the contentions of the Arian or Eusebian and Homoiouian parties during the reign of Constanti tus II. A. D. 337—360 (Lib. ii.). The struggle of heathenism with Christianity under Julian, and the triumph of Christianity under Jovian (A. D. 360—364), then follow (Lib. iii.). The renewed struggle of the Arians and Homoiouians under Valens, a. D. 364—378 (Lib. iv.): the triumph of the Homiojusian party over the Arian and Macedonian parties, in the reign of Theodosius the Great A. D. 379—395 (Lib. v.): the contention of John Chrysostom with his opponents, and the other ecclesiastical incidents of the reign of Arcadius A. D. 395—408 (Lib. vi.): and the contents of Christianity with the expiring remains of heathenism, the Nestorian controversy, and the council of Ephesus, with other events of the reign of the younger Theodosius, A. D. 408 to 439, in which latter year the history closes, occupy the remainder of the work. This division of the work into seven books, according to the reigns of the successive emperors, was made by Sozocrates himself (Comp. ii. 1). In the first two books he followed, in his first edition, the ecclesiastical history of Rufinus; but this part, as already mentioned, he had to write for his second edition. The materials of the remaining books were derived partly from Rufinus, partly from other writers, and partly from the oral account of persons who had been personally cognizant of matters, and who survived to the time of the writer. Sozocrates has inserted a number of letters from the emperors and from prelates and councils, creeds, and other documents which are of value, both in themselves, and as authenticating his statements. He aimed not at a pompous phraseology, or φρονέω φρονεσίης (Lib. i. 1), but at perspicuity (Lib. iii. 1), and his style, as Photius remarks (Biblioth. Cod. 28), presents nothing worthy of notice. The inaccuracy with respect to points of doctrine with which the same critic charges him (ἀλήθεια καὶ εν τοις δόγμασιν ου χαλιν ἐστιν ἀκριβή) may be taken as a corroboration of what has been said concerning the comparative liberality of his temper. His diligence and general impartiality are admitted by the best critics, Valesius, Cave, Fabricius, &c. "His impartiality," says Mr. Waddington (Hist. of the Church, part ii. c. 7, ad fin.), "is so strikingly displayed as to render his orthodox questionable to Baronius, the celebrated Roman Catholic historian; but Valesius, in his life, has clearly shown that there is no reason for such a suspicion. We may mention another principle which he has followed, which, in the mind of Baronius, may have tended to confirm the notion of his heterodoxy—that he is invariably adverse to every form of persecution on account of religious opinions—ὁσιωτάτῳ ἡ ἀγάπη τοῦ ἁγίου τατᾶτου τοῦ θεοῦ ἄνθρωπος—and I call it perseverance to offer any description of molestation to those who are quiet. Some credulity respecting miraculous stories is his principal failing."

The first printed edition of the Greek text of the Historia Ecclesiastica of Sozocrates was that of Rob. Stephanus (Estienne), fol. Paris 1544. The volume contained also the ecclesiastical histories of the other early Greek writers, Eusebius (with his Life of Constantine), Sozomen, Theodoret, Eunapius, and the fragments of Theodore Anagnostes or Lector. It was again printed with the Latin version of Christopher, and with the other Greek ecclesiastical historians just mentioned, also accompanied by the version of Christopher, except in the case of Theodore Lector, of whom Musculus’s version was given, fol. Geneva 1612; but the standard edition is that of Jlen. Valesius, who published, as part of his series of the ancient Greek ecclesiastical historians, the histories of So-ocrates and Sozomen, with a new Latin version and valuable notes, fol. Paris 1668. His edition was reprinted at Mentz, fol. 1677, and the Latin version by itself at Paris the same year. The remainder of the Mentz edition was issued with a new title page, Amsterdam, 1695. The text, version, and notes of Valesius were reprinted with some additional Variorum notes, under the care of William Reading, in the second volume of the Greek ecclesiastical historians, fol. Cambridge 1720. This edition of Reading was reprinted at Turin, 3 vols. fol. 1748. There is a reprint of the text of Va-lesius, but without the version and notes, 8vo. Oxford, 1844. There have been several Latin versions, as those of Musculus, fol. Basel 1549, 1557, 1594, John Christopherson (Christophor-sonus), bishop of Chichester, fol. Paris, 1571, Col-logen, 1570, 1581; and (revised by Grynaeus, and with notes by him), fol. Basil. 1570 and 1611; and in the Bibliotheca Patrum, vol. v. part 2, fol. Cologn 1618, and vol. vii. fol. Lyon 1677. There are a French translation by Cousin, made from the Latin version of Valesius, 4to. Paris, 1675, and English translations by Meredith Hammer, with the other Greek ecclesiastical historians, folio. Lond. 1577, 1585, 1630, and by Samuel Parker (with translations of Sozomen and Theodoret), 2 vols. 8vo. 1707. The latter, which is an abridged translation, has been repeatedly reprinted. SOCRATES, minor literary persons.

1. A tragic actor at Athens in the time of Demosthenes. (Dem de Cor. p. 314; comp. Sim-lyus.)

3. Of Bitbysynus, a Peripatetic philosopher. (Diog. l. c.)

4. An epigrammatic poet, of whom nothing is known beyond the mention of his name by Dio- genes Laërtius. (l. c.) There is a single epigram in the Greek Anthology, among the Arithmetical Problems, under the name of Sozocrates. (Anth. Pal. xiv. 1; Brunck. Anot. vol. ii. p. 477; Jacobs, Anth. Græca, vol. iii. p. 181, Comm. vol. ii. pt. iii. p. 335.)

5. Of Cos, the author of a work entitled εὐθαλεϊος Ἐκλογ. (Diog. Laëtt. l. c.; Schol. ad Apoll. Isth. 1. 966; Ath. III. p. 111, b.; Schol. ad Arist. Epid. 855, b.; &c.). This is probably the writer intended by the phrase, εὐθαλεϊος Ἐκλογ, is doubtful. Vossius explains it as prayers to the gods, but Menagius contends that it rather means the epithets or sur-names which were assigned to the several gods for various reasons. (Fabric. l. c.; Vossius, l. c.; Menag. ad Diog. l. c.)

SOEMIS.

6. Of Rhodes, an historian, who seems to have lived in the time of Augustus, who wrote a work on the civil war, from which Athenaeus quotes some particulars respecting Antony and Cleopatra. (Ath. iv. p. 147, e.; Menag. l. c.; Vossius, l. c. and p. 227.)

7. The author of a work on Thrace, the second book of which is quoted by Plutarch (Parr. 16, p. 310, a).

There seem to have been also other persons of the same name, but not of sufficient importance to be noticed here. The name is confounded by the ancient writers with Crates, Isocrates, Soocrates, and Sostratus. (Fabric. Vossius, Menag. I. c. occ.; Ionsius, Script. Hist. Philos. vol. i. c. 2.) [P.S.]

SOCRATES, artists. 1. Of Thebes, a sculptor, who, in conjunction with his fellow-citizen Aristomedes, made a statue of the "Dindymene Mother" (Cybele), which was dedicated by Pindar in her temple near Thebes. The artists therefore flourished probably about OL 75, B.C. 480, the statue, as well as the throne on which it sat, was of Pentelic marble; and it was preserved with extraordinary reverence. (Paus. ix. 25, § 3.)

2. The celebrated philosopher, was the son of a sculptor, Sophroniscus, and claimed to be of the mythical lineage of the Daedalids, and himself practised the art during part of his life (see the article above). Pausanias ascribes to him the statue of Hermes Propylaicus, and the group of the three Graces, which stood in the very entrace of the Aeropis at Athens; and he informs us that the Graces were draped (Paus. i. 22, § 6, ix. 35, § 2, s. 7.). Pliny also mentions the Graces of Soocrates, as not inferior to the finest works of marble in existence; but he says that some supposed them to be the production of the painter of the same name (Plin. H. N. xxxvi. 5, s. 4. § 10). There can, however, be little doubt that the account which Pausanias heard at Athens itself was the correct one.

3. A painter who seems, from the manner in which he is mentioned by Pliny, to have been a disciple of Pausias; and if so, he must have flourished about the latter half of the fourth century B.C., or between B.C. 340—300. His pictures were extremely popular. As examples of them, Pliny mentions Aesclapius and his daughters, Hygin, Aegle, Panace, and Iaco; and also a shlofthul, or perhaps a personification of Sloth (piger qui appellatur Oenos), making a rope of broom (spartum), which an ass gnaws away at the other end as fast as he twists it. (Plin. H. N. xxvi. 11, s. 40.) Pliny also mentions the statue of Sloth (piger qui appellatur Oenos), making a rope of broom (spartum), which an ass gnaws away at the other end as fast as he twists it. (Plin. H. N. xxvi. 11, s. 40.)

SOLINUS.

SOGDIA'NUS, or SECU-NIA'NUS (Σεκονδιανός), as he is called by Ctesias, was one of the illegitimate sons of Artaxerxes I. Longimanus. The latter on his death in B.C. 425 was succeeded by his legitimate son Xerxes II., but this monarch after a reign of only two months was murdered by Sogdianus, who now became king. Sogdianus, however, was murdered in his turn after a reign of seven months, by his brother Ochus, as is related in the life of the latter. Ochus reigned under the name of Dareius II. [Dareius II.] (Diod. xii. 71; Ctesias, Pers. c. 44.)

SOE'MIS, or SOA'EMIAS, JULIA, the daughter of Julia Maesa, and the mother of Elagabalus, either by her husband Sextus Varius Marcellus, or, according to the report industriously circulated with her own consent, by Caracalla. Of her early history we know nothing, but it is manifest that she must have been living at the Roman court under the protection of her aunt Julia Domna, about A.D. 204, otherwise the story with regard to the origin of her son, who was born in the following year, would have been palpably impossible. In the battle which transferred the empire from Macrinus to Elagabalus, she is said to have decided the fortune of the day, having succeeded in rallying the flying soldiers by prayers and entreaties, and by placing her boy in their path. Being forthwith created Augusta, she became the chosen counsellor of the youthful prince, and seems to have encouraged and shared his follies and enormities. She took a place in the senate, which then, for the first time, witnessed the intrusion of a woman, and was herself the president of a sort of female parliament, which held its sittings in the Quirinal, and published edicts for the regulation of all matters connected with the morals, dress, etiquette, and equipage of the matrons. She was slain by the praetorians, in the arms of her son, on the 11th of March, A.D. 222, and her body, after having been subjected to every indignity, was cast into a common sewer. [See CARACALLA; ELAGABALUS; JULIA DOMNA; MACRINUS.] (Lamprid. Elugab. 2; Dion Cass. lxxviii. 30, 38; Herodian v. 5, &c.; Scaliger, in Chronic. Euseb. p. 232; Eckhel, vol. vii. p. 264.)

Her name, according to Herodian and Dion Cassius, ought to be written SOEMIS; on all Roman and most Greek medals it appears as SOEMIHS. In the text of the Augustan historians, Capitolinus and Lampridius, we find the corrupt form SOUMIHS. In Greek inscriptions she is styled BASSIANA, from her grandfather, the founder of the family. With regard to the title JULIA, see JULIA DOMNA. [W. R.]

COIN OF SOEMIS OR SOEMIHS.

SOFO'NIUS TIGELLIN'NUS. [Tigellin'us.]

SOGDIA'NUS (Σογδιανός), or SECU-NIA'NUS (Σεκονδιανός), as he is called by Ctesias, was one of the illegitimate sons of Artaxerxes I. Longimanus. The latter on his death in B.C. 425 was succeeded by his legitimate son Xerxes II., but this monarch after a reign of only two months was murdered by Sogdianus, who now became king. Sogdianus, however, was murdered in his turn after a reign of seven months, by his brother Ochus, as is related in the life of the latter. Ochus reigned under the name of Dareius II. [Dareius II.] (Diod. xii. 71; Ctesias, Pers. c. 44.)

SOLIN'NUS, C. JULIA, the author of a geographical compendium, divided into fifty-seven chapters, containing a brief sketch of the world as known to the ancients, diversified by historical notices, remarks on the origin, habits, religious rites and social condition of various nations enumerated, together with details regarding the remarkable productions of each region, whether animal, vegetable or mineral. The arrangement, materials, and frequently the very words, are derived almost exclusively from the Natural History of Pliny, but little knowledge, care, or judgment, are displayed in the selection, and the writer nowhere indicates the source from whence he has drawn so largely contenting himself with assuring his friend Ad
We possess no information with regard to the personal history of Solinus, nor have we any evidence, internal or external, to determine the country to which he belonged. The epithet Grammaticus, attached to his name in the best MSS., seems to point out the profession which he followed, while the affectation, obscurity, and stiffness which characterise his style would lead us to infer that Latin was not his native tongue. The era at which he flourished is likely to be doubtful, but it is clear that he wrote before the seat of empire was transferred to Constantinople, since when speaking of Byzantium he could not have passed over an event so remarkable. He is quoted by St. Jerome, St. Ambrose, St. Augustine, and seems to have been frequently consulted by Ammianus Marcellinus, all of whom belong to the latter end of the fourth century. Forty years afterwards he is referred to as an established authority by Priscian; he is named by Servius, and we find traces of his productions in the Saturnalia of Macrobius. Some lovers of paradox have endeavoured to maintain that he lived in the Augustan age, a supposition at once overthrown by the fact that he speaks of the emperors Caius, Claudius and Vespasian, of Suetonius Paulinus, and of the destruction of Jerusalem (c. 35); the kindred hypothesis that he is the original, and Pliny the plagiarist, can be overthrown with equal facility, for several passages have been adduced by Salmasius (Proleg. ad Solin.) in some of which the words of Pliny have been misunderstood and misrepresented by his compiler, and in others slightly modified, so as to suit the altered circumstance of a later period. On the whole, it is probable, from the terms which he employs when mentioning the Persian empire, that he must be assigned to an epoch subsequent to the reign of Alexander Severus, under whom the line of the Arsacides became extinct, and the dominion of Central Asia passed from the hands of the Parthians; and hence the opinion of Dodwell, who makes him contemporary with Censorinus (A. p. 235), is perhaps not far from the truth.

We learn from the first of two prefatory addresses, that an edition of the work had already passed into circulation, in an imperfect state, without the consent or knowledge of the author, under the appellation Collectaneos Terum Memorableibilibus, while on the text printed, corrected, and published by himself, he bestowed the more ambitious title of Polyhistor; and hence we find the treatise designated in several MSS. as C. Jullii Solini Grammatici Polyhistor ap epso editis et recognitius. Salmasius assures us that among the different codices which he had examined he could discern unquestionable traces of the influence produced by the first of these, and we know that the citations in Priscian are from "Solinus in Memorabilia," "Solinus in Collectaneis," "Solinus in Admirabilibus."

In the collection of epigrams, fragments, &c., published by Pithou (Lugd. p. 267) we find twenty-two heroic hexameters in the style of Lucrètius, consisting of an invocation to Venus, introductory to a poem on fishes. Salmasius discovered these same versæ appended to a very ancient MS. of the Polyhistor belonging to the Royal Library at Paris, with the Incipit eiasdem Ponticon, words which of course imply that Solinus was the composer of this piece, and that it was named Pontica; and in other MSS. also it is distinguished as C. Jullii Solinis Polyhistor Ponticus. Scrierius and Wernsdorf consider that the lines in question breathe the spirit of a purer age, and have ascribed them to Varro Atacinus; but their arguments have recently been powerfully combated by Wullner.

Solinus was much studied in the middle ages, and consequently many editions appeared in the infancy of the typographical art. The first which bears a date is the issue from the press of Jenson (4to. Venet. 1473), and bibliographers have decided that two others, which are without date and without name of place or printer, belong to the same year, and appeared respectively at Rome and at Milan. The most notable edition is that of Salmasius, published at Utrecht in 1689, prefixed to his "Pliniane Exercitationes," the whole forming two large folio volumes, and presenting a wonderful monument of learning and labour.

There is an early translation into English, "The excellent and pleasant Workes of Julius Solinus Polyhistor, containing the noble Actions of humane creatures, the Secretes and Providence of Nature, the description of Countries, the manners of the People, &c. &c. translated out of Latin by Arthur Golding, Gent." 4to. Lond. 1597. Reprinted with the additions of Pomponius Mela, 4to. Lond. 1490.

SOLON (Σόλων), the celebrated Athenian legislator. For our knowledge of the personal history of this distinguished man we are dependent chiefly on the unsatisfactory compilations of Plutarch and Diogenes Laërtius. The former manifestly had valuable and authentic sources of information, which makes it the more to be regretted that his account is not fuller and more distinct.

According to the almost unanimous testimonies of the ancient authors Solon was the son of Excecestides, a man of but moderate wealth and political influence, though he belonged to one of the highest families in Athens, being a descendant of Codrus. [CODRUS.] The mother of Solon was a cousin of the mother of Peisistratus [PEISISTRATUS]. The date of the birth of Solon is not accurately known, but it was probably about B.C. 638. Excecestides had seriously crippled his resources by a too prodigal expenditure, which some writers were well pleased to set down to the credit of his generosity. Solon consequently found it either necessary or convenient in his youth to betake himself to the life of a foreign trader. It is likely enough that while necessity compelled him to seek livelihood in 15th or other, his active and inquiring spirit, which he retained throughout his life (γνώσεις & αλλα ποιλά διδασκαλομένα, Solonis Frgm. 20, ap. Bergk, Poetae Lyrici Graeci), led him to select that pursuit which would furnish the ampest means for its gratification. (Plut. Sol. 2.) The desire of amassing wealth at any rate does not seem to have been his leading motive. The extant fragments of his poetry (Fr. 12, 13, 16, ap. Bergk, l. c. pp. 327, 330) contain various dignified sentiments on the subject of riches, though a sufficient appreciation of their advantages is also perceptible. Solon early distinguished himself by his poetical abilities. His early dispositions were in a somewhat light and amatory strain, which afterwards gave way to the more dignified and earnest purpose of incalculating profound reflections or sage advice. So widely indeed did his reputation spread, that he was ranked as one of the famous seven sages, and his name appears in all the lists of the seven. It was doubtless the union of social and political wisdom which marked him in common with the other members of this assemblage and not his poetical abilities, or any philosophical researches, that procured him this honour.

The occasion which first brought Solon promi-nently forward as an actor on the political stage, was the contest between Athens and Megara respecting the possession of Salamis. The ill success of the attempts of the Athenians to make themselves masters of the island, had led to the enact-mament of a law forbidding the writing or saying anything to urge the Athenians to renew the contest. Such an instinct at his dishonourable renunciation of their aims, and seeing that many of the younger and more impetuous citizens were only deterred by the law from proposing a fresh attempt for the recovery of the island, hit upon the device of feigning to be mad, and causing a report of his condition to be spread over the city, whereupon he rushed into the agora, mounted the herald's stone, and there recited a short elegiac poem of 100 lines, which he had composed, calling upon the Athenians to retrieve their disgrace and reconquer the lovely island. To judge by the three short fragments that remain, the poem seems to have been a spirited composition. At any rate either by itself, or, as the account runs, backed by the eloquent exhortation of Peisistratus (who however, must have been extremely young at the time), it produced the desired effect. The pusillanimous law was rescinded, war was declared, and Solon himself appointed to conduct it. The expedition which he made was a successful one, though the accounts of its details varied. Certain proprietary rights seem to have been performed, by the direction of the Delphic oracle, to the guardian heroes of the island. A body of volunteers was landed on the island, and the capture of a Mega-rian ship enabled the Athenians to take the town of Salamis by stratagem, the ship, filled with Athenian troops, being admitted without suspicion. The Megarians were driven out of the island, but a tedious war ensued, which was finally settled by the arbitration of Sparta. Both parties appealed, in support of their claim, to the evidence of certain local customs and to the authority of Homer (Arist.
Rhet. i. 16), and it was currently believed in antiquity that Solon had surreptitiously inserted the line (II. ii. 558) which speaks of Ajax as ranging his ships with the Athenians. Some other legendary claims, and the authority of the Delphic oracle, which spoke of Salamis as an Ionian island, were also brought forward. The decision was in favour of the Athenians. Solon himself, probably, was one of those who received grants of land in Salamis, and this may account for his being termed a Salamianin. (Diog. Laërt. i. 45.) The authority of Herodotus (i. 59, comp. Plut. Sol. 8) seems decisive as to the fact that Solon was aided in the field as well as in the agora by hiskinsman Pei-sistras. The latter, however, must have lived to a great age, if he died in B.c. 527, and yet served in the field about B.c. 566, or even earlier.

Soon after these events (about B.c. 595; see Clinton, Foster Helenus, s. a.) Solon took a leading part in promoting hostilities on behalf of Delphi against Cirrha, and was the mover of the decree of the Amphictyons by which war was declared. It does not appear however what active part he took in the war. We would willingly disbelieve the story (which has no better authority than Pausnius, x. 37 § 7. Polyaeusen, Stradeg. vi. 13, makes Eurýlochos the author of the stratagem), that Solon hastened the surrender of the town by causing the waters of the Pleistus to be poisoned.

It was about the time of the outbreak of this war when Solon's attention was turned more forcibly than ever to the distracted state of his own country. He had already interfered to put a stop to the dissension between the Alcaeanidæ and the partisans of Cylon [ALCAEANIDÆ; CYLON], and had persuaded the former to abide by the result of a judicial decision. It was very likely also at his recommendation, and certainly with his sanction, that, when the Peloponnesians were suffering from the effects of pestilential disorders and superstitious excitement, and the ordinary religious rites brought no relief, the celebrated Epimenides [EPIMEMIDES] was sent for from Crete. (Plut. Sol. 12.) But the sources of the civil dissensions by which the country was torn required a more thorough remedy.
Geographical as well as political distinctions had separated the inhabitants of Attica into three parties, the Pedieis, or wealthy aristocratical inhabitants of the plain, the Dicæri, or poor inhabitants of the highlands of Attica, and the Parali, or mercantile inhabitants of the coast. These last, in point both of social condition and of political sentiment, held a position intermediate between the other two. It is difficult to say how far we are to trust Pictarch, when he says that the Pedieis and Dicæri differed in being respectively of oligarchical and democratical tendencies. The difficulties arising from these party disputes had in the time of Solon become greatly aggravated by the miserable condition of the poorer population of Attica — the Thetes. The great bulk of these had become sunk in poverty, and reduced to the necessity of borrowing money at exorbitant interest from the wealthy on the security of their estates, persons, or families; and by the rigorous enforcement of the law of debtor and creditor many had been reduced to the condition of slavery, or tilled the lands of the wealthy as dependent tenants. Of the rapacious conduct of the richer portion of the community we have evidence in the fragments of the poems of Solon himself. (Fr. 3, ap. Bergk, l. c. p. 521.) Matters had come to such a crisis that the lower class were in a state of mutiny, and it had become impossible to enforce the observance of the laws. Solon was well known as a man of wisdom, firmness, and integrity; and his reputation and influence had already been enhanced by the visit of Epimenides. He was now called upon by all parties to mediate between them, and alleviate the miseries that prevailed. He was chosen Archon (s. c. 594), and under that legal title was invested with unlimited power for adopting such measures as the exigencies of the state demanded. There were not wanting among the friends of Solon those who urged him to take advantage of the opportunity thus afforded him, and make himself a tyrant of Athens. Plutarch (c. 14, comp. Bergk. l. c. Fr. 30, 32, p. 323) has preserved some passages of the poems of Solon, referring to the feelings of surprise or contempt with which his refusal was met by those who had suggested the attempt. Indeed there can be no doubt that it would have been successful had it been made. That Solon should have had firmness enough to resist such a temptation, argues the possession on his part of a singular degree of virtue and self-restraint.

In fulfilment of the task entrusted to him, Solon addressed himself to the relief of the existing distress. This he effected with the greatest discretion and success by his celebrated disburdening ordinance (στρατηγευόμενος, measure consisting of various distinct provisions, calculated to lighten the pressure of those pecuniary obligations by which the Thetes and small proprietors had been reduced to utter helplessness and misery, with as little infringement of justice as possible on the part of creditors. The details of this measure are, however, involved in considerable uncertainty. Plutarch (Sol. 15) speaks of it as a total abolition of debts. This is in itself in the highest degree unlikely; and, as is acutely remarked by Mr. Grote (History of Greece, vol. iii. p. 137), would have rendered a debasement of the coinage unnecessary and useless. On the other hand it was certainly more than a reduction of the rate of interest, accompanied by a depreciation of the currency (which was the view of Androtion ap. Plut. l. c.). The extant fragments of the poems of Solon imply that a much larger amount of relief was afforded than we can conceive likely to be produced by a measure of that kind, even if (as Thirlwall supposes; see Hist. of Greece, vol. ii. p. 34) the reduction of interest was made retrospective, which is in fact only another way of saying that certain debts, or portions of debts, were cancelled (Frgm. 35, ap. Bergk. l. c. p. 335; Plut. Sol. 15), that he cancelled all contracts by which the land, person, or family of a debtor had been pledged as security, so that the mortgage-pillars were removed, slave-debtors released, and those who had been sold into foreign countries restored. But it does not seem necessary to suppose that in every such case the debt was cancelled, as well as the bond, though such may have been the case with regard to some of the most distressed class. At the same time Solon abolished the law which gave the creditor power to enslave an insolvent debtor, or allowed the debtor to pledge or sell his son, daughter, or unmarried sister, excepting only the case in which either of the latter was convicted of usuary. (Plut. Sol. 29). Most writers (comp. Thirlwall, l. c.; Wachsmuth. Hellen. Alterthums- kunde, § 56, vol. i. p. 472) seem to admit, without any question, the statement that Solon lowered the rate of interest. This, however, rests only on the authority (or conjecture) of Androtion, and as his account is based upon an erroneous view of the whole matter, it may fairly be questioned whether any portion of his statement is to be received, if the essential features of his view of the whole measure be rejected. On the whole we are disposed to deny that Solon did any thing to restrict the rate of interest. We know that Solon's measures introduced a lasting settlement of the law of debtor and creditor at Athens, and so far from there being any evidence that the rate of interest was ever limited, we find that the rate of interest was declared free by a law which was ascribed to Solon himself (Lyxias cont. Theocn. A. § 5, p. 969, comp. 356). To have introduced a restriction as a temporary measure of relief would have been merely a roundabout mode of wholly or partially cancelling debts, and would have required it to be retrospective, and not prospective. But for this last view of the case there is no authority whatever.

With respect to the depreciation of the coinage, we have the distinct statement that Solon made the mna to contain 100 drachmae instead of 73; that is to say, 73 of the old drachmae produced 100 of the new coinage, in which obligations were to be discharged; so that the debtor saved rather more than a fourth in every payment. (Comp. Bückh, Metrologische Untersuchungen, c. xv. p. 276; Diet. of Antiq. art. Seisachtheia. For the grounds on which Mr. Grote disputes the statement that Solon altered the weights and measures, see Classical Museum No. 1.) Respecting the story about the abuse made by three of the friends of Solon of their knowledge of his designs see Callias [Vol. I. p. 566]. The probity of Solon himself was vindicated, as he was a considerable loser by his own measure, having as much as five talents out at interest, which he set the example of giving up.

Though some of those who lost most through the operation of the Seisachtheia were incensed at it, as was natural, its benefits were so great and general that all classes united ere long in a common festival of thanksgiving, which was also termed Seisachtheia. Wachsmuth (l. c. § 56, vol. i. p. 472) asserts very confidently that one effect of the Seisachtheia was to transform the serfs, or villein tenants, into landed proprietors. Of this there is no proof. Another measure of relief introduced by Solon was the remission of all those who had been condemned to atimia to their full privileges as citizens, except those who had been condemned by the Ephetae, the Areiopagis, or the Phylo-basileis, for murder, homicide, or treason. (Plut. Sol. 19.)

It seems that in the first instance nothing more was contemplated in the investment of Solon with dictatorial power than the relief of the existing distress. But the success of his Seisachtheia procured for him such confidence and popularity that he was further charged with the task of entirely remodelling the constitution. As a preliminary step to his further proceedings he repealed all the laws of Draco except those relating to bloodshed. With our imperfect knowledge of the early political constitution of the people of Attica it is impossible to estimate with any certainty the magnitude of the change which Solon effected. Till it can be settled whether the division into four tribes was restricted to the Eupatridae, or included the Geomori and Demiurgi, it is impossible to ascertain in what position the ruling class stood to the unenfranchised demos, and consequently how far the latter was affected by the legislation of Solon. The opinion of Niebuhr (Hist. of Rome, vol. i. note 1017, vol. ii. p. 304), which is supported by Mr. Malden (Library of Useful Knowledge, History of Rome, p. 144), was, that the division into phyiae, hypatrae, and geneas, was restricted to the Eupatridae. All analogy confirms this view, which certainly is not opposed by more numerous or authentic testimonies on the part of ancient writers than are the universally acknowledged views of Niebuhr, who restrict it to the Roman curiae and tribes. If it be the correct one, the demus in Attica must have been destitute of any recognized political organization, and must have profited by the legislation of Solon in very much the same way as the plebs at Rome did by that of Servius Tullius.

The distinguishing feature of the constitution of Solon was the introduction of the timocratic principle. The title of citizens to the honours and offices of the state was regulated (at least in part) not by their nobility of birth, but by their wealth. All the citizens were distributed into four classes. (If the tribes included only the Eupatridae, it will be a mistake to speak of these classes as divisions of the citizens of the tribes; they must have been divisions in which the Eupatrid tribes and the demus were blended, just as the patricians and plebeians were in the classes and centuries of Servius Tullius.) The first class consisted of those who had an annual income of at least 500 medimni of grain or liquid regrads (equivalent to 500 drachmae, a medimmus being reckoned at a drachma, Plut. Sol. 23), and were called Pentacosiomedimni. The second class consisted of those whose incomes ranged between 300 and 500 medimni or drachmae, and were called Hippes (Ὑπηξις or Ιππηξις), from their being able to keep a horse, and bound to perform military service as cavalry. The third class consisted of those whose incomes varied between 200 and 300 medimni or drachmae (see Grote, L. c. vol. iii. p. 157, note, for reasons for rejecting Böck's estimate of the lowest pecuniary qualification of the third class at 150 drachmae), and were termed Zeugitae (Ζεύγιται). The fourth class included all whose property fell short of 200 medimni or drachmae. Plutarch (Sol. 18) says that this class bore the name of Thetes. Grote (L. c. p. 138) questions whether that statement is strictly accurate. There is no doubt, however, that the census of the fourth class was called the Thetic census (θητική έπαθος). The first three classes were liable to direct taxation, in the form of a graduated income tax. The taxable capital of a member of the first class was estimated at twelve times his yearly income, whatever that was. The taxable capital of a member of the second class was estimated at ten times his yearly income; and that of one of the third class at five times his yearly income. Thus upon any occasion on which it became necessary to levy a direct tax, it was assessed at a certain per centage on the taxable capital of each. It is not correct, however, to say that the taxable property of one of the pentacosiomedimni was estimated at 6000 drachmae. It was at least that, but it might be more. In like manner, the taxable capital of one of the Hippes might range from 3000 to 5000 drachmae, and so on. (Böckh, Public Economy of Athens, b. iv. ch. v.; Grote, L. c. p. 156). A direct tax, however, was an extraordinary, and not an annual payment. The fourth class were exempt from direct taxes, but of course they, as well as the rest, were liable to indirect taxes.

To Solon was ascribed the institution of the bóleth, or deliberative assembly of Four Hundred. Probably he did no more than modify the constitution of an earlier assembly of the same kind (Dict. of Antiq. art. Boule). Plutarch (Sol. 19) says that the four hundred members of the Boule were elected (ἐπίθεθαι perhaps implies an election by the popular assembly), one hundred from each of the four tribes. It is worth noting that this is the only direct statement that we have about the Boule of Solon's time. It must be settled whether the the Boule is an ἄρχη, and if it is, whether it is one of the δύναμες spoken of by Plutarch (c. 18), and Aristotle (Pol. ii. 9 § 2), before it can be affirmed that a member of any of the first three classes might belong to it, but not one of the fourth, or that it was elected by the popular assembly. Plutarch does not say that the members of the Boule were appointed only for a year, or that they must be above thirty years of age. In fact we know nothing about the Boule, but that its members were taken in equal proportions from the four genealogical tribes, and that the popular assembly could only entertain propositions submitted to it by the Boule. Here again we feel greatly the want of more certain knowledge regarding those genealogical tribes, with the internal organisation of which Solon does not seem to interfered. We are strongly inclined to the opinion that even Mr. Grote represents the Boule of Solon's constitution as a far less aristocratic assembly than it really was, and that in point of fact it was an exclusively Eupatrid body, closely analogous to the Roman senate under the constitution of Servius Tullius. The most authentic and valuable statement that we have respecting the general nature of Solon's constitutional changes is that of Solon himself (ap. Plut. Sol. 18, Fragm. 4. ap. Bergk, L. c. p. 322), from which it is clear that nothing can be more erroneous than to speak of Solon's institutions as being of a democratic character. To the demos he gave nothing more than a defensive power, sufficient to protect them from any tyrannous abuse on the part of the noble and wealthy classes, with whose prerogatives, in other respects, he did not interfere (δήμῳ μὲν γὰρ δίκαια τούσον κράτος ὑπὸ ἔπαθος, τίμις αὐτῷ ἔργον αὐτῷ ἐπορεύεσθαι τοῦ δ' ἐκχυμών καὶ χρήσιμων ἔχων ἀνίκητο πολιτικὴν καὶ τοῦ ἑφορέαν μηδὲν δεῖκεν ἐξον). According to the view commonly taken of the four tribes, there seems no reason why a large proportion of the Boule might not have been members of the demos, for it is not credible that the Attic demos was entirely included in the lowest class, and if (according to the common view) the Boule was elected by the ecclesia, where the fourth class would be the most numerous, it seems that the result must almost necessarily have been, that the Boule should be little more than the exponent of the feelings and will of the demos. In the most moderate view of the case the constitution and working of such an assembly must have been a large infraction of the previous power and prerogatives of the Eupatrids, and seems equally inconsistent with the passage of Solon quoted above, and with the statement of Plutarch (Sol. 19) that the Boule was designed as a check upon the demos. Both these statements, and all that we learn of the innovations of Cleisthenes, become far more intelligible on the hypothesis that the four Ionian tribes were Euaptrid tribes, and the Boule of Solon an Euaptrid body, whose action, however, was so far controlled by the demos, that its measures required the ratification of the popular assembly to make them valid. Mr. Grote (vol. iii. p. 97) expresses an opinion that before the time of Solon there was but one aristocratical council, the same which was afterwards distinguished from the Council of Four Hundred as the Upper Council, or the Council of Areiopagus. But his remark that the distinctive title of the latter, “Senate of Areiopagus,” would not be bestowed until the formation by Solon of the second senate or council, seems at variance with the quotation from one of the laws of Solon himself, by which Plutarch shows that the council of Areiopagus was not instituted by Solon. We incline more to the opinion of Dr. Thirlwall (Hist. of Greece, vol. ii. p. 40), that the Boule of Solon was only a modification of a previously existing institution.

There was no doubt a public assembly of some kind before the time of Solon, though probably possessed of but little more power than those which we find described in the Homeric poems. Solon undoubtedly greatly enlarged its functions. He gave it the right of electing the archons and other magistrates, and, what was even more important, made the archon and magistrates accountable directly to it when their year of office was expired. He also gave it what was equivalent to a veto upon any proposed measure of the Boule, though it could not itself originate any measure. Nor does it seem at all likely that, as constituted by Solon, it even had the power of modifying any measure submitted to it. Every member of all the four classes might vote in the popular assembly (Dict. of Antiq. art. Ecclesia), and all votes seem to have had the same weight, which forms an important point of difference between the Ecclesin of Athens and the Comitia Centuriata of Servius Tullius.

Plutarch (Sol. 19) remarks that it was an error to attribute to Solon the establishment of the council of the Areiopagus (Dict. of Antiq. art. Areiopagus). He does not seem even to have made any change in its constitution, though he enlarged its powers, and entrusted it with the general supervision of the institutions and laws of the state, and the religion and morals of the citizens.

Athenians in the age of unmitigated democracy were extremely fond of speaking of all their institutions either as originated by Solon, or as the natural expansion and application of his principles. Some even carried them back to Theseus. The omitors of course were not slow to fall in with this popular prejudice, and various palpable anarchisms in their statements show how little reliance can be placed on any accounts of the institutions of Solon that come from such a source. For instance, the oath of the Hellenic dictats, which is quoted by Demostenes and ascribed to Solon (cont. Timocr. p. 740), mentions the Cleisthenian senate of Five hundred. Several other curious examples of similar anarchisms are collected by Mr. Grote (vol. iii. p. 163, note 1) who has some excellent remarks on the practice of connecting the name of Solon with the whole political and judicial state of Athens, as it existed between the age of Pericles and that of Demostenes; many of the institutions thus referred to the great legislator, being among the last refinements and elaborations of the democratical mind of Athens. We entirely coincide in his opinion that the whole arrangement of the Hellistic courts and the transference to them of the old judicial powers of the archons bespeaks a state of things utterly inconsistent with the known relations of the age of Solon. “It would be a marvel, much more marvelling short of strong direct evidence would justify us in believing, that in an age when even partial democracy was yet untried, Solon should conceive the idea of such institutions: it would be a marvel still greater, that the half-emancipated Thetes and small proprietors for whom he legislated — yet trembling under the rod of the Euaptrid archons, and utterly inexperienced in collective business — should have been found suddenly competent to fulfil these ascendant functions, such as the citizens of conquering Athens in the days of Pericles — full of the sentiment of force, and actively identifying themselves with the dignity of their community — became gradually competent, and not more than competent, to exercise with effect.” (p. 165.) The term Heliaean he thinks was in the time of Solon no more than the name of the popular assembly, which is in fact the original meaning of the word. The number of 5000, which was that of the whole body of dicasts after times had been divided into two thousand men each, the division into 10 tribes. It is to be observed, that Plutarch, who after all is our best authority, says nothing of any such dionic organisation as that of the later Heliaea. Mr. Grote even questions the statement of Plutarch (Sol. 18), that Solon allowed an appeal to the ecclesia from the sentence of an archon, considering that Plutarch has been misled by the recollection of the Roman provocatio (I. c. p. 172).

The idea of the periodical revision of his laws by the Nomothetae being a part of Solon’s plan is even in contradiction to the statements of our authorities (Herod. i. 29; Plut. Sol. 25). The institution of the Nomothetae was one of the most ultra-democratical that can well be imagined. It was a jury appointed by lot out of a body of dicasts who were appointed by lot, with power to rescind any law with which any one could find sufficient fault to induce an assembly of all the male citizens to subject it to revision. It is to be observed too that Demostenes (cont. Timarch. p. 706) and Aeschines (cont. Cles. p. 429) mention, in connection with this procedure, as one of the regulations appointed by Solon to be observed by the proposer of a new or amended law, that he should post up his proposed law before the Eponymi, that is, the statues of the ten heroes from whom the ten tribes of Cleisthenes derived their names (comp. Grote, i. c. p. 163).

Besides the arrangement of the general political relations of the people Solon was the author of a great variety of special laws, which do not seem to have been arranged in any systematic manner. Those relating to debts and creditors have been already referred to. Several had for their object the encouragement of trade and manufactures. Foreign settlers were not to be naturalized as citizens unless they carried on some industrious pursuit. If a father did not teach his son some trade or profession, the son was not liable to main-taint his father in his old age. The council of Areopagus had a general power to punish idleness. Solon forbade the exportation of all produce of the Attic soil except olive oil. The impulse which he gave to the various branches of industry carried on in towns had eventually an important bearing upon the development of the democratic spirit in Athens. (Plut. Sol. 22, 24.) Solon was the first who gave to those who died childless the power of disposing of their property by will. He enacted several laws relating to marriage, especially with regard to heiresses (Plut. Sol. 20). Other regulations were intended to place restraints upon the female sex with regard to their appearance in public, and especially to repress frantic and excessive manifestations of grief at funerals (l. c. 21). An adulterer taken in the act might be killed on the spot, but the violation of a free woman was only punishable by a fine of one hundred drachmæ, the seduction of a free woman by a fine of twenty drachmæ (l. c. 23). Other laws will be found in Plutarch respecting the speaking evil either of the dead or of the living, respecting the use of wells, the planting of trees in conterminous properties, the destruction of noxious animals, &c. (l. c. 21, 23, 24. Comp. Diog. Laërt. i. 55, &c.) The rewards which he appointed to be given to victors at the Olympic and Isthmian games are for that age unusually large (500 drachmæ to the former and 100 to the latter). The law relating to theft, that the thief should restore twice the value of the thing stolen, seems to have been due to Solon. (Dict. of Anti. art. κλέμεν δίκη.) He also established or regulated the public dinners at the Prytanæum. (Plut. Sol. 24.) One of the most curious of his regulations was that which denominated atimia against any citizen, who, on the outbreak of a sedition, remained neutral. On the design of this enactment to shorten as much as possible any suspension of legal authority, and its connection with the ostracism, the reader will find some ingenious and able remarks in Grote (l. c. iii. p. 190, &c.). The laws of Solon were inscribed on wooden rollers (ἀξονες) and triangular tablets (κύρθαις), in the βουλοσφόδιον fashion, and were set up at first in the Aeropæs, afterwards in the Prytanæum. (Plut. Sol. 25; Harpocr. s. v. κύρθαις — αἱ κατωθόν νομίζοι; Polux, viii. § 128; Suidas, s. v.)

The Athenians were also indebted to Solon for some rectification of the calendar. Diogenes Laërtius (i. 59) says that "he made the Athenians regulate their days according to the moon," that is to say, he introduced some division of time agreeing more accurately with the course of the moon. Plutarch (Sol. 25) gives the following confused account of the matter: "Since Solon observed the irregularity of the moon, and saw that its motion does not coincide completely either with the setting or with the rising of the sun, but that it often on the same day both overtake and passes the sun, he ordained that this day should be called ἐνυ καλ νέα, considering that the portion of it which preceded the conjunction belonged to the month that was ending, the rest to that which was beginning. The succeeding day he called νομανια," According to the scholiast on Aristophanes (Nab. 1129) Solon introduced the practice of reckoning the days from the twentieth onwards in the reverse order. Ideler (Handbueh der Chronologie, vol. i. p. 266, &c.) gathers from the notices that we have on the subject, that Solon was the first who introduced among the Greeks months of 29 and 30 days alternately.

He also thinks that this was accompanied by the introduction of the Trieteris or two-year cycle.

We have more than one statement to the effect that Solon exacted from the government and people of Athens a solemn oath, that they would observe his laws without alteration for a certain space—10 years according to Herodotus (i. 29),—100 years according to other accounts (Plut. Sol. 25). According to a story told by Plutarch (Sol. 15), Solon was himself aware that he had been compelled to leave many imperfections in his system and code. He is said to have spoken of his laws as being not the best, but the best which the Athenians would have received. After he had completed his task, being, we are told, greatly annoyed and troubled by those who came to him with all kinds of complaints, suggestions or criticisms about his laws, in order that he might not himself have to propose any change, he absented himself from Athens for ten years, after he had obtained the oath above referred to. He first visited Egypt, and conversed with two learned Egyptian priests—Psennophis of Heliopolis, and Sonchis of Sais. The stories which they told him about the submerged island of Atlantis, and the war carried on against it by Athens 9000 years before his time, induced him to make it the subject of an epic poem, which, however, he did not complete, and of which nothing now remains.

From Egypt he proceeded to Cyprus, and was received with great distinction by Philycrus, king of the little town of Aepeia. Solon persuaded the king to remove from the old site, which was on an inconvenient and precipitous elevation, and build a new town on the plain. He himself assisted in laying out the plan. The new settlement was called Soli, in honour of the illustrious visitor. A fragment of an elegiac poem addressed by Solon to Philycrus is preserved by Plutarch (Sol. 26; Bergk, i. c. p. 325). We learn from Herodotus (v. 113) that in this poem Solon bestowed the greatest praise upon Philycrus. The statement of the blundering Diogenes Laërtius (i. 51, 62) that Solon founded Soli in Cilicia, and died in Cyprus, may be rejected without hesitation.

It is impossible not to regret that the stem laws of chronology compel us to set down as a fiction the beautiful story so beautifully told by Herodotus (i. 29—45, 56; comp. Plut. Sol. 27, 28) of the interview between Solon and Croesus, and the illustration furnished in the history of the latter of the truth of the maxim of the Athenian sage, that "the sudden prosperity is precarious, and that no man's life can be pronounced happy till he has seen its close without a reverse of fortune [CROESUS]." For though it may be made out that it is just within the limits of possibility that Solon and Croesus may have met a few years before B.C. 560, that could not have been an interview consistent with any of the circumstances mentioned by Herodotus, and without which the story of the interview would be entirely devoid of any interest that could make it worth while attempting to establish its possibility. The whole pith and force of the story would vanish if any interview of an earlier date be substituted for that which the episode in Herodotus requires, namely one taking place when Croesus was king (Mr. Grote, i. c. p. 199 shows that it is a mere gratuitous hypothesis to make SOLOUS.

SOPATER. 863

Creusus joint king with his father), at the height of his power, when he had a son old enough to be married and command armies, and immediately preceding the turn of his fortunes, not more than seven or eight years before the capture of Sardis.

"In my judgment," observes Mr. Grote, "this is an illustrative tale, in which certain real characters—Solon and Creusus,—and certain real facts—the great power and succeeding ruin of the former by the victorious arm of Cyrus, together with certain facts altogether fictitious, such as the two sons of Creusus, the Phrygian Adrastus and his history, the hunting of the mischievous wild boar on Mount Olympus, the ultimate preservation of Creusus, and his death—regularly put together so as to convey an impressive moral lesson."

During the absence of Solon the old oligarchical dissensions were renewed, the Pedieis being headed by Lycurgus, the Parali by Megacles, the Discrit by Peisistratus. These dissensions were approaching a crisis when Solon returned to Athens, and had proceeded to such a length that he found himself unable to repress them. For an account of the successful machinations of Peisistratus, and the unsuccessful endeavours of Solon to counteract them, the reader is referred to the article Pei-

SISTRATU.S. The tyrant, after his usurpation, is said to have paid considerable court to Solon, and on various occasions to have solicited his advice, which Solon did not withhold. We do not know certainly how long Solon survived the overthrow of the constitution. According to Phainius of Lesbos (Plut. Sol. 32), he died in less than two years after. There seems nothing to hinder us from accepting the statement that he had reached the age of eighty (Diog. Laërt. i. 62). There was a story current in antiquity that, by his own directions, his ashes were collected and scattered round the island of Salamis. Plutarch discards this story as absurd. He himself remarks, however, that Aristotel, as well as other authors of credit, repeated it. Diogenes Laërtius (i. 62) quotes some lines of Cratinus in which it is alluded to. The sin-gularity of it is rather an argument in its favour.

Of the poems of Solon several fragments remain. They do not indicate any great degree of imaginative power, but the style of them seems to have been vigorous and simple. Those that were called forth by special emergencies appear to have been marked by no small degree of energy. Solon is said to have attempted a metrical version of his laws, and a couple of lines are quoted as the commencement of this composition; but nothing more of it remains. (Plut. Sol. 3.) Here and there, even in the fragments that remain, sentiments are expressed of a somewhat more jovial kind than the rest. These are probably relics of youthful effusion.

Some traced them, as well as Solon's somewhat luxurious style of living, to the bad habits which he had contracted while following the profession of a trader. (Plut. Sol. 3.) The fragments of Solon are usually incorporated in the collections of the Greek gnomic poets, as, for example, in those of Syllburg, Brunnck, and Boissoneau. They are also inserted in Bergk's Poetae Lyrici Graeci. There is also a separate edition by Buch (Ludg. Bat. 1823). The select correspondence of Solon with Periander, Peisistratus, Epeimenides, and Creusus, with which Diogenes Laërtius has favoured us, is of course spurious.

Respecting the connection of Solon with the arrangement of the Homeric poems, see the article Homoerus (p. 507).

The story told by Plutarch (Sol. 29, comp. Diog. Laërt. i. 59) respecting Solon and Thespis cannot be true, since dramatic entertainments were not introduced into Athens till 20 years (n.c. 535) after Solon's death. It is related that Solon asked Thespis, after witnessing one of his pieces, if he was not ashamed of telling such untruths before so large an audience. Thespis replied, that as it was done for amusement only, there was no harm in saying and doing such things. Which answer incensed Solon so much that he struck the ground vehemently with his staff, and said that if such amusement as that were to be praised and honoured, men would soon begin to regard covennants as nothing more than a joke.

An inscription on a statue set up in honour of Solon spoke of him as born in Salamis (Diog. Laërt. i. 62, ib. Menage). This can hardly have been the case, as Salamis was not incorporated with Attica when he was born. The statue was set up a long time after Solon's death, and probably by the Salaminians themselves. (Plut. Solon; Diog. Laërt. i. 45, sc.; K. F. Hermann, Lehrbuch der griech. Staatsathl. §§ 106—109; Grote, Hist. of Greece, vol. iii. c. xi.; Thirlwall, Hist. of Greece, vol. ii. pp. 27—56.)

[ C. P. M. ]

SOLEON, a gen engraver, who probably lived under Augustus, at the same time as Dioscorides, with whom he may perhaps be considered to divide the honour of being the founder of the succession of great engravers, who lived under the early Roman emperors, and whose numerous and beautiful works now fill the cabinets of Europe. There is no mention made of Solon in any ancient writer, but his name occurs on several gems. A complete account of his works, with references to the other writers by whom they have been described, is given in Nagler's Neues Allgemeines Künstler-Lexicon, vol. xvii. a. n. (See, also, Thiersch, Epochen, p. 304; Müller, Archäol. d. Kunst, § 300, n. 1.)

SOLEON, JULIUS, a man of the lowest origin, purchased the rank of senator from Cleander, the favourite of Commodus, by the surrender of all his property. He was afterwards put to death by Septimius Severus at the commencement of his reign, although he had himself drawn up a decree of the senate at the request of the emperor, enacting that no senator should be put to death (Dion Cass. lxxii. 12, lxxiv. 2, and Excerpt. Vatic. ed. Mai, p. 225).

SOMIS (Σωμής), the artist who made the bronze statue of Procles the son of Lycaonidas, of Andros, an Olympic victor in the boys' wrestling. (Paus, vi. 14. § 5. s. 13.) From the connection in which the passage stands in Pausanias, it may be inferred with probability, though not with certainty, that Somis was contemporary with Stomius about the beginning of the fifth century b. c. (Thiersch, Epochen, p. 202; comp. Stomius.) [ P. S. ]

SONMUS, the personification of god, and goddess, the Greek Hypnos, is described by the ancients as a brother of Death (Sávaros), and as a son of Night (Hes. Theog. 211, &c.; Virg. Aen. vi. 277). At Sicyon there was a statue of Sleep surmounted by a star, the giver (Paus. ii. 10. § 2). In works of art Sleep and Death are represented alike to youths sleeping or holding inverted torches in their hands. (Comp. Thanatus.) [ L. S. ]

SOROITER (Σωρότερος), historical. 1. One of the generals elected by the Syracusans on the murder of Hieronymus in B.C. 215 (Liv. xxiv. 23, 25).

2. A general of Philip V., king of Macedonia, crossed over to Africa in B.C. 203, with a body of 4000 troops and some money, in order to assist the Carthaginians. He was taken prisoner by the Romans, together with many of his soldiers, and Philip sent an embassy to Rome to solicit their release. (Liv. xxx. 26, 42.)

3. An Acarnanian, the commander of Philip's garrison at Chalcis, was slain with most of his troops in B.C. 200. (Liv. xxxi. 23.)

4. One of the generals of Perseus, slain in battle with the Romans in B.C. 171. (Liv. xlii. 66.)

5. Two Sicilians of this name are mentioned by Cicero in his orations against Verres. (Cic. Verr. ii. 28, iv. 39.)

SOPATER (Σωπάτωρ), literary. 1. Of Paphos, a writer of parody and burlesque (φυλακογράφος), who lived in the time of Alexander the Great, and continued to flourish down to the reign of Ptolemy II., as Athenaeus (ii. 71, b.) informs us, on the authority of the poet himself: his period may therefore be regarded as the forty years from B.C. 323 to 283 (Clinton, F. H. vol. ii. s. a. 283). He is frequently mentioned by Athenaeus, who occasionally calls him Φάλος, which seems to be a nickname, derived from the word φαλίς (lentile-portulage), which appears to have been the title of one of Sopater's plays), and applied to him as a punning variation upon Φάλως. The following titles of his plays are preserved by Athenaeus and Suidas (Ald.); Suidas has made the mistake of distinguishing two Sophai, the one a comedian and the other a parodist: — Βαχής. Βακχίδος γέμιος, Βακχίδος μυστηρίκες, Γαλάτα, Εὐθυνοθέμβρος, Ἡπαπλατιν, Κρυός, Μύστα, Μυστάκων Θρητίων, Νεκεία, Ορφέητα, Πολιά, Ξάφα, Φασκή, Φυσιλόγος. (Fabric, vol. ii. p. 492; Ulrici, Gesch. d. Hellen. Dichter. vol. ii. p. 325.)

2. Of Apamea, a distinguished sophist, the head for some time of the school of Plotinus, was a disciple of Iamblichus, after whose death (before A.D. 339), he went to Constantinople, where he enjoyed the favour and personal friendship of Constantine, who afterwards, however, put him to death, from the motive, as was alleged, of giving a proof of the sincerity of his own conversion to Christianity (Sozom. H. E. i. 5; comp. the note of Valesius; Suid. s. c.). Eunapius, who gives a fuller account of the matter (Vit. Aedes. pp. 36, 37, 41), and Zosimus (ii. 40) ascribes his death to the machinations of Ablabians; but according to the former writer, the pretext for his condemnation was the charge that he detained by magical arts a fleet laden with corn, of which Constantinople was in the utmost want. The time of his death must have been between A.D. 330 and 337. (Clinton, Fast. Rom. s. a. 312, 326, 330.) The only works ascribed to him by Suidas are, one On Prudence (Περὶ Ψωφαλοι), and another On Persons who are undeservedly Fortunate or Unfortunate (περὶ τῶν παρὰ τὴν ζωὴν εὐπροσωπῶν ἢ διασκροπῶνων). There are, however, several other writings, grammatical, and of miscellaneous information, under the name of Sopater, but the best critics ascribe these to a younger Sopater, of Apamea or Alexandria, whom Suidas distinguishes, and, as they suppose, rightly so, from the philosopher of the time of Constantine. Whether this view is correct can hardly be determined with certainty.

3. The younger sophist of Apamea, or of Alexandria, is supposed to have lived about two hundred years later than the former. Suidas tells us that he wrote epitomes of numerous works, and that some ascribed to him the Historical Extracts (Περιγνὺν τῶν ιστορίων), which, we may therefore infer, others attributed to the elder Sopater. Phitos (Bibl. Cod. 161) has preserved an abstract of this ψευδογραφ, or, as he calls it, εἰκόναγω διδασκώ, from which it appears that the work contained a vast variety of facts and figures, collected from a great number of authors. A list of the writers quoted by Sopater is given by Fabriucius (Bibl. Grac. vol. x. pp. 720—722; comp. vol. ii. p. 521, vol. iii. p. 51, vol. iv. p. 250, and Vossius, de Hist. Grac. p. 294, ed. Westermann).

The rhetorical and grammatical works under the name of Sopater are the following:—διαφάσεις ζητημάτων, a classification and analysis of rhetorical themes, printed in the Aldine collection, Venet. 1508, fol.; a commentary on the part περὶ στάθεων of the τεχνὴ βιοτορκή of Homogenes, printed in the same collection; and Prolegomena to Ariostes, printed from a MS. in the Bodleian Library in vol. i. of Jebb's edition of Ariostes. All the remains of his rhetorical works are contained in vols. iv., v., and viii. of Walz's Rhetores Graeci. (Fabric. Bibl. Grac. vol. iv. pp. 18, 73, 102, 138; Westermann, ad Voss. L. c.)

SOPHAGAETUS (Σοφαγαίτος), a native of Symphalax in Arcadia, was a commander of mercenaries in the service of Cyrus the Younger, whom he joined in his expedition against Artaxerxes, in B.C. 401, with 1000 heavy-armed men. In the following year, after the treacherous apprehension of Clearchus and the other principal generals of the Cyreans, Sophagetus and Clenor were deputed to meet Ariaeus, and receive his explanation of the transaction. When the main body of the Greeks, after their arrival on the frontier of the western Armenia, marched to dispose Teribazus from the defile where he meant to intercept them, Sophagetus remained behind in command of the troops that were left to guard the camp. At Trapezeus, Philesius and Sophagetus, being the oldest of the generals, were placed in command of the ships which were to sail to Cerasus with the men above forty, and the women and children, while the rest of the army proceeded thither by land. Some deficiency being afterwards detected in the cargoes of these ships, an investigation took place at Cotyora, and Philesius, Xautiches, and Sophagetus were fined,—the two former for peculation or carelessness in the custody of the goods, and the third for his negligent supervision of them. We find Sophagetus mentioned again, in the account of the engagement of the Cyreans with the Bithynians and the troops of Pharnabazus, as giving his opinion against the attempt to cross a deep gulf which lay on the line of march. (Xen. Anat. i. 1. § 11, 2. §§ 3, 9, ii. 5. § 37, iv. 4. § 19, v. 3. § 1. 6. § 1, vi. 5. § 13.)

SOPHAGASENUS (Σοφαγασήνος), a king of India, with whom Antiochus the Great is said to have renewed an alliance, and from whom he obtained some elephants, when he crossed the Indian Caucasus. (Polyb. xi. 34.) This Sophagasenus probably ruled over the same people as the Indian king Sundrocotus, with whom Seleucus Nicator SOPHIANUS. maintained friendly relations. [Sandrockius] Schlegel supposes Sophageneus to signify in Sanscrit "the leader of a fortunate army," and he gives Subhagunus as the Indian form of the name. [Indische Bibelgedeck, vol. i. p. 246.]

SOPHIANES (Σωφιανᾶς), an Athenian, of the demus of Deceleia. In the war between Athens and Aegina, just before the Persian invasion of b. c. 490, he slew in single combat Eurbyates the Argive, before whose prowess three Athenians had already fallen. At the battle of Plataea, in b. c. 479, Sophanes distinguished himself by his valor above all his countrymen. One account described him as wearing during the engagement an iron anchor, which he had fastened by a chain to the belt of his cuirass, and fixed in the ground to steady himself against the charge of the enemy. According to another statement, he merely bore the device of an anchor on his shield, which he kept perpetually whirling round. In b. c. 465, Sophanes was joined with Lecrus in the command of the 10,000 Athenians who unsuccessfully attempted to colonize Amphipolis, and was slain in battle by the natives. (Herod, vi. 92, ix. 73—75; Thuc. i. 100, iv. 102; Paus. i. 29.) [E. E.]

SOPHIA, the widow of Justin II. [Justinus II.; Tibirius II.]

SOPHIA'NUS (Σωφιανᾶς). 1. Michael. There is a Latin version by a Michael Sophianus of Aristotle's treatise De Anima, which was printed with the In Libros de Anima Aristotelis Expositio of St. Thomas Aquinas, Fol. Venice (apud Juntas) 1565. Of the age of the translator nothing appears to be known unless we could identify him with the subject of one or other of the following articles, which cannot be done without supposing that there is some mistake as to his first name. If it is likely, he was a different person, we may conjecture that he was one of the many Greek refugees who sought refuge in Italy on the capture of Constantinople by the Turks, or a Greek of Corfu, to which island we judge from the following article a branch of the Sophianis belonged. We may perhaps identify him with the Sophianus, a Greek, who translated into Latin, and addressed to Lelio dello Valva, a work De Re Militari et de Militarius Instrumentis, which is extant in the MS. in the Medicean library at Florence, or with the author of a work In Topicis Aristotelis, of Epistolae in Laudem ipsius, and of Epigrammata Sacra, all in the Ambrosian Library at Milan. (Montfaucon, Biblioth. Bibliolcaec, vol. i. pp. 331, 502.)

2. Nicolaus. Raphael Volterratus (Comment. Urban. Lib. xxii) mentions among the eminent persons of his time Sophianus, a Greek, who had taught Greek at Rome, but had not much cultivated an acquaintance with Latin. This notice would rather lead us to identify him with the Michael Sophianus just mentioned. [No. 1.] But Vossius (De Natura Artium, lib. ii. sec De Philologios, c. xii. § 21; Lib. iii. sec De Mathesis seu De Scientiis Mathematicis, c. lviii. § 14) identifies him with Nicolaus Sophianus, a Greek of Corfu, who drew a map of ancient Greece, which was published, and had its value at the time, though partaking considerably of the imperfection of the geographical science of that day. Montfaucon (l. c. p. 187) mentions among the MSS. of the Library of Card. Ottoboni at Rome Nicolaus Sophianus Grammaticus, apparently a Greek grammar, and in the Library of St. Mark at Venice there is a treatise in Greek by Sophianus, τόν Σωφιανού De Sypatiri, cod. ccxxii. A Greek treatise by Nicolaus Sophianus, De Præparatione (s. Confectione) et Usu Astrologiæ, extant in MS. in various Libraries (Montfaucon, l. c. pp. 632, 741, 1289, Biblioth. Reg. Paris. Catal. Fol. 1740. Codd. mmmdxcix. and mmdcdxxii. λ.), must be ascribed to a later Sophianus who lived in the sixteenth century, as appears by its dedication to Pope Paul III. The similarity of the subject would lead us to ascribe the map of Greece to this later Sophianus, were it not for the assertion of Vossius.

3. Theodorus. Josias Simler in his Epitome Bibliothecae Gesnerianae (p. 704, ed. Frisili. Fol. Zurich, 1593, comp. Vossius, De Scientia Mathematicis, c. lviii. § 19), speaks of the works of Theodorus Sophianus which he terms Astronomiae et Musicæ. The subjects would lead to the suspicion that he had in view the works of the later Nicolaus Sophianus, and gave him in mistake the name of Theodorus. There was, however, a Theodorus Sophianus in the last period of the Byzantine Empire: he was nephew of the patriarch Gennadius II. of Constantinople [Gennadius, No. 2], as appears from the title of the funeral oration which his uncle the patriarch pronounced for him, a. d. 1457—"Epitapho τοῦ μακαρίου Θεοδορού τοῦ Σωφιανοῦ ἐν τῇ ἤκεσι μικρῷ Βατοπεδίου ταρτητί, εὐ πνεύμα καὶ υγίνων σα Σεισίος αὐτοῦ Γενναδίου μακαρίου ἐν τῷ ταφίῳ, στεντο καὶ τιμή. Οὗτοι οἰς θεοτικοὶ θεολόγους Σωφιανούς, in Sacrō Monestorio Batopediti sepultis, quam extemplo pronuntiavitглавнующий του αγαθοῦ Γενναδίου μακαρίου αὐτοῦ." (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. xi. 392). It is perhaps to this Theodorus Sophianus that we may refer the So- phianus and the identified in the King's Library at Paris, Cod. mccclx. (Catalog. Biblioth. Reg. vol. ii. Fol. Paris 1740), (Vossius, ii. oc.; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. xii. pp. 293, 714.) [J. C. M.]

SOPHILUS (Σώφιλος), a comic poet of the middle comedy, was a native of Sicyon or of Thebes, and composed the following dramas (Suid. s. v.): Κυλαρδός, Ψίλαρχος, Τυνάρδως ὤ Λήδα, Δηλία, Ἐγγεχείριον (or Ψιράμων, but the other reading is more probably correct), and παπακατακήθια, to which must be added, from Athenaeus, Συνεργόκτης, and Ἀνδρικότης. Diogenes Laertius (ii. 120) refers to a play of Sophilus, entitled Γάμος, in which Stilpo was attacked; but the reading of the passage is very doubtful, and Meineke has shown reasons for supposing that the play referred to is the Γάμοι of Diphilos or Philon, referred to in the same author. It is also probable that Σώφιλος must not be confounded with Σώφιλος or Σώφιλας, which was a different name: the father of the poet Sophocles was named Σώφιλος. There are very few fragments of Sophilus remaining. The time at which he flourished is supposed by Meineke to have been about Ol. 108, b. c. 348. (Meineke, Frag. Com. Graec. vol. i. pp. 424—426, vol. iii. pp. 581—584; Ed. Min., p. 794, &c.) [P. S.]

SOPHOCLES (Σωφικλῆς). 1. The celebrated tragic poet. The ancient authorities for the life of Sophocles are very scanty. Duris of Samos wrote a work Περὶ Ἐμνίου καὶ Σωφικλῆους (Ath. iv. p. 164, d.); Ister, Aristoxenus, Neanthes, Sisyrus, and others are quoted as authorities for his life; and it cannot be doubted that, amidst the vast mass of

VOL. III.
Alexandrian literature, there were many treatises respecting him, besides those on the general subject of tragedy; but of these stores of information, the only remnants we possess are the respectable anonymous compilation, Biaf Sophokleous, which is prefixed to the chief editions of the poet's works, and is also contained in Westermann's Vitarum Scriptores Graeci Minores, the very brief article of Suida, and the incidental notices scattered through the works of Plutarch, Athenaeus, and other ancient writers. Of the numerous modern writers who have treated of the life, character, and works of Sophocles, the chief are: — Lessing, whose Leben des Sophokles is a masterpiece of aesthetic disquisition, left unfortunately incomplete; Schlegel, in his Lectures on Dramatic Art and Criticism, which are now familiar to English readers; F. Schultze, de Vita Sophoclis, Berol. 1836, 8vo.; Schöll, Sophokles, sein Leben und Wirken, Frankfurt, 1842, 8vo., with the elaborate series of reviews by C. F. Hermann, in the Berliner Jahrbücher, 1843: to these must be added the standard works on Greek tragedy by Bückh (Poet. Trag. Graec. Princ.), Weckler (die Griechischen Tragödien), and Kayser (Hist. Crit. Tragicorum Graec.), and also the standard histories of Greek literature in general, and of Greek Poetry in particular, by Müller, Ulrici, Bode, and Bernhardy.

I. The Life of Sophocles.—Sophocles was a native of the Attic village of Colonus, which lay a little more than a mile to the north-west of Athens, and the scenery and religious associations of which have been described by the poet, in his last and greatest work, in a manner which shows how powerful an influence his birth-place exercised on the whole current of his genius. The date of his birth, according to his anonymous biographer, was in Ol. 71, 2, b. c. 493; but the Parian Marble places it one year higher, b. c. 492. Most moderns, with the elaborate series of reviews, on the ground of its more exact agreement with the other passages in which the poet's age is referred to (see Clinton, F. H. s. a.; Müller, Hist. Lit. p. 337, Eng. trans.). But those passages, when closely examined, will be found hardly sufficient to determine so nice a point as the difference of a few months. With this remark by way of caution, we place the birth of Sophocles at b. c. 493, five years before the battle of Marathon, so that he was about thirty years younger than Aeschylus, and fifteen years older than Euripides. (The anonymous biographer also mentions these differences, but his numbers are obviously corrupt.)

His father's name was Sophillus, or Sophilus, respecting whose condition in life it is clear from the anonymous biography that the grammarians knew nothing for certain. According to Aristoxenus, he was a carpenter or smith; according to Ister, a swordmaker; while the biographer refuses to mention these statements, except in the sense that Sophillus had slaves who practised one or other of those handicrafts, because, he argues, it is improbable that the son of a common artificer should have been associated in military command with the first men of the state, such as Pericles and Thucydides, and also because, if he had been low-born, the comic poets would not have failed to attack him on that ground. There is some force in the latter argument.

At all events it is clear that Sophocles received an education not inferior to that of the sons of the most distinguished citizens of Athens. To both of the two leading branches of Greek education, music and gymnastics, he was carefully trained, in company with the boys of his own age, and in both he gained the prize of a garland. He was taught music by the celebrated Lamprus (Vit. Anon.). Of the skill which he had attained in music and dancing in his sixteenth year, and of the perfection of his bodily form, we have conclusive evidence in the fact that, when the Athenians were assembled in solemn festival around the trophy which they had set up in Salamis to celebrate their victory over the fleet of Xerxes, Sophocles was chosen to lead, naked and with lyre in hand, the chorus which danced about the trophy, and sang the songs of triumph, b. c. 480. (Ath. i. p. 20, f.; Vit. Anon.)

The statement of the anonymous biographer, that Sophocles learnt tragedy from Aeschylus, has been objected to on grounds which are perfectly conclusive, if it be understood as meaning any direct and formal instruction; but, from the connection in which the words stand, they appear to express nothing more than the simple and obvious fact, that Sophocles, having received the art in the form to which it had been advanced by Aeschylus, made in it other improvements of his own.

His first appearance as a dramatist took place in the year b. c. 468, under peculiarly interesting circumstances; not only from the fact that Sophocles, at the age of twenty-seven, came forward as the rival of the veteran Aeschylus, whose supremacy had been maintained during an entire generation, but also from the character of the judges. It was, in short, a contest between the new and the old styles of tragic poetry, in which the competitors were the greatest dramatists, with one exception, who ever lived, and the umpires were the first men, in position and education, of a state in which almost every citizen had a nice perception of the beauties of poetry and art. The solemnities of the Great Dionysia were rendered more imposing by the occasion of the return of Cimon from his expedition to Sicyon, bringing with him the bones of Theseus. Public expectation was so excited respecting the approaching dramatic contest, and party feeling ran so high, that Asephon, the Archon Eponymus, whose duty it was to appoint the judges, had not yet ventured to proceed to the final act of drawing the lots for their election, when Cimon, with his nine colleagues in the command, having entered the theatre, and made the customary libations to Dionysus, the Archon detained them at the altar, and administered to them the oath appointed for the judges in the dramatic contests. Their decision was in favour of Sophocles, who received the first prize; the second only being awarded to Aeschylus, who was so mortified at his defeat that he left Athens, and retired to Sicyon. (Plut. Cim. 8.; Marth. Mar. 51.)

Sophocles exhibited on this occasion is supposed, from a chronological computation in Pliny (H. N. xviii. 7. s. 12), to have been the Tristolemus, respecting the nature of which there has been much disputation: Wecker, who has discussed the question very fully, supposes that the main subject of the drama was the institution of the Eleusinian mysteries, and the establishment of the worship of Demeter at Athens by Triptolemus.

From this epoch there can be no doubt that Sophocles held the supremacy of the Athenian stage.
SOPHOCLES.

SOPHOCLES.

(except in so far as it was shared by Aeschylus during the short period between his return to Athens and his final retirement to Sicily), until a formidable rival arose in the person of Euripides, who gained the first prize for the first time in the year n.c. 441. We possess, however, no particular of the poet's life during this period of twenty-eight years.

The year n.c. 440 (OL 84, 4) is a most important era in the poet's life. In the spring of that year, most probably, he brought out the earliest and one of the best of his extant dramas, the Antigone, a play which gave the Athenians such satisfaction, especially on account of the political wisdom it displayed, that they appointed him one of the ten strategi, of whom Pericles was the chief, in the war against the aristocratical faction of Samos, which lasted from the summer of n.c. 440 to the spring of n.c. 439. The anonymous biographer states that this expedition took place seven years before the Peloponnesian War, and that Sophocles was 55 years old at the time. A full account of this war will be found in Thirlwall's History of Greece, vol. iii. pp. 48, 49. From an anecdote preserved by Athenaeus from the Travels of the poet Ion, it appears that Sophocles was engaged in bringing up the reinforcements from Chios, and that, amidst the occupations of his military command, he preserved his wonted tranquillity of mind, and found leisure to gratify his voluptuous tastes and to delight his comrades with his calm and pleasant conversation at their banquets. From the same narrative it would seem that Sophocles neither obtained nor sought for any military reputation: he is represented as good-humouredly repeating the judgment of Pericles concerning him, that he understood the making of poetry, but not the commanding of an army. (Ath. xii. pp. 603, 604; Anon. Vit. Soph.; Aristoph. Byz. Arp. in Antig.; Plut. Per. 8; Strab. xiv. p. 440; Schol. ad Aristoph. Pas. 696; Suid. s. v. Mayer; Cic. Off. I. 40; Plin. H. N. xxxvii. 2; Vol. Max. iv. 3.) On another occasion, if we may believe Plutarch (Vic. 15), Sophocles was not ashamed to confess that he had no claim to military distinction; for when he was serving with Nicias, upon being asked by that general his opinion first, in a council of war, as being the eldest of the strategi, he replied "I indeed am the eldest in years, but you in cornmiss." (Εψηλον φησιν παλαιοσταξ ειμι, σον της προσθετασ). Mr. Donaldson, in his recent edition of the Antigone (Introduction, § 2), has put forward the view, that, at this period of his life, Sophocles was a personal and political friend of Pericles; that the political sentiments expressed in the Antigone were intended as a recommendation of the policy of that statesman, just as Aeschylus, in the Eumenides, had put forth all his powers in support of the opposite system of the old conservative party of Aristides; that Pericles himself is circumstantially, though indirectly, referred to in various passages of the play (especially vv. 352, 2.) and that the poet's political connection with Pericles was one chief cause of his being associated with him in the Samian War.

A still more interesting subject connected with this period of the poet's life, is his supposed intimacy with Herodotus, which is also touched upon by Mr. Donaldson (l.c.), who has discussed the matter at greater length in the Transactions of the Philological Society, vol. i. No. 15. We learn from Plutarch (An Seni sit G erend. Resup. 3, p. 784, b) that Sophocles composed a poem for Herodotus, commencing with the following inscription:

"Α ο ην ὁ Ῥ ο η δ θ ι τ ε τι ζεν Σ ό φ ο λ κ ής ετέον ἀν ὑν πατρὶ επὶ πεντήκοντα."

where the poet's age, 55 years, carries us to about the period of the Samian War. Upon this foundation Mr. Donaldson constructs the theory that Herodotus was still residing at Samos at the period when Sophocles was engaged in the war, and that a familiar intercourse subsisted between the great poet and historian, for the maintenance of which at other times the frequent visits of Herodotus to Athens would give ample opportunity. The chronological part of the question, though important in its bearing upon the history of Herodotus, is of little consequence with regard to Sophocles: the main fact, that such an intercourse existed between the poet and the historian, is sufficiently established by the passage of Plutarch; and the influence of that intimacy may still be traced in those striking parallelisms in their works, which have generally been referred to an imitation of Herodotus by Sophocles, but which Mr. Donaldson has brought forward strong arguments to account for in the opposite way. (Compare especially Herod. iii. 119, with Antig. 924.) The epoch, which has now been briefly dwelt upon, may be regarded as dividing the public life of Sophocles into two almost equal portions, each extending over the period of about one generation, but the latter rather the longer of the two; namely n.c. 460—439, and n.c. 439—405. The second of these periods, extending from the 56th year of his age to his death, was that of his greatest poetical activity, and to it belong all his extant dramas. Respecting his personal history, however, during this period of forty-four years, we have scarcely any details. The excitement of the Peloponnesian War seems to have had no other influence upon him than to stimulate his literary efforts by the new impulse which it gave to the intellectual activity of the age; until that disastrous period after the Sicilian expedition, when the reaction of unsuccessful war led to anarchy at home. Then we find him, like others of the chief literary men of Athens, joining in the desperate attempt to stay the ruin of their country by means of an aristocratic revolution; although, according to the discussions which have come down to us of the part which Sophocles took in this movement, he only assented to it as a measure of public safety, and not from any love of oligarchy. When the Athenians, on the news of the utter destruction of their Sicilian army (n.c. 415), appointed ten of the elders of the city, as a sort of committee of public salvation, under the title of προδήλων (Thuc. viii. 1), Sophocles was among the ten thus chosen. As he was then in his eighty-third year, it is not likely that he took any active part in their proceedings, or that he was chosen for any other reason than to obtain the authority of his name. All that we are told of his conduct in this office is that he contended to the establishment of the oligarchical Council of Four Hundred, n. c. 411, though he acknowledged the measure to be an evil one, because, he said, there was no better course (Aristot. Rhet. iii. 18, Pol. vi. 5). The change of government thus effected released him, no doubt, from all further concern with public affairs.

* The occasion with which Plutarch connects this anecdote is the Sicilian expedition; but we have no other evidence that Sophocles was engaged in that war, nor is it at all probable; still the anecdote may be true in substance, though its time is misplaced.

* It has, however, been doubted whether this Sophocles was not another person (See below, No. 4).

One thing at least is clear as to his political principles, that he was an ardent lover of his country. The patriotic sentiments, which we still admire in his poems, were illustrated by his own conduct; for, unlike Simonides and Pindar, Aeschylus, Euripides, and Plato, and others of the greatest poets and philosophers of Greece, Sophocles would never condescend to accept the patronage of monarchs, or to leave his country for any other reason than the desire of united invasions. (Vit. Anon.) His affections were fixed upon the land which had produced the heroes of Marathon and Salamis, whose triumphs were associated with his earliest recollections; and his eminently religious spirit loved to dwell upon the sacred city of Athens, and the hallowed groves of his native Colonus. In his later days he filled the office of priest to a native hero, Halon, and the gods were said to have rewarded his devotion by granting him supernatural revelations. (Vet. Anon.)

The family disensions, which troubled his last years, are connected with a well-known and beautiful story, which bears strong marks of authenticity, and which, if true, not only proves that he preserved his mental powers and his wonted calmness to the last, but also leaves us with the satisfactory conviction that his domestic peace was restored before he died. His family was of two sons, Iophon, the offspring of Nicostrate, who was a free Athenian woman, and Ariston, his son by Theoria of Sicyon; and Ariston had a son named Sophocles, for whom his grandfather showed the greatest affection. Iophon, who was by the laws of Athens his father's rightful heir, jealous of his love for the young Sophocles, and apprehending that Sophocles purposed to bestow upon his grandson a large proportion of his property, is said to have summoned his father before the phrōtēs, who seem to have had a sort of jurisdiction in family affairs, on the charge that his mind was affected by old age. As his only reply, Sophocles explained, "If I am Sophocles, I am not beside myself; and if I am beside myself, I am not Sophocles;" and then he read from his Oedipus at Colonus, which was lately written, but not yet brought out, the magnificent peripatus, beginning —

Εὐφίλου, ἄδικοι τόδε καὶ κακοὶ ἱλικίας, whereupon the judges at once dismissed the case, and rebuked Iophon for his undutiful conduct. (Plut. An Sené sit Gerend. Respul. 3, p. 775, b; Vit. Anon.) That Sophocles forgave his son might almost be assumed from his known character; and the ancient grammarians supposed that the reconciliation was referred to in the lines of the Oedipus of Colonus, where Antigone pleads with her father to forgive Polyneices, as other fathers had been induced to forgive their bad children (vv. 1192, fol.).

Whether Sophocles died in, or after the completion of, his ninetieth year, cannot be said with absolute certainty. It is clear, from the allusions to him in the Frogs of Aristophanes and the Muse of Phrynichus, that he was dead before the representation of those dramas at the Lenaec, in February, r. c. 406, and hence several writers, ancient as well as modern, have placed his death in the beginning of that year. (Diod. xiii. 103; Murn. Par. No. 65; Arg. III. ad Oed. Col.; Clinton, F. H., s. a.) But, if we make allowance for the time required for the composition and preparation of those dramas, of which the Frogs, at least, not only refers to his death, but presupposes that event in the very conception of the comedy, we can hardly place it later than the spring of n. c. 406, and this date is confirmed by the statement of the anonymous biographer, that his death happened at the feast of the Choic, which must have been in 406, and not in 405, for the Choic took place a month later than the Lenaec. Lucian (Macrobi. 24) certainly exaggerates, when he says that Sophocles lived to the age of 95.

All the various accounts of his death and funeral are of a fictitious and poetical complexion; as are so many of the stories which have come down to us respecting the deaths of the other Greek poets; nay, we often find the very same marvel attending the decease of different individuals, as in the cases of Sophocles and Philemon (Phil. 263, b). According to Ister and Neanthes, he was choked by a grape (Vit. Anon.); Satyrus related that in a public recitation of the Antigone he sustained his voice so long without a pause that, through the weakness of extreme age, he lost his breath and his life together (ibid.); while others ascribed his death to excessive joy at obtaining a victory (ibid.). These legends are of course the offspring of a poetical feeling which loved to connect the last moments of the great tragedian with his patron god. In the same spirit it is related that Dionysus twice appeared in vision to Lyssander, and commanded him to allow the interment of the poet's remains in the family tomb on the road to Decelleia (Vit. Anon.; comp. Paus. i. 21). According to Ister, the Athenians honoured his memory with a yearly sacrifice (Vit. Anon.).

No doubt the ancient writers were quite right in thinking that, in the absence of details respecting the matter of fact, the death of Sophocles was a fair subject for a poetical description; but, instead of resorting to trifling and contradictory legends, they might have found descriptions of his decease, at once poetical and true, in the verses of contemporary poets, who laid aside the bitter satire of the Old Comedy to do honour to his memory. Thus Philemon, in his Aias, was actuated with the Frogs of Aristophanes, in which also the memory of Sophocles is treated with profound respect, referred to the poet's death in these beautiful lines:

Μάκαρ Σοφοκλής, ἐν πολυν χρόνων βιοῦσιν ἄθετον, ἐνδάλειαν ἀνήρ καὶ δίκην, πολλὰς ποιήσας καὶ καλὰς τραγῳδίας, καλῶς ἐκτελεσθήσας ὑδέν ὑπομείνας κακάν.

(Arg. III. ad Oed. Col.; Meineke, Frag. Com.)
Sophocles.

Græc. vol. ii. p. 592; Editio Minor, p. 233.) And if the last line is not specific enough for those who are curious to know the details of the death of such a man, we venture to say that the want may be supplied by those exquisite verses in which the poet himself relates the decease of Oedipus, when restored by a long expiation to that religious calm in which he himself had always lived—a description so exactly satisfying our idea of what the death of Sophocles must and ought to have been, that we at once perceive, by a sort of instinct, that it was either written in the direct anticipation of his own departure, or perhaps even thrown into its present form by the younger Sophocles, to make it an exact picture of his grandfather's death—where Oedipus, having been summoned by a divine voice from the solemn recesses of the grove of the Eumenides, in terms which might well be used to the poet of ninety years of age (Oed. Col. 1627, 1628):—

"οὗτος, όταν, Οἰδίπος, τί μέλλειν χωρίς; πάλαι δὲ τάκτο στοι βραδύντας,— having taken leave of his children and retired from the world, and having offered his last prayers to the gods of earth and heaven, departs in peace, by an unknown fate, without disease or pain (1656, foll.):—

Οὐ γὰρ τις αὐτὸν ὀφεῖ πυρφόρος ἦκε κεραυνὸς ἐξέπραξεν, ὀφεῖ ποινία.

Now a κυνηγεῖ τῷ τότε ἐν χρόνῳ, ἀλὰ τίς ἐκ χθεν ποιμός, τί το νεότατον εὐνόμων διατόταν γῆ κακή ἀνάπτυστον βαθύνω.

Ἄνθρακα σέ συντακτός ὀφεῖ σὺν νόσους ἀλκευον ἐξεύπνευστε, ἀλὰ τίς βρυσόν ὀλισσότας. Ἐγὼ δὲ μυκτὶ φρουρῶν λάγων, ὀφεῖ ἄν παρέστησα ὃμι μυκτὶ φρουρῶν.

If any reader thinks that the application of these lines to the death of Sophocles himself is too fanciful, let him take the last words of the quotation as our answer; and let us be left still further to indulge the same fancy by imagining, not the applause, but the burst of suppressed feeling, with which an Athenian audience first listened to that description, applying it, as we feel sure they did, to the poet they had lost.

The inscription placed upon his tomb, according to some authorities, celebrated at once the perfection of his art and the greatness of his person (Vit. Anon.):—

κρύσταλλον τόξον Σοφοκλῆν πρωταὶ λαβόντα τῇ τραγῳδή τέχνῃ, σχήμα τῷ σειμάτατον.

Among the epigrams upon him in the Greek Anthology, there is one ascribed to Simmias of Thespæ, which is perhaps one of the most exquisite gems in the whole collection for the beauty and truthfulness of its imagery (Bruck, Anal. vol. i. p. 168; Jacobis, Ant. Græc. vol. i. p. 100; Anth. Pal. vii. 22, vol. i. p. 312, ed. Jacobis):—

Ἡρωίτης ἀντί τοῦ δίδωσιν Σοφοκλῆσι, ἡμέρα, κυστής, ἐρίττας, χλωρίας ἀντίκειται πλακάδως, καὶ πεταλοῖ πάντα θάλλων ῥώμων, τῇ φιλοτέχνῳ διατέκνει, ύπάρχει πέραν κλήματα χειμάρρων, ἐκείνης εὐφαίνης πυντυρόφως, ἢς δὲ μελλοῦσιν ἧσαν τοὺσ ἄμελεν καὶ Χαριτώ.

Among the remains of ancient art, we possess several portraits of Sophocles, which, however, like the other works of the same class, are probably ideal representations, rather than actual likenesses. Philostorus (Imag. 13) describes several such portraits by different artists, and an account of those which now exist will be found in Müller's Archäologie der Kunst, § 420, n. 5. p. 731, ed. Welecker.

The following chronological summary exhibits the few leading events, of which the date can be fixed, in the life of Sophocles:—

Ol. b. c.

71. 2. 495. Birth of Sophocles.

73. 4. 484. Aeschylus gains the first prize. Birth of Herodotus.

78. 1. 469. Death of Simonides.

80. 2. 458. The Oresteia of Aeschylus.

81. 1. 456. Death of Aeschylus.

81. 1. 455. Euripides begins to exhibit.

84. 3. 441. Euripides gains the first prize.

84. 4. 440. Sophocles gains the first prize with his Antigone, and is made strategus with Pericles in the Samian war.

85. 1. 439. Probable return of Sophocles to Athens. Death of Pindar?

91. 4. 413. Sophocles one of the Probuli.

92. 1. 411. Government of the Four Hundred.

92. 3. 409. The Philoctetes of Sophocles. First prize.

94. 3. 401. The Oedipus at Colonus brought out by the younger Sophocles.

The following genealogical table exhibits the family relations of Sophocles, omitting the three sons, of whom we only know the names (see above):—

Sophilus 1. (Wife) Nicostratæ—Sophocles 1 = Theoris (Con- cubine)

Iophon 2.

Ariston 3.

Sophocles 2.

All these descendants of Sophocles seem to have been occupied, to some extent, with tragic poetry. Iophon was of some celebrity as a tragic poet [Iophon]. There is some doubt about Ariston; but that he generally preferred the reproduction of his father's works to the exhibition of his own dramas. [Ariston, literary, No. 1] (Comp. Kayser, Hist. Crit. Trag. Græc. pp. 74—76.) Respecting the younger Sophocles see below, No. 2.

2. The Personal Character of Sophocles. — In that elaborate piece of dramatic criticism, the purpose of which is undoubtedly serious, though the form is that of the broad mirth and bitter satire of the Old Comedy, we mean the Frogs, it is extremely interesting to notice both the respectful reserve with which Sophocles is treated, as if he were almost above criticism, and the particular force of the few passages in which Aristophanes more expressly refers to him. (Aristoph. Ran. 76 —82, 786—794, 1515—1519). Εὐκόλοι μὲν εὐθυδῆ, εὐκόλοι δὲ καὶ τραγουδέι, ἐν τευμπερι ἅμα καὶ Χαριτώ.
Sophocles appears, indeed, to have had every element which, in the judgment of a Greek, would go to make up a perfect character: the greatest beauty and symmetry of form; the highest skill in those arts which were prized above all others; the most perfect physique of the latter developed that bodily perfection, which always adorns if it does not actually contribute to intellectual greatness, while the former was not only essential to his art as a dramanist, but was also justly esteemed by the Greeks as one of the chiefest instruments in moulding the character of a man; a constitutional calmness and contentment, which seems hardly ever to have been disturbed, and which was probably the secret of that perfect mastery over the passions of others, which his tragedies exhibit; a cheerful and amiable demeanour, and a ready wit, which won for him the affectionate admiration of those with whom he associated; a spirit of tranquillity and meditative piety, in harmony with his natural temperament, and fostered by the scenes in which he spent his childhood, and the subjects to which he devoted his life; a power of intellect, and a spontaneity of genius, of which his extant tragedies are the splendid, though mutilated, manifestation, and which are the leading features of a character, which the very harmony of its parts makes it difficult to portray with any vivacity. The slight physical defect, weakness of voice, which is said to have disqualified him from appearing as an actor, could not have been of great consequence, considering the perfection to which the technical portion of the art had been brought by his own rules, improving upon those of Aeschylus, and the sufficiency of good actors, whom we could easily show to have flourished at Athens in his time. His moral defects, if we may believe the insinuations of the comic poets and the gossip of the scandal-mongering grammarians, are such as he would naturally be exposed to fall into through the perfection of his bodily senses and the easiness of his temper. Aristophanes, who treated him with such respect, as we have seen, after his death, during his life associated him with Simonides in the charge of the gymnasia. (Cic. de Offic. 40) and it is too probable that, when advanced in age, and with his taste for luxury confirmed, he might have yielded to that habit of making a gain of genius, which, since the time of Simonides, had been a besetting sin of literary men. The charge of his addiction to sensual pleasures, the vice of his age and country, seems well-founded, but in later life he appears to have overcome such propensities. (Plat. Repub. 1. p. 329, b. c.; Cic. Cat. Mej. 14, de Offic. i. 40; Athen. xii. p. 510, xiii. p. 603.)

iii. The Poetical Character of Sophocles. — By the universal consent of the best critics, both of ancient and of modern times, the tragedies of Sophocles are not only the perfection of the Greek drama; but they approach as nearly as is conceivable to the perfect ideal model of that species of poetry. Such a point of perfection, in any art, is always the result of a combination of causes, of which the internal impulse of the man's creative genius is but one. The external influences, which determine the direction of that genius, and give the opportunity for its manifestation, must be most carefully considered. Among these influences, none is more powerful than the political and intellectual character of the age. That point in the history of states, in which the minds of men, newly set free from traditional dogmatic systems, have not yet been given up to the vagaries of unbridled speculation, — in which religious objects and ideas are still looked upon with reverence, but no longer worshipped both as the source of solemn and mysterious for a free and rational country, which a newly recovered freedom is valued in proportion to the order which forms its rule and sanction, and license has not yet overpowered law, — in which man firmly, but modestly, puts forward his claim to be his own ruler and his own priest, to think and work for himself and for his country, controuled only by those laws which are needful to hold society together, and to subject individual energy to the public welfare, — in which successful war has roused the spirit, quickened the energies, and increased the resources of a people, but prosperity and faction have not yet corrupted the heart, and dissolved the bonds of society, — when the taste, the leisure, and the wealth, which demand and encourage the means of refined pleasure, have not yet been indulged to that degree of exhaustion which requires more exciting and unwholesome stimulants, — such is the period which brings forth the productions of the most vivid, the most perfect, and the most elevated mind of Greece: Homer, Pindar, Pericles, Sophocles and Pheidias. The poetry of Aeschylus, — revelling in the ancient traditions and in the most unyielding fatalism, exhibiting the gods and heroes of the mythic period in their own exalted and unapproachable sphere, investing itself with an imposing but sometimes unmeaning pomp, and finding utterance in language sublime, but not always comprehensible, — was the true expression of the imperfectly regulated energy, the undefined aspirations, and the simple faith, of the men of Marathon and Salamis: while that of Euripides, — in its seductive beauty, its uncontrollable passion, its sophistical declamation, its familiar scenes and allusions — reflected but too truly the character of the degenerate race, which had been unsettled by the great intestine conflict of the Peloponnesian War, corrupted by the exercise of license at home and of despotism over their allies, perverted by the teaching of the sophists, and enervated by the rapid degeneration of their morals. The genius of Aeschylus is religious and superhuman; that of Sophocles, without ceasing to be religious, but presenting religion in quite another aspect, is ethical and, in the best sense, human; that of Euripides is irreligious, unethical, and human in the lowest sense, working upon the passions, and gratifying the weaknesses, of a corrupt generation of mankind.

To these external influences, which affected the spirit of the drama as it appears in Sophocles, must be added the changes in its form and mechanism, which enlarged its sphere and modified its character. Of these changes, the most important was the addition of the τριτεγωνισμός, or third actor, by which three persons were allowed to appear on the stage at once, instead of only two. This change vastly enlarged the scope of the dramatic action, and indeed, as a distinct production in literature and art; such was the period which brought forth the productions of the most vivid, the most perfect, and the most elevated mind of Greece: Homer, Pindar, Pericles, Sophocles and Pheidias. The poetry of Aeschylus, — revelling in the ancient traditions and in the most unyielding fatalism, exhibiting the gods and heroes of the mythic period in their own exalted and unapproachable sphere, investing itself with an imposing but sometimes unmeaning pomp, and finding utterance in language sublime, but not always comprehensible, — was the true expression of the imperfectly regulated energy, the undefined aspirations, and the simple faith, of the men of Marathon and Salamis: while that of Euripides, — in its seductive beauty, its uncontrollable passion, its sophistical declamation, its familiar scenes and allusions — reflected but too truly the character of the degenerate race, which had been unsettled by the great intestine conflict of the Peloponnesian War, corrupted by the exercise of license at home and of despotism over their allies, perverted by the teaching of the sophists, and enervated by the rapid degeneration of their morals. The genius of Aeschylus is religious and superhuman; that of Sophocles, without ceasing to be religious, but presenting religion in quite another aspect, is ethical and, in the best sense, human; that of Euripides is irreligious, unethical, and human in the lowest sense, working upon the passions, and gratifying the weaknesses, of a corrupt generation of mankind.
most essential qualities." (Hist. of Gr. Lit. pp. 304, 305.) By the addition of this third actor, the chief person of the drama was brought under two conflicting influences, by the force of which both sides of his character are at once displayed; as in the scene where Antigone has to contend at the same time with the weakness of Ismene and the tyranny of Creon. Even those scenes in which only two actors appear are made more significant by their relation to the parts of the drama in which the action combines all three, and conversely; thus, the scene of the Antigone just referred to derives its force in a great measure from the preceding separate conflicts between Antigone and Ismene, and Antigone and Creon; while the meaning of those two scenes is only brought out fully when they are viewed in their relation to the third. Aeschylus adopted the third actor in his later plays; and indeed it may be laid down, as a general rule, and one which must have contributed greatly to the rapid progress of the art, that every improvement, made by either of the great rival dramatists of the age, was of necessity adopted by the other.

In the time of Sophocles and Euripides, the number of three actors was hardly ever exceeded. "It was an object to turn the talents of the few eminent actors to the greatest possible account, and to prevent that injury to the general effect which the interposition of inferior actors, even in subordinate parts, must ever produce; and, in fact, so often nowadays does produce." (Müller, Hist. Lit. p. 304.) In only one play of Sophocles, and that not acted during his life, does the interposition of a fourth actor appear necessary, namely, in the Oedipus at Colonus; "unless we assume that the part of Theseus in this play was partly acted by the person who represented Antigone, and partly by the person who represented Ismene: it is, however, far more difficult for two actors to represent one part in the same tone and spirit, than for one actor to represent several parts with the appropriate modifications." (Müller, ibid.; note.) It would be travelling rather beyond the bounds of this article to describe the manner in which the persons of a Greek drama were distributed among the three actors, who, by changes of dresses and masks, sustained all the speaking characters of the play. This subject, though essential to a full comprehension of the works of Sophocles, belongs rather to the general history of the Greek drama: it is discussed very well by Müller, who gives a scheme of the distribution of the parts in the Orestean trilogy of Aeschylus, and in the Antigone and Oedipus Tyrannus of Sophocles (pp. 205-307). Mr. Donaldson also discusses in some length the distribution of the parts in the Antigone. (Introduction to the Antigone, § 4.)

Sophocles also introduced some very important modifications in the choral parts of the drama. According to Suidas (s. v.) he raised the number of the chorae from twelve to fifteen; and, although there are some difficulties in the matter, the general fact is undoubted, that Sophocles fixed the number of chorae at fifteen, the establishment of which, as a rule, would necessarily be accompanied with more definite arrangements than had previously been made respecting the evolutions of the Chorus. At the same time the choral odes, which in Aeschylus occupied a large space in the tragedy, and formed a sort of lyric exhibition of the subject interwoven with the dramatic representation, were very considerably curtailed, and their burden was less closely connected with the subject of the play; while the number of the epoiesen, or acts, into which they divided the drama, was increased, and the continuity of the action was made closer by the rareness of the absence of all the actors from the stage, whereas in the earlier tragedies the stage was often left vacant, while the Chorus was singing long lyric odes. The mode in which the Chorus is connected with the general subject and progress of the drama is also different. In Aeschylus the Chorus is a deeply interested party, often taking a decided and even vehement share in the action, and generally involved in the catastrophe; but the Chorus of Sophocles has more of the character of a spectator, moderator, and judge, comparatively impartial, but sympathising generally with the chief character of the play, while it explains and harmonizes, as far as possible, the feelings of all the actors. It is less mixed up with the general action than in Aeschylus, but its connexion with such a particular part of the drama is more pronounced.

The Chorus of Sophocles is cited by Aristotle as giving his definition of the part to be taken by the Chorus: καὶ τὸν χορὸν δὲ ένα διὶ ὑπολαμαθὲν τῶν ὑπόκρυτων καὶ μόνων εἶναι τοῦ διόν καὶ συγγραφέας, κη στέφειν ἄξιος Ἅρων καὶ Δηλίτης ("Rit. 18"); where, however, the value of the passage, as a description of the choruses of Sophocles is somewhat diminished by the fact that he is comparing them, not with those of Aeschylus, but with those of Euripides, whose choral odes have generally very little to do with the business of the play.

By these changes Sophocles made the tragedy a drama in the proper sense of the word. The interest and progress of the piece centred almost entirely in the actions and speeches of the persons on the stage. A necessary consequence of this alteration, combined with the addition of the third actor, was a much more careful elaboration of the dialogue; and the care bestowed upon this part of the composition is one of the most striking features of the art of Sophocles, whether we regard the energy and point of the conversations which take place upon the stage, or the vivid pictures of actions occurring elsewhere, which are drawn in the speeches of the messengers.

It must not, however, be imagined for a moment that, in bestowing so much care upon the dialogue, and confining the choral parts within their proper limits, Sophocles was careless as to the mode in which he executed the latter. On the contrary, he appears as if determined to use his utmost efforts to compensate in the beauty of his odes for what he had taken away from their length. His early attainments in music,—the period in which his lot was cast, when the great cycle of lyric poetry had been completed, and he could take Simonides and Pindar as the starting points of his efforts,—the majestic choral poetry of his great predecessor and rival, Aeschylus, which he regarded rather as a standard to be surpassed than as a pattern to be imitated,—combined with his own genius and exquisite taste to give birth to those brief but perfect effusions of lyric poetry, the undisturbed enjoyment of which was reckoned by Aristophanes as among the choicest fruits of peace (Pax, 523).

Another alteration of the greatest consequence, which, though it was perhaps not originated by Sophocles, he was the first to convert into a general practice, was the abandonment of the trilogistic form, in so far at least as the continuity of subject was concerned. In obedience to the established custom at the Dionysiac festivals, Sophocles appears generally to have brought forward three tragedies and a satyr drama together; but the subjects of these four plays were entirely distinct, and each was complete in itself. Among the merely mechanical improvements introduced by Sophocles, the most important is that of scene-painting, the invention of which is ascribed to him. (See Agatharchus.)

All these external and formal arrangements had necessarily the most important influence on the whole spirit and character of the tragedies of Sophocles; as, in the works of every-first rate artist, the form is a part of the substance. But it remains to notice the most essential features of the art of the great tragedian, namely, his choice of subjects, and the spirit in which he treated them.

The subjects and style of Aeschylus are essentially heroic; those of Sophocles are human. The former excite terror, pity, and admiration, as we view them at a distance; the latter bring those same feelings home to the heart, with the addition of sympathy and self-application. No individual human being can imagine himself in the position of Prometheus, or derive a personal warning from the crimes and fate of Clytemnestra; but every one can, in feeling, share, and thus self-develop Antigone in her life at the call of fraternal piety, and the calmness which comes over the spirit of Oedipus when he is reconciled to the gods. In Aeschylus, the sufferers are the victims of an inexcusable destiny; but Sophocles brings more prominently into view those faults of their own, which form one element of the δύναμις of which they are the victims, and is more intent upon inculcating, as the lesson taught by their woes, that wise calmness and moderation, in desires and actions, in prosperity and adversity, which the Greek poets and philosophers celebrate under the name of σωφροσύνη. On the other hand, he never descends to that level to which Euripides brought down the art, the exhibition of human passion and suffering for the mere purpose of exciting emotion in the spectators, apart from a moral end. The great distinction between the two poets is defined by Aristotle, in that passage of the Poética (6 §§ 12, foll.) which may be called the great text of aesthetic philosophy, and in which, though the names of Sophocles and Euripides are not mentioned, there can be no doubt that the statement that "the tragedies of most of the more recent poets are unnatural" is meant to apply to Euripides, and that the contrast, which he proceeds to illustrate by a comparison of Polynoeus and Zeusis in the art of painting, is intended to describe the difference between the two poets, for in another passage of the Poética (26. § 11) he quotes with approbation the saying of Sophocles, that "he himself represented men as they ought to be, but Euripides exhibited them as they are!" a remark, by the by, which as coming from the mouth of Sophocles himself, exposes the absurdity of those opponents of aesthetic science, who sneer at it as if it ascribed to the great poets of antiquity moral and artistic purposes of which they themselves never dreamt. It is quite true that the earliest and some of the mightiest efforts of genius are to a great extent (though never, we believe, entirely) unconscious; and even such productions are governed by laws, written in the human mind and instinctively followed by the poet, laws which it is the task and glory of aesthetic science to trace out in the works of those writers who followed them unconsciously; but such productions, however magnificent they may be, are never so perfect, in every respect, as the works of the poet who, possessing equal genius, consciously and laboriously works out the great principles of his art. It is in this regard that Sophocles surpasses Aeschylus; his works are perhaps not greater, nay, in native sublimity and spontaneous genius they are perhaps inferior, but they are more perfect; and that for the very reason now stated, and which Sophocles himself explained, when he said, "Aeschylus does what is right, but without knowing it." The faults in Aeschylus, which Sophocles perceived and endeavoured to avoid, are pointed out in a valuable passage preserved by Plutarch (de Prof. Virt. p. 78, b.). The limits of this article will not permit us to enlarge any further on the ethical character of Sophocles, which is discussed and illustrated at great length in some of the works referred to above, and also in Schlegel's Lectures on Dramatic Art and Criticism, where the reader will find an elaborate comparison between the three great tragic poets (Lect. 5). We will only add, in conclusion, that if asked for the most perfect illustration of Aristotle's definition of the end of tragedy as διὰ λόγου καὶ φόδου πεπρανομένη τῆς τῶν τοιούτων παθημάτων κάθαρας (Poët. 6. § 2), we would point to the Oedipus at Colonus of Sophocles, and we would recommend, as one of the most useful exercises in the study of aesthetic criticism, the comparison of that tragedy with the Eumenides of Aeschylus and the Lear of our own Shakspere.

iv. The Works of Sophocles. — The number of plays ascribed to Sophocles was 130, of which, however, according to Aristophanes of Byzantium, seventeen were spurious. He contended not only with Aeschylus and Euripides, but also with Comieris Aristias, Agathon, and other poets, amongst whom was his own son Kephas; and he carried off the first prize in twenty-four times frequently the second, and never the third. (Vit. Anon.; Suid. s. v.) It is remarkable, as proving his growing activity and success, that, of his 113 dramas, eighty-one were brought out in the second of the two periods into which his career is divided by the exhibition of the Antigone, which was his thirty second play (Aristoph. Byz. Argum. ad Antig.). and also that all his extant dramas, which of course in the judgment of the grammarians were his best, belong to the latter of these two periods. By comparing the number of his plays with the sixty-two years over which his career extended, and also the number belonging to each of the two periods, Müller obtains the result that he at first brought out a tetralogy every three or four years, but afterwards every two years at least; and also that in several of the tetralogies the satyr drama was lost, or never existed, and that, among those 113 plays there could only have been, at the most, 23 satyr dramas to 90 tragic.

dies (Hist. Lit., pp. 339, 340). The attempt has been made to divide the extant plays and titles of Sophocles into trilogies; but, as might have been expected from what has been said above respecting the nature of his trilogies, it has signally failed. A much more important arrangement has been very elaborately attempted by Welcker's Griechischen Tragödien, namely, the classification of the extant plays and fragments according to the poems of the Epic Cycle on which they were founded.

The following is most probably the chronological order in which the seven extant tragedies of Sophocles were brought out: Antigone, Electra, Trachiniae, Oedipus Tyrannus, Ajax, Philoctetes, Oedipus at Colonus. It is unnecessary to attempt an analysis of these plays, partly because every scholar has read or will read them for himself, and partly because they are admirably analysed in works so generally read as Müller's History of the Literature of Ancient Greece, and Schlegel's Lectures. Neither will our space permit us to yield to the temptation of entering fully into the much disputed question of the object and meaning of the Antigone; respecting which the reader may consult the editions of the Antigone by Böckh, Wex, Hermann, and Donndoll; articles by Mr. Dyer, in the Classical Museum, vol. ii. pp. 69, foll., vol. iii. pp. 176, foll.; and articles by G. Wolff, in the Zeitschrift für Alterthumswissenschaft for 1846, reviewing the recent works upon the Antigone. It must suffice here to remark that we believe both the extreme views to be equally remote from the truth; that the play is not intended to support exclusively the rights of the law in the person of Creon or those of liberty in the person of Antigone, but to exhibit the claims of both, to show them brought into collision when each is forced beyond the bounds of moderation; or, to speak more properly, the collision is not between law and liberty, but between the two laws of the family and the state, of religious duty and civil obedience. Neither party is entirely in the right or entirely in the wrong. The fault of Creon is in the issuing of a harsh and impious decree, that of Antigone in rashly and obstinately refusing to submit to it; and therefore each falls a victim to a conflict of the two laws for and against which they strive; while both, as also Haemon, are involved by their individual acts in the more general and antecedent duty which rests upon the royal family of Thebes. At the same time, this does not appear to be all that is contained in the drama. The greater fault is on the side of Creon. Antigone would have been perfectly in the right to disobey his edict, if all means of obtaining its repeal had been exhausted, although even then strict law might perhaps have required her martyrdom as the price of her fraternal piety; and perhaps, on the other hand, the poet meant to teach that there are cases in which law must give way, to avert the fearful consequences arising from its strict enforcement. At all events, it is clear that the sympathy of the poet and of the spectators is with Antigone, though they are constrained to confess that she is not entirely guiltless, nor Creon altogether guilty. But still we think that this sympathy with Antigone is only secondary to the lesson taught by the faults and ruin of both, a lesson which the poet has himself distinctly pointed out in the final words of the chorus,—τὸ φρονέω, as opposed to the μεγάλα λόγια of self-will, an indulgence in which, even in the cause of piety towards the gods, brings down μεγάλα παθήματα as a retribution.

The titles and fragments of the lost plays of Sophocles will be found collected in the chief editions, and in Welcker's Griechischen Tragödien.

In addition to his tragedies, Sophocles is said to have written an elegy, a paean, and other poems, and a prose work on the Chorus, in opposition to Thespis and Choroeilus. (Suid. s. v.)

v. Ancient Commentators on Sophocles. — In the Scholia, the commentators are quoted by the general title of Scholia, and the author's name is given only when necessary. Among those cited by name, or to whom commentaries on Sophocles are ascribed by other authorities, are Aristarchus, Praxiphanes, Didymus, Herodian, Horapollo, Andronion, and Aristophares of Byzantium. The question of the value of the Scholia is discussed by Wunder, de Schol. in Soph. Auctorum, Grima, 1838, 4to., and Wolff, de Sophocis Scholiarum Lavor. Varis Lectio[nibus, Lips. 1843, 8vo.]

vi. Editions of the Plays of Sophocles. — The Editio Princeps is that of Aldus, 1502, 8vo., and there were numerous other editions printed in the 16th century, the best of which are those of H. Stephanius, Paris, 1560, 4to., and of G. Canterus Antwerp, 1579, 12mo., both founded on the text of Turnebus. None of the subsequent editions deserve any particular notice, until we come to those of Bruck, in 4 vols. 8vo., Argentor. 1786—1793, and in 2 vols. 4to., Argentor. 1796; both editions containing the Greek text with a Latin version, and the Scholia and Indices. The text of Bruck, which was founded on that of Aldus, has formed the foundation of all the subsequent editions, of which the following are the most important: that of Musgrave, with Scholia, Notes, and Indices, Oxon. 1800, 1801, 2 vols. 8vo., reprinted Oxon. 1809—1810, 3 vols. 8vo.; that of Erfurt, with Scholia, Notes, and Indices, Lips. 1802—1825, 7 vols. 8vo.; (the valuable notes of Erfurt to all the tragedies, except the Oedipus at Colonus, were reprinted in a separate volume, in London, 1824, 8vo.) that of Bothe, who re-edited Bruck's edition, but with many rash changes in the text, Lips. 1806, 2 vols. 8vo., last edition, 1827, 1828; that of Hermann, who completed a new edition, which Erfurt commenced, but only lived to publish the first two volumes, Lips. 1800—1825, 7 vols. 8vo.; Hermann's entirely new revision of Bruck's edition, with additional Notes, &c., Lips. 1823—1825, 7 vols. 8vo.; the edition of Schneider, with German Notes and a Lexicon, Weinb. 1823—1830, 10 vols. 8vo.; the London reprint of Bruck's edition, with the Notes of Burney and Schaefer, 1824, 3 vols. 8vo.; the edition of Elmsley, with the Notes of Bruck and Schaefer, Lexicon Sophocleum, &c. Oxon. 1826, 2 vols. 8vo.; reprinted, Lips. 1827, 8 vols. 8vo.; that of the text alone by Dindorf, in the Poëtica Scriptorium Graecorum, Lips. 1830, 8vo. *, reprinted at Oxford, 1832, with the addition of a volume of Notes, 1836, 8vo.; that of Ahrens, containing the text, after Dindorf, with a revised Latin version, by L. Benierow, the Fragments after Welcker, and new Indices, in Didot's Bibliotheca Scriptorum Graecorum, Paris 1842—1844, imp. 8vo. and lastly, by far the most useful edition for the ordinary student is that by Wunder, in Jacobs and Rosé's Bibliotheca Graeca, containing the text, with critical and explanatory notes and introductions, Graecæ et Excerpt., 1831—1846. 2 vols. 8vo, in 7 parts, and with a supplemental part of emendations to the Trachinia, Grimæ, 1841, 8vo.

For a list of the editions of separate plays, and of the editions not noticed above, the reader is referred to Hoffmann's Lexicon Bibliographicum Scriptorum Graecorum.

Among the numerous translations of Sophocles, very few have been at all successful. There are English versions by Franklin, Lond. 1738; Potter, Lond. 1768; and Dale, 1824. The best German translations are those of Solger, Berlin, 1808, 1824, 2 vols. 8vo, and Fritz, Berlin, 1843, 8vo. Among the translations of separate plays, those of the Antigone, by Böck and Donaldson, interlarded in their respective editions, deserve notice; Böck, Berlin, 1843, 8vo.; Donaldson, London, 1849, 8vo.

A nearly complete list of the works illustrating Sophocles will be found in Hoffmann's Lexicon. They are far from being all mentioned here; but it would be wrong to pass over the one, which is the most useful of them all for understanding the language of the author, namely, Ellenæt's Lexicon Sophocleum, Regimund. Pruss. (Königsberg) 1835, 2 vols. 8vo.

2. The son of Ariston and grandson of the elder Sophocles, was also an Athenian tragic poet. The love of his grandfather towards him has been already mentioned; and it cannot be doubted that one chief way in which Sophocles displayed his affection was by endeavouring to train up his grandson as the inheritor of his own skill in the art of tragedy. We have no definite statement of his age, but he was probably under twenty at the time of his grandfather's death, as he did not begin to exhibit his own dramas till about ten years after that time, namely in n. c. 396. (Diod. iv. 53, where Σοφοκλῆς ὁ Σοφοκλέους must either be corrected by adding Ὀ νιφιλής or οἱ Νιφίλης, or must be understood to mean the grandson, and not the son). He had previously, in 397, brought out the Oedipus at Colonus (Argum. ad Oed. Col.), and we may safely assume that this was the only one of his grandfather's dramas which he exhibited. There is much difficulty as to the proper reading of the numbers of plays and victories ascribed to him. According to the different readings, he exhibited 40 or 11 dramas, and gained 12, 11, or 7 prizes. (Suid, s. v.; Dio. l. c.; comp. Clinton, F. I. ii. p. xxxv. e). All that we know of his tragedies is contained in a passage of Clemens Alexanderinus (Protrept. 30, p. 26, Potter), who refers to statements made in three of them respecting the mere humanity of the Dioscuri. It is, however, a very probable conjecture that, since Aristophanes of Byzantium pronounced 27 of the plays which were extant in his time under the name of the great Sophocles to be spurious, some of these may have been the productions of his grandson. Suidas also ascribes elegies to the younger Sophocles. Welcker, die Griech. Trag. p. 579; Kayser, Hist. Crit. Trag. Graec. pp. 79—81; Wagner, Poét. Trag. Graec. Frag. in Didot's Bibliotheca, p. 78.)

3. Suidas also mentions an Athenian tragic and lyric poet of this name, who lived later than the poets of the Tragic Pheidias, and to whom fifteen dramas were ascribed (Suid. s. v.). The name also occurs on the Orchomenian inscription.

4. An Athenian orator, whose oration for Em- estemon is quoted by Aristotle. (Rhet. i. 15.) Ruhnken supposes that it was he, and not the poet, who was one of the Proxuli, and that he was the same as the Sophocles who is mentioned by Xenophon (Hellen. ii. 3. § 2) as one of the Thirty Tyrants. (Hist. Crit. Ort. Graec., No. viii.)

5. A grammarian, who wrote commentaries on the works of Apollonius Rhodius, (Schol. ad Aristoph. Nab. 397; Stephan. Byz. s. v. Αἰασίως and Κάδαρτρος.)

6. The son of Amphicleides, a native of Smyrnium, was the author of a decree expelling the philosophers from the Attic territory, or, as others say, forbidding any one, on pain of death, to preside over a school of philosophy, without the consent of the senate and people. After a year the decree was revoked, and Sophocles was fined five talents. (Diog. Laërt. v. 38; Pollux, ix. 42; Ath. xiii. p. 610, e. f.; Alexis, ap. Ath. l. c.) From the fragment of the Τερώς of Alexis preserved by Aristotle (l. c.), it appears that the law was passed at end of Ol. 115 or the beginning of Ol. 116, n. c. 316 (Meineke, Hist. Crit. Corn. Graec., p. 394.)

SOPHONIAS (Σοφονίας), a Greek monk who wrote commentaries on Aristotle. Fabricius conjectures that he was the same Sophonias to whom one of the epistles of Simon of Constantinople, probably the same with Simon of Thebes (Simon, No. 22), is addressed. If this conjecture be admitted he must be placed about the end of the fourteenth century. The following works of his are extant in MS.:—

SOPHONISBA (Σοφονίσβα or Σοφονίσβα, see Schweigh. ad Ap. Amynt. Pan. 27), a daughter of the Carthaginian general, Hasdrubal, the son of Gisco. She had been betrothed by her father, at a very early age, to the Numidian prince Masinissa, but at a subsequent period Hasdrubal being desirous to gain over Syphax, the rival monarch of Numi-SOFRON.

dia, to the Carthaginian alliance, offered him the hand of his daughter in marriage. The beauty and accomplishments of Sophonisba prevailed over the influence of Scipio: Syphax married her (4.c. 206), and from that time became the zealous supporter and ally of Carthage. Sophonisba, on her part, was assiduous in her endeavours to secure her adherence to the cause of her countrymen, and it was almost entirely through her influence that Syphax was induced, even after the destruction of his camp by Scipio (SYPHAX), to assemble a new army, and to try his fortune once more. But when his final defeat by Masinissa led to the capture of his capital city of Cirta, Sophonisba herself fell into the hands of the conqueror, upon whom, however, her beauty exercised so powerful an influence, that he not only promised to spare her from captivity, but, to prevent her falling into the power of the Romans, determined to marry her himself. Their nuptials were accordingly celebrated without delay, but Scipio (who was apprehensive lest she should exercise the same influence over Masini-sa which she had previously done over Syphax) refused to ratify this arrangement, and upbraiding Masinissa with his weakness, insisted on the immediate surrender of the princess. Unable to resist this command, the Numidian king spared her the humiliation of captivity, by sending her a bowl of poison, which she drank without hesitation, and thus put an end to her own life. (Liv. xxix.

SOFRON (Σόφρων), of Syracuse, the son of Agathocles and Damnayllis, was the principal writer, and in one sense the inventor, of that species of composition called the Mimo (μίμος), which was one of the numerous varieties of the Dorian Comedy.
For this reason he is sometimes called a comic poet,
a denomination which has led Suidas (s.v.) and, after him, some modern writers, into the mistake of distinguishing two persons of the name, the one a comic poet, and the other the mimographer.

The time at which Sophron flourished is loosely stated by Suidas as early as the times of Xerxes and Ariiphides; but we have another evidence for his date in the statement that his son Xenarchus lived at the court of Dionysus L, during the Rhægian War (b.c. 399—387; see Clinton, F. II. s. a.
393). All that can be said, therefore, with any certainty, is that Sophron flourished during the middle, and perhaps the latter part of the fifth century b.c., perhaps about b.c. 460—420, rather more than half a century later than Epicharmus.

When Sophron is called the inventor of mimics,
the meaning is, as in the case of similar statements respecting the other branches of Dorian Comedy, that he reduced to the form of a literary composition
a species of amusement which the Greeks of Sicily, who were pre-eminent for broad humour and merriment, had practised from time immemorial at their public festivals, and the nature of which was very similar to the performances of the Spartan Diel-cidiae. Such mimetic performances prevailed throughout the Dorian states under various names.
Thus the διηρήσατα of Sparta seem to have been represented by the δραχτηρία of Syracuse; and we meet also with similar exhibitions under the names of διηρήσατα, διηρήσατα, &c. (Respecting these various terms, see Gysras, de Comed. Dor. pp. 59, foll.) The religious festivals with which these amusements were connected seem to have been, at all events chiefly, those of Dionysus; and hence one species of them was the representation of incidents in the life of that divinity, as in the interesting specimen which Xenophon has preserved of a Νεόμας, in which the marriage of Dionysus and Ariadne was represented (Conn. 9). But they also embraced the actions and incidents of every day life; thus the common performance of the Deiélidés was the imitation of a foreign physician, or other person, stealing fruit and the remains of meals, and being caught in the act.

Whether the term μίμος originally included any kind of imitation without words, or whether it was, like those just spoken of, a distinct species of that general kind of exhibition, we are not sufficiently informed; but it is clear that the Mimes of Sophron were ethical, that is, they exhibited not only incident, but characters. Moreover, as is implied in the very fact of their being a literary composition, words were put into the mouths of the actors, though still quite in subordination to their gestures; and, in proportion as the spoken part of the performance was increased, the mime would approach nearer and nearer to a comedy. In all such representations instrumental music appears to have formed an essential part.
(See Xenoph. l. c.)

One feature of the Mimes of Sophron, which formed a marked distinction between them and comic poetry, was the nature of their rhythm. There is, however, some difficulty in determining whether they were in mere prose, or in mingled poetry and prose, or in prose with a peculiar rhythmical movement but no metrical arrangement. Suidas (s. v.) expressly states that they were in prose (καταλο-γάδης) and the existing fragments confirm the general truth of this assertion, for they defy all attempt at senssion. Nevertheless, they frequently fall into a sort of rhetorical cadence, or swing, which is different from the rhythm of ordinary prose, and answers to the description of an ancient scho-list on Gregory Nazianzen, who says of Sophron, οὐδέ γὰρ μίμος ποιήσαν βούθια τι οἷος καὶ καῖλος ἔχοντας, καταλογάδης κατατέφρων (Bibl. Cuidin.
120); Jerome, Eus. V. L. 18.
The short, broken, unconnected sentences, of which the extant passages of Sophron generally consist, containing a large number of short syllables, and mostly ending in trochees like the choliambic verses, produce the effect, described by the scholiast, of a sort of irregular halting rhythm (μυθὸς κόλος).
The following is a fair specimen: (Pr. 52):—'Ιη καλῶν κομφρων 'Η τε καμάδρα τούτων τε φίλα ὁ ἐρυ θραλ γ' ἀκτῆ καὶ λειστροκράτεις.

This prosaic structure of the mimes of Sophron has given rise to a doubt: whether they were ever intended for public exhibition; a doubt which appears to us very unreasonable. Not to insist on the fact that Sophron lived at a period when no works, except of history and philosophy, were composed for private reading, we have before us the certainty that the Mime was, in its very nature, a public exhibition, and, in accordance with the analogy of all similar improvements at that period, we must infer that all the efforts of Sophron were directed, not to withdraw it from its appropriate sphere, but to adapt it to the growing requirements of a more refined age, and to make it acceptable to spectators less easily satisfied than those who had welcomed its ruder forms. Moreover, to suppose that these mimes were not acted, is to divest them of their essential feature, the exhibition by mimetic gestures, to which the words were entirely subordinate; and it is hardly credible that the Greeks of that age, who lived in public, and who could witness the masterpieces of the old Doric and the new Attic drama in their theatres, would be content to sit down and pore over so dull a jest book as the mimes of Sophron must have been when the action was left out. To these arguments, from the nature of the case may be added the express statement of Solinus in Polybius' "cavUolo minioc in scene stett." The dialect of Sophron is the old Doric, interspersed with Sicilian peculiarities; and it appears to have been chiefly as a specimen of the Doric dialect that the ancient grammarians made his works a particular object of study. Apollodorus, for example, wrote commentaries on Sophron, consisting of at least four books, the fragments of which are preserved in Heyne's edition. The fragments of Sophron frequently exhibit anomalous forms, which are evidently imitations of vulgar provincialisms or personal peculiarities of speech (see an example in the Elymn. Mag. s. v. γηρίς). There are also many words coined in jest, such as ὀδὸς ὀδρέπου (Pr. 96). Further information on the dialect of Sophron will be found in the works of Ahrens, who has collected the Fragments. (Ahrens, de Graecis Linguae Dialictis, lib. ii., de Dilicto Determinico, vol. ii., pp. 464 &c.)

With regard to the substance of these compositions, their character, so far as it can be ascertained, appears, as we have said above, to have been etiolat; that is, the scenes represented were those of ordinary life, and the language employed was intended to bring out more clearly the characters of the persons exhibited in those scenes, not only for the amusement, but also for the instruction of the spectators. There must have been something of sound philosophy in his works to have inspired Plato with that profound admiration for their author which will presently be mentioned; something, probably, of that same sound practical wisdom which, in Aristophanes, produced the same effect on Plato's mind. Unfortunately, however, we know nothing of the philosophical complexion of Sophron's mimes, except that they abounded in the most pithy proverbs, thrown together often or three at a time, and worked into the composition with an exuberance of fancy and wit which the ancients compared with the spirit of the Attic Comedy. (Dem. de Eloq. 156, 127, 128.) In fact, we think it would not be far wrong to speak of the mimes of Sophron as being, among the Dorians, a closely kindred fruit of the same intellectual impulse which, among the Athenians, produced the Old Comedy; although we do not mean to place the two on any thing like the same footing as to their degrees of excellence.

The serious purpose which was aimed at in the works of Sophron was always, as in the Attic Comedy, clothed under a sportive form; and it can easily be imagined that sometimes the latter element prevailed, even to the extent of obscenity, as the extant fragments and the parallel of the Attic Comedy combine to prove. Hence the division, which the ancients made of these compositions, into μύον σπουδαίον and γέλαιον, though most of Sophron's works were of the former character (Ulpian. ad Demod. Ol. p. 30) Plutarch distinguishes the mimes which existed in his time into two classes, in a manner which throws an important light both on the character and the form of these compositions. (Quaest. Convic. vii. 8, § 4.) He calls the two classes of mimes ἄνθρωποι and παίγνει, and considers neither species suitable for performance at a banquet; the former on account of their length and the difficulty of commanding the proper scenic apparatus (ὃ δὲ δεχομαιγιαντανὀην, "another proof, by the way, that they were intended for public performance, and not for private reading"), the latter on account of their surcility and obscurity. Although neither here, nor in the description given by Xenophon of a very licentious mime (L. c.), is the name of Sophron mentioned, yet it would be too much to assume that his compositions were all of the better kind. Lastly, Aristotle ranks Sophron as among those who are to be considered poets, on account of their subject and style, in spite of the absence of metre. (Poétic. i. 8, and more fully in ἔπειρα ποιητῶν, ἁθ. xi. p. 505, c.)

It has been asserted that Sophron was an imitator of Epicharmus; but there is no proof of the fact, although it can hardly be doubted that the elder poet had some considerable influence on his later fellow-countrymen. It is, however, certain that Sophron was closely imitated by Theocritus, and that the Idylls of the latter were, in many respects, developments of the mimes of the former. (Demet. de Eloq. 156, 127, 128.) The admiration of Plato for Sophron has been already referred to. The philosopher is said to have been the first who made the mimes known at Athens, to have been largely indebted to them in his delineations of character, and to have had them so constantly at hand, that he slept with them under his pillow, and actually had his head resting upon them at the moment of his death (Suid. s. v.; Diog. iii. 8; Quint. i. 10. 17.)

The fragments of Sophron have been collected by Blomfield, in the Classical Journal for 1811, No. 8, pp. 380—390, and more fully in the Museum Criticum, vol. ii. pp. 340—553, 559, 560, Camb. 1826; and by Ahrens, as above quoted. The titles will also be found in Fabricius. (Fabric. Bibli. Gracc. vol. ii. pp. 493—495; Müller, Dorier, bib. iv. c. 7. § 5; Hermann and Ritter, ad Aristot. Poët. i. 8; Grysar, de Sophron Monograph, Colon. 1838; Bernhardt, Grundrisse d. Griech. Lit. vol. ii. pp. 908—913. B. xx.)

SOPHRONUS (Sophronous), of Athens, the father of the celebrated Socrates, is described by the ancient Greek writers as λαογραφός, λαθέως, λαθόλογος, κραμαλογίς, terms which undoubtedly signify a sculptor in marble, and not, as Hemsterhuis and others have supposed, merely a mason. (Diog. Laërt. ii. 18; Lucian, Sosm. 12, vol. i. p. 18; comp. Hemsterh. ad loc.; Schol. ad Aristoph. Nub. 773; Val. Max. iii. 4, ext. 1; Thiersch, Epochen, p. 125.) He must have flourished about b. c. 470, and have belonged to the old Attic school, which preceded that of Peidias, and to a family of Athenian artists, for Socrates is frequently represented, both by Xenophon and Plato, as tracing his descent from Daeodatus. (Comp. Socrates, p. 847, b, p. 856; a; Dædaulis, p. 928, b.) No works of Sophroniscus are mentioned. (Pl. S. P.)

SOPHRO'NIUS (Sophronius). Among the numerous ecclesiastical writers of this name, treated... of by Fabricius (Bibl. Graec. bk. v. c. xvi. § 7), there are only two that require any notice here.

1. A contemporary and friend of St. Jerome, who gives him a section in his treatise De Viris Illustribus (c. 134), where he informs us that "Sophronius, a man of distinguished learning, wrote the Praise of Bethlehem (Laudes Bethlehem) while yet a boy, and lately composed an excellent work, De Subversione Serapio;" that is, on the destruction of the temple of Serapis at Rome, in A.D. 389 or 390 (see Clinton, Fast. Rom. s. a. 389): "he translated into Greek, in an elegant style, my works, De Virtutibus et Vitis Hilarionis monachi; also the Psalter and the Prophets, which we translated from Hebrew into Latin." Now, since the Catalogue of Jerome was written in A.D. 392, the date of Sophronius is clearly determined by this passage. We have no information respecting his country or condition in life.

In the year 1539, Eunomus published at Basel, from what he calls an ancient and corrected MS., a Greek version of the Catalogue of Jerome, purporting to be made by Sophronius. This publication has ever since been a literary stumbling-block. Soon after its appearance there were not wanting persons who accused Eunomus of fabricating the version from motives of vanity. Isaac Vossius (ad S. Ignatii Epist. ad Smyrn. p. 257), while professing to reject this imputation, but solely on the faith of Eunomus's veracity ("nisi Eunomus hoc diceret, multum de ejus fide dubitaremus"), strongly contends, on the ground of the badness of the Greek, and on other internal evidence, that Eunomus had been imposed upon by a modern forgery. Stephannus le Mayne (ad Var. Soc. p. 418) replies to the charge against Eunomus by showing that there were MSS. older than the one used by him, and that the version is quoted by earlier writers; but he does not say where these MSS. and quotations are to be found. Fabricius and Cave defend the genuineness of the version, chiefly on the following ground, which appears decisive, that many articles of Suidas are in the very words of this Greek version. It is true that Suidas does not quote Sophronius by name, any more than he does Jerome; but, if the antiquity of the version be established, there is no reason to ascribe it to any other person than Sophronius. The somewhat remarkable circumstance, that Clinton mentions the translation as the work of Sophronius, without intimating, either in his account of the Catalogue of Jerome, or in his notice of Sophronius, that its genuineness has been questioned, may be taken, we presume, as a proof of its being a separate edition of that great scholar (Fast. Rom. s. a. 392, 393). Besides the separate edition of it by Eunomus, the version of Sophronius is contained in the Paris (1623) and Frankfort (1684) editions of the works of Jerome; and in the Bibliotheca Ecclesiastica of Fabricius (Hamb. 1718) it is printed with Jerome's original, and the passages of Eusebius, which were Jerome's chief authorities, in parallel columns.

To this same Sophronius Fabricius and others ascribe the work "in defense of Basil against Eunomius" (otypo Basileou kata Eunomioi), which is very briefly noticed by Photius (Bibl. Cod. v.). There is another small work ascribed to him by Eunomus, which professes to be a Greek version of Jerome's Epistolae ad Paulum et Eustochium de Adsumtione Mariæ Virginis, but it is most probable that both the Latin epistle and the Greek version belong to an age later than that of Jerome and Sophronius. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. ix. pp. 158—161; Cave, Script. Eccles. Hist. Litt. s. a., 390, p. 283, ed. Basili; Vossius, de Hist. Graec. p. 306, ed. Westermann.)

2. Patriarch of Jerusalem, A. D. 629—638, was a native of Damascus, and at first a sophist, afterwards a monk, and in A.D. 629 he succeeded Modestus as patriarch of Jerusalem. He distinguished himself as a defender of orthodoxy; and at the Council of Alexandria, in A.D. 633, he openly charged Cyrus with introducing heresy into the church under pretense of peace, and renounced all communion with him. When Jerusalem was taken by Omar, in A.D. 636, he obtained for the Christians the free exercise of their worship. He died, according to some, in the same year; according to others, two years later, in A.D. 638.

SOPHUS, P. SEMPRONIUS, is mentioned by Pomponius (Dig. 1. it. 2. s. § 37) after App. Claudius Caecus, as one who owned the name of Sophus or to his great-grandmother Appius Tribunus Plebis in b.c. 810, and attempted to compel the censor Appius Claudius to conform to the Lex Aemilia which limited the censor's functions to eighteen months. (Liv. ix. 33.) He was consul b.c. 304 with P. Sulpicius Severus (Liv. ix. 45). The two consuls defeated the Aequi, and had a triumph. He was the first plebeian consul pontifex (Liv. x. 9) b.c. 300, and in the next year a lustrum was celebrated by him and his former colleague, as censors; and two tribes were added. He seems to be the same person who took the praetorship at a time when Rome was alarmed by a rumour of a Gallic war (Livy, x. 21). Pomponius says that no one after him bore the name of Sophus, but a P. Sempronius Sophus was consul in b.c. 260 (Fasti) and censor in b.c. 252 (Liv. Epit. 19; Fast. Capitol.), and is called the son of Publius, who may have been the consul of b.c. 304. There is a story of one P. Sempronius Sophus, who divorced his wife, because she had been bold enough to see the public games without his consent; but those who believe the story of Carvilius divorcing his wife suppose that this Sophus must have lived later than the consul of b.c. 304. [G. L.]

SOPOLIS (Σωπολίς), son of Hermodorus, commanded the Amphipolian cavalry in the army of Alexander the Great, in the battle against the Triballians on the banks of the river Lygus, b.c. 335. He is mentioned again as commanding a troop of horse, probably the contingent from Amphipolis, at the battle of Arbela in b.c. 331; and we may perhaps identify him with the father of Hermolaus, the youthful companion against Alexander's life [Hermolaus]. (Att. Amob. i. 2, iii. 11, iv. 13; Curt. viii. 7.)

SO-POLIS, a distinguished painter, who flourished at Rome in the middle of the first century B.C., is mentioned with Dionysius by Pliny, who says, that their works filled the picture galleries. (H. N. xxxv. 11. s. 40. § 43.) In some MSS. of this passage the name is written Soplyus. From a passage of Cicero (ad Att. iv. 16), which has been first pointed out by R. Rolette (Lettre à M. Schorn, pp. 315, 494, 2d ed.), we learn that Sopolis was at the head of a school of painters. [P. S.]

SOPOLIS (Σωπόλης) a physician who instructed Aetius (the heretic, not the physician) in medicine, in the former half of the fourth century after Christ. A high character is given him by Philostorgius, who says he was inferior to none of his contemporaries (Hist. Eccles. iii. 15, p. 52); St. Gregory of Nyssa, on the other hand, without naming Sopelis, says that Aetius became servant to a quack doctor (ἄρτος), from whom he picked up his knowledge of physic. (Cont. Eusom. i. p. 293.)

SOPYLUS. [Sopolis.]

SORA'NUS, a Sabine divinity of the lower world. Mount Soracte, which probably derived its name from him, was, according to Servius (ad Aen. xi. 785), sacred to the infernal gods, especially to Diespiter; and it is related that during a sacrifice offered to Soranus, wolves snatched away the entrails of the victims from the altar, and that the shepherds pursuing the wolves came to a cave, the poisonous vapours of which caused a pestilence among them. An oracle then ordered them to live, like wolves, on prey, and hence those people are called Hirpin, from the Sabine word ἱρίπας, a wolf, which was joined to that of Soranus, so that their full name was Hirpin Sorani. It was a custom observed down to a comparatively late period that the Hirpi or Hiripini (probably some ancient Sabine families) at the festival on mount Soracte, wore felt caps and light glowing coals of fir-wood, carrying about the entrails of the victims (Serv. ad Aen. xi. 784, &c.; &c.; Plin. H. N. vii. 2; Sil. Ital. v. 174; Strab. v. p. 226).

Strabo connects this ceremony with the worship of Feronia, and this circumstance, as well as the proximity of the sanctuary of the two divinities, shows, that Soranus and Feronia probably belonged to the same religion. Roman poets sometimes identified Soranus with the Greek Apollo. (Virg. Aen. xi. 786; comp. Müller, Etrusk. vol. ii. p. 67, &c.; Hartung, Die Religion der Römer, vol. ii. p. 191, &c.)

SORANUS (Σωρανός), the name of several physicians, whom it is difficult (if not impossible) to distinguish with certainty. The following are enumerated by Fabricius (Bibl. Gr. vol. xii. p. 684, ed. vet. See also vol. xiii. p. 426.)

1. A native of Cos, who appears to have written an account of Hippocrates, and is said to have examined the libraries and official records at Cos, in search of materials. His date is unknown, but he may perhaps have lived in the third or second century B.C. He is quoted by Soranus, the author of the Life of Hippocrates. (§ 1.)

2. A native of Mallus in Cilicia, whose date is unknown, but who is mentioned by Suidas as one of the "more ancient" physicians (προτετάγμενος). He appears to have been eminent in his profession; and as he lived after the time of Hippocrates, he may perhaps be placed in the fourth or third century B.C. (Suid. s. v. Σωρανός.)

3. A native of Ephesus, whose father's name was Menander, and his mother's Pheobe. He first practised his profession at Alexandria, and afterwards at Rome, in the reigns of Trajan and Hadrian, A.D. 98-138. Suidas (who gives the above account of him) adds that he composed several excellent works.

4. Another native of Ephesus, who lived later, and who (according to Suidas) wrote Γυναικεῖα βεβαία τίτσαρα, Βίου ἦταν, καὶ Αἰθέρει, καὶ Συντάγματα, βεβαία δέκα, and other works.

Now it is quite possible that Suidas may be correct in stating that there were two physicians of the name of Soranus, both of whom were natives of Ephesus; but at any rate those modern writers who have attempted to distinguish them by assigning to each his proper writings, have decidedly failed, as is evident since the publication of the treatise Περί Γυναικείων Πάθων, in 1838. For instance, Fabricius considers that the elder Soranus (No. 3) is the physician belonging to the sect of the Methodici who is frequently quoted by Caesius Aurelianus, and who wrote a work, "De Coenotelis," consisting of at least two books; and he thinks that the younger Soranus (No. 4) is the author who is frequently quoted by Aetius, to whom belongs the short fragment Περί Μηχανώς καὶ Γυναικεῖων Αἰτίων, which is still extant. It is, however, now quite clear, first, that the fragment in question forms part of the published treatise "De Morbis Mulerum;" 2. that the writer of this work belonged to the sect of the Methodici (see Dietz's Notes at pp. 4, 21); 3. that this is the work frequently quoted by Aetius; and 4. that the writer of this work was also the author of a work Περί Κουρυσσίων consisting of at least two books. Upon the whole, therefore, it seems more probable that Dietz (note to Sor. p. 25) and Dr. Ermerius (Obs. Crit. in Sor. appended to his ed. of Hippocr. De Viet. Rot. inMorb. Acut. p. 372) are correct in supposing that the two physicians of the name of Soranus, mentioned by Suidas as being natives of Ephesus, were, in fact, one and the same individual. The only objection to this hypothesis, of which the writer is aware, arises from the fact that in the treatise "De Morbis Mulerum" the names of several physicians occur who lived later than the time of Soranus; and this difficulty would of course be insuperable if the facts in these passages were genuine and correct. But the text of the whole treatise is at present in a very unsatisfactory state, and contains many words, &c., that are undoubtedly spurious; so that (until the whole question has been thoroughly examined by some future editor of Soranus) we are quite justified in believing the passages in question to be interpolations. (See Ermerius, l.c. p. 371, &c.)

If, therefore, we suppose that there was only one physician of the name of Soranus who was born at Ephesus, the date assigned by Suidas to the son of Menander will agree tolerably well with that which we gather from other sources; he is quoted by Caesius

Praet. vol. i. p. 207), but probably without sufficient reason.
Soranus.

Aurelius rather as a predecessor than as a contemporary; he lived at least as early as Archigenes, who used one of his medicines (ap. Aët. ii. 2. 55, p. 277); he was tutor to Attalus [ATTALUS, Vol. i. p. 412]; and he was dead when Galen wrote his work “De Methodo Medendi,” i.e. about A. D. 178. (Gal. De Med. Med. i. 7, vol. x. p. 53.) But, after all, it must be confessed that the exact chronology of Soranus is not quite satisfactorily made out. He belonged to the sect of the Methodici (Pseudo-Gal. Introdr. c. 4, vol. xiv. p. 614), and was one of the most eminent physicians of that school. Besides the few particulars mentioned above, nothing is known of the events of his life, except that he passed some time in Aquitania for the purpose of treating some skin diseases which were very prevalent there at that time. (Marcell. Empr. De Medicam. c. 19, p. 521.) The following medical works are still extant under the name of Soranus:—1. Perl Ψηφιακων Παιδων, De Arte Obstetriciae Morbusque Mulierum; 2. Peri Μυτρας καλ Ψηφιακων Αδιολων, De Utero et Pudendo Mulier. 3. Perl. Σωλωτης Καταγωγης, De Signt. Fracturarum, by Peri. Ενθιθεν, De Fallos; 5. Βιος Πσωρακτους, Vita Hippocratis; 6. In Artem Medendi Iapogo. The treatise Perl Ψηφιακων Παιδων was first published in Greek in 1838. Regim. Pruss. 8vo. It was first printed for the press by F. R. Dietz, and finished after his death by J. F. Lobech. It is a valuable and interesting work, consisting of one hundred and twenty-two chapters, with a few lines of the hundred and twenty-third, and the titles of thirty-eight more.* As has been intimated above, the text is at present in a very corrupt state, and contains numerous interpolations. Dr. Ermerius has published some valuable “Observations Criticae in Sor. Eph. De Arte Obstetr. Morbsque Mul.” at the end of his edition of Hippocrates, De Vici. Rat. in Morb. Auct. Lugd. Bat. 1841; and a new edition of the work is at the present time (1849) being prepared by Dr. Bell of Paris. With respect to the medical contents of the work the reader may consult a dissertation by H. Häser, “De Sorano Ephasio, ejusque Perl Γων, Ψαλαβ Lithro nuper reperto,” Jenae, 1840, 4to.; another by J. Pinoff, entitled “Arta Obstetriciae Sor. Eph. Doctrina ad ejus Librum Perl Γων, Ψαλαβ Lithro nuper repertum exposita,” Vratisl. 1840, 8vo.; and four interesting articles by the same Dr. Pinoff in the first and second volumes of Henschel’s “Janus,” Breslan. 1846, 1847, 8vo.

The short piece Perl Μπρας καλ Ψηφιακων Αδιολων is, in fact, merely an extract from the preceding work (of which it forms the fourth and fifth chapters), containing one of the best anatomical descriptions of the female organs of generation that have come down to us from antiquity. It has been preserved by Oribasius (Col. Med. xxii. 31, 32), and is to be found in Greek in Goupil’s edition of Rufus Ephesius, Paris, 1554, 8vo., and in the first volume of Ilder’s “Physici et Medicorum Graecorum Minores,” Berol. 1841, 8vo. There is a Latin translation in different editions of Oribasius, in that of Theophilus De Corp. Hum. Fabr. Paris, 1556, 8vo., and in F. Paulini “Universa Antiquorum Anatomie,” Venet. 1604, fol.

*Soronus.

The fragment Perl Ψηφιακων Καταγωγης was published with a Latin translation by Cocchi in his collection of “Graecorum Chirurgici Libr.” Florence, 1754, fol.; and the Greek text is inserted in Ilder’s Phys. et Med. Gr. Min. The short piece Perl Ενθιθεν is to be found in Greek and Latin in the twelfth century of Charlec’s edition of Hippocrates and Galen, Paris, 1679, fol.

The Βιος Πσωρακτους is of little value in itself, but is interesting as being the only ancient account of that great physician that remains, except what is told us by Suidas and John Tzetzes. It may perhaps have formed part of the collection of medical biographies mentioned by Suidas as being written by the younger Soranus. It is published in several editions of the works of Hippocrates; and is inserted also in the old edition of Fabric, Bibl. Gr. (vol. xii. p. 675), in Ilder’s Phys. et Med. Gr. Min., and in A. Westermann’s “Vitarum Scriptores Graeci Minores,” Bunsiv. 1845, 8vo.

The treatise entitled “In Artem Medendi Isagoge” is quite extant only in Latin, and is generally considered to have been written by Soranus. The author is called “Soranus Ephesius, inagnis Peripateticos aut veustissimus Archithec.” The only writers quoted in the work are Homer (c. 16), Hippocrates (c. 3, 4, 23), Erasistratus (c. 1), and Galen (c. 13); and it has been supposed to be rather an original Latin treatise than a translation from the Greek (see Cagnati, Var. Obscr. iv. 2). It is to be found in the collection of medical authors published by Albanius Torinus, Basel, 1828, fol.; and also in the Aldine Collection, Venet. 1547 fol.

Besides these works (if they were all written by the same person), Soranus was the author of several others, of which only the titles and some fragments have been preserved. Galen mentions two works on Pharmacy, from which he quotes some passages (De Compos. Medicam. sec. loc. i. 2, vii. 7, vii. 2. vol. xii. pp. 414, 336, 397, xiiii. 42); one, consisting of at least four books, entitled Perl Ψεφακτεων, and the other Perl Anatomia. Caelius Aurelinus quotes “De Adjutorioris,” “De Febribus,” “Libri Causarum, quos Artiων-γουμενων appellavit,” and the second book “De Coenotetis” (De Morb. Auct. i. 29, 33; De Morb. Chron. i. 3, iv. 1, pp. 143, 153, 289, 494), and says that part of his own work was merely a translation of one by Soranus (De Morb. Auct. i. p. 75). Soranus himself refers to his works entitled Perl Σφραγατωs (De Arte Obst. p. 10), Perl Ζωογενως (p. 11), Perl των πορα Φυσων (p. 20), Perl Κουνοττωv (p. 23), Το Τυγεινω (p. 27), Perl Νουντατωv (p. 106), and Perl Οξεωv (p. 106). Terrilualia quote a work by Soranus “De Anima,” in four books (De Anima, cc. 8, 15, 25, 44), in which he divided the soul into seven parts (ibid. c. 14), and denied its immortality (ibid. c. 6). He is quoted by Paulus Aegineta (iv. 59), as being one of the earliest Greek medical writers, who had described the species of worm called Flavina Medinitosis, or Guinea Worm (see J. Weilhe, De Filar. Med. Comment. Berol. 1832, 8vo.); and he appears to have enjoyed a great reputation among the ancients, as St. Augustine calls him “Medicinae auctor nobilitissimus” (Cont. Julian. v. 51, vol. x. p. 654, ed. Bened.), and Tertullian, “Methodicae Medicinae instructissimus auctor” (De Anima, c. 6). See also St. Cyprian, Epist. 76, p. 156, ed. Paris, 1726.6.

SOSIANUS. SERVILIUS BATEA. [Bere.]

SOSIANUS, Q. VALE'RIUS, whom Crassus in the De Oratore designates as "litetissimum togatorum omnium," is the author of two hexameters, quoted at second-hand from Varro, by St. Augusteine (De Civ. Dei, vii. 9), and also by the third of the mythographers first published by Mai. The lines in question,

"Jupiter omnipotens, rerum regnumque repertor, Progenitor genitrixque Deum, Deus unus et ideam," may very possibly, as Meyer conjectures, have been contained in the work spoken of by Pliny (H. N. Prsa) as having been entitled Eremiton, while the fragment added in the treatise of Varro De Lingua Latina (vii. 31, comp. 63, x. 70), as an example of the word adagio, is probably extracted from a different piece. It is evident, from the passage in Cicero referred to above, that Sosianus must have been a contemporary of Antonius the orator, and therefore flourished about B.C. 100. (See Antol. Lat. ed. Meyer, praef. p. x.)

The mythographer of Mai calls him Sosianus, which is clearly a blunder, perhaps due to the copyster, and in no way must he be confounded with the Sosianus of Juvenal (Sat. vii. 60), who lived under Nero. (Compare Plin. H. N. iii. 5; Plut. Quest. Rom. 61; Gerlach's ed. of Lucullus, 8vo. Turic. 1846. p. xxxi.)

SOR'ORIA, a surname of Juno, under which an altar is said to have been erected to her in common with Janus Curitius, when Horatius, on his return home, had slain his sister, and had been purified of the murder. (Liv. i. 26; Fest. p. 297, ed. Miller.)

SOSANDER (Sos'andros). 1. A foster-brother of king Attalus. He distinguished himself in the war between the latter and Prusias by his defence of Elaea (Polyl. xxxii. 25).

2. A navigator referred to in the epitome of Artemidorus of Ephesus (p. 63), as the author of a work on India. (Vossius, de Hist. Graeciae, p. 500, ed. Westermann.)

[S. P. M.]

SOSANDER (Sos'andros), the seventeenth in descent from Aesclapius, who lived in the fifth and fourth centuries B.C. He was the son of Heraclides and brother of Hippocrates II., the most famous of that name. (Le Clerc, Hist. de la Méd.)

A physician of the same name (who must have lived some time before the first century after Christ, and who may possibly be the same person), is quoted by Asclepiades Pharmacian (ap. Galen, De Compos. Medicinae sec. Loc. iv. 7. vol. xii. p. 733), who has preserved one of his medical formulae. See also Asgr. Bull. 3, 78 p. 322. [W. A. G.]

[SOSIA GALLA. [Galla.]

SOSIANUS, ANTI'STIUS, was tribune of the plebs, A. D. 56, and praetor, A. D. 62. In the latter year he was banished for having written libellous verses against Nero, but was recalled to Rome in A. D. 66, in consequence of his having brought an accusation against Anteus. He was, however, again banished at the commencement of Nero's reign as one of the informers under the tyrant. (Tac. Ann. xiii. 28, xiv. 48, xvi. 14, Hist. iv. 44.)

[SOSIA'NUS, a surname of Apollo at Rome, derived from the quaeator C. Sosius bringing his statue from Seleucia to Rome. (Cic. ad Att. viii. 6; Plin. H. N. xiii. 5, xxxvi. 4.)

SO SIAS (Sos'ias), a vase-painter, whose name is inscribed on a beautiful cylix, which was discovered at Vulci, in 1828, and is now in the Royal Museum at Berlin (No. 1030). This work is one of the finest extant specimens of Greco-Etruscan vase-painting. Writers on ancient art have compared it to the productions of Polygnotus, on account of the character visible in the figures, or to those of Dionysius on account of its minute and elaborate finish. At all events it belongs to one of the best periods of Etruscan art, and from the manner in which the figures are adapted to the shape of the vessel, as well as from the whole style of the composition, it is pronounced by the best judges to be manifestly an original work and not a mere copy from some greater artist. The subject represented on the inner side of the vase is taken from the mythical adventures of Achilles and Patroclus. Achilles, who had been instructed by Cheiron in the healing art, is binding up a wound which Patroclus has received, as is supposed, in the battle against the Mystian Telephus, which was the first great victory gained by the two heroes. The meaning of the composition on the outer side is more doubtful. It consists chiefly of figures of divinities, and has been variously interpreted as the marriage of Peleus and Thetis, or some other marriage subject, or, in connection with the other side of the vase, as a group of divinities assisting as spectators of the exploits of Achilles and his friend. The vase is supposed to have been a bridal present. It is engraved in the Monuments Inedits of the Archaeological Institute of Rome, vol. 1. pl. 24, and in Gerhard's Trinkshelten des Kon. Mus. pl. 6.

Respecting the artist we have no further information, but the critics have of course indulged in sundry conjectures. Raoul-Rochette supposes that he may have been a Sicilian, from the frequency with which names beginning in Sos are found among the Greeks of Sicily; a point of some importance in connection with the theory formerly advanced by him, that the painters of Etruscan vases were generally Sicilian Greeks; but that theory he now renounces. Others have seen a connection between the medical subject of the inner side of the vase and the root-meaning of the artist's name. (Müller, Archäol. d. Kunst. § 143, n. 3; R. Rochette, Lettre à M. Scholl, pp. 59, 60, 2d. ed.; Nagler, Künstler Lexicon, s. v.)

[SOSIBIUS (So'si'bias), historical. 1. A Tarantine, one of the captains of the body-guards of Ptolemy Philadelphus. (Joseph. Ant. xii. 2. § 2.) It is not improbable he may have been the father of the minister of Ptolemy Philopator. 2. The chief minister of Ptolemy Philopator, king of Egypt. Nothing is known of his origin or parentage, though he may have been a son of No. 1; nor have we any account of the means by which he rose to power; but we find him immediately after the accession of Ptolemy (b.c. 222), exercising the greatest influence over the young king, and virtually holding the chief direction of affairs. He soon proved himself, as he is termed by Polybius, a ready and dexterous instrument of tyranny; it was by his ministeration, if not at his instigation, that Ptolemy put to death in succession his uncle Lysimachus, his brother Magas, and his mother Berenice. Not long after, Cleomenes, of whose influence with the mercenary troops Sosibius had at this time dexterously availed himself, shared the same fate (Polyb. v. 34—39, xv. 25; Plut. Cleom. 33—35). While the young king gave himself up to luxury and debauchery, the whole administration of the kingdom appears to have been left to Sosibius, who allowed both the finances and military defences to fall into a state of the greatest decay, so that when Antiochus the Great declared war against Ptolemy, and invaded Coele-Syria, it was some time before the Egyptian monarch or his ministers could muster an army to oppose him. Sosibius, however, displayed some dexterity in delaying the progress of Antiochus by negotiation until he had time to organise a mercenary force: and when, in b.c. 218, Ptolemy at length took the field in person, Sosibius accompanied him, and was present at the decisive battle of Raphia. After the close of the campaign he found a more congenial occupation in negotiating the terms of the treaty of peace, which Ptolemy commissioned him to arrange with Antiochus. (Polyb. v. 63, 65, 66, 63, 67.)

During the remainder of the reign of Ptolemy Sosibius seems to have retained his power, without opposition, though sharing it in some degree with the infamous Agathocles, but we have very little information with regard to the latter years of his rule. We are told, however, that he was once more the minister of Ptolemy in putting to death his wife and sister Arsinoë, as he had previously been in the murder of his other relations (Polyb. xv. 25). But great as was the address of Sosibius in all the arts and intrigues of a courtier, he was no match for his yet baser colleague Agathocles; and although, after the death of Philopator (b.c. 202), the two ministers at first assumed in conjunction the guardianship of the young king, Ptolemy Epiphanes, Sosibius seems to have been supplanted and put to death by his insidious rival. All particulars of these events are, however, lost to us. (Polyb. xv. 25, 54; and Schweigh. ad loc.)

3. A son of the preceding, who held the office of body-guard (Somatophylax) to the young king, Ptolemy Epiphanes; a post which Agathocles suffered him to retain (probably on account of his youth) even after the death of his father. In the tumult which led to the destruction of Agathocles, Sosibius took a decisive part, by appealing to the infant monarch himself to give up his hated favours to the populace; and it was probably on this account that he subsequently obtained the guardianship of the young king's person, with the custody of the royal signet. These duties he discharged in a manner that gave general satisfaction; but the intrigues of his more turbulent and ambitious brother, Ptolemy, having involved him in an open rupture with Tlepolemus, who was at the head of the administration, the latter obtained the advantage, and compelled Sosibius to resign his office; from which time we hear no more of him. (Polyb. xv. 32, xvi. 22.)

[SOSIBIUS (Sosic), literary. 1. A philosopher mentioned by Diogenes Laërtius (ii. 46) as having opposed the opinions of Anaxagoras; but it does not follow necessarily that he was contemporary with Anaxagoras. Nothing more is known of him. 2. A distinguished Laædæmonian grammarian, who flourished in the reign of Ptolemy Philadelphus (about b. c. 251), and was contemporary with Callimachus. (Ath. xi. p. 493, f. iv. p. 144, a.) He was one of those writers who employed themselves in solving the difficulties met with in the ancient authors, and who were therefore called ἀντικῶτεροι ἢ ἐπιλυτικοι, in opposition to the ἐνσώματος, who employed their ingenuity in proposing problems for others to solve. (Suid. s. v. Aleth. xi. p. 493, f.)

The following works of his are quoted: 1. Περὶ Αλκάμαιον (Ath. iii. p. 115, a, xiv. p. 646, a., p. 648, b.) 2. Περὶ τῶν ἐν Ἀλκάμαιοι δωρίσι (Ath. xv. p. 674, a., p. 678, b.) 3. Ομοιοτήτες (Ath. xv. p. 690, e.) 4. A Chronography, entitled περὶ χρόνων (Ath. xiv. p. 635, f) or χρόνων ἀναγραφη (Clem. Alex. Strom. vol. i. p. 327, c.) One of his works, but we are not told which, contained information respecting the ancient Dorian Comedy of the Diculstae and the Mimes. (Suid. s. v. Σωσικ, Δισυλαίστων: Ath. xiv. p. 621.) Besides the passages now referred to, there are several other quotations from his writings. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. vi. p. 379; Vossius, de Hist. Graec. pp. 136, 137, ed. Westerman; Clinton, E. H. vol. iii. p. 503.)

3. A grammarian, who lived under Claudius, and was the tutor of Britannicus. (Tact. Ann. xi. 1.)

4. Respecting the supposed tragic poet of this name, see Sosithēus.

[SOSIBIUS (Sosic), an Athenian sculptor, known as the maker of a vase about two feet high, in the Louvre, adorned with eight figures in relief, of which two are of Artemis and Hermes, and the remaining six represent a sacrifice. The two figures of divinities are in the archaic style, but the others display a freedom and grace, which has led Waagen to suppose it not improbable that the artist lived in the time of Pheidias. The architectural ornaments on the vase are quite in the style of that age. (Clare, p. 126, No. 302; Bouillon, iii. 73; Waagen, Kunstwerke u. Künstler in Paris, p. 101; Nagler, Künstler-Lexikon, s. v. Sosicles.)

SOSICLES (Sosic), a Corinthian deputy, at that remarkable congress of the allies of Sparta, before which the Spartans laid their proposal for restoring Hippias to the tyranny of Athens. Sosicles remonstrated with indignant vehemence against the measure, and set forth the evils which Corinith had endured under the successive tyrannies of Cypselus and Periander. His appeal was successful with the allies, and the project was abandoned. (Herod., v. 92, 93.)

[SOSICLES (Sosic), is mentioned by Fabricius, on the authority of Suidas and Eudocius, as a tragic poet of the time of Philip and Alexander the Great, having been venerated by the Cypriots, from the best MSS. of Suidas, that the name is erroneously introduced, owing to the text of Suidas being misread by some of his copyists, as well as by Eudocius. According to the true reading of Suidas, Sosicles is simply mentioned as the father of the tragic poet Sophanes. (Suid. s. v. Σωσίφαρνες, ed. Kuster; Eudoci. p. 384; Westermann, Vitatum Script. Graec. Min. p. 152, n. 63; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. ii. p. 322.)

[SOSICLES (Sosic), artists. 1. A sculptor of unknown age and country, whose name is found inscribed on a statue of an Amazon in the Capitoline Museum. (Mus. Cap. vol. iii. p. 46.) The execution of the statue, we are told by Raoul Rohette, is very good, although the form of the letters of the inscription belongs to the later Roman empire.
The inscription is of the following form, COΣCIKH, where the meaning of the sign Σ below the name has never been satisfactorily explained.

We owe to the same writer the publication of a discovery by which the artist's name again appears. This is a plinth to which adhere the two feet and one leg of the statue of a man, which it once supported. The execution of these remaining portions is said by R. Rochette to correspond to that of the Amazon. The plinth bears the following inscription, in large characters, COΣCIKA... The fragment was discovered at Tusculum, in 1842, in the course of the excavations undertaken by M. Canina, at the expense of the queen dowager of Sardinia; and it was to form (and now, we suppose, forms) a part of the collection of ancient marbles found at Tusculum, and preserved in the Villa della Rufinella. (R. Rochette, Lettre à M. Schorn, p. 403, 2d ed.)

2. Gem engraver. [Sosikrates.]

SOSIKEKATES (Σωικράτης), a vice-general of the Achaeans in their war against the Romans (b.c. 147), was the chief mover of the resolution, taken by an assembly held at Corinth, to endeavour to treat with Metellus; for which act, upon the arrival of Dineus at Corinth, he was condemned to death; and, in the hope of extorting a confession from him, he was subjected to the severest tortures, under which he expired. This cruel deed so disgusted the people, that Dineus did not venture to carry out his intention of publishing the death of the ambassadors who had been sent to Metellus. (Polyb. xi. 5; Thirlwall, Hist. of Greece, vol. viii. p. 453.)

SOSIKEKATES (Σωικράτης), literary. 1. A comic poet, whose time is unknown. Pollux quotes twice from his play entitled Παρακαταθήν (Poll. ix. 57, iv. 173; in both passages the name is corrupted; in the former into Πεποράτης, in the latter into Κρατής; but in the latter passage a manuscript has Σωικράτης). His Φίλαδελφας also is cited by Athenaeus (xi. p. 474 a, d); and there are some other quotations from unknown plays of his. (Ath. i. p. 31, e; Stob. Flor. xxii. 2; Maxim. Conf. p. 198, Gesner.) From the titles of his plays, Meineke thinks it more probable that he belonged to the New Comedy than to the Middle. (Meineke, Frag. Com. Graec. vol. i. pp. 498, 499, vol. iv. pp. 591, 592; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. ii. p. 495)

2. Of Rhodes, an historical writer, who is quoted by Diogenes Laërtius (ii. 84) as an authority for the statement, that Aristippus wrote nothing. It is therefore inferred, with much probability, that he is the same as the Sosikrates whose work upon the Succession of the Philosophers is quoted by Athenaeus (iv. p. 163, f. Σωικράτης εἰς τρίτη φιλοσοφίας διαδοχής). He also wrote a work on the history of Crete, Κρήτικα, which is frequently quoted. (Strab. x. p. 474; Ath. vi. p. 261, e, et alib.) He flourished after Hermippus and before Apollodorus, and therefore between B.C. 200 and B.C. 128. (Clinton, F. H. vol. iii. p. 565.)

There appear to have been other writers of the name; such as Sosikrates Phanagorites, whose Ἱοίος is quoted by Athenaeus (xii. p. 590 c.), and a certain Sosikrates quoted by Fulgentius Planincides (s. v. Nefrendos). The passage of a Sosikrates of Cyzicus, cited by Fulgentius (Myth. ii. 13), is evidently copied from a quotation made by Diogenes Laërtius from the Succession of the Philosophers. The name is sometimes confounded with Socrates. (Vossius, de Hist. Graec. p. 500, ed. Westermann; Fabric. Bibliothec Graec. vol. ii. p. 873, vol. vi. p. 138.)

SOSIKENES (Σωσείγηνα). 1. An officer who commanded the Phoenician fleet, which had been assembled by Eumenes to make head against his rivals in B.C. 318. The fleet had arrived at Rhodes, where it was detained by contrary winds, when that of Antigonus suddenly arrived, adored with garlands and other triumphal ornaments, from his recent victory at the Hellespont. Sosigenes himself, however, was met with a demand that he should restrain the crews, who immediately declared in favour of Antigonus, and joined the hostile fleet. (Polyaenus, iv. 6 § 9.)

2. (Perhaps identical with the preceding.) A friend of Demetrius Poliorcetes, who was one of the few that still remained with him in his retreat and wanderings after his last defeat by Seleucus, B.C. 286. He had preserved 400 pieces of gold, which he now offered to Demetrius as a last resource, and with this supply the king endeavoured to reach the coast, but was intercepted by the detachments of Seleucus, and compelled to surrender at discretion. (Plut. Demet. 49.)

3. A Rhodian by birth, but who appears to have held a magistracy among the Achaeans, whom he persuaded to pass a decree abolishing all the honours which had been paid to Eumenes, king of Pergamus. (Polyb. xxviii. 7; and Schweigh. ad loc.)

SOSIKENES (Σωσείγηνα), the astronomical, the astronomer employed by Julius Caesar to superintend the correction of the calendar (b.c. 46), is called an Egyptian, but may be supposed to have been an Alexandrian Greek. With the exception of certain allusions to him by name, which simply confirm the fact that he was considered a skilful astronomer, nothing can be found concerning him. The most definite of them is that of Simplicius, who says he wrote on astronomy. A sentence of Pliny (H. N. ii. 8) is interpreted by Weidler as implying that Sosigenes maintained the motion of Mercury round the sun. Riccioli and others represent that he remained at Rome until the time of Augustus, and aided in the final establishment of the calendar according to the intention of Julius. But it must be clear that if Sosigenes had remained at Rome, the Augustan correction never could have been needed: the leap-year would never have been made a triennial intercalation under the eye of the astronomer himself. Nevertheless, Pliny (H. N. xviii. 25) mentions the Augustan correction, most probably, as if it had been a correction of the theory of the calendar, arising out of the further investigations of Sosigenes himself: his words are: “en ipsis ratio postea comperito errore correccta est, ita ut duodecim annis continuos non intercalaretur... et Sosigenes ipse tribus commentationibus, quasquam diligentior esset ceteris, non cessavit tamen addubilare, ipso semet corrigendo.” According to our view of this passage the tres commentationibus are of the three occasions on which, during the time of Augustus, an intercalation had to be omitted: Pliny seems to make each of them a separate interference of Sosigenes (whom he may seem to keep alive at Rome for the purpose) for the correction of his period. And Weidler, in SOSINUS (Sosianus), of Gortyna, in Crete, an artist or archifise, whose name is known by his sepulchral monument, on which he is designated χαλκόπητης, a term which has been explained in different ways. By comparing what little can be gathered respecting the word itself with the bas-relief on the monument, Böckh and Roault-Rocheote have come to the conclusion, that the word signifies a maker of bronze shields. The monument, which is in the Museum of the Louvre, has been engraved by Bouillon (Mus. des Antiq. vol. iii. Cippus, i. 3), and the inscription is published by Böckh (Corp. Inser. No. 837). (R. Rochette, Lettre à Schorn, pp. 495, 406, 24 ed.; comp. Welcker, Syll. Graec. No. 3, pp. 5-7.)

SOSIPATER (Sosipater). 1. An Athenian comic poet of the New, and perhaps also of the Middle Comedy. He is only mentioned by Athenaeus (vol. i. p. 578 E, f. who quotes a very long passage from his Καταφύγιοι, in which mention is made of the cook Charides, to whom the comic poet Ephephon refers as being dead. (Ath. ix. p. 379, c.) Hence it is inferred that Sosipater flourished shortly before Ephephon. (Meineke, Fragm. Com. Graec. vol. i. p. 477, vol. iv. pp. 482—485; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. ii. p. 495.)

SOSIPATER and ZENON, of Soli, statutes, known by an inscription found at Lindos as having made one of the bronze στατουρίας of Athene Lindia and Zeus Polieus. There is some doubt as to the meaning of the term στατουρίας. Ross translates it priests, R. Rochette understands it as equivalent to the sacerdotes of Pliny (H. N. xxxiv, 8, s. 19 § 34), and Welcker translates it ex-priests. (Ross, Rhein. Mus. 1846—1847, vol. iv. p. 169; Welcker, Rhein. Mus. 1848—1849, vol. vi. pp. 382, 385.)

SOSIPHANES (Sosiphanes), one of the ambassadors whom Antiochus Epiphanes sent to Rome when he engaged in his war against Egypt for Cœle-Syria. (Polyb. xxviii. 1, 18.) [P. S.]

SOSIPHANES (Sosiphanes), the son of Sosicles, of Syracuse, a tragic poet, who, according to Suidas, exhibited seventy-three dramas, and obtained seven victories; was one of the seven tragedians who were called the Tragic Pleiad; was born at the end of the reign of Philip, or, as others said, in that of Alexander, and died in the 121st or 124th Olympiad (adopting Clinton’s correction πές and πέδ, for πέκ and πέδε); while others stated that he flourished at one or the other of those dates. (Suid., s. v.) Clinton proposes to reduce these statements into a consistent form in the following manner: Sophanes was born in the reign of Philip, or in that of Alexander, between B. C. 310 and B. C. 330, and exhibited tragedy in the times of the Pleiad, Ol. 121 (B. C. 296) or Ol. 124 (B. C. 284). He is placed among the poets of the Pleiad by a scholiast on Hephaestion (p. 185), as well as by Suidas; but in the other three lists, the name of Aeantides appears instead of Sophanes. If the latter really belonged to the Tragic Pleiad, he must have been the oldest of the seven poets in it.

SOSPILIS (Sospilis), i. e. the saviour of the state, was the name of a hero among the Eleans, who was represented as a boy wearing a military cloak, and carrying the horn of Amalthea in his hand. He had a sanctuary in common with Eleithyia at the foot of the hill of Cronos at Olympia, and no one was allowed to approach his altar except the priestsess, and even she only with her head covered. Oaths in which he was called upon were considered to be particularly solemn and binding. The origin of his worship is thus related:—Once when the Arcadians had invaded Elis and the Eleans had marched out to meet them, there appeared among the Eleans a woman with a boy at her breast and declaring that after she had given birth to the child she had been called upon by a vision in a dream, to offer the child as a champion to the Eleans. The commanders of the Eleans believing the assertion, placed the child naked before their ranks, and when the Arcadians began the attack, the child was metamorphosed into a serpent. Hereupon the Arcadians fled in dismay, and the Eleans pursuing them gained the victory. The Eleans hence called their saviour Sospilis, and on the spot where he had disappeared in the form of a snake they built a sanctuary to him and his supposed mother Eleithyia. (Paus. vi. 20, § 4, ii. 25, § 4.)

SOSPIPPUS (Sospippos), a supposed comic poet of the New Comedy, the only mention of which is in the following passage of Athenaeus (iv. p. 133, f.), Δίαλεξα δὲ τοῦ Σωσιπποῦ εἰς Ἀποκλιτοχρόνον, where, since the name of Sospippus does not occur elsewhere, Meineke proposes to read Ποιησίππον, adding, however, "quamquam ejusmodi conjectus nihil sincerius", Sospippus is the title of a comedy of Anaxandrides, which may perhaps account for the meaning of the name as that of a comic poet; such mistakes are frequent. (Meineke, Hist. Crit. Com. Graec. pp. 373, 453.)

SOSIS (Sosis). 1. A Syracusan, who joined the expedition of the younger Cyrus with 300 mercenaries. (Xen. Anab. i. 2 § 9.)

2. A Syracusan, who endeavoured to excite a popular sedition against Dion during the period when the latter having made himself master of Syracuse was besieging Dionysius in the island citadel. Sosis had purposely wounded himself, and pretended to have received these injuries from emissaries of Dion, but the fraud was discovered, and Sosis, in consequence, was put to death by the indignant populace. (Plut. Dion. 34, 35.)

3. A Syracusan, originally a man of ignoble birth, and a brazier by trade (Liv. xxiv. 30), was one of the conspirators who assassinated Hieronymus at Leontini, B. C. 215. (Hieronymus). After that event, Sosis and Theodetus (another of the conspirators) hastened immediately to Syracuse, where they roused the people to arms, and made themselves masters of the city with the exception of the citadel, in which Andranodorus, the governor left there by Hieronymus, had fortified himself. The next day of assembly of the people was held, in which Sosis and Theodotus were among those chosen as generals or praetors, and Andranodorus was soon after induced to surrender the citadel. (Liv. xxiv. 21—23.) Shortly after, he was appointed, together with Deinomenes, to command the army sent to the relief of Leontini, but arriving too late to save that city, which had already fallen into the power of Marcellus, they turned their arms against the traitors Hippocrates and Epicydes, who had taken refuge at Herbeusus. Their object was, however, again frustrated by the mutiny of their mercenary troops, who declared in favour of the two Carthaginians, and the latter, following up their advantage, quickly made themselves masters of Syracuse itself. (Id. ib. 30—32.) Sosis on this occasion escaped the fate of most of his colleagues, and fled for refuge to the camp of Marcellus, with whom he continued throughout the long protracted siege of the city. During the course of these operations he rendered important assistance to the Roman general by carrying on negotiations with the Syracusan officers, and by leading the party which effected the surprise of the Epipolae. For these services he was rewarded by a conspicuous place in the ovation of Marcellus, b. c. 211, besides obtaining the privileges of a Roman citizen and an extensive grant of lands in the Syracusan territory. (Id. xxv. 25, xxvi. 21, 30.)

[SOSITHEUS. (Σώηθεος), a Sicilian medalist, whose name appears, in the abbreviated form ΣΩΣ, on the front of the diadem of a female head, which is the type of a small Syracusan medallion; and also in full, ΣΩΣΙΣΘΕΟΣ, on a medal of Gelo II. in the Pembroke cabinet. The admission of this name into the list of ancient artists is, however, a matter of controversy. (R. Rochette, Lettre à M. Schorh, pp. 96, 97.)]

SOSISTRATUS (Σωιστράτος). 1. A Syracusan, who shared with Heracleides in the chief direction of the affairs of his native country, a few years previous to the elevation of Agathocles. The account given by Diodorus of the steps by which they had raised themselves to power is lost, but that author tells us in general terms that they were men accustomed to treachery, bloodshed, and every species of crime. (Diod. xix. 3, and Wesseling, ed. loc.) We find them both holding the joint command of an expedition sent by the Syracusans to assist the Crotomians against the Bruttians, as well as of a subsequent armament which laid siege to Rhegium; but Sosistratus appears to have held the first place, and we soon after find him spoken of as having raised himself to the rank of tyrant or absolute ruler of Syracuse. The revolution, by which he effected this, appears to have been connected with a victory of the oligarchical party in the city, but their triumph was of short duration, and Sosistratus himself was soon after expelled from Syracuse together with 630 of the leading men of the aristocratical party. War now arose between the democratic party, who remained in possession of Syracuse, and the exiles, in which the latter, supported by assistance from the Carthaginians, were not only able to maintain their ground, but, after many vicissitudes of fortune, procured their recall to their native city. It is doubtful whether Sosistratus himself was included in the accommodation which appears to have re-instated the oligarchy in the chief power, as his name does not occur in the revolutions which followed, and which ended in the elevation of Agathocles, b. c. 317. (Diod. xix. 3—5.) At a subsequent period however (b. c. 314) we find him mentioned as one of the most active and able of the Syracusan exiles assembled at Agrigentum, who from thence carried on war against Agathocles; and the prominent place which he occupied at this time directed against him the especial enmity of the Spartan Acrotatus, who in consequence contrived to remove him by assassination. (Diod. xix. 71.) It is singular that Polyainus (v. 37) seems to represent Sosistratus as acquiring the sovereign power after Agathocles, instead of before him: but the circumstances related by him are wholly irreconcilable with the narrative of Diodorus. (Compare also Trog. Pomp. Pred. xxi.)

2. A Syracusan who, together with THRONUS or THYNON, for a time held the supreme power in his city. He was seized with the idea of reviving the caravan of confusion which preceded the arrival of Pyrrhus. After the expulsion of Hicetas (about b. c. 279), Thynon alone is mentioned as succeeding him in the chief direction of affairs, but we soon after find Sosistratus dividing with him the power. Our imperfect accounts however give us very little idea of the real state of affairs. It appears that Sosistratus and Thynon both relied upon the support of foreign mercenaries: and were engaged in civil war with one another, in which the former had the advantage, and occupied the city of Syracuse, while Thynon fortified himself in the island citadel. Sosistratus was also master of Agrigentum and not less than thirty other cities, and found himself at the head of a force of 10,000 troops, so that he would probably have crushed his rival, had it not been for the arrival of the Carthaginians, who laid siege to Syracuse both by sea and land. Thus oppressed by civil discord, and external enemies, he both parties employed the assistance of Pyrrhus, and on his arrival Sosistratus surrendered the city into his hands, and Thynon the citadel. A reconciliation was now effected between the rivals, who thenceforth supported Pyrrhus with their joint efforts; and Sosistratus placed all the cities and troops at his disposal in the hands of the king, while he assisted him in recovering Agrigentum, which had fallen into the hands of the Carthaginians. For these services however, he met with no gratitude; the arrogance of Pyrrhus having alienated the minds of all the Sicilians and rendered the king in return suspicious of all the leading men among them, he took an opportunity to put Thynon to death, and Sosistratus narrowly escaped sharing the same fate. His name is not again mentioned. (Diod. xxii. 4. Exe. Hesychel. p. 485—487; Dion. Hal. Exe. xvi. 6—8, pp. 2360—2362, ed Reiske; Plut. Pyrr. 23.) The name is written Sistratus in many manuscripts and editions, but the form Sosistratus appears to be the more correct. [E. H. B.]

[SOSITHEUS (Σωισθέος), of Syracuse or Athens, or rather, according to Suidas, of Alexander in the Troad, was a distinguished tragic poet, one of the Tragic Pleiad, and the antagonist of the tragic poet Homer: he flourished about Ol. 124 (n. c. 284); and wrote both in poetry and in prose. (Suid. s. v.) He is also mentioned among the... poets of the Pliiad in all the lists except that of Tzetzes.

The remains of his works consist of two lines from his Αριστ. (Stob. Serm. ii. 23), and a considerable fragment of twenty-four lines from his Δαφνίς or Αυγήφανος, which appears to have been a drama pastoral in its scene, and in its form and character very similar to the old satyric dramas of the Attic tragedians. (Schol. ap. Casaub. ad Theocr. c. 12; comp. Ath. x. p. 415 b; Tzetz. Chil. ii. 595; Schol. ad Theocr. x. 41.) By some of the above authorities the name Sosibius is wrongly given instead of Sosthenes. Another error, into which some writers have been led by the character of the Δαφνίς of Sosthenes, is that of making him a comic poet. (Fabric. Bibl. Græca, vol. ii. pp. 322, 323, comp. p. 495; Clinton, F. H. vol. iii. s. a. 278, 259, pp. 501, 502; Welcker, Griech. Trag. p. 1052; Wagner, Frag. Trag. Græca, in Didot's Bibliotheca, pp. 149—152.) [P. S.]

SOSIUS. 1. C. Sosius, was quaeator of M. Lepidus, consul b. c. 66. He was praetor in b. c. 49, on the breaking out of the civil war, and, like most of the other magistrates of that year, belonged to the Pompeian party. He did not, however, remain with this party long; for instead of going to Brundusium to cross the sea with Pompey, he returned to Rome with Lupa and openly united himself to Caesar (Cic. ad Att. viii. 6, i. 1). After the death of Caesar he followed the fortunes of Antony, whom he accompanied to the East, and by whom he was appointed in b. c. 38 governor of Syria and Cilicia in the place of Ventidius. Like his predecessor in the government, he carried on the military operations in his province with great success. He was commanded by Antony to give vigorous support to Herod against Antigonus, the representative of the Asmonean line of princes, who was in possession of Jerusalem, and had kith and kin successfully resisted the efforts of Herod to subdue him. Sosius obtained possession of the island and town of Arados off the coast of Phœnicia, towards the end of b. c. 38. In the following year, b. c. 37, he advanced against Jerusalem along with Herod, and after hard fighting became master of the city, and placed Herod upon the throne. (Dion Cass. xiii. 22; Joseph. Ant. xiv. 15, 16; B. J. i. 17—18; Tac. Hist. v. 9; Plut. Ant. 34.) [HERODES.] In return for these services, Antony obtained for Sosius the honour of a triumph in b. c. 34, and the consulship along with Ca. Domitias Ahenobarbus in b. c. 33. In the ather year the quarrels and misuderstandings between Octavian and Antony broke out into open hostilities. Sosius warmly espoused the cause of his patron, and in an assembly of the senate on the 1st of January ventured to attack Octavian, and upheld the cause of Antony. Octavian was absent from Rome at the time, and on his return to the city Sosius found it necessary to quit Italy and betake himself to Antony. In the following year, b. c. 31, he commanded a squadron of Antony's fleet; and during the absence of Agrippa, who had the supreme command of the fleet of Octavian, he attacked the squadron of L. Arruntius and put it to flight; but while engaged in the pursuit, he fell in with M. Agrippa, who wrested the victory from him. He then went down the Danube, crucified the king of Cilicia, and compelled Sosius himself to seek safety in flight. It is erroneously stated by Dion Cassius (l. 14) that Sosius fell in this engagement. In the decisive battle of Actium, Sosius commanded the left wing. He escaped from the battle and fled to a place of concealment, but was detected and brought to Octavian. The conqueror pardoned him, however, at the intercession of L. Arruntius (Suet. Aug. 17; Appian. B. C. v. 73; Dion Cass. xiii. 41, l. 2, 14, li. 2, lvi. 38; Vell. Pat. ii. 85, 86). There are several coloi of this C. Sosius extant. The specimen annexed has on the obverse the head of Antony, and on the reverse an eagle standing on a thunderbolt, with a caduceus before it, and the legend κ. Μ. ΣΟΣΙΟΥ. (Eckelh, vol. v. p. 314.)

COIN OF C. SOSIUS.

2. Sosius, the name of two brothers, booksellers at Rome in the time of Horace (Ep. i. 20, 2, Art. Poët. 345). They were probably freedmen, perhaps of the Sosius mentioned above.

SOSIUS PALCO. [FALCO.]

Sosius Pappus, was honoured with a statue by Trajan, and is mentioned among the friends of Hadrian. (Dion Cass. Ixviii. 16; Spart. Had. 4.)

SOSIUS SENE'GIO. [Sene'cio.]

Sosius, an artist, whose name is given by Müller (Archäol. § 308, n. 4) on the authority of a passage in Pliny (H. N. xiii. 8. s. 11). "Cedrius est Romae in delubro Apollo Sosianus, Seleucia adiectus;" but it cannot be pronounced with certainty, from this passage, whether the artist's name was Sosius, which is only found as a Roman name, or Sosius, Sosis, or Sosus, all three of which are genuine Greek names. (See Pape, Wörterbuch d. Griech. Eigennamen.) Nothing is known of the artist's age; for it by no means follows necessarily from the statue being of wood, that he lived at a very early period. Statues of divinities were frequently made out of the finer and more durable woods, at every period of Greek art. (Siebeln, ad Paus. v. 17. § 2; Amothea, vol. ii. p. 259.)

SOSPITA, that is, the "saving goddess," was a surname of Juno at Lanuvium and at Rome, in both of which places she had a temple. Her worship was very ancient in Latium and was transplanted from Lanuvium to Rome. (Cic. De Nat. Deor. i. 29, De Div. i. 2; Liv. viii. 14, xxiv. 10, xxvii. 3, xxix. 14, xxxi. 12, xxxii. 30. x. 19; Ov. Fast. ii. 56; Sil. Ital. viii. 362, xiii. 346.) The name is connected with the verb σωσίων, but the ancient Romans called her Sisipa, and so her name appears in inscriptions, just as Jupiter also is called Sapes instead of Sospes. (Fest. p. 343, ed. Müller.) [P. S.]

SOSTHENES (Σόσθηνης), a Macedonian officer of noble birth, but unconnected with the royal family, who obtained the supreme direction of affairs during the period of confusion which followed the invasion of the Gauls. After the death of Ptolemy Ceraunus (b. c. 230), and the short-lived sovereignty of his brother Meleager, 3 l. 3
SO'ISTRATUS.

Antipater, a nephew of Cassander, was placed on the throne, but his incapacity became speedily apparent, and the times being such as to require an efficient military leader, he was set aside after a reign of only 45 days, and Sosthenes assumed the command of the army, though without the title of king. His arms were at first crowned with success: he defeated the division of the Gauls under Belgius, and for a time cleared Macedonia of the barbarians, but was in his turn defeated by Brennus, and compelled to shut up his troops within the walls of the fortresses. Brennus, however, now turned his arms against Greece. Macedonia became again free, and Sosthenes restored her to the ancient position of her citizens during the space of nearly two years. Such at least is the statement of Porphyry, but the chronology of these events is extremely obscure. Sosthenes is included by the chroniclers among the kings of Macedonia; but it is very doubtful whether he ever assumed the royal title, which he had at first expressly refused. (Justin. xxiv. 5, 6; Porphyry. ap. Euseb. Arm. vol. i. pp. 156, 157, 162) [E. H. B.]

SOSTHENES (Σωσθενής), of Cnidos, wrote a work on Iberia, of which Phytarch quotes the thirteenth book. (Plut. de Flav. cc. 16, 17; Vossius, de Hist. Graecis, p. 500, ed. Westermann.)

SOSTHENES (Σωσθενής), a gem-engraver, for the above form, first suggested by Visconti, seems to be most probably the correct mode of reading the inscription on a celebrated gem, which others have read Suicides or Sosodes. This is one of the many examples of the confusion of Greek names beginning in So. The Gem is an intaglio, representing a Gorgon's head, in that beautiful style, which did not prevail until after the time of Praxiteles. (Stosch, pl. 65; Bracci, pl. 109; Mus. Borb. vol. iv. pl. 39; Eckhel, Pierees grav. 31; Lippert, Dukkliotichao, i. ii. 70—77; R. Rochette, Letter à M. Schorr, pp. 154, 155, 23 ed.) [P. S.]

SO'ISTRATUS (Σώστρατος), a youth beloved by Hercules, to whom funeral sacrifices were offered in Achaia, and whose tomb was shown in the neighbourhood of the town of Dyme. (Paus. vii. 17, § 4.) [L. S.]

SO'ISTRATUS (Σώστρατος). 1. An Aeginetan, son of Laodamas, is alluded to by Herodotus as having made the greatest profits ever realized by a single commercial voyage, but unfortunately the period and other circumstances of this successful enterprise are wholly unknown to us. (Herod. iv. 152.)

2. A Syracusan. [SO'ISTRATUS, No. 2.]

3. Son of Amyntas, a noble Macedonian youth, in the service of Alexander the Great; was one of those implicated in the conspiracy of the pages against that monarch, for which he was put to death together with his friend and associate Hermolaus. [HERMOLAUSS.

4. A citizen of Chalcedon, who became a courtier of the Gaulish king Cavarus, and is accused of having corrupted the naturally good disposition of that chief inu by his flatteries. (Polyb. ap. Athen. vi. p. 252, c.)

5. A flute-player and parasite, who enjoyed a high place in the favour of Antiochus II. king of Syria. His sons were admitted by that monarch among his body-guards. (Athen. i. p. 19, a. vi. p. 244, f.)

6. Father of Deinarchus the Athenian orator, called by some writers Socrates. [E. H. B.]

literary. 1. A grammarian who lived in the time of Augustus. He was a native of Nysa, and a son of Aristodemus, who was an old man when Strabo was young. (Strabo, xiv. p. 560).

We have no means of deciding whether it is to either of these, or to some different author, that the following works are to be ascribed:—1. A work on Euruscan history (Σωστράτης Tορφονν, Plut. Parall. Min. c. 20; Stob. Floril. iv. 35). 2. A work on animals. (Athen. vii. pp. 308, b, 312, etc.; Stob. Hyg. Hist. IV. v. 27, p. 51.) 3. A work on legendary history (Μετέχεις δαυείδ, Stob. l. c. 19). 4. A treatise on hunting (κυνηγυρία, Stob. l. c. iv. 33). 5. A work on Thrace (Σωστράτης, Stob. l. c. vii. 66). 6. A treatise on rivers (Plut. de Fluv. c. 2; Vossius, de Hist. Graec. p. 227, ed. Westermann.) [C. P. M.]

SO'ISTRATUS (Σώστρατος), the name of three members of the family of the Asclepiadæ. 1. The third in descent from Asclepius, the son of Hippolochus I., and the father of Dardanus, who may be supposed to have lived in the eleventh century B.C. (Jo. Tzetzes, Chilv. hist. Hist. 155, in Fabric. Bibl. Gr. vol. xii. p. 680, ed. vet.)

2. The eighth in descent from Asclepius, the son of Theodorus I., and the father of king Criasim II., who lived perhaps in the eighth and seventh centuries B.C. (Id. ibid.)

3. The twelfth in descent from Asclepius, the son of Theodorus II., and the father of Nebros, who lived in the seventh century B.C. (Id. ibid.; Poeti Epist. ad Artix. ap. Hippocr. Opera, vol. iii. p. 770.)

4. A surgeon of Alexandria, mentioned in terms of praise by Celsius (De Med. vii. praef. p. 137), who may be conjectured (from the names of his apparent contemporaries) to have lived in the third century B.C. (See also Cels. vii. 4, 14, pp. 139, 151.) Sprengel says he was a celebrated lithotomist, but of this there is no evidence. He appears to have given some attention to the subject of bandages (Galen, De Punct. c. 102, 103, vol. xviii. pt. i. p. 823; Nicetas, cc. 469, 482, 484), and is probably the same person who wrote some zoological works, which are quoted by several ancient authors, but are not now extant. (Aelian, De Nat. Anim. v. 27, vi. 51; Schol. Nicand. Ther. vv. 565, 574, 760, 764; Schol. Theor. id. i. 115*; Athen. Deipn. vii. 66, 90, pp. 303, 312.) See also Galen, De Atur. ii. 14. vol. xiv. p. 184; and Gariopontus, De Ficr. c. 7. (Sprengel's Gesch. der Arzneik. ed. 1846.) [W. A. G.]

SO'ISTRATUS (Σώστρατος), artists. There at least four, if not five, Grecian artists mentioned, of this name, who have been frequently confounded with one another, but whom Thiérsch has distinguished with much skill and, for the most part, correctly. (Epochen d. bild. Kunst, pp. 278, 292, 501.)

1. A statuary in bronze, the sister's son of Pythagoras of Rhegium, and his disciple, flourished about Ol. 89, b. c. 424. (Plin. N. H. xxxiv. 8. s. 19. § 8.) None of his works are mentioned.

2. Of Chios, the instructor of Pantias, and

* In this passage (as Dr. Rosenbaum, the editor of the new edition of Sprengel's History, remarks) for Σώστρατος we should read Σώστρατος.
SO stratus.

therefore the sixth in that series of seven artists, of whom Aristotle of Sicyon was the first, and Pantias the last.

(Paus. vi. 9. § 1; comp. Aris.

Tockles). There is some difficulty in fixing the times of these artists; but, on the whole, the most probable date for Sostratus is that assigned to him by Müller, namely, about Ol. 93, n. c. 400. Paus sianus (vii. 26. § 4. s. 7) mentions this same statue as the work of Hypatodorus, an artist who flourished between Ol. 90 and Ol. 102, and whose name might easily be corrupted into Hecatodorus. Pausianus does not mention Sostratus in connection with Hypatodorus; and Polybius does not identify him with the teacher of Pantias; but, from a comparison of the two passages with the one first quoted from Pausianus, the inference is at least probable that they refer to the same artist.

3. A statue in bronze, which Pliny mentions as a contemporary of Lysippus, at Ol. 114, n. c. 328, on the day of Alexander's death. (H. N. xxxiv. 3. s. 19). Even if we make all allowances for Pliny's practice of grouping together, at some marked historical epoch, artists who were only partially contemporary, we can hardly suppose this Sostratus to have been the same person as the preceding. But, on the other hand, considering how frequently different branches of art were cultivated by the same person, there is much probability in Thiersch's conjecture, that he was identical with the following.

4. The son of Dexiphanes, of Cnidus, was one of the great architects who flourished during and after the life of Alexander the Great. He built for Ptolemy L, the son of Lagus, at the expense of 600 talents, the celebrated Pharos of Alexandria, in connection with which we have one of the numerous examples recorded of the contrivances to which artists have resorted to obtain their share of the posthumous flattery of their patrons desired to monopolize. It is related that Sostratus, not being allowed by Ptolemy to inscribe his own name upon his work, resorted to the artifice of secretly carving his name in deep letters in a stone of the building, which he then covered with a softer material, on which he inscribed the name of the king.

In this case, however, the story appears to be an invention; for Pliny expressly mentions it as an instance of the meagreness of Ptolemy, that he permitted the name of the architect to be inscribed upon the building. (Plin. H. N. xxxvi. 12. s. 18; Strab. xvi. p. 791; Suid. and Steph. Byz. s. v. Φάρος; Lucian, de Conscrib. Hist. 62, vol. ii. p. 69). The architect also embellished his native city, Cnidus, with a work which was one of the wonders of ancient architecture, namely, a portico, circular in form, surrounded, supporting a tower, which served as a promenade, and in which Pliny (l. c.) calls parvisia ambulatio. This phrase, taken in connection with Lucian's mention of the work in the plural number (στρώσ), suggests the idea that the edifice of Sostratus was a continuous series of porticoes surrounding an enclosed space, perhaps the Agora of the city. Pliny further informs us that Sostratus was the first who erected a building of this kind. (Plin. l. c.; Lucian, Amor. 11, vol. ii. p. 408).

5. An engraver of precious stones, whose name appears on several very beautiful cameos and intaglios, which are enumerated by Raoul-Rochette (Lettre à M. Schorn, pp. 155, 156, 2d ed.). The form ΣΩΣΟΣΤΡΑΤΟΣ, which occurs on some of these pieces, is evidently the same name; but we are not quite prepared to assert, with Raoul-Rochette, that "the reading, which is not Greek, could only proceed from the inadvertence of the artist." It may be so, but it may also be that ΣΩΣΟΣΤΡΑΤΟΣ was a softened pronunciation of the name.

The explanation suggested by Winckelmann, in his account of the gems of Baron Stosch,—that the form ΣΩΣΟΣΤΡΑΤΟΣ occurs only on gems of later workmanship, the engraver of which is presumed, wished to pass them off as works of Sostratus, but was careless in the execution of his forgery,—appears, according to the testimony of R. Rochette, to be negatived by the existence of works which are evidently of genuine antiquity, and which bear the name in that form.

6. To the above artists, whom various writers notice, must be added another, a medalist, whose name appears in full on some coins of Tar tentum, and to whom, therefore, Raoul-Rochette appears very likely to be correct in ascribing other medals of Tarentum, and of Thurium, which are inscribed with the abbreviations ΣΩΣ and ΣΩΣ, although from the frequency of names beginning with this syllable, especially among the Greeks of Southern Italy, it is impossible to be quite sure that he is right. (R. Rochette, Lettre à M. Schorn, p. 97.)

[SOSUS (Σωστράτος), artists. 1. Of Pergamus, a worker in mosaic, and, according to Pliny, the most celebrated of all who practised that art. He made the pavement of a room on which Pergamus, when he meant to imitate, by means of little coloured pebbles, the floor of an unswept room after a banquet, whence it was called σωστράτος οἶκος. The fragments of the meal, which had fallen to the floor, were exactly represented, and in the centre was a αἰθαρᾶ, with a dove drinking out of it, the shadow of whose head was seen on the water in the vessel, and other doves were sunning themselves on the edge of the cantharus. (Plin. H. N. xxxvi. 25. s. 60). An imperfect copy of the central part of this mosaic (at first mistaken for the original), was found in Hadrian's Villa at Tivoli, in 1737 (Mus. Capitol. iv. 69), and a more perfect copy was found at Naples in 1833. (Müller, Archäol. d. Kunst, § 163, n. 6, § 322, n. 4, ed. Welecker.) One or two other mosaics have been supposed by some antiquaries to be copies from works by Sossia, but on grounds entirely conjectural. (See Nagler, Künstler Lexicon, s. v.)

We have no information respecting the artist's age or country, but it is clear that he must have lived during or after the decline of painting, which followed the Alexandrian period, when the art had degenerated to an ornament of luxury, when homely and even grotesque subjects were greatly admired (comp. Pyreicus), and when the elaborate imitation of minute details was prized above every other quality.

2. A medalist, whose name appears in very fine characters on the prow of the vessel carrying the heroine Histaia, which is the ordinary type of the numeros coins of Histaia in Euboea. Raoul Rochette remarks, that it is very curious to find the artist's name thus engraved on one of a class which are perhaps the most abundant of any of the Greek medals, and that, too, in a part of Greece which had before furnished no other example of such an usage. (R. Rochette, Lettre à M. Schorn, p. 97, 2d ed.)

[S. J.]

SOTADES (Σώταδης). 1. An Athenian comic poet of the Middle Comedy (Suid. s. v.), of whose plays we have the following titles: 'Εργελείωνοι and 'Εργελειονευοι (Ath. vii. p. 293, a; Antillatt. p. 102), and Παραληπτποιοι (Ath. ix. p. 368, a). Both these are erroneously ascribed by Suidas and Endoeia to the more celebrated poet of Maroneia, with whom, indeed, the comic poet was so frequently confounded, even in ancient times, that Athenaeus (vii. p. 293, a.) expressly distinguishes them from one another. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. ii. p. 495; Meinecke, Frag. Com. Graec. vol. i. p. 426, vol. iii. p. 585.)

2. A native of Maroneia in Thrace (or, according to others, of Crete, but he is generally called Μαρωνείτης), flourished at Alexandria about B.C. 280. He wrote lascivious poems, called φλακες or κινειδοί, in the Ionic dialect, whence they were also called ιομικοί λόγοι. (Suid. s. v.; Ath. xiv. p. 620, e.) They were also called Σωταδησία διηγα. (Socrat. H. E. i. 9.) As other examples of this species of composition, Athenaeus and Suidas mention the Πυρος, the Πύρροι, the Μελικαί, the Αλεξανδρα, Timocharidas and Xenarchus. Strabo (xiv. p. 649) ascribes the beginning of this species to Sotades, who, as well as his successor, Alexander the Aetolian, wrote in prose, while Lysis and Simus wrote in metre; but there is some error in this statement, for we have express information respecting the kind of metre which Sotades employed. It would seem that Sotades carried his lascivious and abusive satire to the utmost lengths; this appears to be what Suidas means by calling him δαιμονιος. The freedoms which he took at last brought him into trouble. According to Plutarch (Op. Mor. p. 11, a.) he made a vehement and gross attack on Ptolemy Philadelphus, on the occasion of his marriage with his sister Arsinoë, and the king threw him into prison, where he rotted for a long time. According to Athenaeus (i.e.), the poet attacked both Lysimachus and Ptolemy; and, having fled from Alexandria, he was overtaken at Caunus by Ptolemy's general Ptoleclus, who shut him up in a leaden chest and cast him into the sea.

Of his works, we possess a few lines, and the following titles: -Δανους (Hephaest. p. 8, ed. Gaisford); 'Αμανδίων (Suid.) εις δου κατάλειψ (Suid.); ες Βελεστήρχου (Suid.); 'Αλας (Hephaest. p. 21); Πρήσσων (Suid.).

The metre which he generally used, and which was called after him the Sotadaean verse, was Ionic a Majore Tetractem or Brachycaleptic

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - admiring, however, of several variations. (Hephaest. p. 63; Gaisf. ad Hephaest. p. 319).

Athenaeus (xiv. p. 620, e.) refers to commentaries on Sotades and his works by his son Apollonas, and by Carystius of Pergamus. He appears to have had many imitators. Of the Latin poets, Ennius, L. Accius, and others, are said to have composed poems of the same species; and even among Greek churchmen Ariosus was accused by Athanasius of writing in a style approaching to the "Sotadean poems." (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. ii. pp. 495, 496; Clinton, P. H. vol. iii. s. a. 260, p. 500.)

3. An Athenian philosopher, who wrote a book on the mysteries. (Suid. s. v.)

4. A philosopher of Byzantium, of whom we know nothing but his name. (Suid. s. v.) [P. S.]

[SOTERICHUS (Σωτερίχος), i.e. "the Saviour" (Lat. Servator, or Sopaces), occurs as the surname of several female divinities in Greece, e. g. 1. of Artemis at Pegae in Megaris (Paus. i. 40. § 2, 44. § 7), at Trogzenae (ii. 31. § 1), at Boea in Laconia (iii. 22. § 9), near Pelleone (vii. 27. § 1); 2. of Persephone in Laconia (iii. 13. § 2), in Arcadia (viii. 31. § 1); 3. of Athena (Schol. ad Plat. p. 90. ed. Ruhmk., Aristot. Hist. ii. 18); and 4. of Eumonia (Pind. Ol. ix. 25). [L. S.]

SOTER (Σωτήρ), i.e. the "Saviour" (Lat. Servator or Sopaces), occurs as the surname of several divinities:—1. of Zeus in Argos (Paus. ii. 20. § 5), at Trogzenae (iii. 11. § 4), in Laconia (iii. 23. § 6), at Messene (iv. 31. § 5); at Mantinea (viii. 9. § 1), at Megalopolis (viii. 30. § 5; comp. Aristoph. Ran. 1433; Plin. H. N. xxxiv. 8). The sacrifices offered to him were called σωτήρα. (Plut. Arat. 52.) 2. Of Helios (Paus. viii. 31. § 4), and 3. of Bacchus. (Lycoph. 206c.) [L. S.]

SOTER (Σωτήρ), the Preserver, a surname of Ptolemy I. king of Egypt, as well as of several of the other later Greek kings. [Plut. De Mus. 2.]

SOTER, JULIUS, is supposed, on the authority of an inscription, to have been an artist in the fine species of mosaic, which was practised under the Roman emperors; but the matter is open to controversy. The inscription (Orelli, Inscri. Lat. No. 4262), mentions the name of Soter as PICTORIS QUADRIGULARI, which Weleker and others have explained in the above manner; but Raoul-Rochette, with more ingenuity than sound judgment, brings forward various arguments for reading Pistoris, and so turning the artist into a baker! (Weleker, Itin. Mus. vol. i. p. 289; Müller, Archäol. d. Kunst, § 522, n. 4; R. Rochette, Lettre à M. Schorn, pp. 442—454. 2d ed.)

[SOTEIRIA (Σωτηρία), i.e., the personification of safety or recovery (Lat. Sutus) was worshipped as a divinity in Greece, and had a Temple and a statue at the Patras (Paus. vii. 21. § 22, 24. §). [L. S.]

SOTERICUS (Σωτηρίχος). 1. Of Alexandria, a distinguished musician. (Plut. De Mus. 2.)

2. Of the Oasis, an epic poet of the time of Dioctelian. Suidas (s. v.) mentions, as his works, an Encomium on Dioctelian, a poem entitled Βασιλικά διοι Μινωσιακά, in four books, one on Panthedia of Babylon (τά κατά Πανθείαν τών Βασιλεων), another on Ariadne (τά κατά Αριάδνην), a life of Apollonius of Tyana, a poetical history of the taking of Thebes by Alexander the Great, entitled Πίθασαν ή Αλεξάνδρειοι, and others. A scholiast on Lycochron. (456) quotes a passage from his Κλάβανηκαί. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. iii. p. 52; Vossianis, de Hist. Graec. pp. 293, 294, ed. Westermann.)

[SOTERICUS, MARCRIUS, a freedman, from whom L. Crassus purchased his Tusculan villa (Cic. pro Balb. 25). A Gellius (xii. 2) makes mention of a former workman of the name of Sotericus, who must, however, have been a different person from the proceeding.
SOTERIDAS (Σωτηρίδας), a grammarian of Epidaurus, the husband of Pamphila, under whose name he published an historical work in three books. He also wrote a work on Orthography (ὁρθογραφίας), Homerian questions (Ἑρμηνείας Ομηρίας), a Commentary on Menander (μενανδρίας εἰς Μένανδρον), on Metres (περὶ μέτρων), on Comedy (περὶ κωμῳδίας), and on Epitaphs (εἰς ἔπταφη). Suidas has two articles on Soteridas, which so nearly resemble each other, that there can be no doubt of their referring to one and the same person, especially when we bear in mind the constant practice of Suidas to make different articles out of the statements of different writers concerning one person, without troubling himself much about their consistency. The above account is taken from the one of Suidas’s articles which appears to be copied from the better authority. In the other (and s. v. Πομψήλιος) he makes Soteridas the father, instead of the husband, of Pamphila; but the fact of his writing under her name appears more consistent with his being her husband than her father. Also, the Commentary on Menander is called, in the second article, a Commentary on Homer and Menander; a curious conjunction, unless the Homer referred to be the poet of the Tragic Pleiad. These variations are of little consequence in themselves; but they furnish a good example of the sort of materials out of which much of the minor Greek literary history has to be constructed.

SOTION (Σοτίών). There appear to have been three or four philosophers of this name. The following alone are worth noticing:

1. A native of Alexandria, who flourished at the close of the third century B.C. (Clinton, Fasti Hellen. vol. iii. p. 526.) Nothing is known of his personal history. He is chiefly remarkable as the author of a work, entitled Δαμοχαϊ, on the successive teachers in the different philosophical schools. It is quoted very frequently by Diogenes Laërtius (ii. 12, 26, v. 86, &c.,) and Athenaeus (iv. p. 162, e., &c.) It consisted of at least 23 books (Diog. Laërt. provem. 1. 7.) He was also, apparently, the author of a work, περὶ τῶν Τίμωνος σιδῶν Αθην. viii. p. 336, d.,) and of a work entitled Δίκαιους ἔλεγχοι (Diog. Laërt. x. 4.).

2. Also a native of Alexandria, who lived in the age of Tiberius. He was the instructor of Seneca, who derived from him his admiration of Pythagoras (Seneca, Epist. 108). It was perhaps this Sotion who was the author of a treatise on anger, quoted by Stobaeus (Floril. xiv. 10, xx. 53, lxxxiv. 6—8, 17, 18, cviii. 59, cxiii. 15). Plutarch also quotes him (Alex. c. 61), as the authority for certain statements respecting towns founded by Alexander the Great in India, which he had heard from his contemporary Potamon the Lesbian. Vossius conjectures that it is the same Sotion who is quoted by Tzetzes (Chil. vii. 144) as the authority for some other statements relating to India, which he probably drew from the same source.

SOZOMENUS, HERMETIS, SALAMANES, or SALAMINUS (Σαλαμίνιος Ἑρμητις Σαλαμίνιος, Σαλαμίνιος, Phyt. Bibl. Cod. 30; comp. Sozomen, H. E. lib. vi. c. 32: Ἑρμητις Σαλαμίνιος, ὁ καὶ Σαλαμίνιος, Nisich. Calist. H. E. lib. 1. i. 1.), with the additional epithet SCHOLASTICUS; usually called in English SOZOMENUS; a Greek ecclesiastical historian of the fifth century. He was probably a native of Bethelia or Bethel, a populous village in the territory of Gaza in Palestine. His grand-father was the first of his family who embraced the Christian religion, being influenced thereto by the wonderful recovery of Alaphon, a person of property in the same village, and a demoniac, who had been relieved by the prayers of the monk Hilarion, after he had resorted in vain to Jewish and Heathen exorcists. The grandfather of Sozomen, with some of his kindred, fled from Bethelia during the reign of Julian, fearing the violence of the heathen multitude: but they appear to have returned; and the grandfather being a person of some education, and skilled in the exposition of the Scriptures, and especially in solving difficulties, was much esteemed by the Christians of Ascalon, Gaza, and the neighbouring parts (Sozomen, H. E. lib. v. c. 15). That Sozomen was born and educated at Bethelia is inferred from his familiarity with the locality (ibid.), and from his intimacy, when quite young, with some persons of the family of Alaphon, who were the first to build churches and monasteries near Bethelia, and were pre-eminent in sanctity (ibid.); a description which, as Valesius notices, appears to identify them with the four brothers, Salamani, Physcon, Malachon or Malchion, and Criapius, mentioned by him in another place (lib. vi. c. 32). Valesius supposes Sozomen to have derived that great admiration of the mystic life which he shows in various parts of his work from his early intercourse with these monks; and it was perhaps from the first-mentioned of them that he derived his own name of Salamani. That the early life of Sozomen was spent in the neighbourhood of Gaza, appears also from his familiar acquaintance with the department of Zenon, the aged bishop of Maiuma, the port of that city (lib. vii. c. 26). The statement of some writers that Sozomen was a native of Cyprus is an error, arising apparently from the corrupt form Σαλαμίνιος, Salaminus, in which Nicephorus has given his name. According to Valesius, whom Cave follows, Sozomen studied civil law at Berytus; but we have not been able to trace any reference to this circumstance in Sozomen’s history; he practised at the bar at Constantinople, and was still engaged in his profession when he wrote his history (lib. ii. c. 3). Of his subsequent life nothing appears to be known. As he mentions, in the prefatory epistle to his history, an incident which probably occurred in A. D. 443, he must have survived that year; and Cellier thinks that, from the manner in which he speaks of Proclus of Constantinople (lib. ix. c. 4), ad fin. Προκλου εὐπροσώπου τοῦ ἀρχιερείας, “in the episcopate of Proclus of Constantinople”), he must have written after the death of that prelate in A. D. 446; but we think the words do not necessarily lead to that conclusion.

The only work of Sozomen which has come down to our time is his Εὐκλησιαστικὴ ἱστορία, SOZOMENUS.

Historia Ecclesiastica. His first design was to comprehend in this work the whole period from the ascension of Christ; but considering that the earlier period, to the overthrow of Licinius by Constantine the Great, A.D. 324, had been already treated of by other writers, among whom he enumerates Clemens (apparently meaning the Pseudo-Clemens, author of the Recognitions or the Clementine), Hegesippus, Africanus, and Eusebius, he contracted his plan so far as related to that period, and comprehended it in a separate work, a compendium in two books, which is now lost (II. E. lib. i. 1). His longer history is in nine books, but is imperfect; for though he proposed to bring it down to the seventeenth consulsiphip of the younger Theodosius, A.D. 439, the year in which the history of Socrates ends (comp. Oratio ad Imp. Theodos. mentioned just below), the work, as now extant, comes down only a little later than the decease of the emperor Honorius, A.D. 423. Whether it was ever finished according to the author's design, or whether some portion of it has been lost, cannot now be ascertained. It breaks off at the end of a sentence, but in the middle of a chapter; for, while the title of the last but one of the dissertations of the relics of the prophet Zacharias (or Zacharib) and of the Proto-Martyr Stephen, the chapter itself gives an account only of the former. The work was divided by the author into nine books, and has prefixed to it a dedication to the emperor Theodosius II., Ἁγια πρὸς τὸν αὐτοκόμπο τὸ Θεοδοσίου Β. Ορατίος ἀδ Ἰμπ. Θεοδοσίου. The first two books contain the events of the reign of Constantine the Great; the first book ending with the Council of Nice, and the second beginning with the discovery of the cross of Christ, and the visit to Jerusalem of Helena, the emperor's mother. The next two books comprehend the reigns of the sons of Constantine; the events which preceded the death of Constans being in the third book, and later events in the fourth. The revolt of Julian, the death of Constantius, and the greater part of the events of the reign of Julian, occupy the fifth book; the invasion of Persia by Julian and the death of that emperor, and the beginning of the reign of Arcadius, Valentinianus, and Valerius, are included in the sixth; the reign of Theodosius the Great is given in the seventh, that of Arcadius in the eighth, and that of the younger Theodosius in the ninth, that last book, as already noticed, is imperfect. It may be here observed that Fabricius denies that the work is incomplete, urging that the discovery of the relics of the prophet Zacharias, which is the closing incident of the history, occurred, according to the authority of Marcellinus, in the seventeenth consulship of Theodosius II., A.D. 439, the year to which Sozomen proposed to bring down his history. Even were this statement accurate, the authority of Marcellinus could not be permitted to overbalance that of Sozomen himself, who distinctly places the discovery of the relics among the incidents of the minority of Theodosius, whereas Theodosius, in his seventeenth consulship, was nearly forty years of age. Marcellinus however does not mention the finding of the relics either of the prophet Zacharias, which Sozomen has actually related, or of the proto-martyr Stephen, which Sozomen proposed to relate in his last extant chapter. What Marcellinus does mention as an incident of the seventeenth consulship of Theodosius, is the translation of the latter relics from Jerusalem to Constantinople, by the empress Eudocia, the wife of Theodosius (Marcellin. Chron.). The discovery, or asserted discovery of the relics, was quite a different event, and took place in A.D. 415 [Lelantus, No. 31], long before their removal.

Sozomen is admitted to excel Socrates in style. This was the judgment of Photius, which is confirmed by later critics; but these contend for the superiority of Socrates in soundness of judgment. Valesius says, 'In writing history, Sozomen adopted a style neither tame nor turgid, but of a medium character; which style, indeed, is most suitable for a writer on ecclesiastical affairs. And indeed Photius, in his Bibliotheca, prefers the style of Sozomen to that of Socrates; an opinion to which we readily subscribe. But Socrates excels Sozomen in judgment; as much as he falls short of him in elegance of diction; for Socrates, indeed, judges exceedingly well, both of men and of ecclesiastical events and transactions; nor does his history contain any thing except what is of gravity and importance: there is nothing that you can expunge as superfluous. On the other hand there are in Sozomen things of a trifling and querulous character, which though not derogatory (c. 6) on the building of the city of Hemona, and on the Argonauts, who carried the ship Argo on their shoulders for several stadia; also that description of the suburb of Daphne (at Antioch) which is contained in the fifth book (c. 19); also that observation on beauty of person, when speaking of the virgin in whose house Saint Athanasius was for some time concealed (lib. v. c. 6); and lastly, the ninth book contains scarcely any thing else than warlike incidents which have nothing in common with ecclesiastical history.' But it may be observed, that however the last remark of Valesius may be intrinsically just, the very fault of which he complains (and the complaint will apply to other parts of the work as well as the ninth book, and, though in a less degree, to Socrates also) makes the work more valuable, as furnishing materials for an interesting but obscure period of Roman history. As Socrates and Sozomen were contemporaries, it has been a question which of them first published his history. As they commence at the same point, and profess to terminate at the same point (though the work of Sozomen, as we have observed, is incomplete), it is obvious that one borrowed at least his plan from the other; and as they for the most part agree in their statements, it is probable that the later writer made considerable, though unacknowledged use of his predecessor's work. Valesius, on the ground that the inferior writer is likely to be the plagiarist, assigns the priority to Socrates; and he is probably correct. The ancients, in naming the two, generally put Socrates first. Sozomen has given much which Socrates omits; especially he abounds in notices of anchors and saints, of whom he seems to have been a great admirer. Why Sozomen, supposing him to be the later of the two writers, should have undertaken to write a sequel does not mention the finding of the relics, which had just been treated of by another, is not clear. There are no sharp criticisms or other indications of personal feeling; and no marks of important theological difference. Possibly he may have thought Socrates had not sufficiently recorded the virtues of the ascetics, and therefore published his own history with the view of honouring them,
SPARTACUS.

The work of Sozomen is one of those abridged and combined in the Historia Tripartita of Cassiodorus. [CASSIODORUS, EPHEMIUS, No. 11.]

The Greek text of Sozomen appears to have been first published, with that of Socrates and the other Greek ecclesiastical historians, by Rob. Stephanus, fol. Paris, 1544; and was again printed, with the Latin version of John Christoptris, bishop of Chichester, fol. Geneva, 1612. It was also included with the work of Socrates, in the edition of Valæsis, both in its original publication and in its several reprints; and in the edition of Reading [SOCRATES, SCHOLASTICUS]. There are Latin versions by Musceus and Lattuca, the latter of which exists prefixed with their versions of the other ecclesiastical historians [SOCRATES, SCHOLASTICUS]. The version of Christopherson extended only to the first six books of Sozomen; the needful supplement of a version of the last three having been made by Petrus Saffridius. The abridged English version of the Greek ecclesiastical historians by Parker includes Sozomen, as does also the French version of Cousin, but not the English translation of Meredith Hamner [SOCRATES SCHOLASTICUS]. (Valæsis, De Vitæ et Scriptis Socratæ et Sozomini, prefixed to his edition of their works; Vossius, De Historici Graecis, lib. ii. c. 20; Fabric. Biblioth. Laubecius has confounded Hermeis Sozomen with Hermæis, the author of the Iroisio Gentilium Philo sophorum [Hermæis, No. 3]; but there is no doubt that they are different persons. (Fabric. l.c.)

SPARGAPINES (Σπαργαπίνης), son of Tomyris, queen of the Massagætes, was surprised and taken prisoner by Cyrus, when, according to the account of Herodotus, he invaded that territory in b. c. 529. The young prince, overwhelmed by his calamity, put an end to his own life (Herod. i. 211—213; compare Strab. xi. p. 312; Justin, i. 6.)

SPARUS, a friend of the younger Pliny, to whom he addressed two of his letters (Ep. iv. 5, viii. 5), but of whom nothing is known.

SPARUS, FULVIUS, a rhetorician, mentioned by the elder Seneca (Coturarr, v. provid. p. 322, Extr. i. p. 382), and by Quintilian (vi. 3 § 100).

SPARTA (Σπάτα), a daughter of Euratas by Cleo, and wife of Lacedæmon, by whom she became the mother of Amyclas and Eurydice. (Apollod. iii. 10. § 3.) From her the city of Sparta was believed to have derived its name (Paus. iii. 1. § 3; Schol. Eurip. Orest. 615.) She was represented on a tripod at Amyclae. (Paus. iii. 18. § 5.)

SPARTACUS, the name of several kings of the Cimmerian Bosporus.

1. Succeeded the dynasty of the Archæanactids (Wesseling, ad Diod. xil. 31) [ARCHEANACTIDAE] in b. c. 438, and reigned until b. c. 431. He was succeeded by his son Seleucus. (Diod. xil. 31, 36.)

2. Began to reign in b. c. 427 and reigned 20 years. He was succeeded in b. c. 407 by his son Satyrus. (Diod. xiv. 93; Isocrates, Trag. p. 370.)

3. Succeeded his father Lecenon in b. c. 353, and died, leaving his kingdom to his son Parysades, in b. c. 348. (Diod. xvi. 31, 52.)

4. Son of Eumelus, began to reign in b. c. 301, and reigned 20 years. (Diod. xx. 100; see Clinton, Kings of Bosporus, in Fast. Hellen. vol. ii. pp. 261—263.)

W. B. D.

SPARTACUS, by birth a Thracian, was successively a shepherd, a soldier, and a chief of banditti. On one of his predatory expeditions he was taken prisoner, and sold to a trainer of gladiators. In b. c. 73 he was a member of the conspiracy of Cn. Lentulus Batiatus, and was detained in his school at Capua, in readiness for the games at Rome. Among his fellow prisoners, principally Gauls and Thracians, were two Gaulish swordsmen, Crixus and Oenomaus, who joined with Spartacus in urging their comrades rather to die attempting freedom, than to be “butchered for a Roman holiday.” Of 200 gladiators about 70 broke out of the school of Lentulus, plundered a cook’s-shop of its spits and cleavers, and, thus armed, passed through the gates of Capua. On the high road they met some waggons laden with gladiators’ armour, and, seizing it, took refuge in the crater of Vesuvius, where a number of runaway slaves joined them. Spartacus was chosen leader; Crixus and Oenomaus were his lieutenants; and their ravages soon excited the alarm of the Capuan people. They were blockaded by C. Claudius Pulcher (No. 90.), at the head of 3000 men. A wild vine grew on the sides of the old abandoned guished crater, and on ladders twisted from its stems, the fugitives descended the least accessible and therefore unguarded side of their place of refuge, attacked their besiegers in the rear, and supplied themselves with better weapons from the slain. Spartacus now proclaimed freedom to slaves, and the numbers that flocked to him proved the impolicy of the Roman land-owners in preferring slave-labour to free, the desolation of Suia’s wars, and the weakness and depopulation of Italy. The eruption of a handful of half-armed men devastated Italy, from the foot of the Alps to the southernmost corner of the peninsula, and was little less dangerous to the empire than the Hannibalic war itself. Spartacus was triumphant for upwards of two years, b. c. 73—71. In 73 he defeated Cos sinia, a legatus of the praetor Varrius Glaber; next Glaber himself repeatedly, capturing in one action his war-horse, lictors, and faces. From this time forward Spartacus was attended with the accompaniments of a Roman proconsul. He ravaged Campania and sacked Cora, Nuceria, and Nola, and perhaps Compa, in the territory of the Hirpinians. He was absolute master of Lucania and Bruttium, and placed garrisons and magazines in Thuri and Metapontum. Spartacus was as discreet as he was valiant. In the midst of his successes, and with 40,000 men under his command, he saw that in the end Rome would prevail, and he knew that victory, while it swelled, disorganised his bands. His Gaulish followers were jealous of their Thracian comrades, and Crixus and Oenomaus were the chief conspirators against the government. The Social War being therefore, proposed to his army to make their way to the north of Italy, and, forcing the passes of the Alps, to disperse severally to their respective homes.
SPARTACUS.

SAPL ventures, and getting beyond the lines of Crassus. Rome was once more panic-struck, and even Crassus, although eager to finish the war unaided, summoned Cn. Pompey from Spain and L. Licinius Lucullus from Thrace. The jealousy of the slaves themselves terminated the contest. The Gauls sev- ered themselves from Spartacus and chose two of their countrymen for leaders, Granicus and Castus. Apart from their great chief they were powerless. Granicus and Castus, with 30,000 of their followers, were slain in the neighbourhood of Croto, and the disgrace of Rome was in part wiped out by the recovery of its territory. About 5000 now repented of his application to Pompey and Lucullus, and hastened to bring the war to an end. Near Petelia Spartacus was once more victorious, and defeated L. Quintius and Tremellius Serva, the quaestor of Crassus. His followers, instead of hastening to the Alps and escaping to Gaul and Thrace, compelled Spartacus to march southward and engage Crassus. Spartacus offered to negotiate. His terms were contemptuously rejected. He then attempted to seize the shipping in the harbour of Brundisium, but Lucullus had just landed there from Epirus. Near the head of the river Silurus Spartacus encountered the Romans for the last time. A skirmish between the pioneers of Crassus and the slaves, brought on a general engagement. Like Warwick at Barnet, Spartacus sowed his war- horse in front of his army, and prepared for death. Long after victory was hopeless he was traced by heaps of slain; but in the carnage that closed the day, his body was irresistibly lost. About 5000 had been the number of his followers, and these proved a heavy blow to Rome. The character of Spartacus, like that of Hannibal, has been malignèd by the Roman writers. Cicero compares the vilest of his contemporaries to him: Horace (Carm. iii. 14. 19) speaks of him as a common robber: none recognizes his greatness, but the terror of his name survived to a late period of the empire (Sidon. Apollin. Carm. ix. 253; Themiist. Or. i. ). Accident made Spartacus a shepherd, a freebooter, and a gladiator; nature formed him a hero. The excesses of his followers he could not alwavs repress, and his efforts to restrain them often cost him his popularity. But he was in himself not less mild and just than he was able and valiant. He preferred his Thracian cottage and freedom to the throne of Italy. Of all contemporary characters the mind dwells with most complacency on those of Sertorius and Spar- tacus. But the one, nobly born and befittingly trained, sullied his name by the murder of the Spanish hostages at Huesca ; the other, a peasant by birth, a slave by compulsion, saved the lives of his captives. The most terrible guerrilha chiefman recorded in history was unstained by the vices of his conquerors, and, had circumstances favoured him, would have rivelled the fame of Viriathus and Wallace. (Plut. C. cass. 8—12, Pompey, 21, Cat. Min. 8; Liv. Epit. xcvi. xcvi. ; Vell. ii. 30; Flor. iii. 20; Eutrop. vi. 7; Oros. v. 24, 33;

SPARTIUS (Σπαρτίος), from the verb σπαρτιάω, and accordingly signifies "the sown man," it is the name given to the people who spoke the dragonian dialect by Cadmus, and were believed to be the ancestors of the five oldest families at Thebes. (Apollod. iii. 4. § 1; Paus. ix. 5. § 1, 10. § 1; Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. iii. 1179, at Pind. Isthm. i. 41, at Euryp. Phoen. 670, at Soph. Antig. 128; Od. Met. iii. 101, &c.; comp. Cadmus.) [L. S.]

SPARTIANUS, DELIUS, one of the six "Scriptoros Historiae Augustae" (see CAPITOLIUS.) His name is prefixed to biographies of 1. Hadrianus and Aelius Verus; 2. Didius Julianus; 3. Severus; 4. Priscennius Niger; 5. Caracalla; 6. Geta; of which the first four are inscribed to Dio- cletian, the fifth to no one, the sixth to Constantine, and hence the last two are believed by many to be from a different hand. He repeatedly informs us that he had composed the lives of all the emperors down to Hadrian, beginning, as we must infer from his words, with Julius Caesar, and that he intended to continue the work to his own time. The whole of the first portion of his labours has however perished, the collection which bears the title of the Augustan History commencing, as we have pointed out in a former article [CAPITOLINIUS], with Hadriannus, and it seems very doubtful if he ever completed his design, since Vopiscus (Aurelian. init. expressly declares that he was acquainted with no work in the Latin language which contained an account of the career of Aurelian. We have already observed [CAPITOLINIUS] that there is much difficulty in assigning the pieces which form this series to their proper authors. Submasius found in the Palantine MS. the whole from Hadrianus to Alexander Severus attributed to Spartianus, and those from the two Maximini to Balbinus under the name of Capitolineus, and hence was led to form the probable conjecture that Spartianus and Lampadius [LAMPARDIUS] were one and the same person, whose name in full was Aelius Lampadius Spartanus. For the editions, translations, &c. of Spartianus see CAPITOLINIUS. [W. R.]

SPARTON (Σπαρτόν), the name of two mythical personages, the one a son of Phoroneus (Paus. ii. 16. § 3), and the other a son of Tisamenus. (Paus. vii. 6. § 2.) [L. S.]

SPENDIUS (Σπερίειος), one of the chief leaders of the Carthaginian mercenaries in their inscription, after the close of the First Punic War, B. C. 241. He was a Campanian by birth, but had been a slave under the Romans, and having saved his master from the sword of the Carthaginians as a mercenary soldier, where he rose to a distinguished place by his great personal strength and daring. After the close of the war he became apprehensive lest he should be given up to the Romans, and hence exerted himself to the utmost in fomenting the discontents of his brother mercenaries, and preventing them from coming to any agreement with their Carthaginian masters. For this reason, when the troops at length broke out into open mutiny, he was chosen, together with an African of the name of Matho, to be their leader. The proceedings of the two joint commanders during the war which followed, have been already related under Matho. Spendidus was at length taken prisoner by Hannibal Barca [HANNIBAL, No. 8, p. 329], and crucified by his orders before the walls of Tunis: his body afterwards fell into the possession of Matho, who caused the Carthaginian general Hannibal to be suspended in its place until the same cross. (Polyb. i. 69, &c. 85, 86; Diod. xxv. Exc. Vales. p. 567, Exc. Vat. p. 55.) [E. H. B.]

SPENDON (Σπερντόν), of Sparta, one of those early musicians whose paean were sung by the Spartan youths at the Gymnopaediae, with those of Thaletas and Alcman. (Phlt. Lyc. 28.) [P. S.]

SPERATUS, JULIUS. We possess an elegy, extending to thirteen couplets, in praise of the nightingale, which was first published by Pitton, and afterwards with greater care by Goldastes (Opuscula Erof. et Amat. p. 74), who made use of four MSS. Of these, three gave no indication regarding the author, but the fourth, which belonged to the monastery of St. Gill, bore the title Versus Iulii Sperati de Philologo. We know nothing whatsoever of this personage, nor of the age to which he belongs, except that the piece in question was imitated by Paulus Alvarus of Corduba, a monk of the ninth century. The lines will be found in Weismersd, Poët. Lat. Minor, vol. vii. part ii. p. 403; comp. vol. vii. part i. p. 255, and in Burmann, Anthol. Lat. v. 149, or No. 392, ed. Meyer. [W. R.]

SPERECHIUS (Σπέρεχιος), a Thessalian river-god, became the father of Menestheus by Polydomy, the daughter of Peleus. (Hom. II. xvi. 174, xxiii. 142; Apollod. iii. 14. § 4; Paus. iii. 37. § 2; Herod. vii. 198.) [L. S.]

SPERTHIAS. [Βύλις.]

SPES, the personification of hope, was worshipped at Rome, where she had several temples, the most ancient of which had been built in B. C. 354, by the consul Atlius Calatinus, near the Porta Carmentalis (Liv. iv. 51, xxi. 62, xxi. 47, xxv. 7, xl. 15; Tac. Ann. ii. 49). The Greeks also worshipped the personification of hope, Elpis, and they relate the beautiful allegory, that when Epimenides opened the vessel brought to him by Pandora, from which all manner of evils were scattered over the earth, Hope (Elpis) alone remained behind (Hes. Op. et D. 96; Theognis, 1135). Hope was represented in works of art as a youthful figure, lightly walking in full attire, holding in her right hand a flower, and with the left lifting up her garment. (Hirt. Mythol. Bilderb. p. 100; Müller, Anc. Art and its Rem. § 406.) [L. S.]

SPESUSIUS (Πούσ Σπεσιύς), the distinguished disciple of Plato, was a native of Athens, and the son of Barynnodon and Potone, a sister of Plato (Diog. Laërt. iv. 1; Suid. s. v.). We hear nothing of his personal history till the time when he accompanied his uncle Plato on his third journey to Syracuse, where he displayed considerable ability and prudence, especially in his amicable relations with Dion (Plut. Dion. c. 22. 17). His moral worth is recognised even by the syllogist Timon, though only that he may henp the more unsparing ridicule on his intellectual endowments (Plut. Dion. 17). And indeed he is not comparable either to Plato or to Aristotle, though the latter appears among all his Academicians antagonists, to have deemed Speusippus worthy of the honour of being refuted, and is even said to have purchased his books for three talents (Diog. Laërt. iv. 5; A. Gallius, Nect. Att. iii. 17). The report about his sudden fits of anger, his avarice, and his propensity to voluptuousness, are probably derived from a very impure source: Athenaeus (vii. p. 279, e, xii. p. 546, d) and Diogenes Laërtius (iv. 1, 2; comp. Suid. s. v.; Tertullian, Apolog. c. 46) can adduce as authority for them scarcely any thing more than some abuse in certain letters of the younger Dionysius, who was banished by Dion, not without the co-operation of Speusippus. Having been selected by Plato as his successor in the office of president of the Academy, he was at the head of the school for only eight years (a. c. 347—339). He died, as it appears, of a lingering paralytic illness (Diog. Laërt. iv. 1, 3, 4). Another account, at variance with this, as seems most upon his being banished (L. Huxley, Theo. iii. 1). From the list of his numerous dialogues and commentaries Diogenes Laërtius gives as an extract, which contains only titles, which do not always admit of any conclusion as to their contents, and the scanty notices in other writers furnish us with little that can supply the void or throw any light upon them. Speusippus seems to have continued Plato's polemical attacks upon the hedonistic theory of Aristippus ('AiropittuXov av', Peri 'Aithoun av', Peri πληθυντον av'), to have developed somewhat further the ideas of justice and of the citizen, and the fundamental principles of legislation (Peri δικαιοσύνης av', Peri Politis av, Peri γνωσεως). He appears also to have discussed the idea of the philosopher, and philosophy, and to have treated of preceding philosophers ('πκίλεις α', Peri φιλοσοφίας α', Peri φιλοσόφων, according to Menage's conjecture; at any rate a book of that kind is quoted by Diogenes, in his life of Parmenides, x. 29). But he seems to have been especially directed to the bringing together of those things that were similar as regards their philosophic treatment (Diog. Laërt. l. c. 5, διδαχα των περὶ την πραγματειαν διμων α'—1, Διαρεισεις και π呃 τα δυο υποθεσεις; comp. Athenæus, vii. passim), and to the derivation therefrom, and laying down, of the ideas of genera and species (Peri γενων και ειδων παραδειγματων [?];) for in the sciences had he directed his attention especially to what they had in common, and to the mode in which they might be connected (Diodoros, ap. Diog. Laërt., l. c. 2; Casaubon is hardly correct in restricting the word μαθηματα to the mathematical sciences). Thus he seems to have endeavoured to carry out still further the threefold division of philosophy into Dialetics, Ethics, and Physics, for which Plato had laid the foundation, without, however, losing sight of the mutual connection of those branches of philosophy. For he maintained, no less, that a Platonic number can arrive at no complete definition, who did not know all the differences by which that was to be defined was separated from the rest (Themist. in Arist. Anal. Post. vid. Schol. in Aristot. ed. Brandis, p. 248, a.). With Plato, moreover, he distinguished between that which is the object of thought, and that which is the object of sensuous perception, between the cognition of the reason and sensuous perception. He endeavoured, however, to show how the latter can be taken up and transformed into knowledge, by the assumption of a perception, which, by participation in rational truth (την κειμη των λογων ανθρωπους), raises itself to the rank of knowledge. By this he seems to have understood an immediate, in the first instance aesthetic, mode of conception; since he appealed, in support of his view, to the consideration that artistic skill has its foundation not in sensible activity, but in an unerring power of distinguishing between its objects, that is, in a rational perception of them (Sext. Emp. Adv. Math. vii. 145, &c.). The idea of essence also he endeavoured to seize more distinctly by separating its kind, the difference between which he considered would result from the difference between the principia on which they are based. Thus he distinguished essences of numbers, of size, of soul, while Plato had referred them, as separate definitions, to the ideal numbers (Arist. Met. vi. 2, 11, xii. 10, de Anima. i 2; Iamblich. op. Stob. Eel. l. 802). Nevertheless Speusippus also must have endeavoured to distinguish different kinds of essences, inseparable, when in the first place he set out from absolute unity, and regarded it as a formal principium which they had in common (Arist. Met. vi. 2, p. 1028, xiv. 3, xiii. 9; comp. Ravaiss. Speusippi de Primos Rerum Principiis Placita, Paris, 1839), and in the next place he appears to have presupposed multitude and multiformity as a common primary element in their composition. But it is only the difficulties which led him to make this and similar deviations from the Platonic doctrine, of which we can get any clear idea, not the mode in which he thought he had obviated those difficulties by distinguishing different kinds of principia. The criticism of Aristotle, directed apparently against Speusippus, shows how little satisfied he was with the modification of the original Platonic doctrine. With this deviation from Plato's doctrine is connected another which takes a wider range. As the ultimate principium, Speusippus would not, with Plato, recognize the CéUel, but, with others, the ideas were also Platonics, going back to the older Theologians, maintained that the primordium or principia of the universe were to be set down, indeed, as causes of the good and perfect, but were not the good and perfect itself, which must rather be regarded as the result of generated existence, or development, just as the seeds of plants and animals are not the fully formed plants or animals themselves (Arist. Met. xiv. 4, 5, xiii. 7, xii. 10, Eth. Nic. i 4; Cic. de Nat. Doer. i. 13; Stob. Eel. i. p. 862; Theophrast. Met. 9). The ultimate primordium he designated, like Plato, as the absolutely one, but would not have it to be regarded as an existing entity, since all definitude can only be the result of development (ib. xii. 7, ix. 6, xiv. 5; comp. Ravaiss. l. c. p. 11, &c.). When, however, with the Pythagoreans, he reckoned the One in the series of good things (Arist. Eth. Nic. i 4), he radically conceived it, and, with others, as being the foundation, and wished to indicate that it was from the One and not from the Manifold, that the good and perfect is to be derived (comp. Arist. Met. xiv. 4, xii. 10; Ravaiss. l. c. p. 15, &c.). Nevertheless Speusippus seems to have attributed vital activity to the primordial unity, as inseparably belonging to it (Cic. de Nat. Doer. i. 13; comp.
SPHINX.

from Troezen to Attica, where two demi were named after him. (Paus. ii. 30. § 8; Steph. Byz. s. v.)

Sphinx (2σφινξ), a monstrous being of Greek mythology, is said to have been a daughter of Orthus and Chimaera, born in the country of the Armini (Hes. Theog. 320), or of Typhon and Echidna (Apollod. iii. 5. § 8; Schol. ad Eurip. Phoen. 46), or lastly of Typhon and Chimaera (Schol. ad Hes. and Eurip. L. C.). Some call her a natural daughter of Laius (Paus. ix. 26. § 2). Respecting her stay at Thebes and her connection with the fate of the house of Laius, see Oedipus. The riddle which she there proposed, she is said to have learnt from the Muses (Apollod. iii. 5. § 8), or Laius himself taught her the mysterious oracles which Cadmus had received at Delphi (Paus. ix. 26. § 2). According to some she had been sent into Boeotia by Hera, who was angry with the Thebans for not having punished Laius, who had carried off Chrysippus from Pisa. She is said to have come from the most distant part of Ethiopia (Apollod. l. c.; Schol. ad Eurip. Phoen. 1709); according to others she was sent by Ares, who wanted to take revenge because Cadmus had slain his son, the dragon (Arg. ad Eurip. Phoen.), or by Dionysus (Schol. ad Hes. Theog. 320), or by Hades (Eurip. Phoen. 810), and some lastly say that she was one of the women who, together with the daughters of Cadmus, were thrown into madness, and were metamorphosed into the monstrous figure. (Schol. ad Eurip. Phoen. 45.)

The legend itself clearly indicates from what quarter this being was believed to have been introduced into Greek mythology. The figure which she was conceived to have had is originally Egyptian or Ethiopian; but after her incorporation with Grecian story, her figure was variously modified. The Egyptian Sphinx is the figure of an unwinged lion in a lying attitude, but the upper part of the body is human. They appear in Egypt to have been set up in avenues forming the approaches to temples. The greatest among the Egyptian representations of Sphinxes is that of Ghizeh, which, with the exception of the paws, is one block of stone. The Egyptian Sphinxes are often called artists, as ornaments of architectural and other works. (Paus. iii. 13. § 8, v. 11. § 2 ; Eurip. Elect. 471.)

SPHODRISAS (Σφόδριας), a Spartan, whom Cleombrotus, on his return from the invasion of the Theban territory, in B.C. 576, left behind him as harmost at Thebes, placing the third part of the allies (their regular contingent) under his command, and entrusting him with all the money he had brought from home, with which he desired to purchase the allies. Not long after this, and at a time when his country was at peace with Athens, Sphodrias was induced to take the foolish and unjustifiable step of invading the Athenian territory. According to Diodorus, he was instigated to it by private orders from Cleombrotus, acting without the authority of the Ephors; while from Xenophon and Plutarch we gather that he was tempted with by Pelopidas and Gorgidas, who wished to embroil Athens with Sparta, and whose mingled bribes and flattery Sphodrias, venal at once and vain and weak, was unable to resist. He accordingly led forth his troops from Thebes, with the professed intention of surprising the Pelasgi. When the day broke, however, he had advanced no further than the Tirsonian plain, where, according to one statement preserved by Plutarch, his soldiers were terrified by a light, which appeared to flash from the walls and temples at Eleusis. Sphodrias therefore was obliged, after the enterprise; but instead of retracting quietly, he wantonly added to the exasperation of the Athenians, by driving off cattle and plundering houses. The Ephors brought him to trial for his life, and his guilt was so clear, not to speak of the policy of conciliating Athens by his condemnation, that he did not dare to return home and meet the charge in person. He was therefore tried in his absence, and, contrary to all expectation, was acquitted through the influence of Agesilus, who had weakly yielded to the entreaties of his son Archilas, an intimate friend of Cimon, the son of Sphodrias. At Leuctra Sphodrias was one of the immediate escort of king Cleombrotus, and perished in the battle, B.C. 371. (Xen. Hell. v. 4. §§ 15, 20, &c., vi. 4. § 14 ; Plut. Ages. 24, 25, Pediop. 14 ; Dion. xiv. 29.)

SPHRAGITIDES (Σφραγίτιδες), a surname of a class of prophetic nymphs on mount Citharon in Boeotia, where they had a grotto called σφραγισθενής. (Paus. Aristid. 9 ; Paus. ix. 3. in fin. ; Plut. Sympos. i. 10.)

SPINTHARUS (Σπινθαρός), of Heraclea on the Pontus, a tragic poet, contemporary with Aristophanes, who designates him as a barbarian and a Phrygian (Aet. 765, comp. Schol.). He was also ridiculed by the other comic poets. We know nothing of his plays, except two titles, preserved by Suidas (s. v.), περικακομένος ἡρακλῆς, and Ξεμήλα κεραυνωμένη. He appears to be the same person as the Spintharus who, according to Diogenes Laërtius (v. 92, 93 ; comp. Suid. s. v. παραπτολίξις), attempted to pass off a spurious tragedy, entitled Παρθενώναιος, as a work of Sophocles; and so far succeeded as to impose upon Heraclides, who quoted the play as a genuine drama of Sophocles; but the Alexandrian grammarians never give it a place among the works of Sophocles. The forgery was also ascribed to a certain Sophocles Metathemates. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. ii. pp. 211, 213, 323 ; Welcker, die Griech. Tragöd. p. 1034 ; Bode, Gesch. d. Hellen. Dichkunst, vol. iii. pt. 1, pp. 48, 562.) Respecting some other insignificant writers of this name, see Menag. ad Dion. Laërt. ii. 20. (P. S.)

SPINTHARUS (Σπινθαρός), a Corinthian architect, who commenced the rebuilding of the great temple at Delphi, after its destruction by fire in B.C. 561, B.C. 540. (Paus. x. 5. § 5.) The temple was not, however, finished till B.C. 480 ; so that the architect could scarce have lived to see the completion of the work. (P. S.)

SPINTHERUS, an agnomen of P. Cornelius Lentulus, consul B.C. 57, and of his son. [LEN- TULUS, Nos. 20 and 21.]

SPITHRIDATES (Σπίθριδατες). 1. A Persian, was one of the commanders sent by Pharnabazus to oppose the passage of the Cyrenian Greeks through Bithynia, B.C. 400. [RHATINES.] In B.C. 396 Spithridates, offended with Pharnabazus, who wished to take his daughter as a concubine, was induced by Lyonsander to revolt from the satrap, bringing with him his children, his treasures, and 200 horse. His defection was most acceptable to Aegiasus, who gained information from him about the affairs of Pharnabazus. (Xen. Anab. vi. 5. § 7, Hell. iii. 4. § 10, Ages. 3. § 3 ; Plut. Ages. 3, Lyg. 24.)

2. Satrap of Lydia and Ionia under Dareius Codomannus, was one of the Persian commanders at the battle of the Granicus, in B.C. 334, in which engagement, while he was aiming a blow from behind at Alexander, his arm was cut off by Cleitus, son of Dropides (Arr. Anab. i. 12, 15, 16). Diodorus calls him Spithridates, and appears to confound him with Mithridates [MITHRIDATES, No. 5.], the son-in-law of Dareius, whom Alexander slew in the battle with his own hand; while what Arrian records of Spithridates is related by Diodorus of his brother Rhoesaces. (Diod. xvii. 19, 20 ; Wess. ad loc. ; Plut. Alex. 16, de Alex. Fort. i. 2.)

SPITYNCHAS is mentioned by Sillig (Cat. Artif. s. v.), as the engraver of a precious stone described by Gori (Gemm. Etrusc. ii. pl. 9, No. 1) ; but we find no other notice of him, nor any other instance in which the name occurs. We have not the opportunity of referring to the work of Gori. [P. S.]

SPO'DIUS (Σπόδιος), a surname of Apollo at Thebes, derived from σπόδες, ashes, because his altar consisted of the ashes of the victims which had been sacrificed to him. (Paus. ix. 11. § 5.)

SPO'ONGIA, one of the judges who acquitted Clistus for his violation of the mysteries of the Bona Dea, B.C. 61, is probably a fictitious name given to him by Cicero in ridicule. (Cit. ad Att. i. 16. § 6.)

SPONSIA'NUS. A few gold coins, of half barbarous workmanship and of much larger size than those usually issued from the Roman imperial mint, are to be found, chiefly in the museums of Austria, which exhibit on the obverse a male beardless head surrounded with rays, and the characters IMP. SPONSIANUS, while on the reverse is stamped a device corresponding minutely with the consular barrel of C. Minucius Augurinus, and the letters c. a.vg. The name of Sponsianus is totally unknown to ancient, and no plausible conjecture has yet been proposed in regard to the origin of these pieces. (Eckhel, Doctrin. Num. vol. vi. p. 840.)

SPURINNA.

SPORUS was a beautiful youth of servile origin, who bore a striking resemblance to Poppea Sabina, the wife of Nero. On the death of Sabina in A.D. 63, Nero became passionately fond of this youth, had him castrated, dressed as a woman, and called by the name of Sabina. He carried this disgusting folly so far as to marry Sporus publicly in Greece, in A.D. 67, with all the forms and ceremonies of a legal marriage. Sporus returned with Nero to Rome in the following year, fled with him from the city when the insurrection broke out against the tyrant, and was present with him at his death. Otho, who had been one of the companions of Nero in his debaucheries, lived on intimate terms with Sporus after his accession to the throne, but Vitellius having commanded Sporus to appear as a girl upon the stage in the most degrading circumstances, he put an end to his life to escape from the indignity (Dion Cass. lxxvi. 28, lxxiii. 12, 13, 27, liv. 8, lxv. 10; Suet. Ner. 28, 46, 48, 49; Aurel. Vict. Caes. 5, Epit. 5; Dion Chrysost. Orat. xxi; Siduas, s. v. Σπορᾶς). The name of Sporus is familiar to modern readers by Pope's infamous satire upon Lord Hervey.

SPURLIA GENS, only known from coins, for the Spurlius, whose name occurs as a tribune in some editions of Livy (iv. 42), is in all the more recent editions Sps. Iclius. The annexed coin has on the obverse the head of Pallas, and on the reverse the Moon driving a biga, with the legend A. SVRL and ROMA (Eckhel, vol. v. p. 315.)

COIN OF THE SPURLIA GENS.

SPURINNA, VESTRITIUS, the haruspex who warned Caesar to beware of the Ides of March. It is related that, as Caesar was going to the senate-house on the fatal day, he said to Spurinna in jest, “Well, the Ides of March are come,” upon which the soothsayer replied, “Yes, they are come, but they are not past.” (Val. Max. viii. 11. § 2; Suet. Caes. 63; Plut. Caes. 63; comp. Cic. de Diet. i. 52, ad Fam. ix. 24.)

SPURINNA, VESTRITIUS, a Roman general, who played a distinguished part in the war of succession which followed the death of Nero. Having espoused the cause of Otho, he received, along with Annius Gallus, the command of the forces upon the Po, destined to oppose the invasion of the Vitellians from the North. Upon the approach of Cæcina he threw himself into Placentia, which he defended with so much gallantry and resolution, that the besiegers were compelled, after a desperate assault, to retire (Tacit. Hist. ii. 11, 18, &c., 36). Even after the hopes of his party had been crushed by the battle of Bedriacum, Spurinna remained steadfast in his loyalty, but we hear little more of him until he re-appears upon the stage in the reign of Trajan, under whom he achieved great fame by a bloodless victory over the savage tribe of the Bructeri, whom he reduced to submission, and was rewarded by the senate, on the motion of the prince himself, with a triumphal effigy in bronze (Plin. Ep. ii. 7). His wife was named Cottia, and by her he had a son Cottius, a youth of the highest promise, who died at an early age, and a statue to his memory was decreed at the public expense, partly on account of his own merits, and partly as a tribute to his father, who was at that time absent in Germany (Plin. Ep. i. c. iii. 8, comp. v. 17). From the younger Pliny, who lived upon terms of the closest friendship with Spurinna, and ever speaks of him with the warmest respect, we learn that he was alive at the age of 77, in the full enjoyment of his faculties, mental and bodily, and a very interesting letter (Plin. Ep. iii. 1, al. 2) is devoted to an account of the happy manner in which the old man was wont to pass his time. Among other occupations we are told, “Scribit . . . et quidem utraque lingua, lyrica doctissime. Mirabilis dulcedo, mira susvisitas, mira hilaritas, cujus gratiam cumulat sanctitas scribentis.”

In the year 1613, Caspar Barthius published at the end of his “Venatici et Bucolicci poëtae Latini” four odes, or rather fragments of odes, in Chorographic measure, extending to nearly 70 lines, which he had found in the leaves of a MS. lying neglected among the rubbish of a library at Marburg. This Codex contained several other pieces copied at different periods, and these he describes. The odes in question were not divided into lines, but were written continuously like prose, the title prefixed being Incipit Veropilicus Spurinna de contentu seaeucl ad Mortuam. Barthius republished them in his Adversaria (xiv. 5), and then for the first time declared his belief that they were the work of the Vestritius Spurinna, so well known to the readers of the younger Pliny. The opinions entertained by scholars touching these productions are very various. Some have pronounced them to be forgeries by Barthius, suggested by the epistle from which we have quoted above, and they urge strongly that the words of Pliny do not prove that Spurinna ever published any thing, while the absolute silence of the grammarians, who could scarcely have failed to notice the works of a lyric bard, the number of whom is so small, affords a strong presumption that nothing of the kind was in existence. This hypothesis, however, is by no means probable, for not only does the finder describe most minutely, and in such a manner as to court inquiry, the place where and the circumstances under which he became possessed of these remains as well as the contents of the volume in which they were included, but the verses themselves are so mutilated and confused that no one could expect to derive any credit or any gratification, directly or indirectly, from such a piece of dishonesty. Moreover, Barthius does not appear to have attached any importance to his discovery; he speaks very dubiously of the merit of the lines, he does not attempt to correct the errors nor to supply the blanks, and professes himself unable to determine the age to which they belong, but infers from the title De Contentu seaeucl ad Mortuam that they proceeded from a Christian pen. Nor was it until they were published for the second time that he assigned them to an historical personage.

Others have supposed that they were the production of some monk of the middle ages, who desired to place in the mouth of a heathen these exalted sentiments with regard to a contemplative life which were entertained by the ecclesiastics of that epoch; but the style of the Latinity, and the number of Grecians involved, forbid us to adopt this theory. A third party imagine that they may have been fabricated at an early period, and may have embodied scraps or fragments which were actually in circulation as the words of Spurinna, and this is the view to which Barthius himself inclines.

It is almost impossible in a matter of this sort to form a very decided opinion. Every one who reads will discern that, in their present state, these lines in no way merit the eulogium pronounced by Pliny upon the poetical talents of his friend. Perhaps the most suspicious circumstance is that, notwithstanding the shortness, obscurity, and mutilated condition of the fragments, we are, in studying them, constantly reminded of the observations of Pliny, just as if they had been composed for the purpose of tallying with them. The very fact of the imperfect state in which they appear in the MS. is a proof that at the time when they were copied they must have been ascribed to some author of importance, for had not a fictitious value been attached to them from some such consideration, they would never have been thought worthy of being preserved.

These odes will be found in Wernsdorf, Poet. Lat. Min. vol. iii. pp. 351, &c., and a dissertation on the author, pp. 326, &c. See also Bayerus. "De Vestriio Spurinna lyrico et ejus Fragmentis," in the transactions of the Petersburgh Academy for 1730, &c. [R.]

STAPHELYS, Q. PETILLIUS, was praetor urbanus in B.C. 181, and was commissioned to levy troops on account of the war with the Ligurians. In his praetorship the books of king Numa Pomphilus are said to have been discovered upon the estate of one L. Petillius, though some writers give a different name for the latter person. Spurinus obtained possession of the books, and upon his representation to the senate that they ought not to be read and preserved, the senate ordered them to be burnt (Livy. x. 18, 26, 29; Val. Max. i. 1. § 12; Plin. H. N. xiii. 14. s. 27; Plut. Num. 22; August. de Civ. Dei, v. 34; Lactant. i. 22; comp. Num. Vol. ii. p. 1213). Spurinus was consul in B.C. 176 with Cn. Cornelius Scipio Hispalus, and fell in battle against the Ligurians. (Livy. xii. 14–18; Val. Max. i. 5. § 9, ii. 7. § 15; Obsequ. 64; Fasti Capitol.)

SPURIIUS, is properly a Roman praenomen, but occurs as the gentile name of one or two persons of no importance. Thus, for instance, we read of a M. Spurin, who was one of the conspirators against Julius Caesar. (Appian, B. C. ii. 113.)

SQUILLA GALLANUS. [GALGANUS.]

SQUILLUS, L. LICI/NIUS, one of the conspirators against Q. Cassius Longinus in Spain, B.C. 48. [LONGINUS, No. 15.]

L. STABE/RIUS, the governor of Apollonia for the Pompeians in B.C. 48, was obliged to desert the town on the approach of Caesar, in consequence of the inhabitants declaring in favour of the latter (Caes. B. C. ii. 12; Appian, B. C. ii. 34).

STADIEUS (Σταδιέως), artists. 1. An Athenian statuary, the instructor of Polycles. (Paus. vi. 4. § 3. s. 5.) The determination of his time depends, of course, on that of Polycles: Stadieus probably flourished about OL 95, B.C. 400. [POLYCLYES.]

2. A painter, the disciple of Nicosthenes, mentioned by Pliny among the artists who were non ignobles quidem, sed in transcursu tamen discendii. (Plin. H. N. xxxv. 11. s. 40, § 42.) [P. S.]

C. STAlE/NIUS, called in many editions of Cicero C. STALE'NIUS, one of the judges at the trial of Oppianicus in B.C. 74. It was believed that he had at first received money from the accused to acquit him, but afterwards voted for his condemnation, because he had received a still larger sum from the accuser Cluentius. (Cic. Vet. ii. 32, with the note of Zumpt.) Cicero, in his History of Cluentius, gives C. Staleinus in B.C. 66, in which he is anxious to remove from the minds of the judges the bad impressions that existed against his client, dwells at length upon the fact that Oppianicus had bribed Staienus, and also represents the latter as the agent employed by Oppianicus to bribe the other judges. According to Cicero, Staienus was a low-born contemptible rascal, who called himself Aelius Paetus, as if he had been adopted by some member of the Aelia gens, and who had assumed the cognomen Paetus, in preference to that of Ligur, another cognomen of the Aelii, because the latter would have reminded the people that he had sprung from Liguria. His oratory was characterized by vehemence and fury, but was sufficiently popular to have raised him to the honours of the state, had he not been condemned of majestas, in consequence of exciting a mutiny among the troops during his quaeestorship. (Cic. pro Cluent. 24, 26, 36, Brut. 68, Tusc. 20.)

STAU S MINA'CIIUS, a general of the Samnites, B.C. 296, was taken prisoner and carried to Rome. (Livy. x. 20.)

STALLIUS, C. and M., brothers, were Roman architects, who were employed, in conjunction with another architect named Menalippus, to rebuild the Odeum of Pericles at Athens, after it was burnt down by Aristion, in the Mithridatic War, B.C. 173. 3, B.C. 86. (Appian, Mithridat. 38.)

The new edifice was erected at the cost of ArioBazares 11. Philopator, king of Cappodocia, between B.C. 65 and B.C. 52. (Vitr. v. 9. § 1.) The names of the artists are preserved by an Attic inscription on the base of a statue which they erected in honour of their patron, ArioBazares. (Böckh, C. I. No. 357, vol. i. p. 429; R. Rochette, Lettres à M. Scholl, p. 407, 2d ed.) [P. S.]

STAPHYLUS (Σταφύλος), a son of Dionysus and Ariane (fict. ad Apollon. Iod. iii. 997), or of Theseus and Ariadne (Plut. These. 20), was one of the Argonauts (App. i. 9. § 16). By Chrysoteimis he became the father of three daughters, Molpadia, Rhoeo, and Parthenos. Rhoeo was beloved by Apollo, and Staphylus, believing that she was with child by some one else, locked her up in a chest and threw her into the sea. The chest was washed on the coast of Delos, where she gave birth to Anius. She placed the child on the altar of Apollo, praying that the god, if he were the father, should save the child. Apollo accordingly concealed the boy, and taught him the art of prophecy. The sisters of Rhoeo were to guard the wine of Staphylus, but while they had fallen asleep the swine spilled and spoiled the wine. The sisters, on discovering the mischief, took to flight and threw themselves down from a rock. But STASANOR.

Apollo, who saved them, transferred Parthenos to Bubastis in the Chersonesus, where a sanctuary was dedicated to her, and Melpodemia, under the name of Hemiteia, to Castabos in the Chersonesus. There a temple was erected to her also, which no one was allowed to enter who had touched a swine, and where libations were offered to her, consisting of honey and water. Hemiteia was worshipped especially as a divinity affording relief to women in child-bed (Diod. v. 52, 63). According to others Hemiteia became by Lyrcus the mother of Basi-leus. (Parthen. Erot. 1.)

STAPHYLUS (Στάφυλος), of Naxos, in Egypt, a Greek writer quoted by Strabo (x. p. 479), Pliny (H.N. v. 31), and Athenaeus (ii. p. 45, ε.). (Ced. 9, ταύτης Σταφυλίδος ο Ἀθηναίος, κατὰ Πλίνιον τὸ μὲν καὶ Αθηναίου). (Arrh. υ. 1064)., on Aeolia and Attica (Harpocr. s. v. είρεθρον, ποιεῖται, and on Arcadia (Sext. Empir. adv. Math. 116).

STASANDER (Στάσανδρος), a native of Cyprus, who was an officer in the service of Alexander the Great, and must have attained considerable distinction, though his name is not mentioned during the lifetime of that monarch; as only two years after his death, in the second division of the provinces at Triparadeisus (c. 321), Stasander obtained the important satrapy of Aria and Drangiana, in which he succeeded Stasander (Arr. ap. Phot. p. 71, b.; Diod. xviii. 39). In the contest between Eumenes and Antigonus, he aided with the former, whom he joined with all the forces he could muster, and we find him particularly men-tioned as an officer under Gabiene. Hence, after the final triumph of Antigonus, he was deprived by the conqueror of his satrapy, which was given to Eutus. (Diod. xix. 14, 27, 48.)

STASANOR (Στασάνωρ), a native of Soli in Cyprus, who held a distinguished position among the officers of Alexander the Great (Strab. xiv. p. 683). He probably entered the service of that monarch after the conquest of Cyprus in c. 333, but the first occasion on which his name is men- tioned is during the campaign in Bactria, when he was detached by Alexander with a strong force to reduce Arsanes, the revolted satrap of Aria. This service, in conjunction with Phrataphernes, he successfully accomplished, and rejoined Alexander at Zariaspa in the autumn of c. 326, bringing with him Arsanes himself as a captive, as well as Barzanes, who had been appointed by Bessus the satrap of Parthia (Arrh. Anth. iii. 29, iv. 7). As a reward for this exploit he obtained the satrapy of Aria, which was, however, soon after changed for that of Drangiana, in the command of which he remained during the whole of Alexander’s cam-paign in India. On the king’s return, Stasander was one of those who met him in Carmania with a very opportune supply of camels and other beasts of burthen, but returned to resume the charge of his province when Alexander continued his march towards Persia (Arrh. ι. iv. 18, vi. 27, 29; Curt. viii. 3. § 17). In the first partition of the provinces after the death of Alexander, Stasander re-tained his former satrapy of Drangiana, but in the subsequent division at Triparadeisus (c. 321), he exchanged it for the more important government of Bactria and Songdiana (Diod. xviii. 3, 39; Dexipp. ap. Phot. p. 64, b.; Arrian, ibid. p. 71, b.; Justin, xiii. 4). Here he appears to have remained in quiet for some years, taking no open part, so far as we are informed in the contest between Eumenes and Antigonus, though apparently inclined in favour of the former: but he secured the at- tachment of the native population by the justice and moderation of his rule, and thus established his power so firmly that Antigonus found it prudent to pardon his favourite disposition towards his rival, and left him in the undisturbed pos-session of his satrapy, n. c. 316. (Diod. xix. 48.) From this time his name does not appear again in history.

STASICRATES (Στασικράτης), one of the various architects, or one of the various forms of the name of the architect, to whom different writers ascribe the design of the city of Alexandria. (See Deiocrates.)

STASINUS (Στασίνος), of Cyprus, an epic poet, to whom some of the ancient writers attri-buted that one of the poems of the Epic Cycle which was entitled Κύπρης οι τὰ έπτ᾽ οὶ Κύπρης. The statements on the subject are, however, so va-rious, and partake so much of conjecture, that no certain conclusion can be drawn from them. In the earliest historical period of Greek literature, and before critical inquiries began, the Cypria was accepted without question as a work of Homer. Pindar refers to it as Homer’s (Fr. 119, ap. Ae-lian. V. H. ix. 15; but there is some doubt as to the genuineness of the quotation); and the respect in which it was held by the early trage-dians is evident from the number of their dramas which were founded upon it. Herodotus (ii. 117) declares that his grandfather had a copy which he trans-ferred it to Homer; but in a manner which plainly shows that that opinion was still the prevailing one. Plato, on the other hand, quotes as from Homer two verses which, the Scholiast asserts, are from the Cypria (Euthyphri, p. 12, a.). Aristotle (Poet. xxiii. 6) distinguishes the author of the Cypria from Homer, but without mentioning the name of the former; and Pausanius refers to the poem in the same manner (iii. 16. § 1; iv. 2 § 7; x. 26. § 1; x. 31. § 2). It is not till we come down to the times of Athenaeus and the grammarians, that we find any mention of Stasinus; and even then the poem is ascribed to him in a very hesitating and indefinite manner. Thus Athenaeus in one passage (ii. p. 35, c.), speaks of the poet of the Cypria, whoever he may be,” in another (vii. p. 534), he mentions the author in the following indefinite way, ὁ τὰ Κύπρης νομοθέτης έπτ᾽, εἴτε Κύπρης τίς εἰσιν ἢ Στασίνος ἢ διότις δέητο ιγκρίαν νομαζόμενος; and in a third (xx. p. 682, e.), he quotes the author of the poem as either Hegesias or Stasinus, and adds that Demodamus of Halicarnassus made the author of the Cypria a native of Halicarnassus. Lastly, Proclus, who is our chief authority for the history of the epic cycle, not only tells us that the poem was ascribed to Stasinus or Hegesias or Homer, but what he and others tell us of Stasinus only adds new doubts to those which already beset the subject, and new proofs of the uncertainties of the ancient testimonies respecting it. (Procl. Chrest. in Gaisford’s Hephaestion et Proclus, pp. 471, foll.; quoted also by Photius, Bibli. Cod. cxxix. pp. 319, a. foll.). Stasinus was said to be the son-in-law of Homer, who, according to one story, composed the Cypria and gave it to Stasinus as his daughter's marriage portion; manifestly an attempt to reconcile the two different accounts, which ascribed it to Homer and Stasinus (Proc. L.c.; Aelian. V. H. ix. 15). We are also told that the poem was named from its author's native place; but critical analogies suggest the doubt whether the country of the alleged author was not invented to account for the title. Other passages, which might be quoted from the grammarians and scholiasts, leave the question much in the same state. Even the number of books of which the poem consisted is doubtful; for the only authority for the common statement, that it contained eleven books, is a quotation of Athenaeus from the eleventh book (xv. p. 422, c.).

From these statements it may be judged whether there is sufficient foundation for the opinion of Müller and other writers, that the poem may be safely assigned to Stasinus, whose date they fix as about contemporary with Arctinus of Miletus. Considering the immense range of mythological stories which we know the poem to have embraced, there is much probability in the opinion of Bernhardy, that it was a work of many times and many hands. Its title may be explained by the conspicuous part which Aphrodite has in the general action; a circumstance which certainly favours the idea that the author of the general plan of the poem was a Cyprian.

The Cypria was the first, in the order of the events contained in it, of the poems of the Epic Cycle relating to the Trojan War. It embraced the period antecedent to the beginning of the Iliad, to which it was evidently designed to form an introduction of that poem as outlined given by Pindar, and from the extant fragments, a good idea may be formed of its structure and contents. The Earth, wearied with the burden of the degenerate race of man, entreats Zeus to diminish their numbers. He grants her request, and prepares two chief agents to accomplish it, Helen and Achilles, the beauty of the former furnishing the cause of the contest, and the skill of the latter the instrument of extermination. The events succeeding the birth of Helen (or ruther, for the form of the myth is varied), her being sent by Zeus to Leda to bring up, and the marriage of Peleus, down to the sailing of the expedition against Troy, were related at great length, and the incidents of the war itself much more briefly, the latter part being apparently occupied chiefly with those previous adventures of the heroes which are referred to in the Iliad. It concluded with the following somewhat clumsy contrivance to connect it with the opening of the Iliad: the war itself is not found to be murderous enough to accomplish the object prayed for by the Earth; and in order to effect it more surely, the fresh contention between Achilles and Agamemnon is stirred up by Zeus. [STATEIRA.]

Seleucus, the admiral of the Egyptian fleet, and to place himself under the supremacy of Ptolemy: but in b.c. 315 he abandoned the alliance of that monarch, and, in common with several of the other princes of the island, entered into negotiations with Antigonus. Before, however, the latter could lend them any support, Ptolemy himself arrived in Cyprus with a fleet and army, took Stasioecus prisoner, and razed his city to the ground. (Diod. xix. 62, 78.)

[STATEIRA (Στατείρα).] a citizen of Tegae, and the leader of the party there which was favourable to Sparta. When Archidamus III. was sent, in b.c. 37, to succour his defeated countrymen, Stasippus and Proxenus, he seized the height of their power, and Tegae therefore zealously assisted the Spartan king with reinforcements. In b.c. 370, Stasippus successfully resisted in the assembly the attempt of Calibus and Proxenus to change the existing relations of Tegae to Sparta, and include it in the proposed federative union of all Areadian towns. His opponents hereupon had recourse to arms, and Stasippus defeated them in battle, but did not make as much of his victory as he might have done, through reluctance to shed the blood of his fellow-citizens. The democratic leaders were less scrupulous, and, having been reinforced from Mantinea, got Stasippus and many of his friends into their power, and murdered them after the mockery of a trial. ( xen. Hell. v. 4, § 18, 5. §§ 6, &c.; Val. Max. iv. 1, Ext. 5.) [CALLIBIU, No. 2.] [E. E.]

STATE MATER, a Roman divinity, whose image at one time stood in the forum, where fires were kindled. She appears to have been first introduced into Italy by Tarentum, and the forum was paved, the fires were kindled in other parts of the town, in order not to spoil the stones (Fest. p. 317, ed. Müller). In inscriptions she is sometimes called Statia Mater, and she is probably identical with Vesta. (Hartung, Die Religion d. Röm. vol. ii. p. 110.)

STATEIRA (Στατείρα). 1. Wife of Artaxerxes II., king of Persia, was the daughter of a noble Persian named I Atmos. She was married to Artaxerxes (then called Arsaces) during the lifetime of his father Ochus, and it was only by the urgent entreaties of her husband that the queen-mother Parysatis was prevailed upon to spare her life, when she put to death all her brothers and sisters on account of the revolt of their eldest brother Terithuches (Cesnna, Pers. §§ 59—61; Plut. Artax. 2). The enmity thus originated between Parysatis and Stateira was aggravated by many successive circumstances. Parysatis, while she exercised great influence over Artaxerxes, still preferred her son Cyrus, while Stateira was warmly attached to her husband, who appears to have requited her affection with equal ardour. Hence, when the rebellion of Cyrus became known, b.c. 401, Stateira was one of the loudest in the clamour raised against the queen-mother, who by her ill-timed favour to her younger son had involved the empire in these dangers. Again, after the defeat and death of Cyrus, the cruelty with which Parysatis on the one hand pursued all who had any personal share in his death, and on the other the favour shown by her to Clearchus, and her efforts to induce the king to spare his life, were bitterly reproached by her Stateira, who did not scruple to attribute them to their true motive, and persuaded Artaxerxes to put Clearchus to death. But though she was successful in this instance, she could not long maintain her ground against the increasing influence of Parysatis: and the latter at length became so confident in her power over the mind of her son, that she determined to remove Stateira by poison, a purpose which she at length effected, notwithstanding the vigilance of the young queen. Arta- xerxes, though deeply affected at her death, did not venture to punish his mother, but put to death her maid Gigis, who had been her accomplice in the plot. (Plut. Artax. 5, 6, 17—19; Cesn.s, Pers. §§ 60, 61.)

2. The sister and wife of Dareius Codomanus, celebrated as the most beautiful woman of her time. She accompanied her husband on his march to the battle of Issus (b. c. 333), and was taken prisoner, together with her mother-in-law Sisygambis and her daughters, after that battle. They were all treated with the utmost respect and courtesy by the generous conqueror, but Stateira died shortly before the battle of Arbela, b. c. 331. She was honoured by Alexander with a splendid funeral, and a special envoy to express Dareius of her fate. (Curt. iii. 3. § 22, 11. § 24—26, 12. §§ 11, 15, 22, iv. 10. §§ 13—34; Arrian. Anab. ii. 11, 12, iv. 19, 20; Plut. Alex. 21, 30; Justin. xi. 9, 12.)

3. The eldest daughter of Dareius Codomanus, who was held in marriage to Alexander the Great, before the battle of Arbela, and whom the conqueror actually married at Susa (b. c. 324), is called by Diodorus, Plutarch, Curtius, and Justin, Stateira, but according to Arrian her real name was Barsine (Diod. xvii. 107; Curt. iv. 5. § 1; Plut. Alex. 70; Justin. xii. 10; Arrian, Anab. vii. 4. § 5.) For her subsequent fortunes, see Barsine.

4. A sister of Mithridates the Great, who was put to death by his orders at Pharmacian, together with her sister Roxana, and his two wives Bernice and Monima, for fear of their falling as captives into the hands of Lucullus. Stateira met her fate with a dignity and composure worthy of her royal birth. She was about forty years of age, but unmarried. (Plut. Lucull. 18.) [E. H. B.]

STATIA GENs. This name appears to have been originally Lucanian or Samnite, for the Statii, mentioned before the time of Julius Caesar, all belong to the nations of southern Italy, with the solitary exception of T. Statius who is said to have been tribune of the plebe in Rome in b. c. 475. The Statii first acquired historical importance by the exploits of L. Statius Murcus, the legatus of Caesar, whose name appears on coins [MURCus], but none of them obtained the consulate during the republican period, and the first person of the name who was raised to this honour was L. Statius Quadratus, in a. d. 142. The Statii bore several cognomina, which are given below.

STATIA'NUS, O'PPIUS. [OPPius, No. 17.]

STATIA'NUS, MA'NLUS, a senator in the reign of Prorus, a speech of whose is preserved by Vopiscus. (Prob. 12.)

STATILIA GENs, was originally a Lucanian family, and not a Roman gens. Towards the end of the republic, however, the Statiliu began to take part in public affairs at Rome, and one of them, namely T. Statilius Taurus, obtained the consulate in b. c. 37. All the Statii of any historical importance bore the cognomen TAURUS. A few literary persons of this name are mentioned with other cognomina, which are given below. On coins we find the surname of Taurus.

STATILIA MESSALLINA. [MESSALLINA.]

STATILII, I. T. STEN IUS STATILUS, as he is called by Pliny, or Statilus Statilius, according to Valerius Maximus, the leader of the Lucanians, who attacked Thrulli. The tribute of the plebes, C. Aelius, brought forward a law at Rome, directed against this Statilius, in consequence of which the inhabitants of Thrulli rewarded him with a golden crown. (Plin. H. N. xxxiv. 6. 6. 15; Val. Max. i. 8. § 6.)

2. MARIIUS STATILUS, a Lucanian, commanded a troop of Lucanian cavalry under the Roman consuls in the campaign against Hannibal, in b. c. 216. (Liv. xii. 42.)

3. L. STATILUS, a man of equestrian rank, was one of Catiline's conspirators and was put to death with Lentulus and the others, in the Tullianum. (Sall. Cat. 17, 43, 46, 47, 55; Cic. in Cat. iii. 9, 6; Appian, B. C. ii. 4.)

4. STATILUS, a very bad actor, mentioned by Cicero, as being on his eurition for Roscius the comic actor (c. 10).

5. L. STATILUS, an augur spoken of by Cicero in b. c. 45. (Cic. ad Att. xii. 13, 14.)

6. STATILUS, a young man and a great admirer of Cato, was with him at Utica at the time of his death, and wished to follow his example, by putting an end to his own life, but was prevented by his friends from so doing. He served in the republican army after the death of Caesar, and fell at Philippi. (Plut. Cat. min. 65, 66, 73.)

7. Q. STATILUS, was prevented by Augustus from holding the tribunate of the plebs, which was intended for him in b. c. 29. (Dion Cass. lii. 42.)

STATILUS CAPELLA. [CAPELLA.]

STATILIUS CORVINSUS. [CORVINUS.]

STATILIUS FLACCUS. [FLACCUS.]

STATILUS MAXIMUS, a Roman grammarian, frequently quoted by Chrysiaus, wrote a work De Singularibus apud Ciceronem, and Commentaries upon Cato and Sallust. (Chrysiaus, pp. 175, 192, 176, et alibi, ed. Putzchius.)

STATILIUS SEVERUS. [SEVERUS.]

STATILIUS TAURUS, at whose expense the first amphitheatre of stone was built at Rome, is wrongly inserted by some writers in the list of ancient authors. (See TAURUS, and Dict. of Antiq. art. Amphitheatrum, 2d ed.) [P. S.]

STATIUNUS or STATILI'NUS, a Roman divinity, to whom sacrifices were offered at the time when a child began to stand or run alone. (August. De Civ. Del. iv. 21; Tertullian, De Anim. 39; Varro, op. Nov. p. 528.) [L. S.]

STATI'RA. [STATEI'RA.]

L. T. STATIUS, tribune of the Plebes, in b. c. 475, in conjunction with his colleague L. Caeidius, brought an accusation against Sp. Servilius Priscus Structus, the consul of the preceding year. (Liv. ii. 52.)

2. STATIUS, a literary slave of Q. Cicero, whom he subsequently manumitted, had given offence to M. Cicero. (Cic. ad Att. ii. 18, 19, vi. 2, xii. 5, ad Q Fr. i. 2, § 1, 3, 8, ad Fam. xvi. 16.)

3. STATIUS, the Samnite, put to death by the triumvirs in b. c. 43 (Appian, B. C. iv. 25), is probably the same as the celebrated C. Papus Matius, one of the leaders of the Samnites in the Social war. [MUTILUS.]

4. STATIUS, a tribune of the soldiers in the reign of Nero. (Tac. Ann. xvi. 60.)
STATIUS ACHILLES. [ACHILLES TATIUS.]
STATIUS ALBĂIUS OPPIANICUS. [OPPIANICUS.]

STATIUS ANNAEUS, a friend of the philosopher Seneca, and well skilled in the art of medicine, provided Seneca with hemlock in order to hasten his death, when the blood did not flow in sufficient abundance from his veins; but the poison took no effect. (Tac. Ann. xvi. 64.)
STATIUS CAECILIUS. [CAECILIUS.]
STATIUS, DOMITIUS, tribune of the soldiers in the reign of Nero, was deprived of his office on the detection of Piso's conspiracy. (Tac. Ann. xv. 71.)

STATIUS GELLIIUS, a general of the Samnites, was defeated by the Romans and taken prisoner in B.C. 305. (Liv. iv. 44.)
STATIUS METIUS, held Casilinum for Hannibal in B.C. 214. (Liv. xxiv. 19.)
STATIUS MURCIIUS. [MURCIUS.]
STATIUS P. PAPINIIUS, a distinguished grammarian, who, after having carried off the palm in several public literary contests, opened a school at Naples, about the year A.D. 39, according to the calculations of Dodwell. He subsequently removed to Rome, and at one period acted as the preceptor of Domitian, who held him in high honour, and presented him with various marks of favour. He was the author of many works in prose and verse, of which no trace remains, and died probably in A.D. 86. By his wife Agellina, who survived him, he had a son

P. PAPINIIUS STATIUS, the celebrated poet. Our information with regard to his personal history is miserably defective. He is named by no ancient author, except Juvenal, so that any knowledge we possess of his family or career has been gleaned from incidental notices in his own writings, and many of these are couched in very ambiguous language. It appears that under the skilful tuition of his father he speedily rose to fame, and became peculiarly renowned for the brilliancy of his extemporaneous effusions, so that he gained the prize three times in the Alban contests (see Sueton. Dom. 4); but having, after a long career of popularity, been vanquished in the quinquennial games (Suet. Dom. l.c.) he retired to Naples, the place of his nativity, along with his wife Claudia whom he married in early life, to whom he was tenderly attached, and whose virtues he frequently commemorates. From the well-known lines of Juvenal, s. vii. 82, —

Currit ad vocem jucundam et carnem amicis Thebaoidos, laetam fecit quum Statius Urbem Promisique diem: tanta dulcedine captos Afflict ille animos, tantaque libidine vulgi Auditor, sed, quem fregit subselvia versa, Esurit, intactum Paridi nisi vendat Agavem,— we should infer that Statius, in his earlier years at least, was forced to struggle with poverty, but he appears to have profited by the patronage of Domitian (Silv. iv. 2), whom in common with Martial and other contemporary bards he addresses in strains of the most fulsome adulation. The tale that the emperor, in a fit of passion, stabbed him with a stilus, seems to be as completely destitute of foundation as the notion that he was a Christian. Dodwell fixes upon A.D. 61 and A.D. 96, as the epoch of his birth and of his death, but these conclusions are drawn from very uncertain premises. Those dates, which can be ascertained with precision, will be noted as we review his productions in succession.

The extant works of Statius are: —

I. Silvarum Libri V., a collection of thirty-two occasional poems, many of them of considerable length, divided into five books. To each book is prefixed a dedication in prose, addressed to some friend. The metre chiefly employed is the heroic hexameter, but four of the pieces (i. 6, ii. 7, iv. 3, 9), are in Phalaecian hendecasyllabics, one (iv. 5) in the Alcaic, and one (iv. 7) in the Sapphic stanza. The first book was written about A.D. 90 (4. 91), the third after the commencement of A.D. 94 (iii. 3. 171), the first piece in the fourth book was composed expressly to celebrate the kalends of January, A.D. 95, when Domitian entered upon his 17th consubship, and the fifth book appears to have been brought to a close in the following year.

II. Thebaidos Libri XII., an heroic poem in twelve books, embodying the ancient legends with regard to the expedition of the Seven against Thebes. It occupied the author for twelve years (xii. 811), and was not finished until after the Dacian war, which commenced in A.D. 86 (i. 20), but had been published before the completion of the first book of the Silvae (Silv. i. proem.; comp. iii. 2. 143, iv. 4. 86, &c.).

III. Achilleidos Libri II., an heroic poem breaking off abruptly. According to the original plan, it would have comprised a complete history of the exploits of Achilles, but was probably never finished. It was commenced after the completion of the Thebaids (Achill. i. 16), and is alluded to in the last book of the Silvae (v. 2. 163, v. 5. 37). In some manuscripts this fragment is comprised within a single book, in others is divided into five.

Statius may justly claim the praise of standing in the foremost rank among the heroic poets of the Silver Age, and when we remember how few of the extant fragments of Roman muse belong to this department, we do not feel surprised that Dante and Scaliger should have assigned to him a place immediately after Virgil, provided always we regard them as separated by a wide impassable gulph. While by no means deficient in dignity, and not infrequently essaying lofty flights, he is in a great measure free from extravagance and pompous pretensions; but, on the other hand, in no portion of his works do we find the impress of high natural talent and imposing power. Those passages which have been most frequently quoted, and most generally admired, display a great command of graceful and appropriate language, a liveliness of imagination which occasionally oversteps the limits of correct taste, brilliant imagery, pictures designed with artistic skill, and glowing with the richest colours, a skilful development of character, and a complete knowledge of the mechanism of verse; but they are not vivified and lighted up by a single spark of true inspiration. The rules of art are observed with undeviating accuracy, and the most intricate combinations are formed without the introduction of a disturbing element; but there is a total absence of that simple energy which is the surest mark of true genius.

The pieces which form the Silvae, although Evidently thrown off in haste, and probably regarded by their author as 'trifles of comparatively little importance, produce a much more pleasing effect than either the Thebaid or the Achilleid, in which the original strength of expression seems to have been worn away by repeated polishing, and the native freedom of the verse to have been shackled and cramped by a laborious process of correction.

The Edizio Princes of the Silvae is a quarto volume, without date and without name of place or printer, not later probably than 1470. The Silvae will be found also in the editions of Catullus, Tibullus, and Propertius, which appeared in 1472, 1475, and 1481, in the edition of Catullus of 1473. The text was revised and published with a commentary by Domitius Calderinus, in a volume containing also remarks upon Ovid and Propertius, fol. Rom. Arnold Pannartz, 1475. The best editions are those of Markland, whose critical notes evince remarkable sagacity, 4to. Lond. 1728, and of Sillig, 4to. Drecd. 1827, which is a reprint of Markland, with some additional matter.

The Edizio Princes of the Thebais and Achilleis is a folio volume, without date and without name of place or printer, but belonging probably to the year 1470. Besides this there are a considerable number of editions of these poems, either together or separately, printed in the 15th century, a sure indication of the estimation in which they were held.

The Edizio Princes of the collected works is a folio volume, without date, and without name of place or printer. It contains the commentary of Calderinus on the Silvae, and must therefore have been published after the year 1475. No really good edition of Statius has yet appeared. That of Hurd, which was a work of great promise, was never carried beyond the first volume, which contains the Silvae only, 8vo. Leips. 1817. The best for all practical purposes is that which forms one of the Series of Latin Classics by Lemaire. 4 vols. 8vo. Paris, 1825—1830.

The first five books of the Thebaid were translated into English verse by Thomas Stephens, 8vo. Lond. 1648, and the whole poem by W. L. Lewis, 2 vols. 8vo. Oxford, 1767 and 1778. The translation of the first book by Pope will be found in all editions of his works.

The Achilleid was translated into English verse by Howard. 8vo. Lond. 1660.

Of translations into other languages, the only one of any note is the version into Italian of the Thebaid by Cardinal Bentivoglio, 4to. Rom. 1729, and 8vo. Milan, 1821. [W. R.]

STATIUS VALENS wrote the life of the emperor Trajan. (Lamprid. Alex. Sever. 48.)

STATOR, a Roman surname of Jupiter, describing him as staying the Romans in their flight from an enemy, and generally as preserving the existing order of things. (Liv. i. 12, x. 37; Cic. Cat. i. 13; Flor. i. 1; Senec. De Benef. iv. 7; Plin. H. N. ii. 53; August. De Civ. Dei. iii. 13.) [L. S.]

STATORIUS, a centurion in the army of P. and Cn. Scipio in Spain, in b. c. 213, was sent by these generals as an ambassador to Syphax, the king of the Numidians, with whom he remained in order to train foot-soldiers in the Roman tactics (Liv. xxiv. 48, xxx. 28). He appears to be the same as the L. Statorius, who afterwards accompanied C. Laelius, when he went on an embassy to Syphax. (Frontin. i. 1 § 3.)

STATORIUS VICTOR, a rhetorician mentioned by the elder Seneca, was, like him, a native of Corduba (Cordova) in Spain. (Senec. Suet. 2.)

STAUROCULIS (Σταυροκύλιος), Emperor of Constantinople, son of the Emperor Nicephorus I. [NICEPHORUS I.], first the colleague of his father, and after his death for a short time sole emperor. He was solemnly crowned as emperor in the month of December A. D. 803 in the second year of his father's reign in the ambo or pulpit of the great Church (St. Sophia) at Constantinople, by the hand of the patriarch Tarasius: being altogether unfitted, according to Theophanes, either in personal appearance, bodily strength, or judgment, for such a dignity. Possibly this unfitness arose from his youth, for it was not until Dec. 807, four years after his father's death, that Stauracius was married. His bride was Theophano, an Athenian lady, kinswoman of the late Empress Irene (IRENE), who was selected by Nicephorus for his son after a careful search among the unmarried ladies of the empire, notwithstanding she was already betrothed to a husband, with whom, though not fully married to him, her union had been consummated. The choice of so contaminated a partner dishonour'd the unhappy prince to whom she was given as a wife, and the unbridled lust of Nicephorus cast additional contempt on his son by the seduction about the time of the marriage of two young ladies more beautiful than Theophano, and who had been selected as competitors with her for the hand of the young emperor. In May A. D. 811 Stauracius left Constantinople with his father to take the field against the Bulgarians at the head of an army, the number of which struck terror into the heart of the Bulgarian king and induced him to sue for peace, which was refused. The first encounters, which were favourable to the Greeks, appear to have been directed by Stauracius, for his father ascribed them to his skill and good fortune. The Bulgarians again sued for peace and again their suit was rejected. In the following fatal battle, in which Nicephorus was killed and the Greek army almost annihilated, Stauracius received a wound in or near the spine, under the torture of which he escaped with difficulty to Adrianople. Here he was proclaimed autocrat, sole emperor, by the officers who surrounded him, and this announcement was received by those who had escaped with him from the slaughter with a delight which evidenced his personal popularity. Michael the Curopalata, who had married Procopia, daughter of Nicephorus, and who had also escaped from the slaughter, but unwounded, was solicited by some of his friends to assume the purple; but he declined, professedly out of regard to the oaths of fealty which he had taken to Nicephorus and Stauracius, perhaps from a conviction that the attempt would not succeed. Stauracius was conveyed in a litter to Constantinople, where he was exalted by the patriarch Nicephorus [NICEPHORUS, Byzantine writers, STEPIANUS.

No 9] to seek the Divine mercy and to make restitution to those whom his father had oppressed. "Being," says Theophanes "the genuine inheritor of his father's disposition," but perhaps influenced by the exhaustion of the imperial finances through an unfortunate war, he replied, that he could not spare for restitution more than three talents. "This," says the late historian, "was but a small part of what he (Nicephorus) had wrongfully taken." The painfulness of his suggestions Theophanes, who described, like Irene, to grasp the sceptre, and probably the intrigues of the parties themselves, alienated Stauracius from his brother-in-law Michael and several of the great officers of the court, and he is said to have contemplated bequeathing the empire to his wife, or even restoring the ancient forms of the Roman Republic. His counsellors conspired against him, and Stauracius having proposed to put out the eyes of Michael, matters were brought to a crisis; Michael was proclaimed emperor (Oct. 811), and Stauracius having put on the habit of a monk, was deposed, and died soon after his deposition, having reigned only two months and six days after his father's death. His widow Theophane embraced a monastic life, and employed the wealth which the humanity or policy of Michael [Michael I. Rhangabe] allowed her, in converting her palace into a monastery called "Hebraica" (τα Ἑβραῖα) and by corruption "Iabraica" (τα Ἴβραῖα), and at a later period "Stauraca" (Σταύρακης), because in it the body of Stauracius, and afterwards that of Theophane, were buried. According to some writers his body was deposited in (perhaps transferred to) the monastery of Stryrus. The character of Stauracius is drawn in the most unfavourable colours by Theophanes, Zonaras, and others: but it was the misfortune of Nicephorus and his son to come between the two sovereigns, Irene and Michael Rhangabe, whose services to orthodoxy or profusion to the church made them great favourites with the ecclesiastical annalists of the Byzantine empire; and their evanescing dynasty was founded by the deposition of one and overthrown to make way for the elevation of the other of these favourites of the church. It is reasonable therefore to suppose that their characters have been unfairly represented; and, in the case of Stauracius especially, things harmless or unimportant have been described as evidences of the greatest depravity. (Theophanes, Chronog. pp. 405—419, ed. Paris; pp. 322—332, ed. Venice; pp. 745—769, ed. Bonn; Leo Grammaticus, Chronog. pp. 204—206, ed. Bonn; Cedrenus, Compend. pp. 477—482, ed. Paris; vol. ii. pp. 33—43, ed. Bonn; Le Beau, Bas Empire, liv. lvii, ch. xxviii—xxv. Gibbon, Decline and Fall, ch. xviii.) [J. C. M.]

STELLA, ARRU'NTIUS. 1. The person to whom Nero entrusted the superintendence of the games which he exhibited in A.D. 55. (Tac. Ann. xii. 22.)

2. A poet and a friend of Statius, who dedicated to him the first book of his Silvae, the second poem in which celebrates the marriage of Stella and Violantilla. This Stella is also mentioned by Martial (vi. 21).

STELLIUS, C. AFRAN'VIUS. 1. Praetor A.D. 185, and one of the triumvirs for founding a colony A.D. 183. (Liv. xxxix. 23, 25.)

2. Son of the preceding, served in A.D. 169 against Persus, king of Macedonia, and was stationed in the Illyrian town of Usca, which was compelled to surrender to Perseus. (Liv. xliii. 19, 19.)

STE'NIUS or STHE'NIAU, a Campanian and Lucanian name. Stenius was one of the leading men at Capua, who entertained Hannibal in B.C. 216, after the battle of Cannae (Liv. xxiii. 8); and Pliny speaks of a Stenius Statilus as a Lucanian general. (Statilis, No. 1.)

STENERCLE'RUS (Στενερκλε'ρος), a herald of the Greeks at Troy, whose voice was as loud as that of fifty other men together. His name has become proverbial for any one who screams or shouts with an unusually loud voice. (Hom. Il. v. 783; Juven. Sat. xii. 112.) [L. S.]

STENYCLE'rus (Στενύκλε'ρος), a Messenian hero, from whom the Stenyclarian plain was believed to have derived its name. (Paus. iv. 33. § 5.) [L. S.]

STEPHANUS (Στέφανος), historical. 1. One of the two sons of Thucydamis, whom Plato mentions among the instances of those sons of great men, whom their fathers, though educating them with the utmost care, have been unable to train to excellence (Menon, p. 94, c. d.). He is mentioned by Athenaeus (vi. p. 234, e.) as the scribe of a decree of Alibiades, engraved on a pillar in the temple of Heracles at Cynosarges.

2. An Athenian orator, son of Menecles of Acharme, against whom Demosthenes composed two orations, which contain scarcely any particulars of his life deserving notice here. He is also mentioned by Athenaeus (xii. p. 593, f.).

3. Ἐρωδάτης, the husband of Neaea, several times mentioned by Demosthenes in his Orations against Neaea. [P. S.]

STEPHANUS, emperor of Constantinople. [Romanus I.; Constantinus VII.]

STEPHANUS (Στέφανος), literary. 1. An Athenian comic poet of the New Comedy, was probably the son of Antiphanes, some of whose plays he is said to have exhibited. (Anon. de Com. p. xxx.; Suid. s. v. Ἀλεξίας.) The other statement of Suidas (s. v. Ἀλεξίας), that he was the son of Alexis, seems to arise merely from a confusion of the names of Alexis and Antiphanes. All that remains of his works is a single fragment, quoted by Athenaeus (vi. p. 493 a.), from his Παλαιάδες, a poem of which Homer is supposed to have been imitated by the imitators of Lacedaemonian manners. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. ii. p. 496; Meineke, Frag. Com. Graec. vol. i. pp. 304, 376, 485, 436, vol. iv. p. 544.)

2. Of Byzantium, the author of the well-known geographical lexicon, entitled Ἐθνωδία, of which unfortunately we only possess an epitome. There are few ancient writers of any importance of whom we know so little as of Stephanus. All that can be affirmed of him with certainty is that he was a grammarian at Constantinople, and lived after the time of Arcadius and Honorius, and before that of Justinian II. The ancient writers, often as they quote the Ἐθνωδία, give us absolutely no information about its author, except his name. We learn from them, however, that the work was reduced to an epitome by a certain Hermolaus, who dedicated his abridgement to the emperor Justinian. (Hieroc- laeus.) Hence, in turning to the few incidental pieces of information which the work contains respecting its author, we are met by the question, whether such passages were written by Stephanus.
himself, or by the epimoton Hermolous. The most important of these passages is the following, which occurs in the article 'Ἀναστάτωρ'. Καὶ Ἐθνεῖος δέ, ὥριο ἡμῶν τά ἐν τῇ βασιλείᾳ σχολάς διακομήσας, which cannot refer to any other Eugene than the eminent grammarian of Augustopolis in Phrygia, who, as we learn from Suidas, taught at Constantinople, under the emperor Anastasius, at the end of the fifth century or the beginning of the sixth. (Suid. s. t.) This passage was pointed out by Thomas de Pinedo, the translator of Stephanus, as an indication of the author's age; but nearly all the editors of Stephanus, as well as Isaac Vossius and Fabricius, have chosen to regard it as an insertion made by Hermolous, for the following reason; if Eugenius flourished under Anastasius, who died in A. D. 518, his successor in the presidency of the schools would in all probability be in office under Justinian I., who came to the throne in A. D. 527, which agrees with the statement of Suidas, that Hermolous dedicated his epitome to Justinian. Plausible as this argument is, it is far from being conclusive. It evidently rests in part, if not chiefly, on the tacit assumption that, when a personal reference is made in an abridged work to the author, without any thing to show whether it is the original author, or the epimoton, the presumption is, that it has been inserted by the latter. Now we believe that the presumption is just the other way; both on the general principle that, in an abridged work, whatever cannot be proved to be an interpolation should be referred to the original author, and also on account of the well-known habit of compilers and epitomators of the later period of Greek literature to copy their author almost verbatim, so far as they follow him at all, and to make their abridgement by the simple omission of whole passages, often in such a manner as even to destroy the grammatical coherence of what is left, as is frequently the case in this very epitome of Stephanus. On this presumption, we think, the question mainly turns. It would be rash to regard it as decided; but it may be safely said that the passage should probably be referred to Stephanus, unless some positive and decisive proof be produced that it was inserted by Hermolous. The chronological argument stated above is not such a proof; for Suidas does not say to which of the two Justinians Hermolous dedicated his epitome; and, even if it was to Justinian I., there is nothing to prevent our supposing that the work of Stephanus was composed under Justin or in the early part of the reign of Justinian, and that the epitome was made very soon afterwards; but, considering how little Suidas troubles himself about minute distinctions, it is perhaps better to keep to the explanation that the Justinian to whom Hermolous dedicated his epitome was Justinian II., and that Stephanus himself flourished under Justinian I., in the former part of the sixth century. Western, who argues farther, that it is unlikely that a person of so little learning and judgment, as the epimoton of Stephanus appears by his work to have possessed, would have been placed at the head of the imperial schools of Constantinople, or would have written such a work as the Byzantine history quoted in the article Τότου, or as the disquisition on the Atheniains referred to under Αἰθαίος; but, in these cases also, it appears better to rest on the simple presumption that these passages proceed from the hand of the original author. There being no proof to the contrary. A more important piece of collateral evidence respecting the time of Stephanus, pointed out by Western, is his eulogy of Petrus Patrichius (e. v. Άσκόνιος), who died soon after A. D. 582, and was therefore a contemporary of Stephanus, supposing that the latter flourished in the sixteenth century as proposed by Scaliger. The literary history of the work of Stephanus is also involved in much obscurity. Even the title has been a subject of dispute. In the Aldine edition it is entitled περὶ τόλεων, which Dindorf has adopted; in the Juntine περὶ τόλεων καὶ δήμων, which Berkelius also places at the head of the text, while on his title-page he has Στρέφανος Βυζαντίου εὐθύκα κατ' ἐπίτομον; and Salmasius prefers the title Στρέφανος Βυζαντίου περὶ εὐθύκων καὶ τοπικῶν. All these variations are supported more or less by the authority of the MSS. The numerous references, however, made to the work by ancient writers, especially by Eustathius, make it clear that the proper title of the original work was Ἐθνικά, and that of the epitome ἐκ τῶν εὐθύκων Στρέφανος κατ' ἐπίτομον. The title prefixed to the important fragment of the original work, which is preserved in the Codex Segnerianus, deserves notice on account of its full explanation of the original work, although it has of course been added by a grammarian:—Στρέφανος γραμματικοῦ Κωνσταντι- νουπόλεως περὶ τόλεων καὶ δήμων τα καὶ εὐθύκων τα καὶ τόπων, καὶ διανύσας αὐτῶν καὶ μετωνομαι- σιας καὶ τῶν ἐντείνου παραγεγευμένων εὐθύκων τα καὶ τοπικών καὶ κτητικῶν τὰ ὁμολόγων. According to the title, the chief object of the work was to specify the gentile names derived from the several names of places and countries in the ancient world. But, while this is done in every article, the amount of information given went far beyond this. Nearly every article in the epitome contains a reference to some ancient writer, as an authority for the name of the place; but in the original, as we see from the extant fragments, there were considerable quotations from the ancient authors, besides a number of very interesting particulars, topographical, historical, mythological, and others. Thus the work was not merely what it professed to be, a lexicon of a special branch of technical grammar, but a valuable dictionary of geography. How great would have been its value to us, if it had come down to us uncutticated, may be seen by any one who compares the extant fragments of the original with the corresponding articles in the epitome. These fragments, however, are unfortunately very scanty. They consist of:—(1) The portion of the work from Δάμνη to the end of Δ, contained in a MS. of the Segnerian Library; but, unfortunately, there is a large gap even in this portion; (2) The article Θηριαός δοῦ, which is preserved by Constantinus Porphyrogenetus (de Admin. Imp. c. 25); (3) An account of Sicily, quoted by the same author from Stephanus (527) and time above assigned to him. The first two of these fragments are inserted by Western in the text, in place of the corresponding articles of the epitome, which he transfers to his preface; the third differs so thoroughly from the article Σικελία in the epitome, that Western does not venture to insert it in the text, but prints it in his preface. There are also some other quotations in the ancient writers, which, from their general, but not exact, resemblance to the articles in the epitome, are presumed to be taken from the original.
They are particularized by Westermann in his preface.

From a careful examination of the references, it appears that the author of the Etymologicae Magnae, Eustathius, and others of the grammarians, possessed the original work of Stephanus. It also seems probable that the work, as it now exists, is not a fair representation of the epitome of Hermolaus, but that it has been still further abridged by successive copyists. The former part of the work is introductory to the portion of Stephanus, the middle of Σ is little more than a list of names; the articles in Τ and Τ become fuller again; and those from Ξ to Ω appear to be copied, almost without abridgement, from the work of Stephanus.

The work is arranged in alphabetical order; but it was also originally divided into books, the exact number of which cannot be determined; but they were considerably more numerous than the letters of the alphabet.

The following are the chief editions of the Epitome of Stephanus:—(1) the Aldine, Veneti. 1502, fol.; (2) the Juntine, Florent. 1521, fol.; (3) the edition of Xylander, with several emendations in the text, and with Indices, Basili. 1568, fol.; (4) that of Thomas de Pinedo, the first with a Latin version, Amst. 1678, fol.; (5) the text corrected by Salmasius, from a collation of MSS.; various readings collected by Gronovius from the Codex Pernusin, with notes; A Latin Version and Commentary by Abr. Berkellus, Lulg. Bat. 1668, fol., reprinted 1694, fol.; (6) that of the Weißensteiners, containing the Greek text, the Latin version and notes of Thomas de Pinedo, and the various readings of Gronovius, with Indices, Amst. 1725, fol.; (7) that of Dindorf, with readings from a newly-found MS. and the notes of L. Holstenius, A. Berkellus, and Thomas de Pinedo, Lips. 1825, &c., 4 vols. 8vo.; (8) that of A. Westermann, containing a thoroughly revised text, with a very valuable preface, Lips. 1839, 8vo.: this is by far the most useful edition for ordinary reference. The chief fragment was published separately, by S. Tennulius, Amst. 1669, 4to.; by A. Berkellus, with the Persius of Hanno and the Monument Adultaminum of Ptolemy Euergetes, Lulg. Bat. 1674, 8vo., reprinted in Monthuson's Cataloga Bibliothecarum Christianarum, pp. 291, &c., Paris, 1715, fol.; by Gronovius, Lulg. Bat. 1731, fol., and the Theaurus Antiqu. Graec. vol. vii., pp. 269, &c.; and it is contained in all the editions, from that of Thomas de Pinedo downwards. There is a German translation of the fragment, with an Essay on Stephanus, by S. Ch. Schiriltz, in the Ephem. Litter. Scholaest. Univ. vol. ii. pp. 385—390, 393—399, 392, 4to. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. iv. pp. 621—661; Vossius, de Hist. Graec. pp. 324, 325, ed. Westermann; Wellauer, de Extrema Parte Opera Stephani de Urbino, in Friedemann and Seebod's Miscell. Crit. vol. ii. pt. 4, pp. 692, &c.; Westermann, Stephanii Mistantii Ευβοικών quaer superant, Præf.; Hoffmann, Lex. Bibl. Scrip. Graec. s. v.) There are several other Greek writers of this name, but not of sufficient importance to require notice here. (See Fabric. Bibl. Graec. Index.) [P.S.]

STEPHANUS, artists. 1. A sculptor, who exercised his art at Rome in the first century B.C., was the disciple of Paitoleus and the instructor of Menelaus, as we learn from two inscriptions; the one on the trunk of a naked statue in the Villa Albani, ΣΤΕΦΑΝΟΣ ΠΑΣΙΤΕΛΟΥΣ ΜΑΘΗΤΗΣ EPOIEI (Marini, Inseriz. d. Villa Albani, p. 174); and the other on the base of the celebrated group in the Villa Ludovisi, MENEAAOC ΣΤΕΦΑΝΟΤ ΜΑΘΗΤΗC EPOIEI. [Menelaus.] Stephanus is also mentioned by Pliny (H. N. xxxvi. 5. 4, § 10) as the maker of Hippocrates, in the collection of Asinius Pollio; but what he means by Hippocrates is not very clear. From the connection, the word would appear to be a feminine plural.

2. A freedman of Lucina, in whose household he practised the art of a worker in gold, as we learn from a Latin inscription, in which he is designated AURIFEX. (Gori, Nos. 114—122; Bianchini, p. 67, No. 220; Weckler, Kunstblatt, 1827, No. 84; Osann, Kunstblatt, 1830, No. 84; R. Rochette, Lettre à M. Schön, p. 407, 24 ed.) [P. S.]

STEPHANUS, was ordained bishop of Rome A. D. 255, in the place of Lucius, and suffered martyrdom four years afterwards. He is known to us solely by the dispute which he maintained with Cyprian upon baptismic heretics, which became so fierce, that Stephanus, not content with refusing audience to the deputies despatched by the African prelate, positively forbid the faithful to exercise towards them the common duties of hospitality. He appears to have published two epistles in connection with this controversy.

1. Ad Cypriannum. 2. Ad Episcopos Orientales conturbuit Heleosium et Fermullanum. Neither of these has been preserved, but a short fragment of the former is to be found in the letter of Cyprian Ad Pompeium (Ixxiv.), and is printed in the Epistolæ Pontificum Romanorum of Constant (fol. Paris, 1721, p. 210). [W. R.]

STEPHANUS (Στιφάνος), the name of several physicians:—

1. Probably a native of Tralles in Lydia, as he was the father of Alexander Trallianus. (Alex. Trall. iv. 1, p. 198.) He had four other sons, Anthemius, Dioscorus, Metrodorus, and Olympius, who were all eminent in their several professions. (Agath. Hist. v. p. 149.) He lived in the latter half of the fifth century after Christ.

2. A native of Edessa, who was one of the most eminent physicians of his age. He was of great service to Kosbath (or Cabades) king of Persia, early in the sixth century after Christ, for which he was richly rewarded. During the siege of Edessa by Cosa (or Choroiot) the son of Kosbath, A. D. 544, Stephanus was sent with some of his fellow-citizens to intercede in behalf of the place; and in his address to the king he claims for himself the credit not only of having brought him up, but also of having persuaded his father to nominate him as his successor to the throne in place of his elder brother. (Procop. de Belo Pers. ii. 26.) His intercession had no effect, but the king was shortly afterwards forced to raise the siege.

3. A native of Alexandria, author of a short Greek treatise on Alchemy, who must have lived in the early part of the seventh century after Christ, as part of his work (p. 243) is addressed to the Emperor Heraclius (A. D. 610—641). It consists of nine πράξεις, or Lectures (see Fabric. Bibl. Græce, vol. ii. p. 694, note, ed. vel.), of which one is entitled Στεφανοῦ Άλξανδρου πλευρικού μελετημονομον πουλοφολογίου καὶ δεδουντομον τους μεγαλην καὶ ιερα τέχνην περὶ Χρυσοποίας πράξει συν τινι πράξτι, where it is not quite clear whether περὶ Χρυσοποίας, De Chrysporia, is meant to be the title of the whole work, or merely of the first section of it. Reinesius (apud Fabric. Bibli. Gr. vol. xii. p. 757) speaks highly of the work, but notices that the author falls into (p. 231) the common error of the Eastern and Greek churches of that age respecting the procession of the Holy Ghost.

The writer was evidently a religious man, as appears from the way in which he uses his numerous quotations from the New Testament.*

The work was first published in a Latin translation by Dominicus Pizimentus, Patav. 1573. 8vo., together with Democritus, Sinesius, and others on the same subject. The Greek text is to be found in the second volume of Ideler's Physici et Medici Graeci Minorae, Berol. 8vo. 1812. Fabricius (l. c. p. 693) and others think that this Stephanus was the same person as the commentator on Hippocrates and Galen, who may have been called (say they) Athenienses from being born at Athens, and Alexandrinus from having settled at Alexandria; but this conjecture seems improbable.

4. A native of Athens, and a commentator on Hippocrates and Galen, who is said in the titles of some MSS. at Vienna to have been a pupil of Theophilus Protospathartius (Lambec. Biblioth. Vindob. vol. vi. p. 196, vol. vii. p. 323). Nothing more is known of his personal history, and his date is somewhat uncertain. Some persons confound him with the chemist of Alexandria, and say that he lived in the seventh century after Christ; but this is probably an error, as Dietz appears to be correct in stating that some of the Greek words to be found in his writings (e. g. Ψυχή δωρά, Comment. in Hippocr. "Prognos," p. 97, τος θεός, ibid. p. 89, λαγωδόταν κοινω- μάθαι, p. 94, μάγκυρες, p. 146, δακτίλιοι, p. 154, κλακιοι, p. 159, &c.) indicate a later date. If it is true that Theophilus was his tutor, this does not help to determine the century in which he lived, as the date of the master is as uncertain as that of the pupil. If, however, we suppose Theophilus to have lived in the ninth century [Theophilus Protospathartius], Stephanus may be safely placed in the same. However this may be, he is certainly, in the opinion of Dietz (Skel. in Hippocr. et Gal. vol. i. p. xxvii.) and M. Littre (Dictionnaire d'Hist. et d'Arts d'Hippocr. tome i. p. 128), the most important of all the ancient commentators on Hippocrates after Galen, as his notes form a useful supplement to those of that writer, and contain quotations and explanations not to be found elsewhere. His Scholia on the "Prognosticon" of Hippocrates are to be found in the first volume of Dietz's "Scholia in Hippocratem et Galenum," Regim. Pruss. 8vo. 1834. There is also a commentary on the "Aphorisms" of Hippocrates, which in some MSS. bears the name of Stephanus, but in others it is attributed to Meletins or Theophilus; some extracts are inserted in the second volume of Dietz's collection mentioned above. His commentary on Galen's "Ad Glauconem de Metodo Medendi" is said by Fabricius, and others who have repented the assertion on his authority, to have been pub-

* He quotes (p. 225) a mystic enigma in six verses from the Sibylline oracles (lib. ii. p. 115, ed. Amstel. 1619), which is wrongly printed as prose, and of which several solutions have been attempted (but with doubtful success) in modern times. See Fabr. l. c. p. 696 lished in Greek, Venet. ap. Aldum, 1536, 8vo., but this edition is not mentioned by Renouard (Annales des Aldes), and its existence is very doubtful. It was first published in a Latin translation by Augustus Gadallinus, 1554, 8vo., Venet., which was several times reprinted. The Greek text is inserted in the first volume of Dietz's Skel. in Hippocr. et Gal. There is a short Greek work in MS., entitled Βίοι Διοςκορίδου και Σπερκίου Ἀθηναίου τοῦ φιλοσοφοῦ περὶ κομικῶν φαινόμενων ἡμερισιας κατὰ δισθείνων σαφης ἑκτάβασι (Lambec. Biblioth. Vindob. vol. vi. p. 228), which has been published by Caspar Wolphius, in a Latin translation, 1585, 8vo. [Tigurni, with the title—"Alphabetum Empiricum, sive, Dioscoridis et Stephani Atheniensis Philosophorum et Medicorum, de Remedios Expertis Liber, juxta Alphabeti Ordinem digestus." The treatise on Fever, which is in some MSS. attributed to Stephanus Atheniensis, is in fact by Palladius. (Penny Cyclop.)

5. Besides the above-mentioned physicians the Arabic writers mention at least two persons of the name of Estefan (or Stephanus), who translated various Greek works into Arabic. The most eminent of these was the son of a person named Basil; he lived at Bagdad in the reign of the Caliph Motawakkel, a. n. 232—247 (A. D. 847—861), and translated Dioscorides and several treatises of Galen, some of which are still extant in MS. in different European libraries. It is, perhaps, his translation of Dioscorides which is quoted by Ibn Ba'itâr (vol. i. p. 265); where Sontheimer, the translator, calls him Iṣṭaḥfān ʾĪbn Nāṣif, by misplacing a single point, and thus confounding Nasif with Basil. (See Nicoll and Pusey, Catal. MSS. Arab. Biblioth. Bodl. p. 587; De Sacy's Translation of "Abdallatif," p. 495; Venrich, De Auctor. Graecor. Version. et Comment. Syriac. Arab. Armen. et Pers. Lips. 1842, pp. xxxvi. 216, &c.)

[W. A. G.]

STERCIULIUS, STERCUITIUS, or STER-QUILINUS, a surname of Saturnus, derived from Stercus, manure, because he had promoted agriculture by teaching the people the use of manure. This seems to have been the original meaning, though some Romans state that Sterculius was a surname of Punicus, the son of Faunus, to whom likewise improvements in agriculture are ascribed. (Macrob. Sat. i. 7; Serv. ad Aen. ix. 4, x. 76; Lactant. i. 20; Plin. Hist. Nat. xvii. 9; August. De Civ. Dei, xviii. 15.)

[L. S.]

STE'ROPE (Στερόπη), 1. A Pleiad, the wife of Oenomaus (Apollod. iii. 10, § 1), and according to Pausanius (v. 10. § 5), a daughter of Atlas.

2. A daughter of Pheron and Xanthippe (Apollod. i. 7, § 7.)

3. A daughter of Cepheus of Tegena. (Apollod. ii. 7, § 3.)

4. A daughter of Acastus. (Apollod. iii. 13, § 3.)

5. A daughter of Porthon, and mother of the Sirens. (Apollod. i. 7, § 10.)

[LS.]

STE'ROPE'S (Στερόπης), a son of Uranus and Gea, was one of the Cyclopes. (Hes. Theog. 140; Apollod. iii. 1, § 2.)

[LS.]

STER'T'I`NIUS. 1. L. Stertinus, was sent as proconsul into further Spain in B. C. 199, and on his return to Rome three years afterwards (B. C. 196), brought into the public treasury fifty thousand pounds weight of silver, and from the spoils dedicated two fountains or statues in the forum Boarium, and one in the Circus Maximus, and placed upon them gilded statues. In the same year that he returned, he was appointed one of the ten commissioners, who were sent into Greece to settle the affairs of the country, in conjunction with T. Quintius Flamininus. (Liv. xxxi. 50, xxxiii. 37, 32; Polyb. xviii. 31.)

2. C. Stertinus, was praetor B.C. 188, and obtained Sardinia as his province. (Liv. xxxviii. 35.)

4. Stertinus, a Stoic philosopher, whom Horace calls in fun the eighth of the wise men. (Hor. Sat. ii. 3. 33, 296, Epist. i. 12. 20.)

5. L. Stertinus, the legatus of Germanicus, defeated the Bructeri in A. D. 13, and found among their booty the eagle of the nineteenth legion, which had been lost in the defeat of Varus. In the course of the same year he was sent by Germanicus to receive the surrender of Segestes, the brother of Segestes; and in the next year he was despatched against the Angirvari, a people dwelling on the banks of the river Vassus, whereupon he defeated them, and compelled him to acknowledge the supremacy of Rome. (Tac. Ann. i. 60, 71, ii. 3, 22.)

6. Stertinus Maximus, a rhetorician mentioned by the elder Seneca. (Controv. 9.)

7. Stertinus Avitus, a person celebrated by Martial at the beginning of the ninth book of his Epigrams. He is apparently the same person as the L. Stertinus Avitus, who was consul suffectus under Domitian in A. D. 92. (Fasti.)

Q. Stertinius, a physician at Rome in the first century after Christ, who, according to Pliny (H. N. xxix. 5), made it a favour that he was content to receive from the emperor five hundred thousand sesterces per annum (or rather more than four thousand four hundred pounds), as he might have made six hundred thousand sesterces (or rather more than five thousand three hundred pounds), by his private practice. He and his brother, who received the same annual income from the emperor Claudius, left between them at their death, notwithstanding large sums that they had spent in beautifying the city of Naples, the sum of thirty millions of sesterces, or rather more than two hundred and sixty-five thousand six hundred pounds. As these sums are considered by Pliny to be very large, they may serve to give us some idea of the fortunes made at Rome by the chief physicians at the beginning of the empire. (Penny Cyclopaedia.)

[W. A. G.]

STESA'GORAS (Στέσαγόρας). 1. An Athenian, father of Cimon [No. 1], and grandfather of the great Miltiades. (Herod. vi. 34, 103.)

2. Son of Cimon [No. 1], and grandson of the above. He succeeded his uncle Miltiades I. in the tyranny of the Thurian Chersonese, and continued the war with the people of Lampacus, which his predecessor had begun. Not long, however, after his accession, he was assassinated by a pretended deserter from the enemy, and, as he died childless, his wife was succeeded by his brother, the great Miltiades. (Herod. vi. 38, 39.)

STESANDER (Στέσανδρος), a musician of Samos, was the first who sang Homeric hymns to the cithara by the Pythagian games. (Ath. xiv. p. 638, a.; comp. Sext. Empir. adv. Math. vi. 16.)

[PS.]

STESIC'HORUS (Στέσιχορος), of Himera in Sicily, a celebrated Greek poet, contemporary with Sappho, Alcaeus, Pitaeus, and Phalaris, later than Alcamen, and earlier than Simonides, is said to have been born in Ol. 57, B.C. 632, to have flourished about Ol. 43, B.C. 609, and to have died in Ol. 55. 1, B.C. 560, or Ol. 56, B.C. 556—552, at the age of eighty or, according to Lucian, eighty-five. (Suid. s. v. Στέσιχορος, ίδρωτης, Ταύρος; Euseb. Chron. Ol. 43. 1; Aristot. Rhet. ii. 20. § 5; Cic. Verr. i. 8. 122; Liv. xxv. 13, 35; L. c., 5. 26; Clinton, F. H. vol. i. s. a. 111, vol. ii. s. a. 556, 553.) Various attempts have been made to remove the slight discrepancies in the above numbers; but it appears better to be content with the general result, which they clearly establish, that Stesichorus flourished at the beginning and during the first part of the sixth century B.C.

There appears, at first sight, to be a discrepancy between these testimonies and the statement of the Parian Marble (Ep. 51), that Stesichorus the poet came into Greece at the same time at which Aeschylus gained his first tragic victory, in the archonship of Philocrates, Ol. 73. 3, B.C. 475. But the statement of the Parian inscription is, to a later poet of the same name, and family. That it cannot refer to the Stesichorus now under notice is proved, not only by the above testimonies, but also, as Bentley has shown, by the way in which Simonides mentions Stesichorus, in connection with Homer, as an ancient poet (Ath. iv. p. 172, e. f.); whereas, if the statement of the Marble applied to him, he must have been contemporary with Simonides. Still further light is thrown on this matter by another clause of the Parian inscription (Ep. 74), which states that "Stesichorus the second, of Himera, conquered at Athens in Ol. 102. 3," B.C. 369. The clear and satisfactory explanation of these statements is, that the poetical art was, as usual, hereditary in the family of Stesichorus, and that two of his descendants, at different times, went to Athens to take part in the dithyrambic contests.

There are different statements respecting the country of Stesichorus. The prevailing account was that he was born at Himera, but he is sometimes called simply "the poet of Himera;" but others made him a native of Matalauros, or Matalurus, in the south of Italy (or, as some say, in Sicily), which was a Locrian colony. (Steph. Byz. s. v. Ματαυρός; Suid.) Now, as Himera was only founded just before the poet's birth, it is probable that his parents migrated thither from Matalauros; and here we have, as Klein and Müller have observed, the explanation of the strange tradition which made Stesichorus a son of Hesiod; for there existed among the Ozolian Locrians, at Oeneon and Naupactus, a race of epic poets, who claimed to be of the lineage of Hesiod; and from this race we may suppose the family of Stesichorus to have descended. The actual connection of the poetry of Stesichorus with the old epic poetry will be explained presently. Besides this mythical statement respecting Hesiod, the following names are mentioned as father of Stesichorus—Euphorbus, Epheusmus, Euclideus, and Hyetes. (Suid. s. v. Ευδοκ.; Steph. Byz. l. c.; Epig. Anon. ap. Brunck, Anal. vol. iii. p. 24, No. 33.)

According to Suidas, the poet had two brothers, a geometrician named Mamertinus, and a legislator named Halianax. Other statements concerning his family, which rest upon very doubtful authority, will be found in Kleine, pp. 15, 16.
H. Klein's, titles, but among Plin. pp. 1229, it is said to have been carefully educated at Catana, and after enjoyed the friendship of Phalaris, the tyrant of Agrigentum. The latter statement rests on no better authority than the spurious letters of Phalaris: but there is nothing to prevent its being true, since it is clear that Phalaris and Stesichorus were contemporaries. Many writers relate the fable of his being miraculously struck with blindness after writing an attack upon Helen, and recovering his sight when he had composed a Pallindia. (Paus. iii. 19. 11, &c; Kleine, Dissert. sect. vii.) The statement that he travelled in Greece appears to be supported by some passages in the fragments of his poems, by the known usage of the early Greek poets, and by the confused tradition preserved by Suidas, that he came to Catana as an exile from Pallantium in Arcadia. For his connection with Catana, and his burial there, we have several testimonies. Suidas says that he was buried by a gate of the city, which was called after him the Stesichorean gate, and that a splendid octagonal monument was erected over his tomb, having eight pillars and eight sets of steps and eight angles; whence, according to some he was derived the name Στριγίχωρος Κρίτος, applied to the throw "all eight" in gaming. (Suid. s. v. πάντα ὀξέα; Pollux, ix. 7; Eustath. ad Hom. pp. 1229, 1397.)

There are extant two early epitaphs on Stesichorus, the one in Greek, by Antipater (Jacobs, Anth. Graec. vol. i. p. 328), the other in Latin (Perrett, Mos. Lapidar. v. 36, p. 534). The people of Thermæ, the town which succeeded Himera, had a bronze statue of the poet, which Cicero describes as statua sentit, inveros, cum libro, summo publico et artificiali factus (Verr. ii. 35). This or another statue formed afterwards one of the treasures of the gymnasion of Zeuxippus at Byzantium. (Christod. Epychr. l. c.) There is also a bronze medall of Himera, bearing on the reverse a man standing, holding a crown in his right hand and a lyre in his left, which some suppose to have been struck in honour of Stesichorus.

Among the ancient writers who celebrated his praises were Cicero (l. c.), Aristides (Orat. vol. i. p. 152, ed. Steph.), Dionysius (de Comp. Verb. vol. ii. p. 28, ed. Sylb.), Longinus (xiii. 3), Dio Chrysostom (p. 559, d. ed. Morell), and Synaesius (Inom. p. 155, b. ed. Paris. 1612), nearly all of whom compare him to Homer in character and style. Quintilian's testimony is, in general, to the same effect, but he blames the language of Stesichorus as diffus (x. i. 62). At Hermopollis, on the contrary, says that his numerous epithets add sweetness to his style (de Fom. Orat. ii. p. 409, ed. Laurent). For other testimonies see Kleine, sect. ix.

Stesichorjus was one of the nine chiefs of lyric poetry recognized by the ancients He stands, with Alcam, at the head of one branch of the lyric art, the choral poetry of the Dorians; for, although he lived fifty years later than Alcam, yet the improvements made by the Himeraeon poet on the chorus were so distinct from, and so far in advance of, those introduced by the Spartan, that he well deserves to share the honour, which some indeed, as we have seen, ascribed to him exclusively, of being the inventor of choral poetry. He was the first to break the monotony of the strophe and antistrophe by the introduction of the epode, and his metres were much more varied, and the structure of his strophes more elaborate, than those of Alcam. His odes contained all the essential elements of the perfect choral poetry of Pindar and the tragedians. For an analysis of his metres, see Kleine, sect. xi.

The subjects of his poems were chiefly heroic; he transferred the subjects of the old epic poetry to the lyrical form, dropping, of course, the continuous narrative, and dwelling on isolated adventures of his heroes. He also composed poems on other subjects. His extant remains are classified by Kleine under the following heads. 1. Mythical Poems, of which we have the following titles: άθλια, Γυμνοι, Κέβεροι, Κόκκοι, Σκυλά, Σούρθημα, Ἑωράνεια, Ἰλνον πέρισ, Νόστοι, Ὕρεστία. 2. Hymns, Encomia, Epithalamia, Paenons: among which were, Παλαιοί Εἰς 'Ελένην, and Ἐπιδαιδήμων Ἐλέως. 3. Erotic Poems, and Scolia: titles, Καλώς, Ραβδία. 4. A pastoral poem, entitled Δάφνις. 5. Fables: Πίντων καὶ Αλαρος, Γεώργων καὶ ἄκτων, Εἰς Δάφνους παράλαεις. 6. Elegies.

The dialect of Stesichorus was Dorian, with an intermixture of the epic. His names were mostly in the Dorian, but sometimes also in the Phrygian mode.

The fragments of Stesichorus have been printed with the editions of Pindar published in 1560, 1566, 1567, 1586, 1589, 1620, and in the collections of the Greek poets published in 1568 and 1569, and recently in the collections of Schneiderin and Bergk. They have also been edited by Suchforth, Gotting. 1771, 4to; by Blomfield, in the Museum Criticam, vol. ii. pp. 256—272, 340—358, 504, 607, and in Gaisford's Poetical Minore Graecet; and by Fr. Kleine, Berol. 1828, 5vo. The last mentioned is by far the most useful edition of the fragments, and the authorities respecting the life and writings of the poet are collected and discussed in a dissertation prefixed to the fragments. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. ii. pp. 151—157; Müller, Hist. of Lit. of Anc. Greece, pp. 197—203; Bernhardy, Grundrisse d. Griech. Litt. vol. ii. pp. 471—477; Kleine, as above quoted.)
STHENELUS.

Mnasippus, and the withdrawal of the Lacedaemonian fleet even before the arrival of Iphicrates, who had superseded Timotheus [MNASIPPOS]. There can be no question as to the identity of the Stesicles of Xenophon with the Ctesicles of Diodorus. But the latter writer tells us that Ctesicles had been sent some time before to Zacynthus, to take the command against the Spartans of the Zacynthian exiles, whom Timotheus had restored. Schneider would reconcile the two authors by supposing that he was ordered to proceed to Zacynthus to Corecyra; nor does this seem so inconsistent with the language of Xenophon as Thrivilantz and Rehdantz represent it. (Xen. Hell. vi. 2. § 10—26; Diod. xv. 46, 47; Schneider, ad Xen. Hell. vi. 2. § 10; Wesseling, ad Dion. xv. 47; Thril- vant's Graeco, vol. v. p. 60; note; Rehdantz, Vitae Iph. Chab. Timothei. iv. § 3.) [E. E.]

STESI'MBROTUS (Στησίμπρωτος), of Thasos, a rhapsodist and historian in the time of Cimon and Pericles, who is mentioned with praise by Plato and Xenophon, and who wrote a work upon Homer, the title of which is not known. He also wrote some historical works, for he is frequently quoted by Plutarch as an authority. There is also a quotation in the Etymologicum Magnum (s. v. 'Παλαβείον) from a work of his on the mysteries, ποπεύματα τοις Κορεαίς (Plut. Per. 3. 1). Xen. Mem. ii. 2. § 10, Sympos. iii. 5; Plut. Graec. pp. 43, 44, ed. Wester- man.) [P. S.]

STHEINO or STHEINO (Στηνός or Σθηνός), one of the Gorgons. (Hes. Theog. 276; Apollod. ii. 4. § 2.) [L. S.]

STHENEBOEA (Σθηνεβοία), a daughter of Jo- bates, or Amphianax or Apheidas, was the wife of Proetus. From love of Bellerophon she made away with herself, whence Bellerophon is called heros Sthenoebeus. (Apollod. ii. 2. § 1, iii. 9. § 1; comp. Proetus and Hippodamus.) [L. S.]

STHENELA/IDAS (Σθηνέλα/δας), a Spartan, who held the office of ephor in B.C. 432, and, in the congress of the Lacedaemonians and their allies at Sparta in that year, vehemently and successfully urged the assembly to declare war with Athens. The speech which Thucydides puts into his mouth on this occasion is strongly marked by the characteristics of Spartan eloquence,— brevity and sim- plicity. (Thuc. i. 85, 86, viii. 5; Paus. iii. 7.) [E. E.]

STHENELAS (Σθηνέλας), a son of Crotopus, father of Gelanor and king of Argos. (Paus. ii. 16. § 1, 19. § 2.) [L. S.]

STHENELA (Σθηνέλα), the name of two mythi- cal personages, one a daughter of Danaus (Apollod. ii. 1. § 5), and the other a daughter of Acastus and mother of Patroclus. (iii. 12. § 8.) [L. S.]

STHENELAS (Σθηνέλας). 1. One of the sons of Aegyptus and husband of Sthenel. (Apollod. ii. 1. § 5.)

2. A son of Melas, who was killed by Tydeus. (Apollod. i. 8. § 5; comp. Oen. s.)

3. A son of Perseus and Andromeda, and hus- band of Nippe, by whom he became the father of Alcinous, Medusa, and Eurythea. (Hom. II. x. 116; Ov. Her. ix. 25; Met. ix. 273; Apollod. ii. 4. § 5, &c.) He was slain by Hyllus, the son of Hercules. (Hygin. Fh. 244.)

4. A son of Androgeos and grandson of Minos; he accompanied Hercules from Paros on his ex- pedition against the Amazons, and together with his brother Alcæus he was appointed by Hercules ruler of Thasos. (Apollod. ii. 5. § 9; comp. Apollon. Rhod. ii. 911, who confines him with No. 5.)

5. A son of Actor, likewise a companion of He- racles in his expedition against the Amazons; but he died and was buried in Paphlegonia, where he afterwards appeared to the Argonauts. (Apollon. Rhod. ii. 911.)

6. A son of Capanes and Evadne, belonged to the family of the Anaxagoridæ in Argos, and was the father of Cylandares (Hom. Il. v. 109; Paus. ii. 18. § 4, 22. § 8, 30. in fin.; but, according to others, his son's name was Cometes. (Tzetz. ad Lyoph. 603, 1093; Serv. ad Aen. xi. 269.) He was one of the Epigoni, by whom Theseus was taken (Hom. Il. iv. 405; Apollod. iii. 7. § 2), and commanded the Argives under Diomedes, in the Trojan war, being the faithful friend and companion of Diomedes. (Hom. II. ii. 564, iv. 367, xxiii. 511; Philostr. Her. 4; Hygin. Fab. 175.) He was one of the Greeks concealed in the wooden horse (Hygin. Fab. 108), and at the distribution of the booty, he was said to have received an image of a three-eyed Zeus, which was in after- days shown at Argos. (Paus. ii. 45. § 3, v. 86, iv. 55. § 11; Xen. Hell. 2.) His image was later wanted to exist at Argos. (ii. 20. § 4, 22. in fin.; comp. Horat. Carm. i. 15, 23, iv. 9, 29; Stat. Aulid. i. 469.)

7. The father of Cyrus, was metamorphosed into a swan. (Ov. Met. ii. 368.) [L. S.]

STH'NELUS (Σθηνέλος), a tragic poet, con- temporary with Aristophanes, who attacked him in the Gerytades and the Wasps. (Aristoph. Vesp. 1312, and the Schol.) The scholar here speaks of him as a tragic actor, which is evidently a mistake, for Harpocration (s. v.) expressly tells us that he was mentioned in the Didascaliae as a tragic poet, and there are several references to him as such. He is mentioned by Aristotele (Poet. 22) with Cleophon, as an example of those poets whose words are well chosen, but whose diction is not at all elevated. The insipidity of his style is happily ridiculed by Aristophanes in the question, "How shall I eat the words of Sthenelus, dipping them in vinegar or in dry salt?" (Geryt. ap. Schol. ad Poes. Luc. 554; Xen. Mem. iii. 2.) His image was later wanted to exist at Argos. (ii. 20. § 4, 22. in fin.; comp. Horat. Carm. i. 15, 23, iv. 9, 29; Stat. Aulid. i. 469.)

STHENIS.

STHENIS (Σθήνης, Σθηνης), the former is the form used by the ancient writers, the latter in the extant inscriptions; a statuary of Olym- thus, is mentioned by Pliny as contemporary with Lyssippus and others, at the 114th Olympiad, a. d. 323. (H. N. xxxii. ix. p. 10.) The false reading of this passage, in the common editions, makes

* That is, in the common editions. In the best manuscripts the word ἅρματρυς is omitted.
Sthenis a brother of Lyistratrus; whereas Lyistratrus was the brother, not of Sthenis, but of Lyssippos: the true reading is given in Silvig's edition.) His works, as enumerated by the same writer, were the following: the statues of Ceres, Jupiter, and Minerva, which stood in the Temple of Concord at Rome, and also flentes martrious, et adorantes, sacrificanteque. (Ibid. § 33.) Other writers mention, as one of the best of his works, the statue of Autolycus, which was carried to Rome by Lucullus, after the taking of Sinope. (Strab. xii. p. 546, a.; Plut. Lucull. 23, Pomp. 10; App. Pann. Mithr. 83.) He also made two statues of Olympic victors, Pytagias and Choeirias. (Paus. vi. 16. § 7, 17. § 3.)

In addition to these notices of the artist, important information may be derived from two extant inscriptions. From one of these we learn that he made a statue of the philosopher Bion, the base of which still exists, bearing the words, STILBE EIOIIEI. (Spon, Miscell. p. 126.) The other, which is of far more consequence, is on one of the fragments of a base discovered at Athens, in 1840, on the plateau in front of the western portico of the Parthenon. This base appears to have been a massive structure of masonry, faced with marble plates, and supporting a group of at least five statues. Several of the marble plates were found, bearing the names of the persons whose statues, dedicated by themselves, the base originally supported, and of the artists who made them, or at least some of them. One of these inscriptions is STILBE EIOIIEI, and another ΑΕΚΙΑΧΡΗΣ EIOIHEI. Hence we learn, not only the true form of the artist's name, but also the important facts, that he exercised his art at Athens, in connexion with the most distinguished artists of the later Attic school, and that he was contemporary with Leochares, who flourished about Ol. 102—111, b. c. 370—335. This furnishes another striking example of the looseness with which Pliny and groups artists together under certain fixed dates. A curious phenomenon is presented by inscriptions on the other sides of this base, bearing the names of Augustus, Drausa, Germanicus, and Trajan, and showing how ancient statues were appropriated. (Ross, Kunstblatt, 1840, No. 32; R. Rochette, Lettre à M. Schorn, pp. 407, 408; Nagler, Künstler-Lexicon, s. v.)

STILBE. [STENIUS]. STENIUS, i. e. "the powerful," or "the strengthening," "a surname of Zeus, under which he had an altar in a rock near Hermione, where Aegus concealed his sword and his shoes, which were found there by Theues after he had lifted up the rock. (Paus. ii. 32. § 7, 34. § 6.) One of the horses of Poseidon also bore the name Stenius. (Schol. ad Hom. ll. xiii. 23.) [L. S.]

STILCHIO. [STHENIUS]. STHENIUS, of Thermae (Himerenses) in Sicily, was a friend of C. Marius, and was therefore accused before Cn. Pompey, when the latter was sent to Sicily by Sulla (Cic. Ferr. ii. 46; comp. Plat. Pomp. 10). The unjust proceedings of Verres against this Sthenius are related at length by Cicero. (Verr. ii. 34—46, comp. iii. 7, v. 42, 43.)

STHENNIS. [STHENIUS]. STICHIOUS (ΣΤΙΧΙΟΥ), a commander of the Athenians in the Trojan war, was slain by Hector. (Hom. ll. xiii. 195, xv. 329.) [L. S.]

STILBE. (ΣΤΙΛΒΗ), a daughter of Peneus and Creusa, became by Apollo the mother of Lapithus and Centaurus. (Diod. iv. 69; Schol. ad. Apollon. Rhod. i. 40.)

STILCHIO (ΣΤΙΛΧΙΟΥ or ΣΤΙΛΧΙΟΥ), the military ruler of the western empire under Honorius, was the son of a Vandal captain of the barbarian auxiliaries of the emperor Valens. Stilicho rose through prowess and great military skill, combined with many other eminent qualities, which made him dear to the army and invaluable to the emperor Theodosius. In a. d. 384, when master equilibrium, he was sent as ambassador to Persia, and through his various accomplishments and agreeable manner of transacting business, so pleased the Persian king, that peace was concluded on terms very advantageous for Rome. On his return, he was made comes domesticus and commander-in-chief of the army; but his greatest reward was the hand of Serena, the niece of Theodosius, whom he married about the same time, from which we may infer the great esteem he enjoyed with his master, and the influence he exercised in the empire. Jealousy soon arose between him and Rufinus, the nefarious minister of Theodosius, which increased after the murder of his friend, the gallant Promotus, who in reward for his victories over the East Goths, was first exiled, and then put out of the way by Rufinus. Jealousy soon waxed to implacable hatred, and a struggle took place between the two rivals, which eventually ended in the destruction of Rufinus.

During the period from Stilicho's return from Persia to the year 394, he distinguished himself by several victories over the barbarians, especially the Bastarnae, and took a prominent part in the government; but the events are not important enough to be mentioned in detail. His influence increased not a little when Theodosius confided to Serena the education of his infant son Honorius, after the death of the empress Flacella, and it rose to its acme in 394. In that year Theodosius proclaimed Honorius Augustus and emperor of the West, Stilicho and Serena being appointed his guardians; and after a touching private speech, with which Theodosius concluded the ceremony, they set out for Rome, where Stilicho took the reins of government. He, as well as Serena, were active in abolishing paganism, which had still a strong root in Rome; but it seems that their zeal was not over pure, since several temples were stripped, by their command, of their silver and gold ornaments, which found their way into the governor's treasury, if at least the report is true, for generally speaking Stilicho was a man of remarkable integrity. The Roman emperor had now five heads—one emperor-in-chief, Theodosius, two sub-emperors, Honorius and Arcadius, and two powerful ministers, Stilicho and Rufinus, both animated by boundless ambition and divided by mortal hatred; so that evils of every description would have sprung up, had not Theodosius been the man fit to govern such heterogeneous elements, and make them all conform to his own will. No sooner, however, did his death take place (394), than the struggle for the mastery broke out between Stilicho and Rufinus. The fall of the latter could be foretold. Rufinus, although possessed of eminent qualities, was a downright scoundrel; while with still higher natural gifts, great military experience, and an eminently better character, Stilicho combined a twofold imperial alliance through his wife Serena and his daughter Maria, who had been betrothed to Honorius in the lifetime of Theodosius, and was married to her soon afterwards. Stilicho began his reign by dividing the imperial treasury in equal shares between Honorius and Arcadius; prevailed upon Honorius to grant the amnesty promised by the late Theodosius to the partisans of the rebel Eugenius; quelled a military outbreak at Milan; and finally set out to make his and the emperor's authority respected in Gaul and Germany, where the barbarians pursued an audacious course of invasions. His march up the Rhine was triumphant, and his force was increased by an alliance with the Suevi and Alamanni. Marcomir, the principal chief of the Franks, fell into his hands, and was sent to Italy, where he ended his days in captivity; the Saxon pirates, the scourge of the northern coast, were severely chastised, and shrunk back into their own seas; and such was the terror caused by the rapid and crushing advance of Stilicho, that the Picts made a sudden flight, and abandoned their native montana, from mere fear that Stilicho would effect a landing on the British coast, although he never did so. All this was achieved in the course of one summer; and Stilicho had no sooner returned to Milan than he set out again for the purpose of ruining Rufinus in Constantinople. One pretext for this expedition was the invasion of Greece by Alaric; another the conducting back of the eastern legions, which were stationed in Italy, and proved a heavy burden to the country. His success in this bold undertaking, and the death of Rufinus, are related in the life of the latter. [Rufinus.]

The downfall of his rival enabled Stilicho to turn the full weight of his power against Alaric, who, in 396, had penetrated into the Peloponnesus. With a powerful army raised in Italy, Stilicho hastened to Greece, and Alaric soon found himself blocked up within that peninsula, whence no escape by land was possible but into their island of Corcyra, which was guarded by a strong Roman force. Owing to the presumption of Stilicho, however, who seems to have thought he had caught his enemy as if in a trap, or perhaps to the negligence of his lieutenants, who might have indulged in similar hopes, Alaric extricated himself from his dangerous position by a rapid march towards the gulf of Corinth; which he crossed at its narrowest point near Rhium, with his whole army, captives and booty, and was soon safely encamped in Epeirus. Thence he carried on negotiations with the ministers of Arcadius, who were afraid that if Alaric were undone, Stilicho would make himself master of the East also, and ere long (398) Alaric was appointed master general of Eastern Illyricum, which was one of the most important posts in the empire of Arcadius. The presence of Stilicho in Greece was now no longer required, and he returned to Italy with rage and thoughts of revenge against Alaric. A war between the two rivals broke out soon afterwards, for which Stilicho made the most active preparations. Nor was he negligent in increasing his authority in Italy, and the people felt his sway, or worshipped his power so much, that in 398 they caused a splendid statue to be erected to him in Rome; in the same year the marriage between his daughter Maria and Honorius was celebrated at Milan. In 400, Stilicho was consul together with Aurelianus, and the honorary titles of pater and dominus were given to him. The war with Alaric had meanwhile taken its course, and in 402 Alaric was driven dangerously to Italy, where the Gothic chief had already shaken off once more his appearance. In 403 Alaric made an irresistible push as far as Milan, whence the emperor Honorius fled to Ravenna, after abandoning, at the persuasion of Stilicho, the cowardly plan of transferring the seat of the empire into Gaul. In this crisis Stilicho acted with surprising boldness, energy, and military wisdom. At the approach of the Goths he hastened to Rhætia, where the main force of the Italian troops was employed against the natives, and after giving the latter a severe chastisement, and compelling them to accept peace, he returned to Milan with the whole of the Rhætian corps. At the same time most of the Roman troops were withdrawn from Gaul and Germany, and even the Caledonian legion was recalled from the frontiers of Britain. With his army thus augmented, he occupied Milan, where he was besieged, and perished in its assa, his brother blockaded by Alaric. However, at the close of March (403), he suddenly sallied out, and at Pollentia (not far from Turin) obtained a decisive victory over the Goths. The dispersion of the barbarians, an immense booty, the rich spoil of Greece and Illyricum, and thousands of captives among whom was the wife of Alaric, were the fruit of this great victory. Soon afterwards Alaric suffered another defeat under the walls of Verona, in consequence of which he withdrew from Italy. Stilicho was rewarded with the honour of a triumph on his return to Rome (404).

These victories and the subsequent increase of influence and power raised the ambition of Stilicho to so high a pitch, that he aspired to make himself master of the whole Roman empire, Eastern and Western. Honorius had no children, and Arcadius only one son, after whose death or removal both the empires would become the inheritance of this fortunate heir, his mother Maria, to whom Stilicho accordingly undertook to marry his own son, Eucherius. This plan, however, could not be executed without the assistance of his mortal foe Alaric; but as ambition prevailed over hatred in both the rivals, Stilicho did not hesitate to make proposals to that effect to the Gothic chief, and Alaric gladly entered into the plan. The concert of their action was for some time interrupted by the invasion of Radagaisus, one of the most dangerous and destructive by which Italy was ever visited, but from which it was delivered by the valor of Stilicho in 406. [Radagaisus.] In the following year (407), Gaul was inundated and laid waste by that innumerable host of Suevi, Vandals, Alani, and Burgundians, who caused the downfall of the Roman authority beyond the Alps, and in the same year the legions in Britain proclaimed Constantine emperor in that province and in Gaul. This torrent of invaders had either no means, or, more probably, no inclination to check, his whole activity being absorbed by his schemes upon Constantinople and his intrigues with Alaric. Already had he thrown the gauntlet to the ministers of Arcadius, by annexing all Illyricum to the Western Empire, whither he sent Jovinus as prefect, and his lofty plans became manifest after Alaric had openly renounced his allegiance to the Eastern court, and entered into that of the Western, upon which Stilicho compelled the subservient senate of Rome to elect Alaric a member of their body. Fortune, however, began to turn her back upon the ever successful master of Italy. Maria, the wife of Honorius, having died, Serena proposed her second daughter Theramantia (Aemilia Materna) to him, when Stilicho opposed the project, as any issue arising out of this new marriage would thwart his plan of obtaining both the empires for his son Eucherius. Serena, however, carried her point, and the marriage took place accordingly. Soon afterwards Arcadius died, and was succeeded by his son Theodosius the younger, for whom his excellent mother Pulcheria reigned with sovereign power. The influence of Honorius, where dangerous court intrigues sprang up, in which the arbitrary rule of Stilicho found an unforeseen check. It was evident that the emperor secretly followed the advice of other counselors than his father-in-law, and among those the crafty Olympius soon became conspicuous. Stilicho was not the man to be taken by surprise by such intrigues; and since he was as crafty as he was bold, he coolly informed the emperor that he would at last settle the business in Illyricum, where Jovinus was only nominal prefect, if he was there at all, and go thither with the legions to annex it finally to the Western Empire. For the first time in his life, Honorius firmly opposed the will of Stilicho, on the pretext that he would not rob his nephew of his paternal inheritance. At the same time he declared that he would leave Rome, whither he had been compelled to accompany his father-in-law, and take up his former residence at Ravenna. His eyes had been opened by Olympius, who had seen through the plan of Stilicho's going to Illyricum, and could not but consider it as a means of making war upon both the emperors at once, and of seizing by force of arms what he could not obtain by intrigues and negotiations. Honorius consequently set out for Ravenna. He was received with shouts of acclamation by the troops assembled in the camp of Pavia, who were preparing for a campaign in Gaul, and had been secretly worked upon by Olympius. Honorius addressed the troops in a long and artful speech. Suddenly they rose in uproar against the partisans of Stilicho, and a terrible bloodshed ensued: the prefect praetorius of Gaul and Italy, a magistrate equitum, a magister militum, the quaestor Salvisius, and his namesake Salvius, the comes domesticus, besides many other high functionaries, fell victims to the fury of the army. Stilicho, full of sinister forebodings, assembled round him his remaining partisans in the camp of Bologna, where he was then staying, but to their surprise and indignation he declined to follow their plan of immediately hastening to Pavia, and putting down Olympius and the whole rebellion. His hesitation in adopting energetic means in such an alternative caused his ruin. His own most faithful friends now turned against him. Sarus was the first to act. [SARUS.] He surprised the camp of Stilicho, and cut his body-guard to pieces in the conflict. Stilicho fled to Ravenna, where he shut himself up after summoning the principal cities of Italy to declare against the barbarian mercenaries of the emperor. The confusion increasing, a council of churchmen took place soon arrived with a chosen body of troops, and a warrant to seize the person of the fallen minister, to whom safety of life was promised. Stilicho trusted to the promise and left the church, but was immediately seized and massacred. He suffered death with the calm stoicism of an ancient Roman. His property was confiscated, and cruel persecutions were instituted against his family; his son Eucherius took to flight, but was seized, dragged from one place to another, and finally put to death. The marriage of Honorius and Theramantia was dissolved, but she was allowed to lead an obscure life with her mother Serena, and died seven years afterwards. The friends of Stilicho were persecuted with cruel rigour, their blood flowed in torrents, and their families were disgraced and proscribed. Olympius had become the successor of Stilicho. (Claudian. [ W. P.]

STILIO, L. AEILUS PRAECONIMUS, a Roman eques, was one of the earliest grammarians at Rome, and also one of the most celebrated. Cicero describes him as most learned in Greek and Roman literature, and especially well acquainted with ancient Latin works. Aelius gave instruction in grammar to Varro, who speaks of him with the greatest respect, and frequently quotes him; and he was also one of Cicero's teachers in rhetoric. He received the surname of Praecominus, because his father had been a praeco, and that of Stilo on account of his compositions. He belonged to the aristocratical party in the state, and accompanied Q. Metellus Numidicus into exile in a. c. 100, and, on his return, took up a house in Rome in the following year. Aelius, however, did not aspire himself to any of the offices of state, and did not speak in public; but he wrote orations for many of his friends, such as Q. Metellus, Q. Caepio, Q. Pompeius Rufus and Cotta, upon which Cicero does not bestow much commendation. It was by his grammatical works that he acquired the most celebrity. He wrote Commentaries on the Songs of the Sallii and on the Twelve Tables, a work De Proloquiis, &c. He and his son-in-law, Ser. Claudius, may be regarded as the founders of the study of grammar at Rome. Some modern writers suppose that the work on Rhetoric ad C. Herennium, which is printed in the editions of Cicero, is the work of this Aelius, but this is mere conjecture. [Comp. Vol. I. pp. 726, 727.]

STILPO (Στίλπος), the Greek philosopher, was Megara, the son of Euleides, or as is more in accordance with the chronological notices to be presently adduced, of Pasicles of Thebes, a disciple of Euleides. Other authorities mention Thrasymachus of Corinth as his father. (Diog. Laërt. ii. 118, comp. vi. 89, and Suid. s. e.) According to one account, he did not discourse in dialectical encounters with Diodorus Cronus at the court of Potomeneus Soter; according to another, he did not comply with the invitation of the king to go to Alexandria. We are further told that Demetrius, the son of Antigonus, honoured him no less, spared his house at the capture of Megara (Ol. 121, 3), and offered him indemnity for the injury which it had received, which, however, Stilpo declined. (Diog. Laërt. ii. 115. Plat. Demetr. c. 9, &c.) Uniting elevated sentiment (φθυσμός) with gentleness and patience (μετροποιεῖται), he, as Plutarch says (adv. Colot. c. 22), was an ornament to his countrymen, and had no man among them, which his character of wine and voluptuousness he is said to have entirely overcome (Cic. de Fato, c. 5); in inventive power and dialectic art (σοφοτελεία) to have surpassed his contemporaries, and to have inspired almost all Hellas with a devotion to the Megarian philosophy. A number of distinguished men too are named, whom he is said to have drawn away from Aristotle, Theophrastus, and others, and attached to himself (Diog. Laërt. ii. 113, comp. 119, 120); among others Crates the Cynic, and Zeno, the founder of the Stoic school. (ib. 114.) Not less commendation is bestowed upon his political wisdom, his simple, straightforward dispositions, and the equanimity with which he endured the fate of being the father of a degenerate daughter (ib. 114, comp. Plat. de tranq. animi, c. 6). Of the nine dialogues, which were ascribed to him, and which are described as being of a somewhat frigid kind, we have placed in a prominent point of view the self-sufficiency of it. He maintained that the wise man ought not only to overcome every evil, but not even to be affected by any, not even to feel it. (Seneca, Epist. 9, comp. Plat. de tranq. animi, 6, Diog. Laërt. ii. 114), and in that way outbids not only the Stoics, but even the Cynics. Thence too, probably, his collisions with Crates, referred to in the verses of the latter (ap. Diog. Laërt. ii. 118), and in the otherwise very tasteless anecdote repeated by Diogenes Laertius. (ii. 117, &c.) Whether he was in earnest in his antagonism to the popular polytheistic faith, and whether and how the Areopagus in Athens stepped in, cannot be gathered from the childish statements of such a silly writer as Diogenes. (Diog. Laërt. ii. 116, &c.)

STIMULA. [Ch. A. D.]

STIMULA, the name of Seneile, according to the pronunciation of the Romans. (Livy, xxxix. 12; August. De Civ. Dei, iv. 11, 16; Ov. Fast. vi. 503.) Augustin is wrong in deriving the name from stimulus. (Müller, Etrusk. ii. p. 77.) [L. S.]

STIPAX. [STIPAX].

STOBAXEUS, JOANNEs (Ἰωάννης ὁ Στοβαῖος), derived his surname apparently from being a native of Stobi in Macedonia. Of his personal history we know nothing. Even the age in which he lived cannot be fixed with accuracy. He lived, at all events, later than Hierothes, whom he quotes. Probably he did not live very long after him, as he quotes no work of a later date. His studious avoidance of all Christian sentiments, together with the probability that Stobaeus was a heathen, through his name would rather indicate a Christian, or at least the son of Christian parents. Though Stobaeus is to us little more than a name, we are indebted to him for a very valuable collection of extracts from earlier Greek writers. Stobaeus was a man of extensive reading, in the course of which he noted down the most interesting passages. The materials which he had collected in this way he arranged, in the order of subjects, as a repertory of valuable and instructive sayings, for the use of his son Septimius. This collection of extracts he divided into four books, and published under the title Ἰωάννης Στοβαῖος ἐκλογῶν, ἀποφθηγμάτων, ἐπιθηκῶν βιβλία τέσσαρα. This, however, is not exactly the form in which the work has come down to us. In most of the manuscripts there is a division into three books, forming two distinct works; the first and second books forming one work under the title Elogia florileg. or Sermones, and the third book forming another work, called Ἀρτοβληγών (Florilegion or Sermones). Some have supposed in consequence that the fourth book is lost. This, however, is not the case. Photius (Cod. 167) has preserved a detailed table of contents of all four books; and on comparing the contents of the Florilegium with the table of the contents of the third and fourth books of the original arrangement, it is perfectly evident that the Florilegium consists of both those books combined in one. It is true that according to Photius the third and fourth books together contained 100 chapters, while the Florilegium contains 126 (ed. Gaisford). This, however, may easily have arisen from a subdivision of some of the longer chapters by the抄写者. There seems no sufficient reason for supposing that Stobaeus originally arranged his extracts in two separate works. The table of contents in Photius is sufficiently fall to allow of the restoration of the original subdivision of the Florilegium into the third book forming another work, called Ἀρτοβληγών (Florilegion or Sermones) into two books, answering precisely to those which were in the edition of Stobaeus used by Photius. The two books of Elogues consist for the most part of extracts conveying the views of earlier poets and prose writers on points of physics, dialectics, and ethics. The Florilegium, or Sermones, is devoted to subjects of a moral, political, and economical kind, and maxims of practical wisdom. We learn from Photius that the first book of the Elogues was preceded by a dissertation on the advantages of philosophy, an account of the different schools of philosophy, and a collection of the opinions of ancient writers on geometry, music, and arithmetic. The greater part of this introduction is lost. The close of it only, where arithmetic is spoken of, is still extant. The first book was divided into sixty chapters, the second into forty-six, of which thirty only possess the first nine. The third book originally consisted of forty-two chapters, and the fourth of forty-eight. Each chapter of the Elogues and Sermones is headed by a title describing its matter. The extracts quoted in illustration begin usually with passages from the poets, after whom come historians, orators, philosophers and physicians. Photius has given an alphabetical list of above 500 Greek writers from whom Stobaean has taken extracts, arranged according to their different classes, as philosophers, poets, &c. The works of the greater part of these have perished. To Stobaean we are indebted for a large proportion of the fragments that remain of the lost works of poets. Euripides seems to have been an especial favourite with him. He has quoted about 500 passages from him in the Sermones, 150 from Sophocles, and above 200 from Menander. In extracting from prose writers, Stobaean sometimes quotes verbatim, sometimes gives only an epitome of the passage. The latter mode is more common in the Eschylus than in the Sophocles. With regard to such passages the question has been raised, whether Stobaean quoted at first hand, or from some collection similar to his own. It is at least clear that he had Plutarch's collection of the opinions of philosophers before him, and that in its complete form. A detailed account of the contents of so miscellaneous a collection as that of Stobaean would be foreign to the purpose of the present work. For tables of contents the reader may consult Photius (l. c.) and Fabricius (Bibl. Gr. vol. ix. p. 574, &c.).

The first portion of the work of Stobaean that was published was the Sermones, edited by Franc. Trincavelli (Venice, 4to. 1536) under the title 'Iademus iudicio Stobaei eloquentiae argumenta. Three editions of the same portion were published by Conrad Gesner, with the title Kepoi A'kata- thetai, Κατεχόμενα και ἐπιτομα (ναι ἐκ. ἀνιματ. καὶ ἀνθρωπ. αὐτωτοῦ) at Zürich in 1543, at Basle in 1549, and at Zúrich in 1559, fol. The best edition of the Sermones or Florilegium is that by Gaisford (Oxford, 1822, 4 vols. 8vo.).

The first edition of the Eschylus was that by Canter (Antwerp, 1575, fol.). The best edition is that by A. H. L. Heeren (Gotting. 1792—1801, in 4 vols. 8vo.). The only edition of the whole of Stobaean together is one published at Geneva in 1609, fol. (Schöff, Gesch. der griech. Literatur. vol. iii. p. 395, &c.).

STOLO, C. LICINNIUS CALVUS. [CALV.
VUS, No. 4.]

STOIMUS (Στίθμος), a satyrus, who made the statue of Hieronymus of Andros, to celebrate his victory at Olympia over Tisamenus of Elis, the seer who was afterwards present at the battle of Plateae. (Paus. vi. 14. § 5.) If the statue was made soon after the victory, the artist's age would of course fall at or just before the beginning of the Persian Wars, b. c. 500 or 490. (Thiersch, Epochen, p. 202.)

STRAVAX, a sculptor, known by an inscription on a pedestal found on the Acropolis, in front of the western portico of the Parthenon. This pedestal bears two inscriptions; the one is on the front, from which we learn that it supported an ornamental statue erected by the Areopagus; the other is on the top, by the side of the print of two bronze feet, and runs thus: ΣΤΡΑΒΑΣΕΙΟΤΗΣ. From the form of the letters, Ross supposes that the artist lived in the middle of the 4th century. b. c., that is, in the time of Praxiteles. (Ross, in Gerhard's Archäologische Zeitung for 1844, p. 243; year of his birth is not ascertained; but it has been fixed by some writers by a conjecture founded on several passages in the geography, about B.C. 66. In B.C. 29 Strabo was at Gyasos, and on his voyage to Corinth. Octavianus Caesar was then at Corinth, and on his road to Italy to celebrate the triumph of his victory at Actium (p. 485). Strabo was probably on his way to Italy and Rome, where he spent several years. In B.C. 24, Strabo was with his friend Aelius Gallus in Egypt, and travelled as far as Syene (p. 816). It is assumed that he must have been a man of mature years when he first visited Rome, but there is nothing which justifies the conjecture of making him eight and thirty at the time of this visit, in order to establish B.C. 66 as the year of his birth.

A passage in which Strabo says (p. 569) that he saw P. Servilius Isauricus, has given rise to some discussion. This Servilius defeated the Isauri, whence some got the name Isauricus, between B.C. 77 and 75; and he died at Rome in B.C. 44, at the age of ninety. If Strabo saw this Isauricus, when did he see him? As the question cannot be satisfactorily answered, it has been assumed that Strabo confounded Isauricus with some other distinguished Roman whom he saw in Asia in his youth, or that he has confounded him with the son P. Servilius Cassa, who was also called Isauricus. But it is clear that Strabo means to say that he saw the Isauricus who got his name from the conquest of the Isaurians. The assumed date, B.C. 66, for the birth of Strabo, is too early. He was certainly writing as late as A.D. 18; and perhaps we may with Clinton place his birth not later than B.C. 54. But Strabo was a pupil of Tyrannio the grammarian (p. 549), and Tyrannio was made prisoner by Lucullus in B.C. 71, and carried to Rome, probably not later than B.C. 66, and perhaps earlier. Strabo therefore was a hearer of Tyrannio at some other time.

The name Strabo (squint-eyed) is originally Greek, though it was also used by the Romans, and applied as a cognomen, among others, to the father of Pompeius Magnus. How the geographer got this name we are not informed.

Groskurd infers that Strabo died about A.D. 24. Strabo (lib. xii. p. 576) says that Cyzicus was still a free state; but in A.D. 25, Cyzicus lost its privilege as a Libern Civitas (amusier libertaten; Tacit. Ann. iv. 36; Dion Cass. liv. 7). Accordingly, Groskurd concludes that Strabo was dead in A.D. 25; but this is not a necessary conclusion. We can only conclude that the passage about Cyzicus was written before A.D. 25. In the seventeenth and last book (p. 628, &c.) he mentions the death of Juba II. as a recent occurrence, and he also mentions the fact of Juba being succeeded by his son Ptolemeus. Juba died in A.D. 21. The conclusion that Strabo died in A.D. 24 is unsupported by any evidence. We only know that he died after A.D. 21. Groskurd's reckoning makes Strabo attain the age of ninety. In fact he may have lived after A.D. 25, and may have been more than ninety when he died; but as the year of his birth is unknown, we cannot fix the limit of his age.

As to the time at which he wrote his work, we know nothing more than can be collected from particular passages, and we cannot with certainty infer from a particular passage in a book being written after a given time, that the whole book was written after such time; but Groskurd does make such inferences. At the close of the sixth book (p. 280) Strabo speaks of Caesar Germanicus as still living. Germanicus died in Syria in A.D. 20 (19); and Groskurd concludes that the sixth book was written in A.D. 19. The true conclusion is that this passage was written before A.D. 19. It has been shown that Strabo was writing after A.D. 19, and yet the passage at the end of the sixth book stands as he wrote it, though Germanicus was dead when he wrote the passage about Juba II. in the seventeenth book. This shows that the inference from particular passages should be the strict logical inference and no more. A passage in the fourth book (p. 206) certainly was written in A.D. 19, for Strabo there states that the Carni and Taurisci had quietly paid tribute for thirty-three years; and both these tribes were reduced to subjection by Tiberius and Drusus in B.C. 14. Strabo concludes thus: "if Strabo wrote his fourth book in his eighty-fifth year, and if we allow him two years for the composition of the first three books, he will have commenced his work in the eighty-third year of his age; and since he finished it in his eighty-eighth or ninth year, we may allow for the composition of the whole work six or seven years." This conclusion as to the age when Strabo began his work depends on the date of his birth, which is unknown; and the conclusion as to the times at which he wrote particular books is not certain.

Strabo had a good education. Tyrannio of Amius in Pontus, a professor of grammar, is mentioned by Strabo as his teacher (p. 548); but if Tyrannio went to Rome soon after the capture of Amius, Strabo must have heard him at Rome; and if he did not hear him at Rome as a youth, he must have heard him when he was of mature years. This question about Tyrannio is not clear. See Clinton, Hist. Hellen. B.C. 58. Strabo also received instruction in grammatical and rhetoric from Aristodemus, at Nyssa in Caria (p. 650); and he afterwards studied philosophy under Xenarchus of Seleneia in Cilicia (p. 670), but Strabo does not say that he heard him in Cilicia. Xenarchus finally taught at Rome, where he died. Boethus of Sidon, afterwards a Stoical philosopher, was the companion of Strabo in his Aristotelian studies (p. 757). Strabo seems to have had only moderate mathematical and astronomical knowledge, and certainly he did not possess all the knowledge of his times. He was well acquainted with history and the mythological traditions of his nation; and also with the Greek poets, and particularly with Homer. He must have had competent means to obtain a good education, and as he travelled a great deal and apparently had no professional or other occupation, we may conclude that his work was driven partly by curiosity. It does not appear where he was living while he wrote his work, but wherever it was, he had opportunities of being acquainted with the chief public events that took place in the Roman empire.

The philosophical sect to which Strabo belonged was the Stoical, as appears plainly enough from many passages in his Geography. He wrote a historical work, intitled Ιστορικά Τροπονίατα, which he mentions himself, and it is also cited by Plutarch (Lucullus, 28, Sulla, 26), who calls him Strabo the philosopher. This work, in forty-three books, began where the history of Polybius ended, and was probably continued to the battle of Ac-tium (Greece, Transl. of Strabo, i. p. 21).

Strabo was a great traveller, and much of his geographical information is the result of his own observation. In a passage in the second book of his Geography (p. 117) he says, "I shall accordingly describe partly the lands and seas which I had travelled through myself, partly what I have found credible in those who have given me information orally or by writing. Westwards I have travelled from Armenia to the parts of Tyrrhenaia adjacent to Sardinia; towards the south from the Euxine to the borders of Ethiopia. And perhaps there is not one among those who have written geographies who has visited more places than I have between these limits; for those who have gone further to the west have not gone so far to the east; and others who have gone further wards the east, have not advanced so far to the west: and the case is the same with the regions between the northern and the southern limits."

He expressly mentions in his work having seen the following countries and places: Egypt, Corinth, the island Gyares; Populonium, near Elba; Comana in Cappadochia; Ephesus; Mylasa, Amasia, Nysa, and Hierapolis in Phrygia. It follows, from this enumeration, that he must have seen a great number of other places. The meagre and incorrect description which he gives of many districts and towns may perhaps be taken as evidence that he derived his knowledge of them only from books; whereas on the contrary, the fulness and accuracy of his description, in other cases, may be good evidence that he had visited them with his own eyes.

It is certain that he saw very little of Greece:
he visited Corinth, Argos, Athens, Megara, and the neighbourhood of those places, but this was all.
He saw no more of the Peloponnesus than he would see in going to Argos, and he did not know that the remains of Myceana still existed (p. 372).
It seems probable that he merely passed through Greece on his way to Brundusium, by which route he probably reached Rome. Populonium and Luna were the limit of his travels to the north in Italy. It was probably in Rome that he obtained his information about the countries which lie north of the Alps, Gallia, Germany, and also Britain, and Spain. During his visit to Egypt he stayed some time in Alexandria, and he went up the river to Syene and Philae, the southern limits of Egypt. That he did not remain in Egypt, we may safely assume; but it is not clear by what route he left it, and the conjectures upon this matter are merely guesses.

The oldest writings of the Greeks, the Homeric poems, contain geographical description blended with history and fable. In the early period of Greek literature, geography was nothing more than local description, and the description was made for other purposes than geography: it was subservient to poetry. The Ionian school may be considered as having made a step towards geographical science by the attention which they paid to celestial phænomena, but they did nothing directly for geography. The history of Herodotus is the earliest extant work in which geographical description is blended with an historical subject.

But Herodotus still retains marks of the characteristic early literature of Greece: his history is an epic poem; his general geography still bears the mythical stamp. That which gives so much real value to his work is his own personal observation, and the truthfulness of his description.
He is the first extant writer who has treated on physical geography, and on the causes now in operation by which the earth's surface is continually undergoing change. The connection of geography and history henceforth subsisted, as we see in the extant Greek and Roman historians, and in the Anaehociia of Arrian, which is founded on works that are now lost. The first systematic writer on geography was Eratosthenes, who preceded Strabo by about three centuries. The work of Erotos-thenes was not confined to political and topograp hical description: of the three books, into which the work was distributed, it is said that the third only contained particular description, and the first and second contained a history of geography, a criticism of the sources of which the author availed himself, and matters pertaining to physical and mathematical geography: the whole was accompanied by a new map of the world. Though this work was severely criticised by Hipparchus, it does not appear that the Greeks had any other systematic treatise on geography before that of Strabo. But the materials for a geographical writer had been greatly increased between the time of Erotosthenes and Strabo, and those materials were partly furnished by historical writers, and adventurers by sea and land: the conquests of the Romans also had opened countries which were almost unknown to the contemporaries of Erotosthenes.

There is no ground for viewing the Geography of Strabo as a new edition of that of Erotosthenes, thought it may have been drawn from the treatise of Erotosthenes furnished the foundation for his new undertaking, and also furnished him with many materials, which however he had to examine, to correct, and to add to. Strabo's work, according to his own expression, was not intended for the use of all persons; and indeed no complete geographical work can be adapted to those who have not the necessary elementary knowledge.
His work was intended for all who had a good education, and particularly for those who were engaged in the higher departments of administration; it was designed to be a work which would give such persons that geographical and historical information about each country which a person engaged in matters political cannot do without. Consistently with this view, his plan does not comprehend minute description, except when the place or the object is of great interest or importance; nor is his description limited to the physical characteristics of each country; it comprehends the important political events of which each country has been the theatre, a notice of the chief cities and the great men who have illustrated them; in short, whatever was most characteristic and interesting in every country. His work forms a striking contrast with the geography of Ptolemaeus, and the dry list of names, occasionally relieved by something added to them, in the geographical portion of the Natural History of Plinius. It is in short a book intended for reading, and it may be read; a kind of historical geography.

Strabo's work has a particular value to us of the present time; not merely from his own method of handling the subject: he has preserved a great number of historical facts for which we have no other evidence than his work. His language is generally clear, except in those passages where the text has been corrupted; it is appropriate to the matter, simple and without affectation.

It is objected to Strabo that he has undervalued Herodotus, and puts him on the same footing as Ctesias. The work of Herodotus was perhaps hardly appreciated, as it deserved to be, by any writer of antiquity; and it is a well grounded complaint against Strabo that he could not or did not choose to discriminate between the stories which Herodotus tells simply as stories which he heard, and that which is the result of the personal observation of Herodotus. There are many parts of the geography of Strabo, particularly his description of Greece, for which he could have derived excellent materials from Herodotus. Strabo has maintained the notion, which had prevailed from the time of Alexander the Great, that the Caspian sea was connected with the northern ocean. Herodotus states it to be a lake, without expressing any doubt on the matter; but how he got this information, it is impossible to conjecture. Strabo did not consider such a fable as the voyage of Mys was more reasonable, and he supposed him to give some evidence, such as he had, of its supposed connection with the northern ocean. He rejects the evidence of Pytheas of Marseille, as to the northern regions of Europe, and treats him as no better than a liar, a circumstance in some measure due to Strabo's attachment to his own system; but an unprejudiced critic should have discovered truth even when it is mixed with fable. Strabo's authorities are nearly exclusively Greek. He had a contempt for the Roman writers generally; and certainly simply as geographers there was not one among them who could be called by that name. But the campaigns of the Romans and their historical writings and memoirs would have furnished him with many valuable geographical facts both for his Asiatic and European Geography. He made some use of Caesar's writings for his description of Gallia, the Alps, and Britain, and he used other materials also, as for instance from his brief notice of the voyages of Publius Crassus to the Cassiterides (p. 176). But with this exception, and the writings of Asinus Pollio, Fabius Fictor, and an anonymous chorographer, he drew little from Roman sources. The conjecture that he was imperfectly acquainted with the Latin language, will not sufficiently account for this, even if we suppose that he did not learn it till he visited Rome; for he might easily have learned Latin enough during his residence in Italy to read a Roman author, and if he did choose to do that, he could have found plenty of Greeks and Romans to help him. That he could not have wanted the means of procuring information, we may safely assume, for Strabo could not have travelled so much if he were a poor man. He certainly did not take pains to make the most of the Roman materials which he might have found in Rome.

The imperfect descriptions in many parts of Strabo's work are probably to be attributed more to system than to want of information. He purposely omitted many things and many places as not being comprehended within his notion of what would be useful for the class of persons for whom he wrote.

It was probably also his object to bring his work within a certain compass, so as not to damage its circulation by its magnitude, for as books were to be copied, and as a man wrote in order to have readers, an object which Strabo clearly admits, the reduction of works within reasonable limits was at that time, even more than now, necessary, in order to ensure their circulation.

The use that Strabo has made of Homer, is another objection to his work. Like many other Greeks, Strabo viewed the old national poet as the representative of all knowledge; and considered with respect to his own time, the Homeric poems are the representation of all that was then known, at least of history and geography. But the way in which Strabo, particularly in his first book, labours to give a meaning to what the poet has said, is highly uncritical. That which Homer darkly knew or half guessed, has no value except as an index of the state of geographical knowledge at that time, and was entirely useless in the age of Strabo. Though the Homeric poems show a great acquaintance with the topography of Greece and the islands of the Archipelago, they could not with any propriety be made the basis of a geographical description of those parts, as Strabo has made them; and that work was accordingly how incomplete, which Strabo should have used in preference to the Homeric poems, and which he either did not look for or purposely neglected. Thus his description sometimes becomes rather a commentary on Homer than an independent description, based on the actual state of knowledge. In fact he did not conceive his object with that clearness, which is necessary to give to a work a distinctive character; and though his work is doubtless much more entertaining than that of Eratosthenes was, and more nearly approaches to the character of a true geographical system than the meagre determinations of Ptolemaeus, it does not fulfil all the conditions of a general systematic geography.

It is another defect in Strabo's work that the science of astronomy was not properly applied by him. The determination of the earth's figure, and the determination of position by the measures of latitude and longitude are the essential foundations of geographical description, and the knowledge of the earth's surface, which is the proper object of geography, requires the determination of position, in order to give it precision. Though Strabo had some mathematical and astronomical knowledge, he undervalued these sciences as helps to geography, and he did not consider the exact division of the earth into climates, in the sense in which Hipparchus used the term, and the statement of the latitudes and longitudes of places, which in many cases were pretty well determined, as essential to his geographical description. He is also frequently very incomplete and unsatisfactory in his notice of the physical character and the natural phenomena of the countries which he describes, which defect and others in his work are probably in a great measure due to the circumstance that the notion of a geographical description was by no means well settled then; and indeed the same remark applies in some degree to the whole work of the present day. The true medium between a pure description of the earth's surface as a natural phenomenon and the earth's surface as the scene of human activity, both past and present, cannot be determined by any general rule, but must be left to the tact and judgment of a writer who is thoroughly master of his matter, and who sees by a kind of intuition what must be admitted within his work and what may be properly omitted.
The first two books of Strabo are an introduction to his Geography, and much the most difficult part of the work. A good commentary upon them would in fact be a criticism on all ancient geography up to Strabo's time. He began the first book with showing the importance and geographical knowledge and its uses. He then passes to Homer, whom he considers the earliest of geographers, and defends against many of the objections of Eratosthenes. In this book he points out some errors of Eratosthenes, and makes various remarks on the causes which operate to change the earth's surface. He concludes with some corrections of the errors of Eratosthenes, as to the extent and division of the inhabited part of the earth.

The second book is mainly occupied with mathematical geography. It contains a criticism of the map of the world by Eratosthenes, and of his division of the habitable earth into portions (σφαιραίδες); an examination of the doctrines of Posidonius, particularly the division into six zones adopted by him and by Polybius; with remarks on the supposed circumnavigation of Libya by Eudoxus, and on some errors of Polybius. He also gives his own views on the form and magnitude of the earth, and of the extent of the habitable part of it; and remarks upon the delineation of the earth, on spheres and surfaces, and on a map of the world. He also gives a general sketch of the earth's habitable surface, with reference to seas, countries, and nations; and concludes with explaining the doctrine of climates and of the shadows projected by objects in consequence of the sun's varying position with respect to them.

In the third book he begins his description: he devotes eight books to Europe; six to Asia; and the seventeenth and last to Egypt and Libya. The third book comprises the description of Iberia, and Spain and Portugal, for which his principal authorities are Artemidorus, Polybius, and Posidonius, all of whom had visited Iberia. Artemidorus was also an authority for his knowledge of the sea-coast in general, both that of the Mediterranean, and that of the Ocean. At the end of this book he speaks of the Casamides.

The fourth book treats of Gallia according to its four-fold division under Augustus, of Britain, the description of which is meagre, of Jerne or Ireland, of Thule, and of the Alps. His principal authorities are the same as for the third book, with the addition of C. Julius Caesar, who is his only authority for Britain, with the exception of some little matter from Pytheas. Polybius is his authority for the description of the Alps. But it is plain that he also obtained matter for his fourth book from oral communications during his residence in Italy.

In the fifth and sixth books Strabo describes Italy and the adjacent islands, and his description begins with North Italy, or Gallia Cisalpina, and the country of the Ligures, for which Polybius is his chief authority, though with respect to this and other parts of Italy he derived much information from his own personal observation. Eratosthenes, Artemidorus, Ephorus, Fabius Pictor, Cœcilius, the Sicilian, and an anonymous chorographer are his main written authorities for the description of Italy. The anonymous chorographer is supposed to be a Roman, because he gives distances in Roman miles and not in Greek stadia. Some critics have conjectured that this chorographer is M. Vipsanius Agrippa, but this work of Agrippa, says Groskurd, was not completed and published until after his death, and in n. c. 12, and consequently much too late for Strabo to have made use of it between n. c. 29 and 26, at Rome. The translator here assumes that he has fixed Strabo's residence at Rome during this period, whereas he cannot be proved, and if it could, the argument would not even then be conclusive. It is a better objection to the supposition of this chorographer being Agrippa, "that Strabo made use of this work only for Italy, perhaps also southern Gaul, and for no other country, and yet it extended over the whole Roman empire." The fifth book concludes with a description of Campania, partly from his own knowledge and partly from Antiochus of Syracuse and the others.

In the sixth book he describes Southern Italy and Sicily, with the adjacent islands; and adds at the end a short sketch of the extent and actual condition of the Roman Empire.

In the seventh book he treats of the nations of northern and eastern Europe, including those north of the Ister, and south of the Euphrates, the Illyricum, Pannonia, Dalmatia, the coast of Thrace, the Pontus, and Epirus, with some notices of Macedonia and Thrace. That part of the book which treated of Macedonia and Thrace is lost; and all that we have in place of it is a meagre epitome. Strabo does not state his authorities for what he says of the Germans; but for the other northern nations he had the work of Posidonius. For the tracts south of the Ister he had the lost work of Aristotle on the constitution of states, Polybius, Posidonius, Theopompus, and Ephorus.

The eighth, ninth, and tenth books comprehend the description of Hellas and the Islands, and, as already observed, Homer is the basis of his description. The treatment of the subject in these three books differs considerably from that in the rest of the work: it is chiefly antiquarian and mythological. Heeren maintains that Strabo visited all Hellas and the islands of the Archipelago, but it is not easy to prove this from his work, and the defects of his description are better evidence for the opinion that he saw very little of the Peloponnesus and of Greece north of the Isthmus.

The eleventh book begins with the description of Asia, which is considered as separated from Europe by the Tanais or Don. Strabo follows Eratosthenes in dividing Asia into two large masses, a northern and a southern mass; a natural division determined by the direction of the mountain range of Taurus from west to east. The first or northern division, that on this side Taurus, comprehends four parts, of which the first comprises the country between the Tanais, the Maeotis, the Pontus, and the Caspian; the second comprises the tracts east of the Caspian, and Taurus itself; the third comprises the countries south of the Caucasus, Media, Armenia, and Cappadocia; and the fourth Asia Minor, from the Ilyis. The first three parts are described in the eleventh book, and the fourth, with Cappadocia and Pontus, in the twelfth, thirteenth, and fourteenth books. For the first part, comprised in the eleventh book, Strabo might, and probably did obtain much oral information in his native country; some little he derived from Herodotus, and still more from Artemidorus, Eratosthenes, and the historians of the Mithridatic wars, among whom was Theopompus, the friend of Pom-
In the seventeenth and last book Strabo describes Egypt, Ethiopia, and the north coast of Libya. He had been in Egypt as far as the first cataracts, and his description of this country and of its ancient monuments is one of the most complete parts of his work. Besides the information that he could collect in Alexandria, he had Eratosthenes, Eudorus, Aristeo, Polybius, and Posidonius. For the Ammonium he had the historians of Alexander, whom Arrian afterwards used; and for Ethiopia the authority of Petronius, who had carried on war there, and also Agatharchides and Herodatus. As to the country of the Libyans and the tribes Strabo says little that is new; but he made use of Eratosthenes, Artemidorus, Posidonius, and Iphicrates, who wrote a work on the plants and animals of Libya.

Strabo's historical work is mentioned by Josephus (Jewish Antig. xiv. 7) and by Plutarch. His geographical work is only mentioned by Marcianus of Heraclea, at the commencement of his Peripitus, Athenaeus, and by Herodian in his Lexicon of the Ten Orators (Δέκαοντες). It was largely used by Stephanus of Byzantium, in the fifth century. It is not quoted by Pausanias, which is not surprising; but it is somewhat singular that Plinius does not refer to it in his Natural History, a circumstance which justifies the conclusion that he was not acquainted with the work. Copies of the geography were probably dear, which will explain its not being much in circulation, though the expense alone would not have prevented Plinius from getting it. "How much happier are we," exclaims Grotkurd, with true Philhellenic enthusiasm, "to whom the old Greek authors are now offered in unlimited abundance and in three-silver-groschen-little-volumes (dreisilbergroschen-bindungchen)."

If, then, there were few copies of Strabo, it is something of an accident that the work exists at all; and it seems probable that the extant MSS. may owe their origin to some one who existed in the middle ages. The inference here admits of following from the fact of the great corruption of Strabo's text, and the general agreement of all MSS. which have hitherto been collated in their lacunae and errors, for slight discrepancies in MSS. naturally result from copying, especially when the抄ist is not a critic. The great lacuna at the end of the seventh book is found in all the MSS.; but there must have been some MSS. on which was framed the Epitome which occupies the place of the original text, now deficient. The valuable MS. now at Paris (Cod. Par. 1393; in Falconer's edition, Par. 3) was brought from Asia in 1732, by the Abbé Sevin.

An Epitome or Chrestomathia of Strabo was made by an unknown author, probably about A.D. 980. It is printed in the second volume of Hudson's Minor Geographers, and in the editions of Falconer and Kreyer. This epitome, which has all the faults inherent in an epitome, and some that are not unavoidable, extends to the whole work, and is of some use, as it has been made from a MS. different from any that exist. Another epitome, still in MS., was made by the monk Maximus Plaidunus about 1350; and excerpts from the first ten books made by Plotho, the teacher of Cardinal Bessarion, are still in MS. The excerpts were collated by Siebenkees, and used in the Siebenkees-Tschucke edition.
The first edition of Strabo was by Aldus, Venice, 1516; and this text was followed in the editions of Hopper and Heresbach, Basle, 1549, and of Xylander (Holzmann), Basle, 1571, with a new Latin version. The next edition of the text was by Casaubon, who used several MSS., but it is uncertain if they exist. There are two editions of the text by Casaubon, Geneva, 1587, and Paris, 1620, fol., accompanied by a Latin translation and a commentary. Casaubon, who was only twenty-eight years of age when he edited this work, did a great deal for Strabo, though he could have done more, if he had taken more time about it. His commentary is pretty complete for the first books, but it gradually becomes more meagre as he approached the end of his labours. The edition of 1620 does not differ materially from that of 1587, and it is that which is generally referred to by the page. No new edition of Strabo appeared for a long time, and the critics were contented with making occasional corrections of certain passages and incidental remarks. The conjectures of Thomas Tyrwhitt, London, 1783, are valuable.

The reprint of Casaubon's edition by Alme-lovean, Amsterdam, 1707, is useful for the collection of the notes of various critics. A new edition of Strabo was commenced by Brequigny, but only three books appeared, Paris, 1763. He left behind him a French translation with notes in Latin, which was used by the French translators of Strabo.

The seventh edition of Strabo, that of Falconer, Oxford, 1807, 2 vols. fol., was begun after the edition of Siebenkees, but finished before it. It is a reprint from Alme-lovean, and contains no improvement of the text, though there were means for doing this, in the collection of five MSS. by Villebrune, and in other resources. This edition contains the collation of the Eton MS., that of the Esenrul, and two Medicane MSS.; also the conjectures of Tyrwhitt, and some remarks of Villebrune and Falconer. There are seventeen maps intended for the illustration of Strabo.

The eighth edition of Strabo was commenced by Professor J. P. Siebenkees, Leipzig, 1811. He only lived to complete the first six books in 2 vols. 8vo.; and the work was finished by Professor Tschauke in 1811. Siebenkees did his part very ill; but the edition improved greatly after Tschauke commenced his labours. He made, however, few corrections, having a religious respect for the readings of the MS., and his text differs little from that of the edition of Casaubon. Friedemann added as a continuation and seventh part of this work the commentary of Casaubon, and a very complete critical apparatus.

The ninth edition of Strabo was by the learned Greek of Chios, Adamantios Koray, which appeared at Paris, 1815—1818, 4 vols. 8vo. This was really the first critical edition of Strabo that was worthy of the name, though he is perhaps justly blamed for being sometimes too bold in substituting the conjectures of others or his own for MSS. readings which ought not to be rejected. The first volume contains a map to illustrate the geographical system of Strabo, by Gosselin.

The tenth edition, which is not yet completed, is by Gustavus Kramer, and is by far the most valuable that has yet appeared. The two volumes which have been published (Berlin, 1844 and 1847) contain books i.—xii. The text of this edition is founded on a new collation of MSS., and is furnished with a critical commentary.

The first Latin translation of Strabo appeared forty-five years before the Greek text of Aldus. Guarini of Verona translated the first ten books, and Gregorio of Tiferon the remainder. The next version, that of Xylander, is much superior, and is printed in both editions of Casaubon, in that of Alme-lovean, and in the Siebenkees-Tschauke edition, with some corrections. Strabo was well translated into Italian from a MS. by Bonaccioli, Venice, 1552 or 1562. A German translation by A. J. Penzel appeared at Lemgo, 1775, &c., 4 vols.; but it is said to have little merit.

A French translation of Strabo appeared at Paris, 1805—1819, in five quarto volumes, with the title "Géographie de Strabon, traduite du Grec en Français," and accompanied by copious critical and explanatory notes. It was translated by La Porte du Theil and Koray, with the exception of Du Theil's share, which was left unfinished by his death in 1815, and which was completed by Le tromme, who translated the sixteenth and seventeenth books. Gosselin added the geographical explanations, and five maps to illustrate the systems of Kratosthenes, Hipparchus, Polybius, and Strabo, with respect to the inhabited portion of the earth. The notes of Du Theil are sometimes exceedingly diffuse.

An Italian translation by Ambrosoli was published at Milan, 1826, 4 vols. 8vo., and 4to.

The best translation of Strabo is the new German version by C. J. Groskurd, 3 vols. 8vo., Berlin and Stettin, 1831—1833. The fourth volume, Berlin, 1834, contains a very complete Index, which is adapted to the second edition of Casaubon and all subsequent editions, except the small Tauchnitz edition, the only one that has not the paging of Casaubon's edition in the margin. The translation of Groskurd is made from the corrected text of Strabo, and he has availed himself of the labours of all his predecessors. In addition to this he has bestowed great pains on his version, which is a most valuable addition to the literature of his country: those who occupy themselves with the history of geography, and with ancient geography in particular, may now ascertain the meaning of Strabo, so far as it is possible to ascertain it. The author has added many valuable notes at the bottom of the page. To say that such a work cannot be free from error, is not to disapprove it. A comparison of many parts with the original has convinced the writer of this article of the fidelity, diligence, and sound knowledge of the learned translator. The translation is not dedicated to a king or any great person; but we presume that the author had not imperial or royal patronage, like the French translators of Strabo. It is dedicated to nobody,—to the Manes of Strabo. The preface and introduction contain a dissertation on Strabo, his life and writings, which, with Heeren's "De Fontibus Geographicorum Strabonius," Göttingen 1823, and the Geography of Strabo, is the chief authority for this article. [G. L.]

STRABO, ACTILIUS, accused by the inhabitants of Cyrene in a.d. 59 (Tac. Ann. xiv. 18).

STRABO, PANNIUS. 1. C. PANNIUS STRA- no, was consul n. c. 101 with M. Valerius Messalla. In their consilium the rhetoricians were expelled from Rome (Gell. xii. 11; Suet. de Rhet. 1). Fannus also proposed a lex sumtuaria (Gell. ii. 24; Macrob. Sat. ii. 13; Plin. H. N. x. 50. s. 71).

2. C. FANNIUS C. F. STRABO, the son of the preceding, was consul b. c. 122 with Cn. Domitius Ahenobarbus. In his tribunship of the plebs he had followed the guidance and advice of Scipio Africanus senior. Fannius owed his election to the consulsiphip chiefly to the influence of C. Gracchus, who canvassed the people on his behalf, as he was anxious to prevent his enemy Opimius from obtaining the office. But as soon as Fannius entered upon the consulsiphip, he supported the aristocracy, and took an active part in opposing the measures of Gracchus. He published a proclamation commanding all the Italian allies to leave Rome, and he spoke against the proposal of Gracchus, who wished to give the Roman franchise to the Latins. This speech was preserved and was regarded as a master-piece in the time of Cicero. Many persons questioned whether it had been composed by Fannius himself, as he had the reputation of being only a middlefiddler orator; but Cicero assigns it to him. It continued to be read by the grammarians (Cic. Brut. 26; Plin. H. N. ii. 32; Plut. C. Gracch. 8, 11, 12; Cic. de Orat. iii. 47; Jul. Vict. de Art. Rhet. p. 224, ed. Orelli; Meyer, Orat. Rom. Fragm. p. 191, &c., 24 ed.)

3. C. FANNIUS M. F. STRABO, the son-in-law of Laelius, is frequently confounded with C. Fannius C. f. [No. 2]. In his youth he served in Africa, under Scipio Africanus, in b. c. 146, and along with Tiber Gracchus, was the first to mount the walls of Carthage on the capture of the city. He afterwards served in Spain with distinction, in b. c. 142, under Publius Maximus Servilianus. (Plut. Tiber. Gracch. 4; Appian, Hs. 67.) Fannius is introduced by Cicero as one of the speakers both in his work De Republica, and in his treatise De Amicitia. At the advice of his father-in-law Laelius, Fannius had attended the lectures of the Stoic philosopher, Panaetius. His style of speaking was harsher than that of his namesake, C. Fannius C. L., and none of his orations are mentioned by Cicero. He owed his celebrity in literature to his History, which was written in Latin, and the style of which is described by Cicero as “neque nimis infans neque perfecte dixerta.” We have no information respecting the extent of this History; we only know that it treated of contemporary events; and that it possessed some merit appears from the fact of Brutus making an abridgment of it. Sallust likewise praises its truth. (Cic. de Rep. i. 12, Lael. 1, Brut. 26, 31, comp. 21, de Leg. i. 2, ad Att. xii. 5; Sull. ap. Victorin. p. 57, ed. Orelli; Krause, Vitae et Fragm. Hist. Rom. p. 171, &c.; Orelli, Onom. Tith. pp. 249, 250.)

One of the difficulties respecting this C. Fannius M. f. arises from a letter of Cicero, in which he writes to Atticus to ask him under what consul C. Fannius M. f. was tribune of the plebs, but that he believed that it was during the censorship of P. Africanus and L. Mummius, that is, in b. c. 142 (Cic. ad Att. xvi. 13, c.). Pighius therefore concluded from this passage, that the C. Fannius M. f. who was tribune of the plebs in b. c. 142, must have been a different person from the son-in-law of Laelius, who was serving that year in Spain, as we have already seen; and he accordingly supposes that there were three contemporaries of the name of C. Fannius, namely, 1. C. Fannius, C. f. consul b. c. 129; 2. C. Fannius, M. f. tribune b. c. 142, and 3. C. Fannius, M. f., the son-in-law of Laelius and the historian. But the creation of another person of the same name in order to get out of a chronological difficulty, is always suspicious; and if there were three C. Fannii, who were contemporaries, Cicero would hardly have omitted to mention them, especially since he speaks of the two C. Fannii in such close connection. Orelli supposes (Onom. Tall. l. c.) that C. Fannius, the son-in-law of Laelius, was tribune of the soldiers in Spain in b. c. 142, and that Cicero confounded this tribuneship with the tribuneship of the plebs. But this supposition of Orelli cannot be correct, if Cicero (de Rep. l. 12) is right in his statement that the son-in-law of Laelius was only of quaestorian age in b. c. 129, that is, not more than thirty, since in that case he would not have been old enough to have been tribune of the soldiers in b. c. 142. It is much more probable that Cicero confounded C. Fannius, M. f., the son-in-law of Laelius, with C. Fannius, C. f., and that the latter was tribune of the plebs in b. c. 142. It is, however, quite impossible to reconcile all the statements of ancient writers respecting this C. Fannius. According to his own statement, as preserved by Plutarch (Tib. Gracch. 4), he was one of the first to mount the walls of Carthage in b. c. 146, but if he was thirty in b. c. 129, he could only have been thirteen in the former year!

STRABO, C. JULIUS CAESAR. [CAESAR. No. 10.]

STRABO, M. LAE/NIUS, of Brundisium, a Roman eques and a friend of Varro, was the first person who introduced the use of the avarium, in which birds of various kinds were kept. (Varr. R. R. iii. 5. § 0; Plin. H. N. x. 50, s. 72, where he is erroneously called M. Laelius Strabo.)

STRABO, CN. POMPEIUS. [POMPEIIUS. No. 21.]

STRABO, SEIUS, a Roman eques, was commander of the praetorian troops at the latter end of the reign of Augustus and the commencement of that of Tiberius. He was subsequently sent by the latter emperor to govern Egypt, and was then succeeded in the sole command of the praetorian troops by his son, the notorious Sejanus, who had shared with him the command from the first year of the reign of Tiberius. (Tac. Ann. i. 7, 24. iv. 1; Dion Cass. lvi. 19.) [SEJANUS.]

STRABO, TITIUS. 1. C., belonged to the republican party on the death of Caesar. (Cic. ad Fam. xii. 6.)

2. L., a Roman eques, whom Cicero introduced to M. Brutus (ad Fam. xii. 14).

STRABO, L. VOLETIUS, known only from coins, a specimen of which is annexed. The obverse represents the head of Jupiter, the reverse Europa carried away on the bull. (Eckhel, vol. v. p. 345.)

COIN OF L. VOLETIUS STRABO.
STRATOCLES. STRATON.

STRABO, C. PAETILIUS, C. L., the name of a freedman, which appears, with the epitet CARLATOR, on an inscription, respecting the genuineness of which there are strong doubts. There is no other mention of this artist. (Muratori, Thes. vol. i. p. lxx. n. 6; Maflé, Art. Cr. Lapid. p. 214; Orelli, Inscr. Lat. Sal. n. 1614; R. Rotchette, Lettre à M. Schorn, p. 409.) [P. S.]

STRATOGUPEUS, GREGORIUS. [Mammas.]

STRATIUS (Stratios). 1. A son of Nestor and Anxiaibia. (Hom. Od. iii. 413.)

2. A son of Clymenus. (Paus. ix. 37. § 1.)

3. Stratios, i.e. the warlike, occurs also as a surname of Zeus and Ares. (Strab. xiv. p. 659; Herod. v. 119.) [L. S.]

STRATIUS (Stratios). 1. An Achaean of Tritem, was one of the deputies who met to deliberate concerning the course to be pursued at the breaking out of the war between Perseus and the Romans (a. c. 169). Though his sentiments were hostile to Rome, he dissuaded his countrymen from taking any active part against the republic (Polyb. xxviii. 6). He was one of the Achaenians afterwards carried to Rome in b. c. 167, to await the judgment of the senate, and an embassy sent thither by his countrymen in a. c. 160, had for its chief object to obtain the liberation of him and Polybios (Id. xxxii. 7). He was not, however, set free till long after, when he returned to his native country, where we find him thenceforth taking a strong part in support of the Roman influence, and opposing the destructive counsels of Critolaus and Daeus. (Id. xxxviii. 5, xl. 4.)

2. A physician and friend of Eunenies II., king of Pergamus, who was sent by him to Rome in b. c. 167, to restrain as well as observe the ambitious designs of his brother Attalus. By his prudent admonitions he succeeded in recalling that prince to a sense of duty. (Polyb. xxx. 2; Liv. xiv. 19.) [E. H. B.]

STRATOCLES (Stratokleis). 1. An Athenian orator, the son of Euthydemus. He was a contemporary of Demosthenes, and a friend of the orator Lycurgus. It was on his motion that a decree was passed investing Lycurgus with the office of manager of the public revenue (Plut. Vit. x. Orat. p. 982. a.). Stratocles was a virulent opponent of Demosthenes, whom he charged with having accepted bribes from Harpalus (Deinarch. in Demosth. pp. 175, a. 177, a. Compare Demosthenes, vol. i. p. 986). He was himself a man of very disreputable character, though a persuasive speaker (Demosth. adv. Pand. p. 944. c.; Plut. Demetr. c. 11. p. 983. c.). Plutarch compares him to Cleon, whom he seems even to have surpassed in impudence. On the occasion of the defeat of Amorgus (b. c. 322) Stratocles, having himself received intelligence some time before the news became generally known, crowned himself with a chaplet, and went through the Ceramicus, proclaiming that the Athenians had been victorious, and bidding the people celebrate a festival of thanksgiving. When the real state of the case became known, and the people indignantly charged him with having deceived them, he asked, with consummate effrontery, what harm he had done, for it was owing to him that they had had three days' appearance. Stratocles especially distinguished himself by his extravagant flattering of Demetrios, in whose honour he brought forward in the assembly the most preposterous decrees (Plut. Demetr. 11. 12). When on one occasion, he proposed a vote that whatever Demetrios ordered was pious towards the gods and just towards men, a satirical remark of Democares in reply to some who said that Stratocles must be mad to propose such decrees, led to a quarrel between Democares and the partisans of Stratocles, and ultimately to the banishment of the former (Plut. Demetr. c. 24. Compare Democares, vol. i. p. 973). It was to accommodate the celebration of the Eleusinian mysteries to the convenience or caprice of Demetrios, who demanded to be initiated, that Stratocles proposed the outrageously absurd decree, that the people should call the month Mynychion Anthesterion, and celebrate the smaller mysteries, and then forthwith change the name again to Boedromion and celebrate the greater mysteries (Plut. Demetr. 26). This was in b. c. 302. A fragment of a speech of Stratocles is quoted by Photius (Cod. ccl. 4. p. 447, a. ed. Bekker.) from Agatharchides (Ruhnken. Hist. Crit. Orat. Graec. Opusc. p. 362, 4cc.). We find a Stratocles mentioned as one of the Athenian generals at the battle of Chaeroneia, in b. c. 338. (Poly. Polyan. Strag. iv. 2; comp. Aesch. adv. Ces. c. 45. p. 74.) Droysen (Gesch. der Nachfolger Alexanders, p. 498) considers the general and the orator to be identical.

Cicero (Brutus, 11) mentions a Stratocles in a connection which seems to point him out as a rhetorician who was the author of some historical work. Ruhnken, however (l. c. p. 364) identifies him with the Athenian orator.

2. A celebrated actor at Rome, mentioned by Quintilian (Inst. Orat. xi. 3, § 170) and Juvenal (iii. 99).

3. Some others of the same name are met with, the notices of whom are not worth inserting here. [C. P. M.]

STRATOLAS (Stratolas), a citizen of Elis, and one of the leaders of the oligarchical party there. In b. c. 364 we find him in command of what Xenophon calls The Three Hundred, — perhaps a body organized by the oligarchs out of their own class, in imitation of the Sacred Band of Thbes (see Thirlwall's Greece, vol. v. p. 136). Acting in this capacity, he fell in battle at Olympia against the Arcadians, who had invaded Elis, and were attempting to celebrate the Olympic games under the presidency of Pisa. (Xen. Hell. vii. 4. §§ 15, 31; comp. Diod. xv. 77, 82.) [E. F.]

STRATON (Straton), historical. 1. A Tyrian, who was preserved by the gratitude of his slave, upon occasion of a general servile insurrection, and was subsequently elected by general consent to be king of Tyre, a dignity which he transmitted to his descendants. No clue is given us to the date of this story, which is recorded only by Justin (xxvii. 3), and wears a very fabulous aspect.

2. Son of Gerostratus, the king or dynast of Arados in Phoenicia at the time of its conquest by Alexander. Gerostratus himself was absent with the Persian fleet, but Straton hastened after the battle of Issus (b. c. 335) to meet the conqueror on his advance into Phoenicia with the offering of a crown of gold, and bearing the submission of Arados and its dependent cities. (Arrian. Anaib. ii. 13; Gell. Apol. 1. 6.)

3. King or dynast of Sidon, at the same period, was distinguished for his luxury and voluptuousness, in which he sought to vie with his contemporary Nicoles, king of Salamis (Athen. xii. p. 531). After the conquest of Phocicia, he was deposed by Alexander on account of the support he had given to Dareius, and his throne conferred upon Abdalonimus, a man in humble circumstances. (Curt. iv. 1. § 16; Diod. xvii. 47, erroneously represents him as king of Tyre.)

4. A Greek rhetorician, a friend of M. Brutus, who was present with him at the fatal battle of Philippi (b. c. 42), and having fled with him from the field, was induced to render him a last service by dispatching him with his own sword. He was subsequently reconciled with Octavius, who treated him with distinction, and to whom he rendered good service at the battle of Actium. (Plut. Brut. 52, 53.)

STRATON (Στράτων), literary. 1. An Athenian comic poet of the Middle Comedy, according to Suidas (κ. λ.), who mentions his play entitled Φωνίς, which is, no doubt, the same as the Φωνοκινός, from which a considerable fragment is quoted by Athenaeus (ix. p. 382, ε.). From the frequency with which the name of the comic poet Strattis occurs corrupted into Stratton, some distinguished scholars have supposed that the fragment in Athenaeus should be ascribed to Strattis, and that the comic poet Stratton owes his existence solely to the errors of transcribers, followed by Suidas. It has, however, been shown by Meineke, from the internal evidence of the fragment itself, that it could hardly have been written by Strattis, or by any other poet of the Old Comedy; and therefore there is no reason to reject the testimony of Suidas, although it may be doubted whether he is strictly correct in ascribing Strattis to the Middle Comedy. If the chilens mentioned in the fragment be, as seems very probable, the celebrated poet of Cos, who flourished about OL 120, Stratton ought rather to be referred to the New than to the Middle Comedy. The first three verses of the fragment and the beginning of the fourth were appropriated by Philemon. (Ath. xiv. p. 659, b.)

2. The son of Arceaslaus, of Lampaeus, was a distinguished peripatetic philosopher, and the tutor of Ptolemy Philadephus. He succeeded Theophratus as head of the school in OL 123, b. c. 286, and, after presiding over it eighteen years, was succeeded by Lycon. (Diog. Laërt. v. 58.) He devoted himself especially to the study of natural science, whencesoever he obtained, or, as it appears from Cicero, himself assumed the appellation of Φυσικός (φωσικός). Cicero, while speaking highly of his talents, blames him for neglecting the most necessary part of philosophy, that which has respect to virtue and morals, and giving himself up to the investigation of nature. (Acad. Quaest. i. 9, de Fin. v. 5.) In the long list of his works, given by Diogenes, several of the titles are upon subjects of moral philosophy, but the great majority belong to the department of physical science.

The opinions of Stratton have given rise to much interesting controversy; but unfortunately the result has been very unsatisfactory on account of the want of positive information. From the few notices of his tenets, which we find in the ancient writers, he appears to have held a pantheistic system, the specific character of which cannot however, be determined. He seems to have denied the existence of any god out of the material universe, and to have held that every particle of matter has a plastic and seminal power, but without sensation or intelligence; and that life, sensation, and intellect, are but forms, accidents, and affections of matter. Some modern writers have regarded Stratton as a forerunner of Spinoza, while others see in his system an anticipation of the hypothesis of monads. He has been charged with atheism by Cudworth, Leibnitz, Bayle, and other distinguished writers, and warmly defended by Schlosser, in his Specilicistum historia-philosophicum de Strato philosopho physico, et catharismo vulgo ei tribuita, Viteberg, 1728, 4to. A good account of the controversy, with references to the writers who have noticed Stratton, is given by Harless, in his edition of Fabricius. (Bibl. Græc. vol. iii. pp. 506–508; C. Nauwerck, de Strato. Lamps. Phil. Disquis. Berol. 1836, 8vo.)

3. Another Peripatetic philosopher of Alexandria. (Diog. Laërt. v. 61.)

4. An historian, who wrote the exploits of Philip and Perseus in their wars with the Romans, and may therefore be supposed to have lived about b. c. 160. (Diog. Laërt. v. 61.)

5. Of Sardis, an epigrammatic poet, and the compiler of an Anthology, which was entitled, from the subject common to all the poems of which it consisted, Μοῦρα ἀγάθη. It is so called in the preface of Constantinus Cephalas to this section of his Anthology. It was composed partly of epigrams compiled from the earlier anthologies of Meleager, Philetas, from other sources, and partly of poems written by Stratton himself. Of the poets comprised in the Garland of Meleager, Stratton received thirteen into his collection, namely, Meleager, Dioscorides, Polystratus, Antipater, Aratus, Mnasaeus, Evenus, Alcaeus of Messene, Phainias, Asclepiades, Phrianus, Callimachus, and Poseidippus: of those in the Anthology of Philip, he only took two, namely, Tullius Laurenus and Automedon; and to these he added ten others, namely, Flaccus, Alpheius of Mytillene, Julius Leontidas, Scythinus, Numenius, Dionysius, Fronto, Thymocrates, Glaucus, and Diocles. The whole number of poems in the collection is 253, of which 98 are by Stratton himself. The work formed the last section of the Anthology of Constantine [Planudes], and is printed in Jacobs's edition of the Palatine Anthology, c. xii.

The time of Stratton has been disputed, but it is evident that he lived in the second century of our era; since, on the one hand, he compiled from the Anthology of Philip, who flourished at the end of the first century, and, on the other hand, he is mentioned by Diogenes Laërtius (v. 61), who wrote most probably at the beginning of the third century. A further indication of his date is derived from Schneider from his mention of the physician Capito, who flourished under Hadrian.

(P. S.)

STRATON (Στράτων), the name of several physicians:—1. A physician mentioned by Ari-tole, who lived probably in the sixth or fifth century B.C., as he is called ἱππος ἀπὸ κόσμου (Diog. Laërt. v. 3, § 61).

2. A native of Berytus in Phœnicia, one of whose medical formulae is quoted by Galen (De Compos. Medicum. sec. Loc. liv. i. xii. p. 749). He is probably the same person who appears to be quoted by Andromachus the Younger (ap. Galen. Gyn. ix. vol. xii. p. 290) and Aselepidas Pharmacion (ibid. p. 303), simply as ὁ Βεριτόρας, and who must have lived some time in or before the first century after Christ. Sprengel and others suppose Straton of Berytus to have been the same person as the follower of Erasistratus, which may possibly be true, but cannot be proved; while, on the other hand, it may be plausibly argued that this physician is called ὁ Βεριτόρας, in order to distinguish him from his more celebrated namesake.

3. A pupil of Erasistratus in the third century B.C., who appears to have lived on very intimate terms with his tutor. (Diog. Laërt. v. 3, § 61; Galen. De Ven. Sect. adv. Erasistr. Rom. Dej. c. 2, vol. xi. p. 157; Orbas. Coll. Mediv. xiv. 28, p. 60, ed. Mai.) He wrote a work to explain the difficult words found in the writings of Hippocrates, which is mentioned by Erotianus (Gloss. Hippocr. c. εν. Άλβητ.'). Like the rest of the followers of Erasistratus, he was averse to blood-letting (Galen. De Ven. Sect. adv. Erasistr. c. 2, vol. xi. p. 151), but could not give any very good reasons for his opinion. He is probably the physician quoted by Alexander Trallianus (i. 15, pp. 156, 157), and Aëtius (i. 2, 3, iv. 1, 7, 46, pp. 64, 616, 628). He was tutor to Apollonius of Memphis (Galen. De Diff. Puls. iv. 17, vol. viii. p. 759), and not his father, as some have supposed. [APOLLONIUS*, p. 246.] See Sprengel's Gesch. der Arzneik. vol. i. pp. 559, 561, ed. 1846.

4. A slave at Rome in the former half of the first century B.C., who was bought by Sussia, the mother of Cæcilius, to prepare poisons for her; and who was afterwards crucified for murder and robbery. (Cic. pro Cael. cc. 63—66). [W. A. G.] STRATON, a sculptor, who, with Xenophilus, made, for the temple of Asclepius at Argos, the white marble statues of the gods, and of his attendant Hygeia; in which were placed the statues of the artists themselves. (Paus. ii. 23, § 4). [P. S.]

STRATONICE (Στρατωνίκη). 1. One of the daughters of Theopis, and by Hercules the mother of Atromus. (Apollod. i. 7, § 3.)

2. A daughter of Pleuron and Xanthippe. (Apollod. i. 7, § 7.)

3. The wife of Melanios and the mother of Eurytus. (Hes. Frugam. 48.) [L. S.]

STRATONICAE (Στρατωνικαί). 1. A sister of Perdiccas II., king of Macedonia, who was given by him in marriage to the Thracian prince SKUTHES, the nephew of Sitellas, as a reward for the service rendered him by the former in persuading Sitellas to withdraw from Macedonia. (Thuc. ii. 101.)

2. Daughter of Corhaeus (a Macedonian otherwise unknown), and wife of Antigonus, king of Asia, by whom she became the mother of two sons, Demetrius Poliorcetes and Philippus, who died in B.C. 306 (Plut. Demetr. 2). In B.C. 320 she is mentioned as entering into negotiations with Demosthenes, when that general was shut up with other adherents of Perdiccas, in a fortress of Phrygia; but having induced him to quit his stronghold, she caused him to be seized and detained as a prisoner (Diod. xix. 16). After the battle of Ipsus she fled from Cicilia (where she had awaited the issue of the campaign) with her son Demetrius to Salamis in Cyprus, B.C. 301. (I. d. xxii. Exc. Hoeschel. p. 480.) Here she probably died, as we hear nothing of her when the island fell into the power of Ptolemy some years afterwards.

3. Daughter of Demetrius Poliorcetes and Phila, the daughter of Antipater. In B.C. 300, at which time she could not have been more than seventeen years of age, her hand was solicited by Seleucus, king of Syria, and she was conducted by her father Demetrius to Rhosus, on the Plerian coast, where her nuptials were celebrated with the utmost magnificence (Plut. Demetr. 31, 32). Notwithstanding the value of the gifts, which we have lived in perfect harmony with the old king for some years, and had already borne him one child, when it was discovered that her step-son Antiochus was deeply enamoured of her, and Seleucus, in order to save the life of his son, which was endangered by the violence of his passion, gave up Stratonice in marriage to the young prince, whom he at the same time constituted king of the provinces of Upper Asia. (Plut. Demetr. 38; Appian, Syr. 59; and the other authorities cited under ERASTRATUS, where the well-known circumstances of this story are more fully related.) The union commenced under such strange auspices seems to have been a prosperous one, but we find little subsequent mention of Stratonice. She bore three children to Antiochus: 1. Antiochus II., surnamed Theos; 2. Apama, married to Magas, king of Cyrene; and 3. Stratonice [No. 4.]. The city of Stratonice in Caria was named after her, but whether it was founded in her honour by Seleucus or by Antiochus, is uncertain. (Strab. xiv. p. 660; Steph. Byz. s. v. Στρατωνίκη.)

4. Daughter of the preceding and of Antiochus I., was married to Demetrius II., king of Macedon. (Euseb. Arm. i. p. 164.) The period of their marriage is unknown; but she appears to have remained in Macedonia till about B.C. 239, when she quitted Demetrius in disgust, on account of his second marriage with Phthia, the daughter of Olympias, and retired to Syria. Here she in vain incited her nephew Seleucus II. to avenge the insult offered her by declaring war against the Macedonian king. According to another account, she was in hopes to induce Seleucus himself to marry her; but that monarch was wholly occupied with the recovery of Babylonia and the upper provinces of the empire. While he was thus engaged, Stratonice took advantage of his absence to raise a revolt against him at Antioch; but she was easily expelled from that city on the return of Seleucus, and took refuge in Seleucia, where she was besieged, taken prisoner, and put to death. (Justin. xxviii. i. 38; Agatharchides, ap. Joseph. c. Apion. i. 22; Niebuhr, Kl. Schriften, p. 254; Droysen, Hellenism. vol. ii. p. 414.)

5. A daughter of Antiochus II., king of Syria, married to Ariarathes III., king of Cappadocia.
STATTIS.

(Diod. xxxi. Exc. Phot. p. 518; Euseb. Arm. i. p. 164.)

6. One of the numerous wives of Mithridates the Great, was originally a woman of mean birth, the daughter of a harper, but obtained such influence over the king as to become one of his favourite wives; and when he was compelled to undertake his perilous retreat round the Euxine sea, she was left by him in charge of a strong fortress, in which he had deposited a large amount of treasure. She was, however, induced to betray both the fortress and treasures into the hands of Pompey, on condition that he should spare the life of her son Xiphares; but Mithridates, in order to punish her for this treason, put Xiphares to death before her eyes. (Appian, Mithr. 107; Plut. Pomp. 56; Dion Cass. xxxvii. 7.) [E. H. B.]

STRATONICUS (Στρατονίκος), of Chios, was distinguished musician of the time of Alexander the Great, of whom scarcely any thing is recorded, except the sharp and witty rebuke which he administered to Philotas, when the latter boasted of a victory which he had gained over Timotheus. (Strab. xiii. p. 610; Aelian. N. A. xiv. 14; Ath. viii. p. 352, b.) [P. S.]

STRATONICUS (Στρατονίκος), a physician at Pergamus in Asia, a pupil of Sabinus, and one of Galen's tutors, about A. D. 148. (Galen. De Atra Bile, c. 4, vol. p. 119.) It is not certain whether he is the same person whose opinion respecting the generation of male and female children is mentioned at Galen (De Sem. ii. 5, vol. iv. p. 629), and who is called by him οἱ φωνικοὶ Στρατονίκοι. [W. A. G.]

STRATONICUS, a statuary and silver-chaser, was one of the artists who made bronze statues representing the battles of Artaxias and Eumenes against the Gauls. He therefore flourished about A. D. 240 (Plin. ii. N. xxxiv. 8. s. 19, § 24; Pyromachus). He is also mentioned by Pliny, in his list of distinguished silver-chasers (xxxiii. 55) as the engraver of a cup, on which a Satyr, overpowered with wine, was represented so naturally, that the figure appeared to be rather placed upon the vessel than engraved on it. (Comp. Anth. Pal. vi. 56; Ath. xi. p. 782, b.) [P. S.]

STRATTIS (Στράττις), tyrant of Chios in the time of Dareius Hystaspis and Xerxes, was one of those whom Dareius, in his Scythian expedition, left in charge of the bridge of boats over the Danube. At the period of the invasion of Greece by Xerxes, seven citizens of Chios conspired against Strattis, but the plot was revealed by one of their number, and the remaining six were obliged to seek safety in flight. They first applied for aid to Sparta, whence they proceeded to the Greek fleets, under the command of Leocytides at Aegina, n. c. 479, and entreated their countrymen, but for the time without success, to strike a blow for the restoration of independence to Ionia. (Herod. iv. 138, viii. 132.) [F. E.]

STRATTIS (Στράττις or Στράττις, but the former is the more correct orthography), an Athenian comic poet of the Old Comedy, flourished, according to Suidas, a little later than Callias. He must therefore have begun to exhibit about Ol. 92, b. c. 412. He was in part contemporary with Sanynor and Phyllilus, both of whom are attacked in extant quotations from his works (Schol. Aristoph. Plut. 1195; Ath. xii. p. 531, c.; Poll. x. 189). The drama of Strattis in which Phyllilus was attacked was the Ποτάμω, which, the Scholar says, was brought out before the Ecclesiasticus of Aristophanes, and therefore not later than b. c. 394 or 393 (see Clinton, F. H. ii. s. a. 394). Again, in his Ανθρωποβραχίας he attacked Hegeso- lochus, the actor of the Orestes of Euripides; so that this play must have been brought out later than n. c. 408, the year in which the Orestes was exhibited (Schoi. Eurip. Orest. 278; Clinton. F. H. ii. s. a. 407). Strattis was still exhibiting at the end of the 99th Olympiad, b. c. 330, for we cannot well refer to an earlier period his attack on Isocrates on account of his fondness for Logiscus when he was far advanced in years (Ath. xiii. p. 592, d.; Harpoen. s. v. Δασίσκη). We have little opportunity of forming a judgment on the poetical character of Strattis. His intense admiration of the Orestes of Euripides does not say much for his taste (Schol. Eurip. Orest. 278; Francesco). Subsequently, he was the author of 13 plays, one of which, G. C. P. xxvi. 348, c. [E. H. B.]

According to an anonymous writer on Comedy (p. xxi.), Strattis composed sixteen dramas. Suidas mentions the following titles of his plays: Ανθρωποβραχίας, or, as it should be, Ανθρωποβραχίας, Αταλάντη, Αγαθω ντο ΐτών, Μουρονάν, Ικτίγεωρ, Καλλιπής, Κυνηγάς, Λυμουσέως, Μακέ δώνος, Μιθάδεα, Τριώλος, Φωλιώσα, Φιλοκίτως, Χρύ σιπτος, Πανοπανίας, Φυελοχαλ, in addition to which, four titles are mentioned by other writers, namely, Ζαυπόνος περικαλμένος, Μορμάδων, Ποτάμω, Πον τίς. His name sometimes appears in the corrupt form Στράττων, and some scholars have supposed the comic poets Strattis and Stronon to be one and the same person; but this opinion is undoubtedly erroneous. (Meineke, Frgg. Com. Graec. vol. i. pp. 221–236, 427, vol. ii. pp. 763, foll., Editio Minor, pp. 428, foll.; Bergk. Reicg. Com. Att. Ant. pp. 284, 285; Clinton. F. H. ii. Introd. p. xiv, note r.) [P. S.]

STROMBICHIDES (Στρομβίχιδης), an Athenian, son of Diotimus, was appointed to command the eight ships which the Athenians sent to the coast of Asia, on the news of the revolt of Chios, in b. c. 412. On his arrival at Samos he added a Samian trireme to his squadron, and sailed to Teos to check the spirit of rebellion there. But soon after he was compelled to flee to Samos from a superior Peloponnesian fleet, under Chalcidens and Alcibiades, and Teos forthwith revolted. Not long after this Strombichides seems to have returned to Athens, and later in the same year he was one of three commanders who were sent to the Athenians at Samos with a reinforcement of thirty-five ships, which increased their whole force to 104. This they now divided, retaining the greater part of it at Samos to command the sea, and to carry on the war against Miletus, while Strombichides and two others were detached to Chios with thirty tri remes. On their way they lost three of their vessels in a storm; but with the rest they proceeded to Lesbos, and made preparations for the siege of Chios, to which island they then crossed over, fortified a strong post named Delphinion, and reduced the Chians for a time to great extremities. In b. c. 411, on the revolt of Abydos and Lampsacus, Strombichides sailed from Chios with twenty-four ships, and recovered Lampscmus, but was unable either to persuade or compel Abydos to return to its allegiance; and accordingly he crossed over to Sestos, and there established a garrison to command the whole of the Hellespont. Hence he was soon after summoned to reinforce the Athenians at Samos, who were unable, before his arrival, to make head against the superior force of the Peloponnesians under Astychocus. In Lysias we read that Strometerchides was one of those friends of democracy, who expressed their indignation at the terms of peace with which Theramenes and his fellow-ambassadors returned to Athens from Lacedaemon in b. c. 404. Having thus rendered himself obnoxious to the oligarchs, he was involved with the other prominent men of his party in the accusation brought against them by Agoratus before the council, of a conspiracy to oppose the peace. They were all accordingly thrown into prison, and not long after were put to death with the mockery of a trial under the government of the Thirty (Thuc. viii. 15, 16, 17, 30, 34, 38, 40, 53, 60, 61, 62, 79; Lys. c. Agor. pp. 130—135). We may perhaps identify the subject of the present article with the father of Antocles. (Xen. Hell. vi. 3. § 2.)

STRONGYLION (ΣΤΡΟΓΥΛΙΟΝ), a distinguished Greek statury, mentioned by Pausanias and Pliny, and in an important extant inscription. The inscription furnishes sufficient evidence for the true date of the artist, which had previously been determined wrongly on the supposed testimony of the writers referred to.

The inscription referred to was discovered, in 1840, near the entrance of the Acropolis at Athens, between the Propylaea and the Parthenon. It is engraved on two plates of Pentelic marble, and runs thus:

ΧΑΡΙΔΕΜΟΣΤΕΛΛΕΝΟ ΕΚΚΟΙΝΟΣΑΝΕΘΕΝ ΣΤΡΟΑΛΤΙΟΝΟΙΩΣΕΝ

that is, Χαριδῆμος Εκαγγγέλων ἐκ Κολῆς ἀνδρῖνων Στρογγυλῶν ἐπιτάφιον.

Now, we read in the Scholia on Aristophanes (Ap. 1120), that there stood in the Acropolis a representation of the Trojan horse (Δίονυσος Ιατρός) in bronze, bearing the inscription, Χαριδῆμος Εκαγγγέλων ἐκ Κολῆς ἀνδρῖκες, and Pausanias describes this statute as standing at the exact part of the Acropolis where the inscription was found (i. 23. § 10); and though Pausanias does not mention the name of the artist, he does tell us elsewhere that Strongylion excelled in the representation of oxen and horses (ix. 30. § 1). But this is not all. The passage of Aristophanes, which gives occasion for the information furnished by the Scholiast, describes the walls of the city of the Birds as being so broad, that two chariots might race upon them "having horses as large as the Durian (δοιφοίσ)."

Now, considering how constantly the comic poets appeal to the senses rather than the imagination of their audience, and how generally their illustrations are drawn from objects which present, to the naked eye, objects, present before the eyes of the people, there can be little doubt of the soundness of the remark of the Scholiast, that "It is not credible that the poet says this merely in a general sense, but with reference to the bronze statue in the Acropolis."

If this reasoning be admitted, the date of Strongylion's colossal bronze horse in the Acropolis will be fixed at a period shortly before the exhibition of the Birds in b. c. 414. This date is confirmed by the characters of the inscription, which belong to the style in use before the archonship of Euclides. For the publication of this inscription and the inferences drawn from it, we are indebted to Ross, (Journal des Savants, 1841, pp. 245—247.)

Pausanias (i. 40. § 2) tells us that Strongylion made the bronze statue of Artemis Soteira, in her temple at Megara. Sillig makes Pausanias say that this statue of Artemis was one of the statues of the Twelve Gods, which were ascribed to Praxiteles; and hence he infers, though by what process of reasoning is not very evident, that Strongylion was contemporary with Praxiteles. The fact is, however, that Pausanias expressly distinguishes "the statues of the Twelve Gods, said to be the works of Praxiteles," from that of "Artemis herself," that is, the chief statue of the temple, which, he distinctly affirms, was made by Strongylion; and, so far is the passage from furnishing any evidence that Strongylion was contemporary with Praxiteles, that it affords two arguments to prove that he lived before him; for, in the first place, the statue of the deity, to whom the temple was dedicated, would of course be made earlier than any others that might be placed in it, and, moreover, Pausanias tells us that the temple was built to commemorate a victor in the games of the Megarians over a detachment of the army of Mardonius, who had been struck by Artemis with a panic in the night; so that the only sound inference to be drawn from this passage, respecting the artist's date, is that he should be placed as soon after the Persian wars as the other evidence will permit.

In another passage of Pausanias (ix. 30. § 1) we are informed that of the statues composing one of the two groups of the Muses on Mount Helicon, three were made by Cephisodotus, three by Strongylion, and the remaining three by Olympiothenses; whence it has been inferred that these three artists were contemporaries. This inference is by no means necessarily true, but, on the contrary, while it is quite possible that the three artists may have worked at the same time on the different portions of the group, it is an equally probable conjecture, that the group was left unfinished by one or more of them, and completed by the others. If so, the order in which the names of the artists stand in Pausanias is not to be taken as the order of time in which they lived; for the preceding clause furnishes an obvious reason for his mentioning the name of Cephisodotus first.

Even if we suppose the parts of the group to have been executed at the same time, it is quite possible, as Ross has argued, to bring back the date of Cephisodotus I. high enough to admit of his having been in part contemporary with Strongylion, about the beginning of the fourth century b. c. At all events, it is clear that these passages do not warrant Sillig in placing Strongylion with Cephisodotus I. and Praxiteles at Ol. 103, b. c. 585, but that he flourished about b. c. 415, and probably for some time both before and after that date. Perhaps we might safely assign as his period the last thirty or forty years of the fifth century b. c.

Pliny mentions two other bronze statues by Strongylion (H. N. xxxiv. 8. s. 19. § 21); the one of an Amazon, the beauty of whose legs obtained for it the epithet Euketemos, and excited the admiration of Nero to such a degree that he had it carried about with him in his travels; the other of
a. boy, of which Brutus was so fond that it was named after him. (Silius, Cat. Art. s. v.; Rossa, as above quoted; H. Rochelette, Lettre à M. Schorn, pp. 409—411, 2d. ed.; Nagler, Künstler-Lexicon, s. v.)

STROPHIUS (στρόφιος). 1. The father of Scamandrius. (Hom. II. v. 49.)

2. A son of Crisus and Antiphateia, and husband of Cyngodora, Amaziby or Astyocheia, by whom he became the father of Astydamia and Pylaides. (Schol. ad Eurip. Orist. 33; Paus. ii. 29, § 4; Pind. Pyth. xi. 35.)

3. A son of Pylaides and Electa. Paus. ii. 16, in fin.)

STRUCTUS, a cognomen in the Servilia gens, almost always occurs in connection with those of AHA/LA or of PRISCUS, under which the Structi are given. The only Structus who is mentioned with this cognomen alone, is Sp. Servilus Structus, who was consular tribune in B.C. 365.

STRUTHAS (στρυθάς), a Persian, was sent by Artaxerxes II. (Mmenon), in B.C. 392, to supersede Tiribazus in the satrapy of Western Asia. Recollecting the successful Asiatic campaigns of Aegaeus, Struthas had a strong conviction of the formidable power of the Spartans, and therefore on his arrival took part warmly with the Athenians. The Lacedaemonian government sent Thibron to act against him; but this officer suffered himself to be surprised by Struthas, who engaged in what his army was defeated by the Persians. Diphridas was then despatched to take the command of the Spartan forces, and was more successful in his operations against Struthas. (Diphridas.) (Xen. Hell. iv. 8. §§ 17—21.) By the year 388 B.C. we find Tiribazus again in possession of his satrapy. (Xen. Hell. v. 1. § 6.)

STRA'MON (στραμών), a son of Oceanus and Tethys, was a river god of Thrace, and is called a king of Thrace. (Hes. Theog. 339; Conon, Narr. 4; Anton. Lib. 21.) By Euterpe or Calliope, he became the father of Rhesus (Apollod. i. 3. § 4; Eurip. Rhes. 317), and by Neaera of Euadne. (Apollod. ii. 1. § 2.)

STUDITA (JOSEPHUS). Under the article JOSEPHUS we gave references to this article from the following Josephi:—No. 5, Conessor; No. 14, of Sicily; No. 15, Studita; and No. 16, of Thessalonica. We were led to do this by the authority of Fabricius (Bibl. Graec. vol. xi. p. 79), who has confounded Josephus, the brother of Theodorus Studita, with Josephus Siculus. On further examination we have found that they were distinct persons, and therefore give them here distinctly.

1. JOSEPHUS STUDITA (i.e. monk of the convent of Studi/a, τον Στουδιανος, at Constantinople), brother of Theodore Studita is further known by the titles of Joseph the Conessor (δ θμολογηθης Ιωσηφ) and Joseph of Thessalonica. His parents. Phoebius and Theocretas, appear to have been resident at or near Constantinople: and Joseph and his brother Theodore were monks in the convent of Studium (Anonym. De Monasterio Studi, apud Pagi, Critice in Baronii Annales, ad ann. 814, c. xvi.), of which Theodore was afterwards abbot, and which was the foundation for the received sanctity of its inmates. In a eulogistic notice of Joseph in the Menologium Basilianum (pars iii. p. 167, fol. Urbin. 1727), Joseph is said to have lived in the time of the emperor Theophilus, and to have been elected archbishop of Thessalonica with unanimous approval, on account of his recognised excellence of character. It appears, however, that his appointment was long antecedent to the reign of Theophilus; and that it was by no means unprecedented for when his quarrel with the patriarch Nicephorus had brought him into trouble, he had to defend himself against the charge of having improperly thrust himself into his see; and his defence seems to admit that the objection was not altogether groundless (Baron. Annales Ecles. ad ann. 808, xvii. &c.). In what year he became archbishop is not clear; but in A.D. 809, if we adopt the chronology of Baronius who follows Theophanes, he was deposed, exiled, and imprisoned (ibid. ad ann. 809, xvi. xlvii.; Theophan. Chronog. p. 409, ed. Paris, p. 325, ed. Venice, p. 752, ed. Bonn; Cedren. Comp. p. 478, ed. Paris, vol. ii. p. 36, ed. Bonn). The occasion of this severe treatment was his refusal to communicate with the patriarch Nicephorus of Constantinople, because the latter had restored to the office of oecumens or steward of the great church at Constantinople, the presbyter Joseph, who had officiated at the marriage of the emperor Constantine VI. with the harlot Theodote or Theodata, in A.D. 795 (Constantin. VI.); but it is probable that the quarrel was excited by the prelate's critical censure of the emperor's marriage to a low woman, and that the ejected prelate was regarded as a confessor for the truth rather than a sufferer in a squabble about an individual.

Soon after the accession of the emperor Michael I. Rangabe, Joseph recovered his liberty and his see (Theophan. Chronog. p. 419, ed. Paris, p. 333, ed. Venice, p. 770, ed. Bonn; Zonaras, Annales, lib. xvi. c. 17). When the iconoclastic party, under the patronage of Leo V. the Armenian, regained the ascendancy, Joseph was among the champions and sufferers in the cause of images. He was confined in an island, apparently one of those in the Propontis, in one of which he had been before confined in A.D. 809 (Theodor. Studit. Epitola, apud Baron. Annales, ad ann. 815. xi. 816. xlv. &c.). It is mentioned in the life of St. Nicetas, the Bithynian confessor, that Joseph attended at his funeral, which may be fixed in A.D. 824 (Acta Sanctor. April, vol. i. p. 253, 265, and Appendix p. xxvii.). Nothing seems to be known of him after this, unless we accept as true the statement of the Menologium Basilianum (L.), that he was imprisoned by the emperor Theophilus for refusing to renounce the adoration of images, and died in prison. But the statement is rendered doubtful by the addition that, at the time when he was put in prison, his brother Theodore was banished: for Theodore died in A.D. 826, three years before the accession of Theophilus; so that the account is, at any rate, inaccurate; and whether there is any truth in it can hardly be now ascertained. It is not certain that Joseph lived to the accession of the emperor. He was dead before, and apparently long before 844, in which year the relics of Theodore Studita were transferred with great pomp to the church of the Precursor (see John the Baptist), in the monastery of Studium, where those of Joseph were brought together; see Sta. Nicolai Studiarum, apud Acta Sanctorum Februari, vol. i. p. 547). There are some writings of Joseph extant. Baronius has given (Annales, ed. Ann. 808, of him in some MS. of the Greek Synaxaria, by which interpolations the emperor Leo the Armenian [Leo V.], in whose reign Joseph attempted to go to Rome, has been confounded with Leo the Isaurian [Leo III.], who reigned nearly a century before. Joseph is chiefly celebrated as a writer of Canonae or Hymnæi, of which several are extant in MS.; but there is some difficulty in distinguishing his compositions from those of Joseph of Thessalonica [No. 1.] His Canonæ in ossuia Beatæ Virginis Mariae festa, and his Theodotea, hymns in honour of the Virgin, scattered through the ecclesiastical books of the Greeks, were published, with a learned commentary, and a life of Joseph, translated from the Greek of Joannes or John the Deacon, by Ippolito Maracci, under the title of Martale S. Josephi Hymnographi, 8vo. Rome, 1661. The version of the life of Joseph was by Luigi Maracci of Lucca, the brother of Ippolito. Another Latin version of the same life but less exact, by the Jesuit Florius, was published among the Vitæ Sanctorum Siculorum of Octavius Caje- tanus (Ottavio Gaetano), vol. ii. p. 43, fol. Palermo 1657, and reprinted in the Acta Sanctorum (vid. infra).

Some writers have supposed that there was a third Joseph, a writer of hymns, mentioned in the title of a MS. Typicæos at Rome, as of the Monastery of St. Nicholas Canularum (των κανολων) but there seems reason to think that this Joseph was the subject of the present article; and that the Monastery of St. Nicholas was the one built by him, adjacent to the deserted Church of St. John Chrysostom. (Vita S. Josephi Hymnographi, in the Acta Sanctorum, Aprilis, a. d. iii. vol. i. p. 269, &c., with the Commentarius Praeclus of Paperochne, and Appendix, p. xxxiv.; Fabricius, Biblioth. Graec. vol. xi. p. 79, Menologium Graecum, jussu Basili Imperatoris editum, a. d. iii. Aprilis, fol. Urbino, 1727.)

STYMPHALIDES (Στυμφαλίδες), the celebrated rapacious birds near the Stymphalian lake in Arcadia, whence they were driven by Hercules and compelled to take refuge in the island of Are- tias in the Euxine, where they were afterwards found by the Argonauts. They are described in different ways, but most commonly as voracious birds of prey, which attacked even men, and which were armed with brazen wings, from which they could shoot out their feathers like arrows. (Apollod. ii. 5. § 2; Paus. viii. 22. § 4; Hyg. Fab. 30; Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. ii. 1053.) They are said to have been brought up by Ares. (Serv. ad Aen. viii. 300.) According to Maasæus (op. Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. ii. 1054), they were not birds, but women and daughters of Stymphalus and Ormis, and were killed by Hercules because they did not receive him hospitably. In the temple of the Stymphalian Artemis, however, they were represented in different ways, and behind the temple there were white marble statues of maidens with birds' feet. (Paus. viii. 22. § 5.)

STYMPHALUS (Στυμφαλος). 1. A son of Lycaon. (Apollod. iii. 8. § 1.)

2. A son of Elatus and Laodice, a grandson of Arcas, and father of Parthenope, Agamedes, and Gortys. (Apollod. ii. 7. § 8, iii. 9. § 1; Paus. viii. 4. § 3, 22. § 1.) Pelops, who was unable to con- quer him in war, murdered him by stratagem, and cut his body in pieces. For this crime Greece was visited with a famine, which however was averted.
by the prayer of Aeneas. (Apollod. iii. 12. § 6.)

[Sty Pax or Stipax, of Cyprus, a statuary, to whom Pliny ascribes the execution of a celebrated statue called Splauchnoptes, because it represented a person roasting the entrails of the victim at a sacrifice, and blowing the fire with his breath. (H. N. xxiv. 6. 19. s. 21.) According to Pliny, the person represented was Styx, the daughter of Oceanus, who was the same as the one of whom he elsewhere relates the story, that he fell from the summit of the Parthenon, but was healed by the virtue of a herb which Minerva showed to Pericles in a dream. (H. N. xxvii. 17. s. 20,) a story which Phutarch tells of the architect Mnesicles. Among the recent discoveries on the Acropolis, fragments have been found which Ross supposes to have belonged to the base of the Splauchnoptes, and he has put forth the conjecture that the name Stipax in Pliny is only a corruption of Stрабax; but these matters are too doubtful and intricate to be discussed here. (Ross, in the Künstblatt, 1840, No. 37, and in Gerhard's Archäol. Zeitung, 1844, p. 243.)

[Styx (στήξ), connected with the verb στηγεύω, to hate or abhor, is the name of the principal river in the nether world, around which it flows seven times. (Hom. H. ii. 753, viii. 509, xiv. 271; Virg. Georg. iv. 401; Sen. vi. 408; Petron. Sat. 11, &c.) She was the daughter of Oceanus and Tethys (Hes. Theog. 361; Apoll. i. 2. § 2; Callim. Hypan. in Non. 36,) and as a nymph she dwelt at the entrance of Hades, in a lofty grove which was supported by silver columns. (Hes. Theog. 773.) As a river Styx is described as a branch of Oceanus, flowing from its tenth source (789), and the river Cocytus again is a branch of the Styx. (Hom. Od. x. 511.) By Pallas Styx became the mother of Zelus (zeal), Nice (victory), Bia (strength), and Cmto (power). She was the first of all the immortals that took their children to Zeus, to assist him against the Titans; and in return for this, her children were allowed for ever to live with Zeus, and Styx herself became the divinity by whom the most solemn oaths were sworn. (Hes. Theog. 363; Hom. Od. v. 185, x. 37; Apollod. i. 2. § 5; Apollon. Rhod. ii. 191; Virg. Aen. vi. 324, xii. 816; Ov. Met. iii. 290; Sil. Ital. xii. 568.) When one of the gods was about to pass the Styx, Iris fetched a cup full of water from the Styx, and the god, while taking the oath, poured out the water. (Hes. Theog. 775.) Zeus became by her the father of Persephone (Apollod. i. 3. § 1), and Peirna the father of Echidna. (Paus. viii. 18. § 1.)

[Suada, the Roman personification of persuasion, the Greek Peitho (Πειθώ). She is also called by the diminutive Snadela. (Horat. Epist. i. 6. 38; Cic. Brut. 15, Cat. Maj. 11.)

[SuBrIUS Flavius or Flavius. [FlaVus.

[SuBuLo, P. Decius, was one of the triumvirs for settling new colonists at Aquileia, in n. c. 169; and he is probably the same as the P. Decius, who was sent to Rome in the following year by the praetor L. Anicius, to announce his victory over the Ilyrians and his capture of king Gentins. (Liv. xiii. 17. xiv. 3.)

[SuEtIUs Clemens, was with two others placed by Otho over the troops who were to attack Gallia Narbonensis. (Tac. Hist. i. 57, ii. 12.)

L. SuEtIUs, one of the witnesses against Verres, when he was accused by Ciero. (Cic. Ferr. i. 5, ii. 12, v. 47.)

[SuEtIUs TranQuilLUUs.

[SuEtIUs OptatIanus, wrote the life of the emperor Tacitus. (Vopisc. Tac. 11.)

[SuEtIUs pauliNUs. [pauliNus.

[C. SuEtIUs TranQuilLUUs. The little that is known of Suetonius is derived from his lives of the Caesars and the letters of his friend, the younger Plinius.

He states that he was a young man (adolescents) twenty years after the death of Nero (Nero, c. 57.), and Nero died A. D. 68. Accordingly he may have been born a few years after Nero's death. In his life of Domitian (c. 12) he speaks of being present at a certain affair, as an adolescentus. It appears from various passages in his work that he might have received oral information about the emperors who lived before he was born, at least Tiberius, Caligula, Claudius, and Nero. His father Suetonius Lenis (Otho, c. 10), a tribune of the thirteenth legion, was in the battle of Bedriacum or Bedriacum, in which Otho was defeated by Vitellius. The words Lenis and Tranquillus have the same meaning—but there may be some doubt about the reading Lenis, in the passage in the life of Otho. In the collection of the letters of the twelve emperors Plinius ascribes to Suetonius Tranquillus, from one of which (i. 18) it appears that Suetonius was then a young man and entering on the career of an advocate. In another letter (i. 24) he speaks of his friend Tranquillus wishing to buy a small estate, such as suited a man of studious habits, enough to amuse him, without occupying him too much. Suetonius does not appear to have been desirous of public employment, for he requested Plinius to transfer to a relation, Caesennius Silvanus, a tribuneship, which Plinius had obtained for Suetonius (iii. 8). In a letter of uncertain date (v. 11) Plinius urges Suetonius to publish his works (scripta), but without giving any intimidation what the works were; Plinius says that he had already recommended the works of Suetonius in some hendecasyllabic verses, and jocularly expresses his danger of being called on to produce them by legal process (ne cogantur ad exigendum formulam accipere). In a letter to Tranquillus (vii. 3) Plinius commends to the emperor the integrity and learning of Suetonius, who had become his intimate friend, and he says that he liked him the better, the more he knew him: he requested the emperor to grant Suetonius the jus trium liberorum, for though Suetonius was married he had no children, or at least had not the number of three, which was necessary to relieve him from various legal disabilities. The emperor granted the privilege to Suetonius.

Suetonius became Magister Epistolarum to Hadrianus, a situation which would give him the opportunity of seeing many important documents relating to the emperors. In a passage in the life of Augustus (c. 7) Suetonius makes mention of his having given to the Princeps a bronze bust which represented Augustus when a boy. The critics generally assume that the Princeps was Hadrianus; but it is immaterial whether it was Hadrianus or Trajanus, so far as concerns the biography of Suetonius. Hadrianus, who was apparently of a jealous disposition, deprived of their offices at the same time, Septicius Clarus, who was Praefectus...
SUETONIUS.

Prætorio, Suetonius Tranquillus, and many others, on the ground of associating with Sabina the emperor's wife, without his permission, and apparently during the emperor's absence in Britain, on terms of more familiarity than was consistent with respect to the imperial household. (Spartian, Hadrian, c. 11.)

Suetonius wrote many works, a list of which is given in Suidas (s. v. Τράγκωλος), De Ludis Graecorum, lib. i.; De Spectaculis et Certaminibus Romanorum, libri ii.; De Anno Romano, lib. i.; De Notitia, on the notea or marks used in writing, which may have been a treatise on the Roman short hand; De Ciceronis Republica; De Nominiibus propriis et de Generibus Vestim; De Voelbus mali omnis; De Roma egyptiis Institutis et Moribus, libri i.; Historiae Caesarum, libr Octo; Stema illiastrum Romanorum. He also wrote some other works of which fragments have been discovered: De Regibus, libri iii.; De Institutione Officiarum; De Rebus Varis; and others. There are still extant, and attributed to Suetonius, Vitae Duodecim Caesarum, or the twelve Emperors, of whom the first is C. Julius Caesar and the last is Domitian; Liber de ilustribus Grammaticis; and Liber de claris Rhetoribus; neither of which is contained in the list of Suidas; Vita Terentii, Horatii, Persii, Lucani, Juvenalis, Plinii Majoris, which also are not included in the catalogue of Suidas.

The chief work of Suetonius is his lives of the Caesars which, as it appears, were sometimes distributed in eight books, as they are in some manuscripts. The authorities which he followed for the several lives have been diligently examined by Augustus Krause (De Suetonii Tranquilli Fontinos et Auctoritate, Berlin, 1841). Krause gives some reasons for supposing that Suetonius consulted the historical writings of Tacitus, and he argues, that as Tacitus did not write his annals before A. D. 117, in which year Hadrian succeeded Trajan, Suetonius did not write the lives of the Caesars before A. D. 120. This is not very satisfactory, though it must be admitted that there are many expressions in Suetonius, which closely resemble the expressions in Tacitus; and Suetonius, a grammarian (grammaticus), was likely enough to copy particular phrases. Indeed Suetonius often quotes Senatusconsulta and other documentary evidence in the very words, which Tacitus as a general rule did not. These lives of Suetonius are not and do not affect to be historical: they are rather anecdotal, and in the nature of Mémoires pour servir. His authorities are the writings of the Roman emperors themselves and those of their freedmen, Epistole, Orationes, Testamenta, and other documents of that kind; public documents, as Senatusconsulta, Fasti, inscriptions, and the Acta of the Senate and the people; also the Greek and Roman writers on Roman history. He also learned much from conversation with those who were older than himself, and he would know something of Titus and Domitian at least, as he was a young man during their reign. Suetonius does not follow the chronological order in his Lives, but he groups together many things of the same kind, as he says himself (Augustus, c. 9). His language is brief and precise; his style is obscure, without any affection of ornament. He certainly tells a prodigious number of scandalous anecdotes about the Caesars, but there was plenty to tell about them; and if he did not choose to suppress those anecdotes which he believed to be true, that is no imputation on his veracity. As a great collection of facts of all kinds, the work on the Caesars is invaluable for the historian of this period. His judgment and his honesty have both been attacked by some modern critics; but we are of the same opinion as Krause that on both grounds a careful study of his work will justify him. The friendship of the younger Plinius is evidence in favour of the integrity of Suetonius, and Vopiscus, no great authority, it is true, calls him a most accurate and impartial writer (Flav. Vopisc. Ferrum, c. 1; compare the Life of Probus, c. 2). Those who attack the credit of Suetonius must conduct the assault with more ability and judgment than H. Heisein has in his absurd case, entitled "Disertatio de Imperatoria majestate a primis Historiae Augustae conditoris indignisima habita." (Symbol. Lit. Bremen. tom. ii. iii.)

The treatise De Illustribus Grammaticis and that De Claris Rhetoribus are probably only parts of a larger work, for Hieronymus says in a letter to Desiderius, "I have written a treatise on illustrious men from the time of the Apostles to our own age, imitating therein Tranquillus and the Greek Apollonius." (Casaubon's note on the title of the work De Illustribus Grammaticis.) These two treatises contain a few biographical and other notices, that are occasionally useful. It has been conjectured that the few scanty lives of the Latin poets, already enumerated, belonged to a larger work De Poetis. If this conjecture be true, the short notice of the elder Plinius may not be by Suetonius, and Casaubon would not allow it to be his. But the opinion as to the book De Poetis is merely a conjecture. A work entitled De Viris Illustribus, which has been attributed both to Suetonius and the younger Plinius, is now unanimously assigned to Aurelius Victor.

The editions of Suetonius are very numerous. Before A. D. 1500, fifteen editions had appeared, a proof that the Lives of the Caesars were favourite reading. The oldest edition with a date is that of Rome, 1470, folio. The best of the early editions is that of I. Casaubon, Geneva, 1595, and Paris, 1610. A small edition by J. Schild, Leiden, 1647, contains a selection of useful notes. One of the most useful editions is that by P. Burmann, Amsterdam, 1736, 2 vols. 4to., with a selection of notes from the principal commentators, the fragments of Suetonius, inscriptions relating to the Caesars, tables of the coins of the Caesars, and a copious index. One of the latest editions is that of Baummarten-Crusius, Leipzig, 1816, 3 vols. 8vo., which was again edited by C. B. Hase, Paris, 1828, 2 vols. 8vo.

There is an English translation of the Twelve Caesars by the industrious translator, Philemon Holland, London, 1606, folio. Besides these there are four other English translations, the last of which is by A. Thomson, London, 1796, 8vo., "with annotations and a review of the government and literature of the different periods." There are translations in Italian, French, Spanish, Dutch, German, and Danish.

Bähr's Geschichte der Turnischen Literatur contains the chief references for the literature of Suetonius.

SUFENAS. 291

M. NONIUS, was tribune of the plebs in B. c. 56, and in conjunction with his colleagues C. Cato and Procilius, prevented the consular comitia from being held, in consequence of which an interregnum ensued and thus Pompey and Crassus were elected consuls. On account of their violent conduct in their tribunate Sufenas and his colleagues were brought to trial in B.C. 54; Proculius was condemned, but Sufenas and Cato were acquitted through the influence of Pompey. Sufenas was propraetor in B.C. 51, in one of the provinces in the neighbourhood of Chalcis, and on the breaking out of the civil war two years afterwards, he is mentioned as one of Pompey’s generals. (Cic. ad Att. iv. 15. § 4, vi. 1. § 12, viii. 15. § 3.) He appears to be the same as the Nonius, who was present at the battle of Pharsalia, and who sought to encourage his party after their defeat by remarking that seven eagles were left in the camp of Pompey; when Cicero replied, “It would be very well if we were fighting with jack-daws.” (Plut. Cic. 38.)

There are coins of one Sex. Nonius Sufenas, a specimen of which is subjoined. On the obverse is the head of Saturn and on the reverse a woman seated whom Victory is in the act of crowning. On the reverse we read SEX. NONI. PR. L. V. P. F.; the latter letters are interpreted either praetor or primus iudicis voticos publicos fecit. (Eckhel, vol. v. pp. 261, 262.)

COIN OF SEX. NONIUS SUFENAS.

SUIDAS. (Σουίδας). A Greek Lexicon is extant under the name of Suidas, but nothing is known of the compiler. A Suidas is mentioned by Strabo (p. 329, ed. Casaubon.) as the author of a history of Thessaly, and this work is also cited by the scholar on Apollonius Rhodius, and by Stephanus of Byzantium (s. v. Άρμωρ, Αδωνάτη, Φράγμα, Στέφανον). It is not likely that this Suidas is the author of the Lexicon; but no certain conclusion as to the age of the compiler can be derived from passages in the work, which are unfounded, and were written long after the time of Stephanus of Byzantium, for the work may have received numerous interpolations and additions. Eustathius, who lived about the end of the twelfth century A.D., quotes the Lexicon of Suidas. The article Adam (Αδάμ) contains a chronological epitome, which ends with the emperor Joannes Zimises, who died A.D. 974; and in the article Constantinople (Κωνσταντινουπόλις) are mentioned Basilii the second, and Constantius, who succeeded Joannes Zimises. A remark under the article Polyceutus (Πολυκευτός) shows that the writer of that remark was contemporaneous with the Patriarch Polyceutus (Δημητριάδος Κωνσταντινοπόλιτας) who succeeded Theophylactus, A.D. 956 (note of Reinesius); but the date 936 is given by other authorities. This passage which Reinesius assumes to prove the period of the author of the Lexicon, merely proves the period of the writer who made the remark; and he may be either the author of the Lexicon or an interpolator. But there are passages in the Lexicon which refer even to a later date (s. v. Θεόρατος; Άπειρος; Τελειονόμος), for Michael Psellus is quoted, and Psellus lived at the close of the eleventh century A.D. (See the notes on these words in Gaisford’s edition.)

The Lexicon of Suidas is a dictionary of words arranged in alphabetical order, with some few peculiarities of arrangement; but it contains both words which are not found in dictionaries of languages, and also names of persons and places, with extracts from ancient Greek writers, grammarians, scholars, and lexicographers, and some extracts from later Greek writers. The names of persons comprehend both persons who are mentioned in sacred and in profane history, which shows that if the work is by one hand, it is by a Christian; but there is no inconsistency in supposing that the original of the Lexicon which now goes under the name of Suidas, is a work of earlier date even than the time of Stephanus of Byzantium, and that it received large accessions from some various hands. No well conceived plan has been the basis of this work: it is incomplete as to the number of articles, and exceeding irregular and unequal in the execution. Some articles are quite complete, others contain no information at all. As to the biographical notices it has been conjectured that Suidas or the compiler got them all from one source, which, it is further supposed, may be the Onomatalogos or Phenomena of Greek History, for it is said in Suidas (s. v. Ηρόδορος), “of which this book is an epitome;” but it is an incorrect interpretation to conclude that Suidas means to say that his work is an epitome of the Onomatalogos (περὶ ποικίλων ἐπιφανεστάτων), which would be manifestly false: he means to say that the work in use at the time when he wrote was an epitome of the Onomatalogos.

The scholar on Aristophanes has been freely used in the compilation of this Lexicon. The extracts from ancient Greek writers are very numerous, but the names of the writers are frequently omitted. These extracts have sometimes no reference to the title of the article, and have no application to it; a circumstance probably owing to numerous interpolations made in the manuscript copies of the Lexicon. A want of criticism prejudices the whole work, or rather excessive carelessness, as in the case of the name Severus (Σεβέρου, and Ruster’s note). The article Alyattes (Ἀλυάτης) is another instance, and there are others of a like kind.

There is prefixed to the editions of Suidas the following notice: —Τὸ μὲν παρὸν Βεβοϊν Σουίδας, οἱ δὲ συνταγμένα τούτῳ άνδρες σύμφων, which is followed by a list of twelve names. As to this title, see the remarks of Harles.

The Lexicon of Suidas, though without merit as to its execution, is valuable both for the literary history of antiquity, for the explanation of words, and for the citations from many ancient writers; and a prodigious amount of critical labour has been bestowed upon it. Many emendations have been made on the text by Toupi and others.

The first edition of Suidas was by Demetrius Chaleondylos, Milan, 1499, fol., without a Latin version. The second, by the elder Aldus, Venice, 1514, fol., is also without a Latin version: this edition was reprinted by Froben, Bâle, 1544, fol., with some corrections. The first Latin translation of Suidas was made by Hieron. Wolf, Bâle, 1564, 1581, fol. The first edition, which contained both the Greek text and a Latin version, was by Aemilius Portus, Geneva, 1619, 2 vols. fol., and 1630, with a new title. The Latin version is said to be better than Wolf's.

The edition of L. Küster appeared at Cambridge, 1705, 3 vols. folio. The basis of this edition is not the Editio Princeps, but that of Portus. Küster corrected the text with the aid of the MSS., added numerous good notes, and improved the version of Portus. But he dealt with the Greek text rather in an arbitrary way, and rejected all that he considered to be interpolated. J. Gronovius made an attack on Küster's edition, to which Küster replied. The preface of Küster contains a dissertation on Suidas.

The edition of Suidas by T. Gaisford, in three handsome volumes folio, appeared at Oxford in 1834. The first two volumes contain the text without a Latin version, and the notes, which are chiefly selected from Küster and others. The third volume contains "Index Kusierianus Recurum et Qominum Proprionum quae extra seriem suam in Suidae Lexico occurrant;" "Index Glossarium Personarum Verborumque notati digniorum;" and "Index Scriptorum und Suida citatorum." In his preface Gaisford states, that he used nearly the same MSS. as Küster, but that Küster was careless in noting the readings of the MSS. Gaisford has given the various readings of the best MS., and those of the edition of Chalcedonius. Küster adopted many of the emendations of Portus without acknowledgment, and he is accused generally of borrowing without owning where he got his material from.

The edition of G. Bernhardy, 4to, Halle, 1834, contains a Latin version. It is founded on the edition of Gaisford, as appears from the title—"Gr. & Lat. ad fidem optimorum librorum exactum, post Th. Gaisford recens. et adnot. crit. instructa Gdf. Bernhardy."

There are said to be two unpublished extracts from an epitome of Suidas, by Thomas of Crete, and by Macarius Hieromonachus, the brother of Nicæphorus Gregorius. As to the Latin translation of Suidas, said to have been made by Robert Gros-tete, bishop of Lincoln, who died in 1253, see Fabric. Bibliol. Græca, vol. vi. p. 402. [G. L.]

SULLIUS CAESONIUS NUS. [CAESONINUS.] SULLIUS NERULPUS. [NERULPINUS.] SULLLIUS RUFUS. [RUFUS.] SULCA, Q. BAEBIUS, one of the Roman ambassadors, sent to Ptolemy in Egypt, in B. C. 173. (Liv. xliii. 6.)

SULLA, the name of a patrician family of the Cornelia gens. This family was originally called Rufinus [Rufinus], and the first member of it who obtained the name of Sulla was P. Cornelius Sulla, who was flamen dialis and praetor in the second Punic war. [See below, No. 1.] This was stated by the dictator Sulla, in the second book of his Commentaries (Gell. i. 12), and is corroborated by Livy and other authorities. Plutarch therefore has made a mistake in saying that the dictator Sulla had this name given to him from a personal peculiarity. (Plut. Sull. 2.) The origin of the name is uncertain. Drumm, and most modern writers, suppose that it is a word of the same signification as Rufus or Rufinus, and refers simply to the red colour of the hair or the complexion: and Plutarch appears to have understood the word to have this meaning, since he relates (l. c.) that the dictator received the name of Sulla in consequence of his face being spotted with rough red blotches interspersed with the white. Macrobius (Sat. i. 17) gives quite a different explanation, and derives the word from Sibylla, which he says was given to P. Cornelius Rufinus, because he was the first to introduce the celebration of the Ludi Apollinaris in accordance with the commands of the Sibylline books, and that this surname Sibylla was afterwards shortened into Sulla. This explanation of the word is repeated by Charisius (Inst. Gram. i. 20); but, independent of other objections, it must be rejected on the authority of Quintilian (i. 4. § 25), who classes Sulla with other cognomina, which owed their origin to certain bodily peculiarities. Some modern writers, such as Cortius (ad Sall. Catt. 5), regard Sulla as a diminutive of Sura, which was a cognomen in several Roman gentes [Sura], and we are disposed to accept this as the most probable explanation of the word. It would be formed from Sura on the same analogy as puella from puera, and tenellus from tener (comp. Schneider, Elementarlehre der lateinischen Sprache, vol. i. p. 47, &c.). There is no authority for writing the word Sylla, as is done by many modern writers. On coins and inscriptions we always find Sula or Sulla, never Sylla.

1. P. SULLA (Rufinus) Sulla, the great-grandfather of the dictator Sulla, and the grandson of P. Cornelius Rufinus, who was twice consul in the Samnite wars. [Rufinus, Cornelius, No. 2.] His father is not mentioned. He was, as has been already mentioned, the first of the family who bore the surname of Sulla. He was flamen dialis, and likewise praecon urbannus and peregrinos in B. C. 212. The praecon of the preceding year, M. Attilius, had handed over to him certain sacred verses of the seer Marcus, partly referring to the past and partly to the future, and which commanded the Romans, among other things, to institute an annual festival in honour of Apollo. Upon this the senate ordered the decemviri to consult the Sibylline books, and as these gave the same command, Sulla presided over the first Ludi Apollinaris, which were celebrated this year in the circus maximus. (Livy xxxv. 2. 3, 12, 15, 32, 41.)

2. P. Cornelius Sulla, the son of No. 1, and the grandfather of the dictator Sulla, was praetor in B. C. 186, when he obtained Sicily as his province. (Livy xxxix. 6. 8.)

3. S. Cornelius Sulla, the brother of No. 2, was one of the ten commissioners, who was sent by the senate into Macedonia, in B. C. 167, after the conquest of Perseus, in order to arrange the affairs of that country, in conjunction with L. Aemilius Paullus. (Livy xiv. 17.)

4. L. Cornelius Sulla, the son of No. 2, and the father of the dictator Sulla, lived in obscurity, and left his son only a slender fortune. (Plut. Sull. 1.)

5. L. Cornelius Sulla Felix, the dictator, was born in B. C. 158. Like most other great men, he was the architect of his own fortunes. He possessed neither of the two great advantages which secured for the Roman nobles easy access to the honours of the commonwealth, an illustrious ancestry and hereditary wealth. His father had left him so small a property that he paid for his lodgings very little more than a freedman who lived in the same house with him. But still his means were sufficient to secure for him a good education. He studied the Greek and Roman literature with diligence and success, and appears early to have imbued that love for literature and art by which he was distinguished throughout his life. At the same time that he was cultivating his mind, he was also indulging his senses. He passed a great part of his time in the company of actors and actresses; he was fond of wine and women; and he continued to pursue his pleasures with as much eagerness as his ambitious schemes down to the time of his death. He possessed all the accomplishments and all the vices which the old Cato had been most accustomed to denounce, and he was one of those patterns of Greek literature and of Greek profligacy who had begun to make their appearance at Rome in Cato's time, and had since become more and more common among the Roman nobles. But Sulla's love of pleasure did not absorb all his time, nor did it emasculate his mind; for no Roman during the latter days of the republic, with the exception of Julius Caesar, had a clearer judgment, a keener discrimination of character, or a firmer will. The truth of this the following history will abundantly prove.

The slender property of Sulla was increased by the liberality of his step-mother and of a courtezian named Nicopolis, both of whom left him all their fortune. His means, though still scanty for a Roman noble, now enabled him to aspire to the honours of the state, and he accordingly became a candidate for the quaestorship, to which he was elected for the year B. C. 107. He was ordered to carry over the cavalry to the consul C. Marius, who had just taken the command of the Jugurthine war in Africa. Marius was not well pleased that a quaestor had been assigned to him, who was only known for his profligacy, and who had had no experience in war; but the zeal and energy with which Sulla attended to his new duties soon rendered him a useful and skilful officer, and gained for him the unqualified approbation of his commander, notwithstanding his previous prejudices against him. He was equally successful in winning the affections of the soldiers. He always addressed them with the greatest kindness, seized every opportunity of conferring favours upon them, was ever ready to take part in all the jests of the camp, and at the same time never shrank from sharing in all their labours and dangers. Sulla, doubtless, had already the consulship before his eyes, and thus early did he show that he possessed the great secret of a man's success in a free state, the art of winning the affections of his fellow-men. He distinguished himself at the battle of Cirta, in which Jugurtha and Bocchus were defeated; and when the latter entered into negotiations with Marius, for the purpose of delivering the Numidian Sulla was the first Roman general who had any official intercourse with the Parthians, and he received the ambassadors with the same pride and arrogance as the Roman generals were accustomed to exhibit to the representatives of all foreign powers. Soon after this interview Sulla returned to Rome, where he was threatened in n. c. 91 by C. Censorinus with an impeachment for malversation, but the accusation was dropped.

The enmity between Marius and Sulla now assumed a more deadly form. Sulla's ability and increasing reputation had already led the aristocratic party to look up to him as their leader, and thus political animosity was added to private hatred. In addition to this Marius and Sulla were both anxious to obtain the command of the impending war against Mithridates; and the success which attended Sulla's recent operations in the East had increased his popularity, and pointed him out as the most suitable person for this important command. About this time Bocchus erected in the Capitol gilded figures, representing the surrender of Jugurtha to Sulla, at which Marius was so enraged that he could scarcely be prevented from removing them by force. The exasperation of both parties became so violent that they nearly had recourse to arms against each other; but the breaking out of the Social War, and the immediate danger to which Rome was now exposed, hushed all private quarrels, and made all parties fight alike for their own preservation and that of the republic. Never had Rome greater need of the services of all her generals, and Marius and Sulla both took an active part in the war against the common foe. But Marius was now advanced in years, and did not possess the same activity either of mind or body as his younger rival. He had therefore the deep mortification of finding that his achievements were thrown into the shade by the superior energy of his former questor, and that his fortune paled more and more before the rising sun.

In n. c. 90 Sulla served as legate under the consul L. Caesar, but his most brilliant exploits were performed in the following year, when he was legate of the consul L. Cato. In this year he destroyed the Campanian town of Stabiae, defeated L. Cluentius near Pompeii, and reduced the Hirpini to submission. He next penetrated into the very heart of Samnium, defeated Papius Mutilus, the leader of the Samnites, and followed up his victory by the capture of Dovianum, the chief town of this people. While he thus earned glory by his enterprises against the enemy, he was equally successful in gaining the affections of his troops. He pardoned their excesses, and connived at their crimes; and even when they put to death Albinius, one of his legates and a man of praetorian rank, he passed over the offence with the remark that his soldiers would fight all the better, and atone for their fault by their courage. As the time for the consular comitia approached Sulla hastened to Rome, where he was elected, almost unanimously, consul for the year n. c. 89, with Q. Pompeius Rufus as his colleague.

The war against Mithridates had now become inevitable, and as the Social War was not yet brought to a conclusion, the senate assigned to Sulla the command of the former, and to his colleague Pompeius the conduct of the latter. Marius, however, would not resign without a struggle to his hated rival the distinction which he had so long coveted;
but before he could venture to wrest from Sulla the authority with which he had been entrusted by the senate, he felt it necessary to strengthen the popular party. This he resolved to effect by identifying his interests with those of the Italian allies, who had lately obtained the franchise. He found a ready instrument for his purpose in the tribune P. Sulpicius Rufus, a man of ability and energy, but overwhelmed with debt, and who hoped that the spoils of the Mithridatic war, of which Marius promised him a liberal share, would relieve him from his embarrassments. This tribune accordingly brought forward two rogations, one to recall from exile those persons who had been banished in accordance with the Lex Varia, in account of their having been accessory to the Mithridatic war, and another, by which the Italians, who had just obtained the franchise, were to be distributed among the thirty-five tribes. The Italians, when they were admitted to the citizenship, were formed into eight or ten new tribes, which were to vote after the thirty-five old ones, and by this arrangement they would rarely be called upon to exercise their newly-acquired rights. On the other hand, the proposal of Sulpicius would place the whole political power in their hands, as they far outnumbered the old Roman citizens, and would thus have an overwhelming majority in each tribe. If this proposition passed into a law, it was evident that the new citizens out of gratitude would confer upon Marius the command of the Mithridatic war. To prevent the tribune from putting these rogations to the vote, the consuls declared a justitium, during which no business could be legally transacted. But Sulpicius was re- solving to repeat his proposal. By an underhand stratagem of followers he entered the forum and called upon the consuls to withdraw the justitium; and upon their refusal to comply with his demand, he ordered his satellites to draw their swords and fall upon the consuls. Pompeius escaped, but his son Quintus, who was also the son-in-law of Sulla, was killed. Sulla himself only escaped by taking refuge in the house of Marius, which was close to the forum, and in order to save his life he was obliged to remove the justitium.

Sulla quitted Rome and hastened to his army, which was besieging Nola. The city was now in the hands of Sulpicius and Marius, and the two rogations passed into law without opposition, as well as a third, conferring upon Marius the command of the Mithridatic war. Marius lost no time in sending some tribunes to assume on his behalf the command of the army at Nola; but the soldiers, who loved Sulla, and who feared that Marius might lead another army to Asia, and thus deprive them of their anticipated plunder, stoned his deputies to death. Sulla found his soldiers ready to respond to his wishes; they called upon him to lead them to Rome, and deliver the city from the tyrants. He was moreover encouraged by favourable omens and dreams, to which he always attached great importance. He therefore hesitated no longer, but at the head of six legions broke up from his encampment at Nola, and marched towards the city. His officers, however, refused to serve against their country, and all quitted him with the exception of one questor. This was the first time that a Roman had ever marched at the head of Roman troops against the city. Marius was taken by surprise. Such was the reverence that the Romans entertained for law, that it seems never to have occurred to him or to his party that Sulla would venture to draw his sword against the state. Marius attempted to gain time for preparations by forbidding Sulla in the name of the state to advance any further. But the praetors who carried this command narrowly escaped being murdered by the soldiers; and Marius as a last resort offered liberty to the slaves who would join him. But it was all in vain. Sulla entered the city without much difficulty, and Marius took to flight with his son and a few followers. Sulla used his victory with moderation. He protected the city from plunder, and in order to return to Rome passed through the streets along with his colleague. Only Marius, Sulpicius, and ten others of his bitterest enemies were declared public enemies by the senate at his command, on the ground of their having disturbed the public peace, taken up arms against the consuls, and excited the slaves to freedom. Sulpicius was betrayed by one of his slaves and put to death; Marius and his son succeeded in escaping to Africa. [MARIUS, p. 537, b.]

Although Sulla had conquered Rome, he had neither the time, nor perhaps the power, to carry into execution any great organic changes in the constitution. His soldiers were impatient for the plunder of Asia; and he probably thought it advisable to attach them still more strongly to his person before he ventured to deprive the people of their power in the commonwealth. He therefore contented himself with repealing the Sulpician laws, and enacting that no matter should in future be brought before the people without the previous sanction of a senatusconsultum; for the statement of Appian (B. C. i. 59) that he now abolished the Comitia tributa, and filled up the members of the senate, is evidently erroneous, and refers to a later time. It appears, however, that he attempted at this time to give some relief to debtors by a lex sancitaria, but the nature of which relief is uncertain from the mutilated condition of the passage in Festus (s. v.) who is the only writer that makes mention of this lex. Sulla sent forward his legions to Capua, that they might be ready to embark for Greece, but he himself remained in Rome till the consuls were elected for the following year. He recommended to the people Nonius, his sister's son, and Serv. Sulpicius. His candidates, however, were rejected, and the choice fell on Cn. Octavius, who belonged to the aristocratical party, but was a weak and irresolute man, and on L. Cinna, who was a professed champion of the popular side. Sulla did not attempt to oppose their election; to have recalled his legions to Rome would have been a dangerous experiment when the soldiers were so eager for the spoils of the East; and he therefore professed to be pleased that the people made use of the liberty he had granted them. He, however, took the vain precaution of making Cinna promise that he would make no attempt to disturb the existing order of things; but one of Cinna's first acts was to induce the tribune M. Virgilius to bring an accusation against Sulla as soon as his year of office had expired. Sulla, without paying any attention to this accusation, quitted Rome at the beginning of B. C. 87, and hastened to his troops at Capua, where he embarked for Greece, in order to carry on the war against Mithridates.

For the next four years Sulla was engaged in While 937 the prosecution of this war, the history of which is given under Mithridates VI. and his general Archelaus, and may therefore be dismissed here with a few words. Sulla landed at Dyrrhachium, and forthwith marched against Athens, which had become the head-quarters of the Mithridatic cause in Greece. After a long and obstinate siege, Athens was taken by storm on the 1st of March in the following year, n. c. 80; and in consequence of the insults which Sulla and his wife Metella had received from the tyrant Aristion, the city was given up to rape and plunder. He next obtained possession of the Pelopaeus, which had been defended by Archelaus, Meantime Mithridates had died at Dardanus. The Greeks concentrated all his troops in Boeotia. Sulla advanced against him, and defeated him in the neighbourhood of Chaeronea with such enormous loss, that out of the 120,000 men with whom Archelaus had opened the campaign, he is said to have assembled only 10,000 at Chalcis in Euboea, where he had taken refuge. While Sulla was carrying on the war with such success in Greece, his enemies had obtained the upper hand in Italy. The consul Cinna, who had been driven out of Rome by his colleague Octavius, soon after Sulla’s departure from Italy, had entered it again with Marius at the close of the year. Both Cinna and Marius were appointed consuls n. c. 86, all the regulations of Sulla were swept away, his friends and adherents murdered, his property confiscated, and he himself declared a public enemy. It had frequently been made a subject of panegyric upon Sulla that he had conducted the war with Mithridates under these circumstances, and preferred the subjugation of the enemies of Rome to the gratification of his own revenge. But it must be recollected that an immediate peace with Mithridates would have discontented his soldiers; while by bringing the war to an honourable conclusion, he gratified his troops by plunder, attached them more and more to his person, and at the same time collected from the conquered cities vast sums of money for the prosecution of the war against his enemies in Italy. At the same time it is an undoubted proof of his sagacity and forethought that he knew how to bide his time. Most other men in his circumstances would have hurried back to Italy at once to crush their enemies, and thus have ruined themselves. Marius died seventeen days after he had entered upon his consulship, and was succeeded in the office by L. Valerius Flaccus, who was sent into Asia that he might prosecute the war at the same time against Mithridates and Sulla. Flaccus was murdered by his troops at the instigation of Fimbria, who now assumed the command, and who gained several victories over the generals of Mithridates in Asia, in n. c. 85. About the same time the new army, which Mithridates had again sent to Archelaus in Greece, was again defeated by Sulla in the neighbourhood of Orchomenus. These repeated disasters made Mithridates anxious for peace, but it was not granted by Sulla till the following year, n. c. 84, when he had crossed the Hellespont in order to carry on the war in that country. Sulla was now at liberty to turn his arms against Fimbria, who was with his army at Thyatira. The name of Sulla carried victory with it. The troops of Fimbria deserted their general, who put an end to his own life. Sulla now prepared to return to Italy. After exacting enormous sums from the wealthy cities of Asia, he left his legate, L. Licinius Murena, in command of the province of Asia, with two legions, and set sail with his own army to Athens. While preparing for his deadly struggle in Italy, he did not lose his interest in literature. He carried with him from Athens to Rome the valuable library of Apelleion of Teos, which contained most of the works of Aristotle and Theophrastus. [Apelleion.] During his stay at Athens, Sulla had an attack of gout, of which he was cured by the use of the warm springs of Aedepus in Euboea. As soon as he recovered, he led his army to Dyrrhachium, and from thence crossed over to Brundusium in Italy.

Sulla landed at Brundusium in the spring of n. c. 83, in the consulship of L. Scipio and C. Marcellus. During the preceding year he had written to the senate, recounting the services he had rendered to the commonwealth from the time of the Jugurthine war down to the conquest of Mithridates, complaining of the ingratitude with which he had been treated, announcing his speedy return to Italy, and threatening to take vengeance upon his enemies and those of the republic. The senate, in alarm, sent an embassy to Sulla to endeavour to bring about a reconciliation between him and his enemies, and meantime ordered the consuls Cinna and Carbo to desist from levying troops, and making further preparations for war. Cinna and Carbo gave no heed to this command; they knew that a reconciliation was impossible, and resolved to carry over an army to Dalmatia, in order to have a prospect of joining the war against Sulla; but after one detachment of their troops had experienced some disasters, the remaining soldiers rose in mutiny, and murdered Cinna. The Marian party had thus lost their leader, but continued nevertheless to make every preparation to oppose Sulla, for they were well aware that he would never forgive them, and that their only choice lay between victory and destruction. Besides this the Italians were ready to support them, as these new citizens feared that Sulla would deprive them of the rights which they had lately obtained after so much bloodshed. The Marian party had every prospect of victory, for their troops far exceeded those of Sulla. According to Velleius Paterculus, they had 200,000 men in arms, while Sulla landed at Brundusium with only 30,000, or at the most 40,000 men. (Vell. Pat. ii. 24 ; Appian, B. C. i. 79.) But on the other hand, the popular party had no one of sufficient influence and military reputation to take the supreme command in the war; their vast forces were scattered about Italy, in different armies, under different generals; the soldiers had no confidence in their commanders, and no enthusiasm in their cause; and the consequence was, that whole hosts of them deserted to Sulla on the first opportunity. Sulla’s soldiers, on the contrary, were veterans, who had frequently fought by each other’s side, and had acquired that confidence in themselves and in their general which frequent victories always give to soldiers. Still if the Italians had remained faithful to the cause of the Marian party, Sulla would hardly have conquered, and therefore one of his first cares after landing at Brundusium was to detach them from his enemies. For this purpose he would not allow his troops to do any injury to the towns or fields of the Italians in his march from Brundusium through Calabria.
and Apulia, and he formed separate treaties with many of the Italian towns, by which he secured to them all the rights and privileges of Roman citizens which they then enjoyed. Among the Italians the Samnites continued to be the most formidable enemies of Sulla. They had not yet received the Roman franchise, because they had continued in arms down to this time, and they now joined the Marian party, not only with the design of securing the supremacy for the latter, but with the hope of conquering Rome by their means, and then destroying for ever their hated oppressor. Thus this civil war became merely another phase of the Marsic war, and the struggle between Rome and Samnium for the supremacy of the peninsula was renewed after the subjection of the latter for more than two hundred years.

Sulla marched from Apulia into Campania without meeting with any resistance. It was in the latter country that he gained his first victory over the consul Norbanus, who was defeated with great loss, and obliged to take refuge in Capua. His colleague Scipio, who was at no great distance, willingly accepted a truce which Sulla offered him, although Sertorius warned him against entering into any negotiations, and his caution was justified by the event. By means of his emissaries Sulla seduced into the troops of Scipio, who had now lengthened his own, the consul of the. The latter, who had been prisonet in his tent, Sulla, however, dismissed him uninjured. On hearing of this Carbo is said to have observed "that he had to contend in Sulla both with a lion and a fox, but that the fox gave him more trouble." Many distinguished Romans meantime had taken up arms on behalf of Sulla. Cn. Pompey had levied three legions for him in Picenum and the surrounding districts; and Q. Metellus Pius, M. Crassus, M. Lucullus, and several others offered their services as legates. It was not, however, till the following year, 82 B.C., that the struggle was brought to a decisive issue. The consuls of this year were Cn. Papirius Carbo and the younger Marius; the former of whom was entrusted with the protection of Etruria and Umbria, while the latter had to guard Rome and Latium. Sulla appears to have passed the winter at Campania. At the commencement of spring he advanced against the Etrurians, who had concentrated all his forces at Sacciportus, and defeated him with great loss. Marius took refuge in Prænestæ, where he had previously deposited his military stores, and a great quantity of gold and silver which he had brought from the Capitol and other temples at Rome. Sulla followed him to Prænestæ, and after leaving Q. Lucretius Ocella with a large force to blockade the town and compel it to a surrender by famine, he marched with the main body of his army to Rome. Marius was resolved not to perish unavenged, and accordingly before Sulla could reach Rome, he sent orders to L. Damasippus, the praetor, to put to death all his leading opponents. His orders were faithfully obeyed. Q. Mucius Scaevola, the pontifex maximus and jurist, P. Antistius, L. Domitius, and many other distinguished men were butchered and their corpses thrown into the Tiber. Sulla entered the city without opposition: Damasippus and his adherents, who had previously been made prisoners and repaired to Tarco in Etruria. Sulla marched against Carbo, who had been previously opposed by Pompeius and Metellus. The history of this part of the war is involved in great obscurity. Carbo made two efforts to relieve Prænestæ, but failed in each; and after fighting with various fortune against Pompey, Metellus, and Sulla, he at length embarked for Africa, desiring of further success in Italy. [For details see CARBO, No. 7.] Meantime Rome had nearly fallen into the hands of the enemy. The Samnites and Lucanians under Pontius Telesinus and L. L. Lamponius, while attempting to relieve Prænestæ, resolved to march straight upon Rome, which had been left without any army for its protection. Sulla barely arrived in time to save the city. The battle was fought before the Colline gate; it was long and obstinately contested; the contest was not simply for the supremacy of a party; the very existence of Rome was at stake, for Telesinus had declared that he would raze the city to the ground. The left wing where Sulla commanded in person was driven off the field by the vehemence of the enemy's charge; but the success of the right wing, which was commanded by Crassus, enabled Sulla to restore the battle, and at length gain a complete victory. Fifty thousand men are said to have fallen on each side (Appian, B.C. i. 95). All the most distinguished leaders of the enemy either perished in the engagement or were taken prisoners and put to death. Among these was the brave Sallustius Crispus, who was struck down, cut off and carried under the walls of Prænestæ, whereby announcing to the younger Marius that his last hope of succour was gone. To the Samnite prisoners Sulla showed no mercy. He was resolved to root out of the peninsula those heroic enemies of Rome. On the third day after the battle he collected all the Samnite and Lucanian prisoners in the Campus Martius, and ordered his soldiers to cut them down. The dying shrieks of so many victims frightened the senators, who had been assembled at the same time by Sulla in the temple of Bellona; but he bade them attend to what he was saying and not mind what was taking place outside, as he was only chastising some rebels, and he then quietly proceeded to finish his discourse. Prænestæ surrendered soon afterwards. The Romans in the town were pardoned; but all the Sammites and Praenestines were massacred without mercy. The younger Marius put an end to his own life. [Marius, No. 2.] The army of the latter was now virtually at an end, for the few towns which still held out had no prospect of offering any effectual opposition, and were reduced soon afterwards. In other parts of the Roman world the war continued still longer, and Sulla did not live to see its completion. The armies of the Marian party in Sicily and Africa were subdued by Pompey in the course of 82 B.C.; but Sertorius in Spain continued to defy all the attempts of the senate to crush him, till his cowardly assassination by Perperna in B.C. 72. [SERTORIUS.]

Sulla was now master of Rome. He had not commenced the civil war, but had been driven to it by the mad ambition of Marius. His enemies had attempted to deprive him of the command in the Mithridatic war which had been legally conferred upon him by the senate; and while he was fighting the battles of the republic they had declared him to Pontius Telesinus, conquered his property, and murdered the most distinguished of his friends and adherents. For all these wrongs, Sulla had threatened to take the most ample vengeance; and he more than redeemed his word.
He resolved to extirpate root and branch the popular party. One of his first acts was to draw up a list of his enemies who were to be put to death, which list was exhibited in the forum to public inspection, and called a proscriptio. It was the first instance of the kind in Roman history. All persons in this list were outlaws who might be killed by any one with impunity, even by slaves; their property was confiscated to the state, and was to be sold by public auction; their children and grandchildren lost their votes in the comitia, and were excluded from all public offices. Further, the place of his concealment, received two talents as a reward, and whoever sheltered such a person was punished with death. Terror now reigned, not only at Rome, but throughout Italy. Fresh lists of the proscribed constantly appeared. No one was safe; for Sulla gratified his friends by placing in the fatal lists their personal enemies, or persons whose property was coveted by his adherents. An estate, a house, or even a piece of plate was to many a man, who belonged to no political party, his death warrant; for although the confiscated property belonged to the state, and had to be sold by public auction, the friends and dependents of Sulla purchased it at a nominal price, as no one dared to bid against them. Oftentimes Sulla did not require the purchase-money to be paid at all, and in many cases he gave such property to his favourites without even the formality of a sale. Metella, the wife of the dictator, and Chrysogonus his freedman, P. Sulla, M. Crassus, Vettius, and Sex. Nae- vius are especially mentioned among those who re- ceived such presents; and handsome Roman ma- trons, as likewise actors and actresses, were fa- voured in the same manner. The number of per- sons who perished by the proscriptions is stated differently, but it appears to have amounted to many thousands. At the commencement of these horrors Sulla had been appointed dictator. As both the consuls had perished, he caused the senate to elect Valerius Flaccus interrex, and the latter brought before the people a rogatio, conferring the dictatorship upon Sulla, for the purpose of restoring order to the republic, and for as long a time as he judged to be necessary. Thus the dictatorship was revived after being in abeyance for more than 120 years, and Sulla obtained absolute power over the lives and fortunes of all the citizens. This was towards the close of B.C. 81. Sulla's great object in being invested with the dictatorship was to carry into execution in a legal manner the great reforms which he meditated in the constitu- tion and the administration of justice, by which he hoped to place the government of the republic on a firm and secure basis. He had no intention of abolishing the republic, and consequently he caused consuls to be elected for the following year, B.C. 81, and was elected to the office himself in B.C. 80, while he continued to hold the dictatorship.

At the beginning of the following year, B.C. 81, Sulla celebrated a splendid triumph on account of his victory over Mithridates. In a speech which he delivered to the people at the close of the glorious ceremony, he claimed for himself the sur- name of Fides, as he attributed his success in life to the favour of the gods. He believed himself to have been in particular under the protection of Venus, who had granted him victory in battle as well as in love. Hence, in writing to Greeks, he called himself Epaphroditus. All ranks in Rome bowed in awe before their master; and among other marks of distinction which were voted to him by the obsequious senate, a gilt equestrian statue was erected to his honour before the Rostra, bearing the inscription "Cornelio Sullae Imperatoris Felici."

During the years B.C. 80 and 79, Sulla carried into execution his various reforms in the consti- tution, of which an account is given at the close of his life. But at the same time he adopted measures in order to crushing his enemies more completely, and to secure the power of his party. These measures required a few words of explanation, as they did not form a part of his constitutional reforms, though they were intended for the support of the latter. The first of these measures has been already mentioned, namely the destruction of his enemies by the proscription. He appears to have published his list of victims immediately after the defeat of the Samnites and Lucanians at the Colline gate, without communi- cating, as Plutarch says (Sull. 31), with any mag- nistrate; but when he was dictator he proposed a law in the comitia centurianta, which ratified his proscriptions, and which is usually called Lex Cor- nelia de Proscriptione or De Proscriptis. By this law it was enacted that all proscriptions should cease on the 1st of June, B.C. 81. The lex Valeria, which conferred the dictatorship upon Sulla, gave him absolute power over the lives of Roman citizens, and hence Cicero says he does not know whether to call the proscription law a lex Valeria or lex Cornelia. (Cic. pro Rosc. Am. 43, 44, de Leg. Agr. iii. 2)

Another of Sulla's measures, and one of still more importance for the support of his power, was the establishment of military colonies throughout Italy. The inhabitants of the Italian towns, which had fought against Sulla, were deprived of the full Roman franchise which had been lately conferred upon them, and were only allowed to retain the commerium: their land was confiscated and given to the soldiers who had fought under him. Twenty- three legions (Appian, B. C. i. 100), or, according to another statement (Liv. Eclat. 89), forty-seven legions received grants of land in various parts of Italy. A great number of these colonies was settled in Etruria, the population of which was thus almost entirely changed. These colonies had the strongest interest in upholding the institutions of Sulla, since any attempt to invalidate the latter would have endangered their newly-acquired possessions. But though they were a support to the power of Sulla, they hastened the fall of the commonwealth; an idle and licentious soldiery supplanted an indus- trious and agricultural population; and Catiline found nowhere more adherents than among the military colonies of Sulla. While Sulla thus estab- lished throughout Italy a population devoted to his interests, he created at Rome a kind of body- guard for his protection by giving the citizenship to a great number of slaves belonging to those who had been proscribed by him. The slaves thus re- warded are said to have been as many as 10,000, and were called Cornelli after him, as their patron.

Sulla had completed his reforms by the begin- ning of B.C. 79, and as he longed for the undis- turbed enjoyment of his pleasures, he resolved to resign his dictatorship. Accordingly, to the general surprise he summoned the people, resigned his dictatorship, and declared himself ready to render an account of his conduct while in office. This voluntary abdication by Sulla of the sovereignty of the Roman world has excited the astonishment and admiration of both ancient and modern writers. But it is evident, as has already been remarked, that Sulla never contemplated, like Julius Caesar, the establishment of a monarchical form of government; and it must be recollected that he could retire into a private station without any fear that attempts would be made against his life or his institutions. The ten thousand Corneli at Rome and his veterans stationed throughout Italy, as well as the whole strength of the aristocratical party, secured him against all danger. Even in his retirement his will was law, and shortly before his death, he ordered his slaves to strangle a magistrate of one of the towns in Italy, because he was a public defaulter.

After resigning his dictatorship, Sulla retired to his estate at Puteoli, and there surrounded by the beauties of nature and art he passed the remainder of his life in those literary and sensual enjoyments in which he had always taken so much pleasure. His dissolute mode of life hastened his death. A dream warned him of his approaching end. Thereupon he made his testament, in which he left L. Lucullus the guardian of his son. Only two days before his death, he finished the twenty-second book of his memoirs, in which, foreseeing his end, he made a last will. Among other places, he has Chaldeans, that it was his fate to die after a happy life in the very height of his prosperity. He died in B.C. 78, in the sixtieth year of his age. The immediate cause of his death was the rupture of a blood-vessel, but some time before he had been suffering from the disgusting disease, which is known in modern times by the name of Morbus Pediculosis or Phthisiaria. Appian (B. C. i. 105) simply relates that he died of a fever. Zacharie, in his life of Sulla, considers the story of his suffering from phthisiaria as a fabrication of his enemies, and probably of the Athenians whom he had handled so severely; but Appian's statement does not contradict the common account, which is attested by too many ancient writers to be rejected on the slender reasons that Zachariace agrees (Plut. Sull. 39; Plin. H. N. v. 43, s. 44, xi. 33, s. 30, xxvi. 13. s. 66; Paus. i. 20. § 7; Aurel. Vict. de Vir. Ill. 75). The senate, faithful to Sulla to the last, resolved to give him the honours of a public funeral. This was however opposed by the consul Lepidus, who had resolved to attempt the repeal of Sulla's laws; but Sulla's power continued unshaken even after his death. The veterans were summoned from their colonies, and Q. Catulus, L. Lucullus, and Cn. Pompey, placed themselves at their head. Lepidus was obliged to give way and allowed the funeral to take place without interruption. It was a gorgeous pageant. The magistrates, the senate, the equites, the priests, and the Vestal virgins, as well as the veterans, accompanied the funeral procession to the Campus Martius, where the corpse was burnt according to Sulla's own wish, who feared that his enemies might insult his remains, as he had done those of Marius, which had been taken out of the grave and thrown into the Anio at his command. It had been previously the custom of the Cornelia gens to bury and not burn their dead. A monument was erected to Sulla in the Campus Martius, the inscription on which he is said to have composed himself. It stated that none of his friends ever did him a kind act, and none of his enemies a wrong, without being fully repaid.

Sulla was married five times: — 1. To Julia, for which name we ought perhaps to read Julia (Plut. Sull. 6). She bore Sulla a daughter, who was married to Q. Pompeius Rufus, the son of Sulla's colleague in the consulship in B.C. 88. [Pom- peius, No. 6.] 2. To Aelia. 3. To Coelia, whom he had on the pretext of barrenness, but in reality in order to marry Caecilia Metella. 4. To Caecilia Metella, who bore him a son, who died before Sulla [see below, No. 6.], and likewise twins, a son and a daughter. [No. 7.] 5. Valeria, who bore him a daughter after his death. [Valer- ria.]

Sulla's love of literature has been repeatedly mentioned in the preceding sketch of his life. He wrote a history of his own life and times, which is called Τρομώματα or Memoirs by Plutarch, who has made great use of it in his life of Sulla, as well as in his biographies of Marius, Sertorius, and Lucullus. It was dedicated to L. Lucullus, and extended to twenty-two books, the last of which was finished by Sulla a few days before his death, as has been already related. This did not however complete the work, which was brought to a conclusion by his freedman Cornelius Epica- dius, probably at the request of his son Faustus, to whom the memoirs were preserved; [Plut. de Caec. Met. ii. 12.] From the quotations in A. Gellius (i. 12, xx. 6) it appears that Sulla's work was written in Latin, and not in Greek, as Heerens [Heeren, De Fontibus Plutarcho, p. 151, &c.; Krause, Vitae et Fragmenta Hist. Roman. p. 290, &c.] Sulla also wrote Fabulae Atellaneae (Athen. vi. p. 261, c.), and the Greek Anthology contains a short epigram which is ascribed to him. (Brunck, Lect. p. 267; Jacobs, Anth. Gr. vol. ii. p. 66, Anth. Pal. Appt. 91, vol. ii. p. 788.)

The chief ancient authority for Sulla's life is Plutarch's biography, which has been translated by G. Long, with some useful notes, London, 1844, where the reader will find references to most of the passages in Appian and other ancient writers who speak of Sulla. The passages in Sallust and Cicero, in which Sulla is mentioned, are given by Orelli in his In omnium Sallutianum, pt. ii. p. 192. The two modern writers, who have written Sulla's life with most accuracy, are Zacharie, in his work entitled L. Cornelius Sulla, genan der der Glückliche, als Ordner des Römischen Freyschutzes, Heidelberg, 1834, and Drumm, in his Geschichte Roms, vol. ii. p. 429, &c. The latter writer gives the more impartial account of Sulla's life and character; the former falls into the common fault of Biogra- phers in attempting to apologise for the vices and crimes of the subject of his biography.

THE LEGISLATION OF SULLA.

All the reforms of Sulla were effected by means of Leges, which were proposed by him in the comitia centuriata and enacted by the votes of the people. It is true that the votes of the people were a mere form, but it was a form essential to the preservation of his work, and was maintained by Augustus in his legislation. The laws proposed by Sulla are called by the general name of Leges Corneliae, and particular laws are designated by the name of the particular subject to which they refer, as Lex Cornelia de Falsi, Lex Cornelia de Sicarii, &c.
These laws were all passed during the time that Sulla was dictator, that is, from the end of B. C. 82 to B. C. 79, and most of them in all probability during the years B. C. 81 and 80. It is impossible to determine in what order they were proposed, nor is it material to do so. They may be divided into four classes, laws relating to the constitution, to the ecclesiastical corporations, to the administration of justice, and to the improvement of public morals. Their general object and design was to restore, as far as possible, the ancient Roman constitution, and to give again to the senate and the aristocracy that power of which they had been deprived by the previous passage of measures by the popular party. It did not escape the penetration of Sulla that many of the evils under which the Roman state was suffering, arose from the corruption of the morals of the people; and he therefore attempted in his legislation to check the increase of crime and luxury by stringent enactments. The attempt was a hopeless one, for vice and immorality pervaded alike all classes of Roman citizens, and no laws can restore to a people the moral feelings which they have lost. Sulla has been much blamed by modern writers for giving to the Roman state such an aristocratical constitution; but under the circumstances in which he was placed he could not well have done otherwise. To have vested the government in the mob of which the Roman people consisted, would have been perfect madness; and as he was not prepared to establish a monarchy, he had no alternative but giving the power to the senate. His constitution did not last, because the aristocracy were thoroughly selfish and corrupt, and exercised the power which Sulla had entrusted to them only for their own aggrandisement and not for the good of their country. Their shameless conduct soon disgusted the provinces as well as the capital; the people again regained their power, but the consequence was anarchy and not a government; and as neither class was fit to rule, they were obliged to submit to the dominion of a single man. Thus the empire became a necessity as well as a blessing to the exhausted Roman world. Sulla's laws respecting criminal jurisprudence were the most lasting and bear the strongest testimony to his greatness as a legislator. He was the first to reduce the criminal law of Rome to a system; and his laws, together with the Julian laws, formed the basis of the criminal Roman jurisprudence till the downfall of the empire.

In treating of Sulla's laws we shall follow the fourfold division which has been given above.

1. Laws relating to the Constitution.—The changes which Sulla introduced in the comitia and the senate, first call for our attention. The Comitia Tributa, or assemblies of the tribes, which originally possessed only the power to make regulations respecting the local affairs of the tribes, had gradually become a sovereign assembly with legislative and judicial authority. Sulla deprived them of their legislative and judicial powers, as well as of their right of electing the priests, which they had also acquired. He did not however do away with them entirely, as might be inferred from the words of Appian (B. C. i. 59); but he allowed them to exist with the power of electing the tribunes, aediles, quaestors, and other inferior magistrates. This seems to have been the only purpose for which they were called together; and all conciones of the tribes, by means of which the tribunes had exercised a powerful influence in the state, were strictly forbidden by Sulla. (Cic. pro Cluent. 40.)

The Comitia Centuriata, on the other hand, were allowed to retain their right of legislation unmpaired. He restored however the ancient regulation, which had fallen into desuetude, that no matter should be brought before them without the previous sanction of a senatusconsultum (Appian, B. C. i. 59); but he did not require the confirmation of the senate, as the latter had long ceased to have any practical existence. Götting supposes that the right of provocatio or appeal to the comitia centuriata was done away with by Sulla, but the passage of Cicero (Cic. Ferr. Act. i. 15), which he quotes in support of this opinion, is not sufficient to prove it.

The Senate had been so much reduced in numbers by the proscriptions of Sulla, that he was obliged to fill up the vacancies by the election of three hundred new members. These however were not appointed by the censors from the persons who had filled the magistracies of the state, but were elected by the people. Appian says (B. C. i. 100) that they were elected by the tribes. Most modern writers think that we are not to understand by this the comitia tributa, but the comitia centuriata, which voted also according to tribes at this time; but Götting observes that as the senators were regarded by Sulla as public officers, there is no difficulty in supposing that they were elected by the comitia tributa as the inferior magistrates were. However this may be, we know that these three hundred were taken from the equestrian order. (Appian, L. c.; Liv. Epit. 89.) This election was an extraordinary one, and was not intended to be the regular way of filling up the vacancies in the senate; for we are expressly told that Sulla increased the number of quaestors to twenty, that there might be a sufficient number for this purpose (Tac. Ann. xi. 32.). It was not necessary for Sulla to make any alteration respecting the duties and functions of the senate, as the whole administration of the state was in their hands; and he gave them the initiative in legislation by requiring a previous senatusconsultum respecting all measures that were to be submitted to the comitia, as is stated above. One of the most important of the senate's duties was the appointment of the governors of the provinces. By the Lex Sempronii of C. Graneus, the senate had to determine every year before the election of the consuls the two provinces which the consuls should have (Cic. de Prox. Cons. 2, 7; Sull. Jug. 27); but as the imperium was conferred only for a year, the governor had to leave the province at the end of that time, unless his imperium was renewed. Sulla in his law respecting the provinces (de Provincia ordinandis) did not make any change in the Sempronian law respecting the distribution of the provinces by the senate; but he allowed the governor of a province to continue to hold the government till a successor was appointed by the senate, and enacted that he should continue to possess the imperium till he entered the city, without the necessity of its being renewed annually (Cic. ad Fam. i. 9. § 12). The time during which the government of a province was to be held, thus depended entirely upon the will of the senate. It was further enacted that as soon as a successor arrived in the province, the former governor must quit it within thirty days (Cic. ad Fam. iii. 6); and the law also limited the ex-
SULLA.

To degrade the tribunate still lower, Sulla enacted, that whoever had held this office forfeited thereby all right to become a candidate for any of the higher curule offices, in order that all persons of rank, talent, and wealth, might be deterred from holding an office which would be a fatal impediment to rising any higher in the state. (Appian, B. C. i. 100; Ascon. in Cornel. p. 78, ed. Orelli.) The statement that Sulla required persons to be senators before they could become tribunes (Appian, L. c.), is explained by the circumstance that the quaestorship and theaedilsip, which usually preceded the tribune gave admission to the senate; and it would therefore appear that Sulla required all persons to hold the quaestorship before the tribunate.

II. Laws relating to the Ecclesiastical Corporations.—Sulla repealed the Lex Domitia, which gave to the comitia tributa the right of electing the members of the great ecclesiastical corporations, and restored to the latter the right of co-optatio or self-election. At the same time he increased the number of pontiffs and augurs to fifteen respectively (Dion Cass. xxxvii. 57; Liv. Epit. 89). It is commonly said that Sulla also increased the number of the keepers of the Sibylline books from ten to fifteen; and though we have no express authority for this statement (for the passage of Servius, ad Verg. Aen., vii. 57, 290), it is probable that he did, as we read of Quincteumviri in the time of Cicero (ad Fam. viii. 4) instead of decemviri as previously.

III. Laws relating to the Administration of Justice.—Sulla established permanent courts for the trial of particular offences, in each of which a praetor presided. A precedent for this had been given by the Lex Calpurnia of the tribune L. Calpurnius Piso, in b. c. 149, by which it was enacted that a praetor should preside at all trials for repetundae during his year of office. This was called a Quaesitio Perpetua, and nine such Quaesitones Perpetuae were established by Sulla, namely, De Repetundis, Majestate, De Sicariis et Veneficiis, De Parricidio, Peculato, Ambitus, De Nummis Adulterinis, De Pulsis or Testamentaria, and De Vi Publica. Jurisdiction in civil cases was left to the praetor peregrinus and the praetor urbana as before, and the other six praetors presided in the Quaestiones; but as the latter were more in number than the praetors, some of the praetors took more than one quaestio, or a judex quaestiones was appointed. The praetors, after their election, had to draw lots for their several jurisdictions. Sulla enacted that the judges should be taken exclusively from the senators, and not from the equites, the latter of whom had possessed this privilege, with a few interruptions, from the law of C. Gracchus, in b. c. 123. This was a great gain for the aristocracy; since the offences for which they were usually brought to trial, such as bribery, malversation, and the like, were so commonly practised by the whole order, that they were, in most cases, nearly certain of acquittal from men who required similar indulgence themselves. (Tusc. Ann. xi. 22; Vell. Pat. ii. 92; Cic. Verr. Act. i. 13, 16; comp. Dictionary of Antiquities, art. Judges.)

Sulla's reform in the criminal law, the greatest and most enduring part of his legislation, belongs to a history of Roman law, and cannot be given here. For further information on this subject the penses to which the provincials were put in sending embassies to Rome to praise the administration of their governors. (Cic. ad Fam. iii. 8, 10.)

With respect to the magistrates, Sulla renewed the old law, that no one should hold the praetorship before he had been quaestor, nor the consulship before he had been praetor (Appian, B. C. i. 100; Cic. Phil. xii. 5); nor did he allow of any deviation from this law in favour of his own party, for when Q. Lucretius Oflilia, who had taken Praeneste, presuming upon his services, offered himself as a candidate for the consulship, without having previously held the offices of quaestor and praetor, he was assassinated in the forum by the order of the dictator. Sulla also re-established the ancient law, that no one should be elected to the same magistracy till after the expiration of ten years. (Appian, B. C. i. 101; comp. Liv. vii. 42, x. 31.)

Sulla increased the number of Quaestores from eight to twenty (Tac. Ann. xi. 92), and that of the Praetors from six to eight. Pomponius says (De Orig. Juris, Dig. i. 1. 2s. 32) that Sulla added four new praetors, but this appears to be a mistake, since Julius Caesar was the first who increased their number to ten. (Suet. Caes. 41; Dion Cass. xiii. 51.) This increase in the number of the praetors was necessary on account of the new questiones, established by Sulla, of which we shall speak below in favour of his own party, for when Q. Lucretius Oflilia, who had taken Praeneste, presuming upon his services, offered himself as a candidate for the consulship, without having previously held the offices of quaestor and praetor, he was assassinated in the forum by the order of the dictator. Sulla also re-established the ancient law, that no one should be elected to the same magistracy till after the expiration of ten years.

One of the most important of Sulla's reforms related to the tribunate. It is stated in general by the ancient writers, that Sulla deprived the tribunes of the plebs of all real power (Vell. Pat. ii. 30; Appian, B. C. i. 100; Cic. de Legg. iii. 9; Liv. Epit. 89) but the exact nature of his alterations is not accurately stated. It appears certain, however, that he deprived the tribunes of the right of proposing a rogatio of any kind whatsoever to the tribes (Liv. Epit. 89), or of impeaching any person before them, inasmuch as he abolished altogether the legislative and judicial functions of the tribes, as has been previously stated. The tribunes also lost the right of holding conciones (Cic. pro Cluent. 40), as has likewise been shown, and thus could not influence the tribes by any speeches. The only right left to them was the Interesses. It is, however, uncertain to what extent the right of Interessio extended. It is hardly conceivable that Sulla would have left the tribunes to exercise this the most formidable of all their powers without any limitation; and that he did not do so is clear from the case of Q. Oppimius, who was brought to trial, because, when tribune of the plebs, he had used his Interessio in violation of the Lex Cornelia (Cic. Verr. i. 60). Cicero says (de Legg. iii. 9) that Sulla left the tribunes only the potestas auxiliariter ferendi; and from this we may infer, in connection with the case of the Interessio, that the Interessio was confined to giving their protection to private persons against the unjust decisions of magistrates, as, for instance, in the enlisting of soldiers. Caesar, it is true, states, in general, that Sulla left to the tribunes the right of Interessio, and he leaves it to be inferred in particular that Sulla allowed them to use their Interessio in reference to senatusconsulta (Cæs. B. C. i. 3, 7); but it is not impossible, as Becker has suggested, that Caesar may have given a false interpretation of the right of Interessio as a general matter, in order to justify the course he was himself adopting. (Beckers, Handbuch der Röm. Alterthümer, vol. ii. pt. ii. p. 290).
SULLA.

IV. Laws relating to the Improvement of public Morals.—Of these we have very little information. One of them was a Lex Sumtaria, which enacted that not more than a certain sum of money should be spent upon entertainments, and also restrained extravagance in funerals. (Gell. ii. 24; Macrobi. Sat. ii. 13; Plut. Sull. 35). There was likewise a law of Sulla respecting marriage (Plut. l.c.; comp. Lyc. c. Sull. 3), the provisions of which are quite unknown, as it was probably abrogated by the Julian law.

There are several coins of the dictator Sulla, a few specimens of which are annexed. The first coin contains on the obverse the head of the dictator, and on the reverse that of his colleague in his first consulship, Q. Pompeius Rufus. The coin was probably struck by the son of Q. Pompeius Rufus, who was tribune of the plebs in B.C. 52 (Pompeius, No. 9), in honour of his grandfather and father. The second coin was also probably struck by the tribune of B.C. 52. The third and fourth coins were struck in the lifetime of the dictator. The third has on the obverse the head of Pallas, with MANIL PROQ., and on the reverse Sulla in a quadriga, with L. SULLA IMP., probably with reference to his splendid triumph over the Mithridates. The fourth coin has on the obverse the head of Venus, before which Cupid stands holding in his hand the branch of a palm tree, and on the reverse a guttae and a litus between two trophies, with IMPER. TVRVA(M). The head of Venus is placed on the obverse, because Sulla attributed much of his success to the protection of this goddess. Thus we are told by Plutarch (Sull. 34) that when he wrote to Greeks he called himself Epaphroditus, or the favourite of Aphrodite or Venus, and also that he inscribed on his trophies the names of Mars and Victory, and Venus (Sull. 19). (Comp. Eckhel, vol. v. pp. 190, 191.)

SULLA.

COINS OF THE Dictator SULLA.

6. Cornelius Sulla, a son of the dictator by his fourth wife Caecilia Metella, died in the lifetime of his father. (Senec. Cons. ad Marc. 12; Plut. Sull. 37.)

7. Faustus Cornelius Sulla, a son of the dictator by his fourth wife Caecilia Metella, and a twin brother of Fausta, was born not long before B.C. 68, the year in which his father obtained his first consulship. He and his sister received the names of Faustus and Fausta respectively on account of the good fortune of their father. (Plut. Sull. 29, 34, 37.) At the death of his father in B.C. 78, Fausta and his sister were left under the guardianship of L. Lucullus. The enemies of Sulla's constitution constantly threatened Faustus with a prosecution to compel him to restore the public money which his father had received or taken out of the treasury; but the senate always offered a strong opposition to such an investigation. When the attempt was renewed in B.C. 66 by one of the tribunes, Cicero, who was then praetor, spoke against the proposal. (Ascon. in Cornel. p. 72, ed Orelli; Cic. pro Cnent. 54, de Leg. Agr. i. 4.) Soon after this Faustus accompanied Pompey into Asia, and was the first who mounted the walls of the temple of Jerusalem in B.C. 63, for which exploit he was richly rewarded. (Joseph. Ant. xiv. 4, § 4, B. J. i. 7, § 4.) In B.C. 60 he exhibited the gladiatorial games which his father in his last will had enjoined upon him, and at the same time he treated the people in the most sumptuous manner. In B.C. 54 he was questor, having been elected augur a few years before. In B.C. 52 he received from the senate the commission to rebuild the Curia Hostilia, which had been burnt down in the tumults following the murder of Clodius, and which was henceforward to be called the Curia Cornelis, in honour of Faustus and his father. The breaking out of the civil war prevented him from obtaining any of the higher dignities of the state. As the son of the dictator Sulla, and the son-in-law of Pompey, whose daughter he had married, he joined the aristocratical party. At the beginning of B.C. 49, Pompey wished to send him to Mauritania with the title of propraetor, but was prevented by Thapsus, tribune of the plebs. He crossed over to Greece with Pompey, was present at the battle of Pharsalia, and subsequently joined the leaders of his party in Africa. After the battle of Thapsus, in B.C. 46, he attempted to escape into Mauritania, with the intention of sailing to Spain, but he was intercepted in his journey by P. Sittius, taken prisoner, and carried to Caesar [Sritus]. He was accompanied in his flight by his wife Pompeia and his children, as well as by Afranius, and they were all captured along with him. Upon their arrival in Caesar's camp, Faustus and Afranius were murdered by the soldiers in a tumult, probably not without Caesar's connivance; but Pompeia and her children were dismissed uninjured by Caesar. Faustus seems only to have resembled his father in his extravagance. We know from Cicero (ad Att. ix. 11) that he was overwhelmed with debt at the breaking out of the civil war. (Dion Cass. xxxvii. 51, xxxix. 17, xl. 50, xlii. 13; Cic. pro Sull. 19; Caes. B. C. i. 6; Hirt. B. Afr. 87, 95; Appian, B. C. ii. 100; Flor. iv. 2, § 90; Oros. vi. 16.)

8. Serv. Cornelius Sulla, known only as the brother of the dictator, and the father of the two following persons. (Sall. Cat. 17; Dion Cass. xxvi. 27.)

9. P. Cornelius Sulla, a son of No. 8, and a nephew of the dictator. He was grown up in the lifetime of his uncle, from whom he received as presents several estates of those who had been proscribed. In the conspiracy against the triumvirs, he elected to stand with P. Antonius Paetus, but neither he nor his colleague entered upon the office, as they were accused of bribery by L. Torquatus the younger, and were condemned. L. Cotta and L. Torquatus, the father of their accuser, received the consulsip in their stead. It was currently believed that Sulla was privy to both of Catiline's conspiracies, and he was accordingly accused of this crime by his former accuser, L. Torquatus, and by C. Cornelius. He was defended by Hortensius and Cicero, and the speech of the latter on his behalf is still extant. He was acquitted; but, independent of the testimony of Sullust (Cat. 17), his guilt may almost be inferred from the embarrassment of his advocate. According to A. Gallius (xii. 12) Cicero had borrowed a sum of money from Sulla for the purchase of his house on the Palatine. Cicero afterwards quarrelled with Sulla, because the latter had taken part in the proceedings of Cicero against his brother C. Cassius (Cat. ad Att. iv. 3.) In the civil war Sulla espoused Caesar's cause. He served under him as legate in Greece, and commanded along with Caesar himself the right wing at the battle of Pharsalia, B.C. 48. In the following year he was ordered by Caesar to carry over from Italy to Sicily the legions which were destined for the African war; but the soldiers of the twelfth legion rose in mutiny, and drove him away with a shower of stones, demanding to receive, before they quit Italy, the rewards which they had been promised in Greece. At the conclusion of the civil war Sulla purchased at a small sum some of the confiscated estates of the Pompeian party, and appears in consequence to have incurred no small degree of obloquy. He died during a journey in B.C. 45; and, according to Cicero (ad Fam. ix. 10, xv. 17), people were too glad to hear of his death to trouble themselves about the inquiry whether he had perished by the hands of robbers, or had fallen a victim to excessive indulgence in the pleasures of the table. (Cic. pro Sula, passim; Sall. Cat. 17, 18; Dion Cass. xxxvi. 27; Cic. de Fin. ii. 19; Caes. B. C. iii. 51, 89; Appian, B. C. ii. 76; Cic. ad Att. xi. 21, 22, de Off. ii. 83.) Sulla left behind him a son P. Sulla [No. 11], and also a step-son Memmius. (Cic. ad Q. Fr. iii. 3.)

10. Serv. Cornelius Sulla, also a son of No. 8, took part in both of Catiline's conspiracies. His guilt was so evident, that no one was willing to defend him; but we do not read that he was put to death along with the other conspirators. (Sull. Cat. 17, 47; Cic. pro Sull. 2.)

11. P. Cornelius Sulla, the son of No. 9. Nothing is recorded respecting him. He was alive at the time of his father's death in B.C. 45. ("P. Sulla patrem mortuum habebamus," Cic. ad Fam. xv. 17, pro Sulla, 31.) Respecting the preceding Sullae see Drumm, Geschichte Roms, vol. ii. pp. 423—524.

12. L. Cornelius P. P. P. N. Sulla, the son of No. 11, was consul B.C. 5 with Augustus. (Plin. H. N. vii. 11, a. 13; Dion Cass. index, lib. Iv.)

13. L. Cornelius L. P. N. Sulla Felix, son of No. 12, was consul in the reign of Tiberius, A.D. 33, with Serv. Sulpicius Galba. (Dion Cass. viii. 29; Tac. Ann. vi. 15.) He is probably the same as the "L. Sulla, nobilis juvenis," mentioned by Tacitus, in A.D. 21 (Ann. iii. 31), and as the L. Sulla, whose advanced age in the reign of Claudius is spoken of by Dion Cassius (Lx. 12.)

14. L. Cornelius Sulla, probably son of No. 13, was consul successively under Claudius in A.D. 52. (Fasti.)

15. Faustus Cornelius Sulla, consul under Claudius, in A.D. 52, with L. Salvius Otio Titianus. He was the son-in-law of Claudius, having married his daughter Antonia. Soon after the accession of Nero, Paetus accused Pallus and Burrus of the design of placing Sulla upon the throne; and although the accusation was declared to be false, Nero became jealous of Sulla. One of the emperor's freedmen accordingly invented a plot which was falsely ascribed to Sulla, who was thereupon ordered by Nero to go into exile to Masilla, A.D. 59. But as Nero feared that Sulla from his proximity to the German legions might induce them to revolt, he was put to death by order of the emperor in A.D. 63. (Suet. Claud. 27; Tac. Ann. xii. 52, xiii. 29, 47, xiv. 57.)

16. Cornelius Sulla, governor of Cappadocia, was put to death by Elagabalus. (Dion Cass. lxxiv. 4.)

Sulpicia. 1. The mother-in-law (soecus) of Sp. Postumius Albinus, by whose instrumentality the latter, in his consulship, B.C. 166, became acquainted with the crimes perpetrated in connection with the worship of Bacchus. (Liv. xxxix. 11—13.)

2. The daughter of Ser. Sulpicius Paterculus, and the wife of Q. Fulvius Flaccus. She was declared to be the chastest woman in Rome, and was therefore selected, in B.C. 113, to dedicate the statue of Venus Verticordia, who was believed to turn the minds of women from vice to virtue. (Val. Max. viii. 15, § 12; Plin. H. N. viii. 33.)

3. The wife of Lentulus Crassiciu. Her husband was proscribed by the triumvirs in B.C. 43, and fled to Sex. Pompeius in Sicily, whither Sulpicia followed him, against the wish of her mother Julia. (Val. Max. vii. 7, § 3; Appian, B. C. iv. 39.)

4. Sulpicia Praetextata, the wife of Crassus, is mentioned at the commencement of the reign of Vespasianus, A.D. 70. (Tac. Hist. iv. 42.)

Sulpicia. [Theullus.]

Sulpicia, a Roman poetess who flourished SULPICIUS.

to towards the close of the first century, celebrated for sundry gay amatory effusions, addressed to his husband Calenus. Their general character may be gathered from the expressions of Martial, Ausonius, and Sidonius Apollinaris, by all of whom they are noticed. Two lines from one of these productions, have been preserved by the scholar Wernsdorf.
Sat. vi. 536. (Martial. Ep. x. 35—38; Anson. Epilo-Anthol. Lat. iii. 251, ed. Burmann, or No. 198, ed. Meyer.)

We find in the collected works of Ausonius, as first published by Ugoletus (4to. Parm. 1499, Venet. 1501), a satiric poem, in seventy hexameters, on the edict of Domitian, by which philosophers were banished from Rome and from Italy (Suet. Dom. 10; Gell. xvi. 11). It has been frequently reprinted, and generally bears the title Satyricon Carminus s. Ecloga de edicto Domitian, or Satyra de corrupto reipublicae statu temporibus Domitianian. When closely examined it soon appeared manifest that it could not belong to the rhetorician of Bordeaux, but that it must have been written by some one who lived at the period to which the themes refers, that the author was a female (v. 8), and that she had previously composed a multitude of sportive pieces in a great variety of measures.

Many critics, struck by these coincidences, have not hesitated to ascribe the lines in question to the Sulpicia mentioned above, the contemporary of Martial, and in almost all the more recent collections of the minor Latin poets they bear her name. In a literary point of view they possess little interest, being weak, pointless, and destitute of spirit. (Wernsdorf, Poet. Lat. Min. vol. iii.
p. lx. and p. 83.) The satire is generally append to editions of Juvenal and Persius. [W. R.]

SULPICIA GENS, originally patrician, and afterwards plebeian likewise. It was one of the most ancient Roman gentes, and produced a succession of distinguished men, from the foundation of the republic to the imperial period. The first member of it who obtained the consulship was Ser.
Sulpicius Camerinus Cornutus, in B.C. 500, only nine years after the expulsion of the Tarquins, and the last of the name who appears on the consular Fasti was Sex. Sulpicius Tertullus in A. d. 158.
The family names of the Sulpicii during the republic period are — Camerinus Cornutus, Galba, Gallus, Longus, Paternculus, Petius, Praetextatus, Quirinus, Rufus (given below), Saverio. Besides these cognomens, we meet with some other surnames belonging to freedmen and to other persons under the empire, which are given below. On coins we find the surnames Galba, Flatorius, Proclus, Rufus.

SULPICIUS'ANUS, FLAVIUS, the father-in-law of the emperor Pertinax, was appointed upon the death of Commodus praefectus urbi. After the murder of his son he became one of the can-dates for the vacant throne, when it was exposed for sale by the praetorians. He was outlawed by Didius Julianus, who stripped him of his office but spared his life at the request of the soldiers. He was subsequently put to death by Septimius Severus, on the charge of having favoured the pretensions of Clodius Albinus. (Dion Cass. xlviii.
7, 11, lxxv. 8.) [W. R.]

SULPICIUS APOLLINARIS, a contemporary of A. Gellius, was a learned grammarian, whom Gellius frequently cites with the greatest respect. He calls him, on one occasion ' vir pulneatissimi literarum scientia,' and on another,
' homo memoriae nostrae doctissimus.' (Gell. ii.
16, iv. 17, xiii. 17, xv. 5.) There are two poems in the Latin Anthology, purporting to be written by Sulpicius of Carthage, whom some writers identify with the above-named Sulpicius Apollinaria. One of these poems consists of seventy-two lines, giving the argument of the twelve books of Virgil's Aeneid, six lines being devoted to each Donatus, Vita Virgilii). The contemporary of Gellius is probably the same person as the Sulpicius Apollinaris who taught the emperor Pertinax in his youth. (Capitol. Pertin. 1.)

SULPICIUS ASPER. [ASPER.]

SULPICIUS FLAVUS. [FLAVUS.]

SULPICIUS LUPERCUS SERVASTUS, a Latin poet, of whom two poems are extant; an elegy, De Cupiditate, in forty-two lines, and a satyrical ode, De Vestavitate, in twelve lines. Both poems are printed in Wernsdorf's Poetae Latinii known of the author.

SULPICIUS RUFUS. 1. Ser. Sulpicius
Rufus, was consular tribune three times, namely in B. C. 386, 384, and 383. (Liv. vi. 4, 13, 21.)

2. P. Sulpicius Rufus, tribune of the plebs,
B. C. 88. He was born in B. C. 124, as he was ten years older than Hostilius. (Cic. Brut. 86.)
He was one of the most distinguished orators of his time. Cicero, who had heard him, frequently speaks of him in terms of the highest admiration.
He says that Sulpicius and Cotta were, beyond comparison, the greatest orators of their age.
"Sulpicius," he states, "was, of all the orators I ever heard, the most dignified, and, so to speak, the most tragic. His voice was powerful, and at the same time sweet and clear; the gestures and movements of his body were graceful; but he appeared, nevertheless, to have been trained for the forum and not for the stage; his language was rapid and flowing, and yet not redundant or diffuse." (Brut. 35.) He commenced public life as a supporter of the aristocratic party, and soon acquired great influence in the state by his splendid talents, while he was still young. He was an intimate friend of M. Livius Drusus, the celebrated tribune of the plebs, and the aristocracy placed great hopes in him. (Cic. de Orat. i. 7.)
In B. C.
94, he accused of majestas C. Norbanus, the turbulent tribune of the plebs, who was defended by
M. Antonius and was acquitted. [Norbanus,
No. 1.] In B. C. 83 he was quaestor, and in B. C.
89 he served as legate of the consul Cn. Pompeius Strabo in the Marsic war. In the following year,
B. C. 83, he was elected to the tribunate through the influence of the aristocratic party. The consuls of the year were L. Cornelius Sulla and Q. Pompeius Rufus, the latter of whom was a personal friend of Sulpicius. (Cic. Lael. 1.)
At first Sulpicius did not disappoint the expectations of his party. In conjunction with his colleague, P. Antonius, he resisted the attempt of C. Julius Caesar to become a candidate for the consulship before he had filled the office of praetor, and he also opposed the return from exile of those who had been banished. (Cic. Brut. 63, de Harusp. Resp.
20; Ascon. in Scaur. p. 20, ed. Orelli; Cic. ad Herenn. ii. 26.) But Sulpicius shortly afterwards joined Marius, and placed himself at the head of the popular party. The causes of this sudden change are not expressly stated by the ancient writers; but we are told that he was overwhelmed with debt; and there can be little doubt that he was bought by Marius, and that the latter promised him great wealth as soon as he obtained the command of the war against Mithridates. The history of the rogations which Sulpicius brought forward in favour of Marius and his party, and against Sulla, is fully related in the lives of those persons. [Marius, p. 937; Sulla, p. 936.] It is only necessary to state here, that when the law was passed which conferred upon Marius the command of the Mithridatic war, Sulla, who was then at Nola, marched upon Rome at the head of his army. Marius and Sulpicius had no means of resisting him, and were obliged to fly from the city. They were both declared public enemies by the senate, at the command of Sulla, along with ten others of their party.

Marius succeeded in making his escape to Africa, but Sulpicius was discovered in a villa, and put to death. The slave who betrayed him was rewarded with his freedom, and then hurled down from the Tarpeian rock. (Appian, B. C. i. 58, 60; Plut. Sull. 10; Cic. de Orat. iii. 3, Brut. 63; Liv. Epit. 77; Vell. Pat. ii. 18.)

Although Sulpicius was such a distinguished orator, he left no orations behind him. Cicero says that he had often heard Sulpicius declare that he was not accustomed, and was unable, to write. It is true there were some speeches extant under his name, but they were written after his death by P. Canutius. (Cic. Brut. 56.) [Canutius.] Sulpicius is one of the speakers in Cicero's dialogue, De Oratore. (Ahrens, Die Drei Vollstreitbaren, Tih. Groesch, M. Drusus, and P. Sulpicius, Leipzig, 1836; Meyer, Oratorum Romanorum Fragmenta, pp. 343—347, 2d ed.; Dumnoom, Geschichte Roms, vol. ii. pp. 435, 436.)

3. P. Sulpicius Rufus, probably a son or grandson of No. 2, was one of Caesar's legates in Gaul. He also served under Caesar as one of his legates in the campaign in Spain against Afranius and Petreius, in B.C. 49; and in the following year, B.C. 48, he was rewarded for his services by the praetorship. In the latter year he commanded Caesar's fleet at Vibo, where he was attacked by C. Cassius. Cicero addresses him in B.C. 45 as imperator. It appears that he was at that time in Ilyricum, along with Vatinius. (Caes. B. G. iv. 22, 2B. C. i. 74, iii. 101; Cic. ad Fam. xiii. 77.)

4. SER. Sulpicius LEMONIA RUFUS, the celebrated jurist. See below.

5. SER. Sulpicius Rufus, the son of No. 4, was one of the subscribers of his father's accusation against Murena in B.C. 63. (Cic. pro Mur. 20, 27.) On the breaking out of the civil war, in B.C. 49, he joined his father in espousing Caesar's side, and is frequently mentioned at that time in Cicero's correspondence. He survived his father, who died in B.C. 43. (Cic. ad Att. iv. 18, 19, x. 14, ad Fam. iv. 2, Philipp. iv. 5.)

6. Sulpicius Rufus, who was Ludi procurator, that is, the person who had the charge of the public games, was slain by the emperor Claudius because he was privy to the marriage of Silius and Messalina. (Tac. Ann. xi. 35.)

SER. SULPICIUS LEMONIA RUFUS, the son of Quintus, was a contemporary and friend of Cicero, and of about the same age (Cic. Brut. 40):

Cicero was born B.C. 106. The name LEMONIA is the ablative case, and indicates the tribe to which Servius belonged. (Cic. Philipp. ix. 7.) According to Cicero, the father of Servius was of the equestrian order. (Cic. pro Mur. 7.) Servius first devoted himself to oratory, and he studied his art with Cicero in his youth, and also at Rhodus B.C. 78, for he accompanied Cicero there (Brut. 41). It is said that he was induced to study law by a refraction of Q. Mucius Scaevola, the pontifex, whose opinion Servius had asked on a legal question, and as the pontifex saw that Servius did not understand his answer, he said that "it was disgraceful for a patrician and a noble, and one who pleaded causes, to be ignorant of the law with which he had to be engaged." (Dig. 1. tit. 2. s. 2 § 43.) Henceforth jurisprudence became his study, in which he surpassed his teachers, L. Balbus and Aquilius Gallus, and obtained a reputation in no respect inferior to that of the pontifex who reproved him. As an orator he had hardly a superior, unless it were Cicero himself.

Servius was successively quaestor of the district or province of Ostia, in B.C. 74 (Cic. pro Mur. 8); aedilis curulis, B.C. 69; and during his praetorship, B.C. 65, he had the quaestio peculatus (Cic. pro Mur. 20). In his first candidature for the consulship, B.C. 63, Servius was rejected, and Servius and Cato joined in prosecuting L. Murena, who was elected. Murena was defended by Cicero, Horatius, and M. Crassus (Oratio pro Murena). In B.C. 52, as interrex, he named Pompeius Magnus sole consul. In B.C. 51, he was elected consul with M. Claudius Marcellus; and on this occasion Cato was an unsuccessful candidate. (Plut. Cato, 49.) There is no mention of any decided part that Servius took in the war between Caesar and Pompeius, but he appears to have been a partisan of Caesar, who, after the battle of Pharsalia, made him proconsul of Achaea, B.C. 46 or 43; and Sulpicius held this office at the time when Cicero addressed to him a letter, which is still extant (ad Fam. iv. 3). Marcellus, the former colleague of Servius in the consulship, was murdered at Peineens during the government of Servius, who buried him in the gymnasium of the Academia, where a marble monument to his memory was raised. The death of Marcellus is told in a letter of Servius to Cicero.

In B.C. 43 he was sent by the senate, with L. Philippus and L. Calpurnius Piso, on a mission to M. Antonius, who was besieging Decimus Brutus, in Mutina. Servius, who was in bad health, died in the camp of Antonius. Cicero, in the senate, pronounced a panegyric on his distinguished friend, and on his motion a public funeral was decreed, and a bronze statue was erected to the memory of Servius, and appropriately placed in front of the rostra. The statue was still there when Pompeius wrote. (Cic. Philipp. ix. 7; Pomponius, Dig. 1. tit. 2. s. 2 § 43.)

Servius had a wife named Postumia, and he left a son, Servius.

Our chief information about Servius is derived from Cicero, who attributes his great superiority as a lawyer to his study of philosophy, not that philosophy itself made him a distinguished lawyer, but the discipline, to which his mind had been subjected, developed and sharpened his natural talents. In a passage in his Brutus (c. 41) Cicero has, in few words and in a masterly manner, shown in what the excellence of Servius consisted. His speeches and his responses were free from all obscurity; and this clearness was the result of a careful separation of a thing into all its parts, an exact definition of all that was by implication contained in it, and the removal of all obscurity by just interpretation. As to what was ambiguous, his first care was to ascertain the ambiguity, and then to separate it from every thing else; he applied a correct judgment to the estimate of truth and falsehood, and he deduced his conclusions from his premises with logical precision. To these qualities were added a profound knowledge of the Jus Civile, a perfect apprehension of the universal principles of the Jus Naturale, and a power of expression in which no man surpassed him. Perhaps of all the men of his age, or of any age, he was, as an orator, a jurist, and an advocate, without an equal or a rival. His friend Cicero has recorded the excellence of his moral character. Servius left about one hundred and eighty treatises, or parts or sections of treatises (libri), among which were criticism on the responses of Seneca the pontifex. (Gell. iv. 17. tit. 2. s. 30.) Several of these treatises were extant in the time of Pomponius, and Servius is cited often by the jurists whose writings are excerpted in the Digest; but there is no excerpt directly from Servius in the Digest. Servius had numerous pupils, the most distinguished of whom were A. Oliilus and Alfenus Varus. From the writings of eight of the pupils of Servius, Auidius Namusa, who was one of them, compiled a large treatise in 140 parts; and it is to this work that later jurists refer, when they cite "Servii auditores" as a collective term. He was probably the author of a commentary on the Twelve Tables; and he wrote also Ad Edictum, and Notae ad Macrum, which have been already referred to. He was also the author of a treatise De Dostibus (Gell. iv. 5; Dig. 12. tit. 4. s. 8), and of several books De Sacris Detestatis (Gell. vi. 121); and there are fragments or short notices of various other works of his (Cic. Top. 8; Macrobi. Saturn. 2), and of his orations. Quintilian speaks of three Orationes of Servius as being extant in his time (Inst. Or. x. 1 and 7); one of these was his speech against L. Licinius Murenza, who was accused of ambitus, B. C. 63; and the other was a speech Pro Aufidius, or Contra Aufidium, it is doubtful which, delivered probably in B. C. 44 or 43. (Meyer, Oratorum Romanorum Frag. p. 398, 2d ed.)

There are extant in the collection of Cicero's Epistles (ad Fam. iv.), two letters from Sulpicius to Cicero, one of which is the well-known letter of consolation on the death of Tullius, the daughter of the orator. The same book contains several letters from Cicero to Sulpicius. He is also said to have written some erotic poetry. (Ovid, Trist. ii. 1. 141; Plin. Epist. v. 3.)

Lat.* v. 74) describes the god as of Sabine origin; but the ancients themselves on this as on many other points connected with their earliest religion, were in great uncertainty both in regard to the nature and the origin of Summannus; and some connecting the origin with sub and names regarded him as a deity of the lower world, an opinion which is totally at variance with the attributes given him by most writers, and there is ample reason for regarding him as the Jupiter of night. He had a temple at Rome near the Circus Maximus (Plin. H. N. xxix. 14; Liv. xxxii. 29; Or. Fast. vi. 731). There was a representation of Summanus in the pediment of the Capitoline temple (Cic. de Div. i. 10; comp. SUPERBA, CORNELIA. A few medals, both Roman and Greek, are extant bearing the above name, with the addition of Augusta or Cebacth. Antiquarians differ in opinion as to the reign to which they belong, but from the date upon a coin of Aegae in Cilicia, which bears her name, it seems most certain that she must have been the wife either of Trebonianus Gallus, or of Aemiliana, while other circumstances make it highly probable that the latter was her husband. SURA, ACCIUS, for whom the younger Pliny begs the preторship from the emperor Trajan. (Plin. Ep. x. 7. s. 9.)

SURA, AEMILIUS, the author of a work De Annis Populi Romani, a tract from which is inserted in the present text of Velleius Paterculus (i. 6), but evidently not by Paterculus himself.

SURA, BRUTTIUS, legatus of C. Sentius Saturninus, praetor in Macedonia in B. C. 88, was sent against Metrophanes, the general of Mithridates, whom he defeated in a naval engagement, and compelled to take to flight. He followed up his victory by taking the island of Scythus, where the enemy had deposited their plunder. He next advanced into Boeotia, to oppose Archelaus, with whom he fought for three days in succession. Plutarch relates that he gained a brilliant victory, but Appian says that the two armies parted on equal terms. On the approach of Sulla, who had been appointed 3 P 2 to the command of the Mithridatic war, Sura quit the Boeotia, and returned to his command in Macdonia. (Appian, Mithr. 29; Plut. Sull. 11.)
SURA, P. CORNELIUS LENTULUS, (Lentulus, No. 18.)
SURA, L. LICI'NIUS, was three times consul under Trajan, first suffectus in A.D. 98, in which year Trajan succeeded to the empire, and twice ordinary consul in A.D. 102 and 107. He was one of the most intimate friends of Trajan, and by his strong recommendation of the latter to Nerra, had a great share in gaining for him the empire.
He likewise employed his influence with Trajan to gain for Hadrian more of the emperor's favour, and he may be said thus to have placed two em-perors on the throne. Trajan continued to cherish an undiminished regard for Sura as long as he lived. He frequently employed Sura to write his orations; and on the death of the latter he honoured him with a public funeral, and erected baths to perpetuate his memory. Dion Cassius relates that Sura was sent as ambassador to Decibalus in the Dacian war. Two of Pliny's letters are addressed to him. (Dion Cass. lxxvii. 9, 15; Aurel. Vict.

COIN OF L. NAEVIOS SURDINUS

SURE'NAS, the general of the Parthians, who defeated Crassus in b.c. 54. [Crassus, p. 873.]
SUSAR'ION (Σούσαριός), to whom the origin of the Attic Comedy is ascribed, is said to have been the son of Philius, and a native of Tripodiscus, a village in the Megarian territory, whence he removed into Attica, to the village of Icaria, a place celebrated as a seat of the worship of Dionyus. (Ath. ii. p. 40, b.; Scholiol. xxi. 29.)
This account agrees with the claim which the Megarians asserted to the invention of comedy, and which was generally admitted. (Aristot. Poet.
iii. 5; Apoll. ad Aristot. Eth. Nic. iv. 2; Diet. of Antiqu. art. Comedia, p. 342, 2d ed.) Before the time of Susarion there was, no doubt, practised, at Icaria and the other Attic villages, that extenpore jesting and buffoonery which formed a marked feature of the festivals of Dionysus; but Susarion was the first who so regulated this species of amusement, as to lay the foundation of Comedy, properly so called. The time at which this important step was taken can be determined within pretty close limits. The Megaric comedy appears to have flourished, in its full development, about Ol. 45 or 46, b.c. 600 and onwards; and it was introduced by Susarion into Attica between Ol.
50 and 54, b.c. 560—564. (Plut. Sol. 10; Marub.
p. 19, 20.)
The Megaric comedy appears to have consisted chiefly in coarse and bitter personal jests, and broad buffoonery, and this character it retained long after its offspring, the Attic comedy, had come more refined. (Meineke, pp. 20—24.) That the comedy of Susarion partook of a like rudeness and buffoonery might reasonably be supposed, even if it were not expressly asserted by ancient writers
p. 430); but there can be no doubt that, in his hands, a great and decided advance was made in the character of the drama, which mark of its fact, for the first time, deserved that name. One change, which he introduced, is alone sufficient to mark the difference between an unregulated exercise of wit and an orderly composition; he was the first who adopted the metrical form of language for comedy (τίς εμίμετον κωμῳδίας αρχήχος εὔγενος, Orat. Graec. vol. viii. p. 959; Bentley, Phal.) It is not, however, to be inferred that the comedies of Susarion were written; Bentley has shown that the contrary is probably true. They were brought forward solely through the medium of the chorus, which Susarion, doubtless, subjected to certain rules. (Marm. Par. vv. 54, 55, as restored by Bickh. Corp. Inscri. vol. ii. p. 301.) It seems most probable that his plays were not acted upon waggons. (Meineke, p. 25.) Of the nature of his subjects we know nothing for certain; but it can hardly be conceived that his comedies were made up entirely of the mere jests which formed the staple of the Megaric comedy; although there could only have been a very imperfect approach to anything like connected argument or plots, for Aristotle expressly tells us that Crates was the first who made Λόγος η μιθὺς. (Poet. 6; Crates.)
The improvements of Susarion, then, on the Megaric comedy, which he introduced into Attica, may be said to have consisted in the substitution of premeditated metrical compositions for irregular extemporaneous effusions, and the regulation of the chorus to some extent. It was long before this new species of composition took firm root in Attica; for we hear nothing more of it until eighty years after the time of Susarion, where the art revived in the hands of Euenes, Euenides, and Myllus, at the very time when the Dorian comedy was developed by Epicharmus in Sicily. (Meineke, SY'ADRAS. [Charadas.]
SYAGER (Σᾶγερ), a Lacedaemonian, was the deputy from his state in the embassy which the Greeks sent to Gelon, to ask his assistance against Σέρεξες. [Gelon.] Syager indignantly rejected, on behalf of Sparta, the condition insisted on by the tyrant, that he should have the supreme command of the allied armament. (Herod. vii. 153, 159.)

SYE'NNESIS.

SYAGER (Σεγερ), one of the alleged ante-Homeric poets, is said to have flourished after Orpheus and Musaeus, and to have been the first who sang the Trojan War. (Ael. V. H. xiv. 21; Eustath. ad II. vol. i. p. 3.) He is perhaps the same as the Sagaris whom Aristotle mentioned, according to Diogenes Laërtius (ii. 46), as contemporary with Homer. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. i. pp. 6, 291, 562; Bode, Gesch. d. Hellen. Dichtkunst, vol. ii. p. 247.)

SYCHAÆUS or SICHAÆUS, a wealthy Phocaean and husband of Dido, whose brother Pygmalion, anxious to secure his treasures, treacherously murdered him. (Vrg. Aen. i. 547, &c., iv. 20, 592, 532, 632, vi. 474; Justin, xvi. 4, says, he sailed, and represents the matter somewhat differently from the account in Virgil.) [L. S.]

SYE'NNESIS (Σεννενσης), appears to have been a common name of the kings of Cilicia. We find the following mentioned in history.

1. A king of Cilicia, who joined with Labynetus (Nebuchadnezzar) in mediating between Cyaxares and Alyattes, the kings respectively of Media and Lydia, probably in B.C. 610. (Herod. i. 74; comp. Grote's Greece, vol. iii. pp. 311, 312.)

2. Another, contemporary with Dareius Hystaspis, to whom he was tributary. His daughter was married to Pixodarus. [Pixodarus, No. 1.] (Herod. iii. 90, v. 118.) He was perhaps the same prince whom Herodotus mentions (vii. 98) as one of the most distinguished of the subordinate commanders in the fleet of Xerxes. (Comp. Aesch. Pers. 316, &c.)

3. Contemporary with Artaxerxes II. (Mnemon). When Cyrus the younger, marching against Artaxerxes, in B.C. 401, arrived at the borders of Cilicia, he found the passes guarded by Syennesis, who, however, withdrew his troops, on receiving intelligence that the force sent forward by Cyrus under Menon had already entered Cilicia, and that the combined fleet of the Lacedaemonians and the prince, under Samius and Tamos, was sailing round from Ionia. When Cyrus reached Tarsus, the Cilician capital, he found that Menon's soldiers had sacked the city, and that Syennesis had fled for refuge to a stronghold among the mountains. He was induced, however, by his wife Epaxya to obey the summons of Cyrus, and to present himself before him at Tarsus. Here he received gifts of honour from the young prince, whom he supplied in his turn with a large sum of money and a considerable body of troops under the command of one of his sons. At the same time, however, he took care to send his other son to Artaxerxes, to represent this step as having been taken on compulsion, while his heart all the time was with the king. From the narrative of Xenophon it appears that Syennesis at this time, though really a vassal of Persia, affected the tone of an independent sovereign. (Xen. Hell. iii. 1. § 1, Anab. i. 2. §§ 12, 21-27, 4. § 4, vi. 8. § 25; Diod. xiv. 20; Wess. ad loc.)

SYE'NNESIS (Σεννενσης), a physician of Cyrus, who must have lived in or before the fourth century B.C., as he is mentioned by Aristotle (Hist. Anim. iii. 2. § 3), who quotes from his writings a passage on the origin of the veins. This fragment also forms part of the treatise &quot;De Ossium Natura&quot; in the Hippocratic Collection (vol. i. p. 507), which is in fact composed entirely of passages taken from different ancient writers. (See Litteré's Oeuvres d'Hippocr. vol. i. p. 419.) [W. A. G.]

SYLLA. [Sulla.]

SYLOROS (Συλόρως), the son of Aeces, assisted his brother Polycrates in making himself master of their native island Samos. For a time Polycrates shared the supreme power with Syloros and his other brother Pantagnotus; but shortly afterwards he put the latter to death, and banished the former. Syloros therefore repaired to Egypt, where Cambyses was at that time with his Persian army. As he was one day walking in Memphis, a scarlet cloak which he wore attracted the notice of Dareius, son of Hystaspes, who was then serving among the guards of the Persian monarch. Dareius offered to buy the cloak; but a divine inspiration, as Herodotus says, prompted Syloros to reply that he would not sell it, but would give it him, if he must have it. Dareius accepted the present, and there the matter ended for the time. But at length Syloros heard, with surprise, that the unknown Persian to whom he had given the cloak, was now the great king. He accordingly hastened to Susa, and found Dareius willing to remunerate him in a manner worthy of the king of Persia. Syloros refused the gold and silver which were offered him, and prayed that the island of Samos might be handed over to him. His request was complied with, and Otanes was sent with an army to place the island in the power of Syloros. Since the death of Polycrates, the supreme power had been in the hands of Maeandrius. The latter was in no condition to resist the Persians, and he capitulated to quit the island with his treasures; but immediately after he had sailed away, his crazy brother Charilias, whom he had left in command of the Acropolis, fell upon the unsuspecting Persians, and killed many of their officers. [Polycrates; Maeandrius; Charilias.] The consequence of this treacherous conduct was a wholesale massacre of the inhabitants by Otanes; and the island was handed over to Syloros, stripped of its male inhabitants. Otanes afterwards repeloped the island, but we are not told from what quarter the new population came. Strabo represents Syloros as a cruel tyrant, who depopulated the island, but continued to rule Samos, as a tributary of Persia, till his death, when he was succeeded in the supreme power by his son Aeces. (Herod. iii. 39, 159-149, vi. 13; Strab. xiv. p. 638; Grote, Hist. of Greece, vol. iv. pp. 332-537.)

SYLVA'NUS. [Silvanus.]

SYLV-VIUS. [Silvius.]

SYME (Σύμη), a daughter of Ialysus and Doti, who was dismissed by Glauco to an island near Rodos, off the coast of Caria, which received its name from her. (Athen. vii. p. 296; Steph. Byz. s. v.)

SYMEON or SYME'ON or SYME'O'NES (Συμπήνη sometimes Συμμηνή), literary and ecclesiastical. 1. Abbas [No. 16].

2. ACROMITENSIIS MONACHIUS. Symoean, a monk of one of the monasteries of the Acromitenes at Constantinople, was sent by Cyril, his hegumenus or abbot, to Pope Felix II. or III. at Rome, to stir him up to the more active support of orthodoxy, then so seriously threatened in the East by the strength of the Monophysite party and the temporizing policy of the Emperor Anastasius, and the patriarch of Constantinople, Acacius. The mission of Symeon determined the Pope to act more de-
There was another Symeon, an haeresiarch, who was burnt to death with many of his followers for heresy in the time of Justinian II. Photius gives to him the vague and often misapplied epithet of a Manuelian. (Phot. Narratio in epitome de Michaelis repubbullulabis, apud Montfau. Biblioth. Cotelin. pp. 360, 361.)

9. Hieromonachus. [Nos. 23, 25.] 10. Hierosolymitanus, or of Jerusalem (1). Symeon or Simon, son of Cleophas, and, according to general belief, kinsman of Jesus Christ, was, according to the ecclesiastical historians, the second bishop of the Church of Jerusalem, the Apostle James, son of Alpheus, having been the first. Some of the later Greeks represent Symeon as the son of Joseph (husband of the Virgin Mary) by a former wife. The tradition of his appointment is given by Eusebius (H. E. iii. 11). After holding his bishopric for many years Symeon was put to death for his faith as a Christian, and because he was descended from David. He was a hundred and twenty years old at the time of his martyrdom, which took place during the persecution in the reign of Trajan, and while_Atticus, the consular, was governor of Syria. Eusebius, in his Chronicon, places the martyrdom of Symeon in the tenth year of Trajan, the third year of Olympiad 221, in the fourth consulsip of Sosius and third of Sura, a. d. 107. Some critics, including Bishop Lloyd of St. Asaph, Dodwell, and Pagi, bring down his death to A. D. 116. Symeon is worshipped as a Saint both by the Latin and Greek Churches, by the former on the 18th of February, by the latter on the 27th of April. He was succeeded in his bishopric by Justus. (Euseb. H. E. iii. 11, 32; Hegesippus, apud Euseb. l. c. ; Euseb. Chronicon; Chronicon Paschale; Acta Sanctorum Februa, ad dieviii. vol. iii. p. 53; Le Quen, Oriens Christian. vol. iii. col. 140.)

11. Hymenaeus (2). Toward the close of the eleventh century, the patriarchate of Jerusalem was held by Symeon or Simon II. In the Latin catalogues of the bishops of Jerusalem he is called Simon; but the Latin historians of the crusades generally write his name Symeon or Simeon. He succeeded Euthymius, but in what year is not known: he was already patriarch in a. d. 1094, when he had many conversations with Peter the Hermit, then on a pilgrimage to the Holy Land, on the deplorable state of the Christians in the East; and these conversations were among the means of exciting the compassion and zeal of Peter, and eventually of producing the crusades. On the arrival of the crusaders in Syria, and the formation of the siege of Antioch by them, in a. d. 1098, Symeon, terrified by the threats of the Turks of Jerusalem, fled to the island of Cyprus. From this island he maintained a friendly intercourse with the leaders of the crusaders, sending them presents of fruits, wine, poultry, and such things as he could. He died just about the time of the capture of Jerusalem, and the vacancy caused by his death being filled up by the crusaders with a patriarch of the Latin Church, and by the native Christians with one of the Greek Church, gave occasion to a long continued schism and a succession of rival claimants of the two Churches. An extant treatise De Azymin adversus Latinos, from which Allatius (De Symeon. Scriptis, p. 180) gives a passage, is ascribed, and apparently with good reason, to our Symeon. Le Quen, indeed, doubts whether it is correctly ascribed to him, because the author appears "not to have been hostile to the Latins;" but the very courtesy of tone which occasioned Le Quen's doubts, while sufficiently at variance with the usual style of mediæval polemics, is just such as a man in Symeon's circumstances would be likely to use. (Willermus s. Guillelmus Tyrensis, lib. i. c. 11; Albertus Aquensis, Historia Hieros. lib. vi. c. 39; Le Quen, Oriens Christianus, vol. iii. col. 498; Allatius, l.c.; Montfaucon, Bibloth. Csistin. p. 105; Cave, Hist. Litt. ad ann. 1090, vol. i. p. 159.)

12. Humili. [No. 16.]
13. Logotheta. [No. 22.]
14. Logotheta Junior. In the Bibliotheca Juris Canonici of Justellus and Vocellus (vol. ii. p. 710) is given the Επίστομα κανώνων, Epitome Canonum s. Synopsis Canonica of Symeon Magister and Logotheta. Cave and Oudin distinguish this Symeon from Symeon Metaphrastes [No. 22], who also bore the titles of Magister and Logotheta, by the epithet Junior. The work itself is more ancient than the period (A. D. 1170) in which Cave places this Symeon junior, who could only have selected and arranged it, and possibly (as Beveridge conjectured) made annotations upon it. Christopher Justellus in the PraeATIO to the second volume of the Bibliotheca Juris Canonici supposes the Symeon Logotheta who compiled the Epitome, to have been somewhat later than Alexius Aristinus or Aristenus [ALEXIUS ARISTENUS], who belonged to the middle of the twelfth century, and this appears to have led Cave and Oudin to distinguish him from Metaphrastes, who belongs to a much earlier period. But as, according to Cave's own acknowledgment, the Canonæ are really of earlier date, and in the title the compiler is no otherwise distinguished than by the titles Magister and Logotheta, which were borne by Metaphrastes, we agree with Fabricius in assigning the Epitome to Metaphrastes, and regard "Symeon Logotheta Junior" as an imaginary person. In that case the other works which Oudin and Cave ascribe to him must belong to some other Symeon. (Cave, Hist. Litt. ad ann. 1170, vol. ii. p. 241; Oudin, De Scriptoribus Eccles., vol. ii. col. 1386, &c.; Fabric. Bibl. Grac. vol. xi. p. 297.)

15. Magister. [No. 22.]
16. S. Mamantus, styled in the MSS. of his works, πατος δοκίμων, σώφρονες μόνης τού δόξην Μαμαντός τού ἕλεοςκρόνα, Novus Theologus οr Theologus Junior) et Hegumenus (s. ABBAS) Monasteri S. Mamantis in Xyelo-cerco, or, as some correct it, του ἔλεοσκρόνα, in Xylocerco. His title "Theologus" indicates his eminence as a writer on divinity; and the epithet "Novus" or "Junior" was evidently intended to distinguish him from some other ecclesiastic, perhaps from Gregory Nazianzen, to whom at a much earlier period the title "Theologus" was given; or more probably to distinguish him from some other Symeon, either Symeon Metaphrastes [No. 22] or Symeon the Pious [No. 24]. The time at which this writer flourished has been much disputed; but the facts of his history enable us to assign him to the latter half of the tenth century, or the beginning of the eleventh century. He was born about the middle of the tenth century, of wealthy and noble parents, named Basil and Theophano, at a place called Galatea in Paphлагonia; and was sent at an early age, for his education, to Constantinople, where his relatives held high stations at the Byzantine court. His precocious attainments inspired the highest hopes of his family, and he was introduced by an uncle to the notice of the imperial brothers Basil II. and Constantine IX., apparently at the time when they were yet in their boyhood, and were emperors in name only, the reins of empire being really held successively by Nicephorus Phocas (A. D. 963—969) and John Tzimisces (A. D. 969—975). After the sudden death of the uncle by whom he had been introduced at court, Symeon determined, though only fourteen years of age, to embrace a monastic life; but the monk Symeon the Pious (Συνεσεις ὁ ἐκαθαρτός), or as Combeis styles him, "Venerabilis," the Venerable [No. 24], whom he had chosen for his spiritual guide and father, having advised him to defer his purpose, he returned for a time to the house of his deceased uncle. At a somewhat later period he commenced his noviciate in the Monastery of Studium at Constantinople; but was induced by the envy of the abbot and some of the monks, excited by his pre-eminence in monastic practices, to remove to the Monastery of St. Mamas, where he completed his noviciate, and, in course of time, became abbot and was ordained presbyter. This was some time in the patriarchate of Nicolas Chysoberos, who was patriarch of Constantinople from A. D. 962 to 946. After some years Symeon, who had experienced trouble and danger from the turbulence of some recusant monks, resigned the abbacy, and devoted himself to the composition of works of piety. His literary labours attracted the approving notice of Sergius II., who held the patriarchate from A. D. 999 to 1019 or 1020: but this must have been quite in the early part of the patriarchate of Sergius, who was soon alienated from Symeon by the instrumentality of his syn- cellus, Stephanus, archbishop of Nicomedian, a man of learning and eloquence, who was jealous of Symeon. The charge against Symeon was, that he paid unauthorized honour to the memory of his spiritual father, Symeon the Pious, who was now dead; and to whom our Symeon paid the honours due to a canonized saint. In consequence of this difference Symeon, after six years of persecution, was banished from his monastery, and from Con- stantinople, by the patriarch and synod. This punishment was remitted, and high honours in the Church offered him, if he would comply with the wishes of the patriarch, but he would not purchase them by sacrificing the memory of his friend. He was enabled by the liberality of his friends to found a monastery in the place where he had taken up his abode during his exile, a deserted chapel of St. Marina, on the Asiatic side of the Propontis; and there he remained till his death. His life has been written at length by one of his disciples, Nicetas Stethatus, who has embellished the narrative with the usual appendages of celestial gifts, divine visions, and miraculous incidents; and from a summary of this given by Combeis, in his Auditorium Novissi- num, pars ii. p. 119, &c., and from an abridged translation of it in Roman or modern Greek, we are indebted for the above particulars. Allatius considers Symeon to have been the precursor of the fanatic quietists, who some centuries after gave occasion to the controversy that so agitated the Greek Church, respecting the uncreated light of Mount Tabor. [Palamas.]
SYMEON.

The works of Symeon of St. Mamas are numerous, and are divisible into the following classes:—

1. Αὐγοῦ, Orationes. Allatius (De Symeon, Scriptis) gives a catalogue of the subjects and opening sentences of seventy-eight of these, extant in various MSS. in the original Greek; and the list is transcribed by Fabricius (Biblioth. Graec. vol. xi. p. 304, &c.). Several of these, and some others of which the original Greek was not known by Allatius to be extant, thirty-three in all, were published in a Latin version by Jac. Pontanus, with a preface and notes by Jac. Garetus, 4to. Ingolstadt, 1603. The original of these thirty-three, in the order in which Pontanus gave them, together with twenty others, were in a MS. in the Coislin Library. (Montfaucon, Biblioth. Coislin. p. 407.) To this version Pontanus subjoined two Latin versions of several pieces by different authors. A modern (Roman) Greek version of the works of Symeon contains ninety-two of these Διηγού. 2. Κεφαλαία πρωτεύουσα καὶ θεολογικά, Capita Moralia. The number of these varies in different copies, either from some copies being imperfect, or from a difference of arrangement: in some MSS. they are arranged in three divisions, and amount in all to two hundred and twenty-eight (comp. Allat. de Symeon. p. 166); and this is the number in the version of Pontanus published with the Orationes. The modern Greek version contains only one hundred and eighty-one; but it contains also other Κεφαλαία, to the number of forty, by Symeon designated "the Pious" (Σωματίδιον τῶν έλληνων). [No. 24.]

3. Θέσεις έρωτοι, Diviniti Humani, or, as Pontanus entitled them in his Latin version, Sacrae Commendationes. These are in verse of various kinds, iambic, anapaestic, and of the kind called "versus politici." (This last kind of verses is described in a note to the article PHILIPPUS, literary and ecclesiastical, No. 27, p. 291.) Allatius (p. 161, &c.) and, after him, Fabricius (Bibl. Graec. vol. xi. p. 314, &c.), give the titles of fifty-eight of these Θέσεως, thirty-eight of which, according to Allatius, were translated into Latin, and published by Pontanus: but either by the subdivision or alteration of these, or by the addition of others, of which the original is not known, Pontanus, who has destroyed the poetical form of the original, and arranged them in one Sacram Commendationum Libris, gives forty "capita." The modern Greek version is in verse, and comprehends fifty-one Διηγού, Orationes s. Libri. The dissertation Peri ἀλλατικών ψυχής καὶ σάρκων τῶν έκ άνδρον, τῶν έκ στοιχείων, τῶν έκ βρισκόμενων καὶ τῶν έκ βαμμάτων ἰτέγεινων ἡμῶν Διηγού, De Alterationibus Animae et Corporis que ex Variedade Coeli et Aevi quoque ex Elementis, etc. ed. Combefis, shows that in the Latin version by the Jesuit Possinus, in the notes to his edition of the S. Nicol. Epistolog. 4to, Paris, 1657, is one of the Orationes translated by Pontanus. These are all the works of Symeon which have been published, and chiefly in Latin or modern Greek versions. The Latin versions of Pontanus and Possinus are contained in the Maxima Bibliotheca Patrum, vol. xxii. ad init. fol. London. 1677.

20. The modern or Romain Greek version was made by Dionysius Zgoraerus (Διονυσιος Ζαγοραος), a hermit of the desert islet of Piperi, off the promontory of Athos, and was published 4to., Venice, 1790, with the abridged Romain version of Nicetas Stethatus's life of Symeon prefixed. Allatius, Oudin, and Harless, in his edition of Fabricius, give the titles of various works of Symeon, extant in MSs. in various libraries; but many of them appear to be only duplicates or extracts of those already mentioned, with titles more or less varied. Combéris ascribes to him a discourse in honour of Symeon the Just, who is mentioned in the New Testament as taking the infant Christ in his arms. The author of this discourse styles himself Σωματιὸν ὅ τεσσαρος, Symeon Humilis. Symeon was held in the highest esteem in his own and following generations, and Allatius has quoted several laudatory poetical effusions in his honour. (Allatius, De Symeon, Scriptis. p. 151, &c.; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. xi. p. 302, &c.; Oudin, De Scriptoribus Eccles. vol. ii. col. 587, &c.; Cave, Hist. Litt. ad ann. 1051, vol. ii. p. 138, ed. Oxford, 1749—1743.)

17. MANDRIT. [No. 31.]

18. MANICHARUS. [No. 6.]

19. MARTYR. [No. 26.]

20. MASSALIANUS. [No. 8.]

22. METAPHRASTES (ὁ Μεταφράστης), known also by the titles of MAGISTER (ὁ Μαγιστρος) and LOGOTHEETA (it is doubtful if he was LOGOTHEETA CURSUS, ὁ Λογοθέτης του θρόνου, or MAGNUS LOGOTHEETA, ὁ μέγας Λογοθέτης), a celebrated Byzantine writer of the end of the ninth and beginning of the tenth centuries, as Allatius has shown, but about whose date writers have differed very widely, some placing him in the beginning of the third century, and others as late as the fourteenth (see Allatius and Cave, 'ibid infra'). Our chief authority for the life of Symeon is the Ἐγκώμιον εἰς τὸν Μεταφράστην κύριον Σωματιῶν, Encomium in Metaphrastum Dominum Symeonem of the younger Psellus (Psellus, No. 3), and an SYMEON.

Italicarum Scriptorium, vol. ii. p. 482.) Symeon is mentioned by Leo Diaconus (Historia, x. 7, p. 189, ed. Bonn) as still living when the comet appeared which shortly preceded the death of the emperor Joannes Tzimiskes (comp. Cedrenus, p. 683, ed. Paris, vol. ii. p. 414, ed. Bonn), and which may be fixed in the year 975, so that he must have lived very nearly a century, and perhaps more. His death is described by Psellus as joyful and triumphant. (Comp. Allatius, Vossius, Cave, Oudin, Cellier, Saxius, ubi infra, and Pagi, Critici in Baronii Annales, ad ann. 902, i.—xii.; ad ann. 975, c. ix. x.; Bollandus, Praefat. ad Acta Sanctor. cap. i. § 3, Januar. vol. i.)

The works of Metaphrastes are numerous and of varied character. They may be thus classified:—

1. Α' Αγίων Βίων Μεταφράσεις, Sanctorum Vitae sive Metaphrases. These constitute the largest and most important class of his writings. A few of them were probably original, but by far the greater part were paraphrases (μεταφάσεις) or recastings of more ancient works, of which the language was too rude, or the narrative too short, to meet the demand of the vicious taste and boundless credulity of the age in which Symeon lived, and which he seems to have altered ad libitum. As many, if not most, of the saints whom he commemorated lived before the rupture between the Eastern and Western Churches, some of the more zealous Roman Catholics, as Aloysius Lipomannus, Gretser, and especially Allatius, contend earnestly for the credit of Metaphrastes. Protestant writers have generally set him down as an author unworthy of credit, with the exception, perhaps, of Cave, who seems to think that he only corrected the arrangement and style of those of the ancient legends which needed such revision, and left those which were better written altogether intact. The more critical Roman Catholics unite with the Protestant in depreciating the authority of Symeon. The number of the lives ascribed to Symeon in the MSS. amounts to between six and seven hundred. Lists of these and other Sanctorum Vitae are given by Allatius, ubi infra, and Fabricius (Bibl. Graec. vol. x. pp. 186, seq.). Cave gives a list of a hundred and twenty-two which, after Allatius, he supposes to be correctly ascribed to Metaphrastes. Of those inaccurately assigned to him, Allatius ascribes four hundred and forty-four to other authors; of ninety-five others the authors are unknown. A great number of the Vitae, genuine or spurious, are published in a Latin version by Lipomannus, Surins, and others, in their collections, De Sanctorum Vitae: of these Allatius has given a list (p. 76); a few which Allatius also enumerates (p. 78) have been published in various works in the original Greek, with or without a Latin version. Another list of the published lives given by Hainmann, Zaremba, and Naechrichten, vol. iv. p. 143, foll. (On these Sanctorum Vitae, the great work of Metaphrastes, see Fabric, Bibl. Graec. vol. x. p. 180, &c., besides various incidental notices; and the authors cited at the close of this account.) 2. Συμεών μακρύτατος καλ λογοθέτου χρονογραφία, Symeonis Magistrri et Logothetis Annales. These extend from the beginning of the reign of Leo V. the Armenian, A.D. 813, where Thopheanes concludes, to the reign of Romanus II. the younger, in the midst of which (A.D. 960 or 961) they somewhat abruptly break off. The work was prepared for the press by Comenius, and is given among Of μετά Θεοφραστον, Scriv-SYMEON.

SYMEON.

Paris, 1609, published for the use of the Jesus schools; and were reprinted in the "Epistolas Pontificalia, traigio k. k. p., Poetae Graeci veteres, etc., vol. ii. p. 753, fol. Geneva, 1614. Four other short poems, two of them having their lines or alternate lines beginning with the successive letters of the alphabet, and bearing each the title 'Alphabeticus, Alphabetus;' and the other two addressed, one, Ei τον Βασιλέα, Ad sai omnia cum animam, the other, Ei και του εις πρωτην πατριανον την πολιον. Siglo et S. S. Sacramentum Primum, are given in the De Symeonum Scriptis of Allatius (p. 132, &c.). Some other poems of Symeon are extant in manuscript.

7. Επιστολη καινων, Symposis Canonicus, already noticed in speaking of the imaginary Symeon Logotheta Junior. [No. 14.] 8. Κεφαλαια του Αγιου Μακαριου μεταφραστηκαν απο Σαιωνου του Λουγουθου, S. Macarius Apoggiatus s. Sentences [MACARIUS, No. 1] Capita Ascetica centum septuaginta, metaphrasi illustrata a Symone Logotheta. Either this work or an Epitome of it is inserted in the Thesaurus Ascetici of Possin. (Comp. the obscure notices in Lambecius, De Biblioth. Cesar. vol. v. pp. 151, &c., 214, &c., ed. Kollar.) Besides these Κεφαλαια, selected from the works of Macarius and paraphrased, Symeon wrote some original Κεφαλαια γνωμικα μα, Gnomicae Sententiae CXXXIX, extant in manuscript. (Allatius, p. 132.) 9. Ημηνια Σανον και Τροπα, also from Symon Metaphrastes, were in the time of Allatius, and perhaps are still in use in the Greek Church (Allatius, p. 131), and are extant in various MSS.

10. Clemensinorum Epitome, published by Adrian Turnebus, 4to. Paris, 1555, and in a Latin version by Perioui, 4to. Paris, 1555; the version was reprinted in the edition of the works of Clemens Romanus, fol. Cologne, 1569. We know not on what ground this is ascribed to Symeon. (Comp. Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. vii. p. 31.) 11. Eικ Του του Εν Αγιων Πατρος ημων Βασιλεων αρχιεπισκοπου Καισαρειας της Καπαδοκιας ηθδικο ληγη δια Σαιωνου του Μαγιστρου και Λουγουθου, Ei Libris D. Basilia Archiepiscopi Caesareae Cappodociae Orationes de Moribus XXIV. Simeone Magistro ac Logotheta auctore. These Sermones were made up by Symeon of selections from the works of Basil, and were printed 8vo. Paris, 1556. A Latin version of them by Simiandus Iliouvs had appeared, 8vo. Venice, 1554, and has been reprinted several times.

Another Latin version, by Simon Maillens, archbishop of Tours, was published, 8vo. Paris, 1558, and has been reprinted in the editions of the works of Basil, in which the Oratioes are usually given. (Fabric. vol. ix. p. 56, &c., vol. x. p. 183, &c.) 12. An account of the church of St. Sophia, extant in two MSS. at Vienna (Kollar, Supplement, ad Lambecium, comp. pp. 749, 760), is ascribed in one of the MSS. to Symeon Metaphrastes, but with what accuracy is uncertain. The citations from Metaphrastes in the Catena in Luccum of Nicetas, and the mention by theophanes Caneues of his Ει του ιερου λοιπου ισωμα, In Lucam Commentaria, do not show that he wrote commentaries on Luke. The work intended is probably his account of Luke in his Sacramentum Vite. The citations in the Catena in Matthaeum of Macarius Chrysophalas are possibly from his account of Matthew. A single manuscript ascribes to Symeon Metaphrastes, but with very doubtful correctness, a work called Didyma, whether the work of Philip the Solitary [Philippus, literary and ecclesiastical, No. 27], or a different work, is not ascertain'd. (Allatius, p. 136; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. x. p. 62, note oo.)

23. Monachus & Hieromonachus. Various MSS. bear the name of Symeon Hieromonachus or Monachus as their author. (Comp. Fabric. Biblioth. Graec. vol. xi. p. 299; Cave, Hist. Litt. vol. ii.; Dissertat. Prima, p. 18.) A Symeon Monachus Metaphrastus et Presbyter is mentioned by Photius (Biblioth. Cod. 291) as flourishing in the reign of Justinian I. (See also Nos. 24, 25.)

24. Pius, Vergilius, Or Studita. Symeon, designated by his admirers ὁ εὐλαβής, "the Pious," or, as Combeö renders it, "the Venereal," was a monk of the monastery of Studium at Constantinople, in the latter half of the tenth century. His younger namesake, Symeon of St. Mamas [No. 16], was his disciple, and held in him such reverence as to pay to his memory honours which were deemed unauthorized and excessive, and involved the younger Symeon in difficulties with his ecclesiastical superiors. Symeon the Pious is regarded as the author of a short treatise on the duties of an ascetic life, Λόγος ἀσκήτου πολυμερῆς θυμὸν κεφαλαίων, Oratio de vita ascetica officiis summatis scripta, of which a version in modern or Romain Greek, by Dionysius Zagoreus, is published with his version of the works of Symeon of St. Mamas. 4to, Venice, 1790. See the biographical notices of Symeon of St. Mamas, in the Ascetorum Novissimorum of Combeö and in the version of Zagoreus, already referred to [No. 16].

25. Scholarius, styled also Hieromonachus, Συμεων ἐρημοδασιος ὁ σχολάρδος; a monk of the Byzantine empire, whose date is not known, except that he lived about or after the close of the eighth century. He composed a work entitled Κωνέως, Syntagma Canonum, extant in MS. at Vienna, containing the Canons ascribed to the Apostles and to the seven general councils. (Fabric. Biblioth. Graec. vol. xi. p. 299; Cave, Hist. Litt. vol. ii., Appendix prima, p. 18; Lumbecius, Commentar, de Bibliotheca Caesarea, vol. iv. col. 435, ed. Kollar.)

26. Of Seluccia and Ctesiphon. The increase of the number of Christians in Persia, and their formation into churches with ecclesiastical officers, had excited the apprehensions of the Magi, and also the jealousy of the Jews; these bodies excited the Persian king to commence a severe persecution against the Christians, and Symeon, archbishop of Seleucia and Ctesiphon, was put to death on a charge of favouring the interests of, and treacherously conveying to, the Roman emperor Constantine the Great, or more probably his son Constantinus II., intelligence affecting the interests of Persia. Syriac writers call this Symeon Bar-Saba or Bar-sabbé, i. e. "Filius Tinctorum" (Assemani. Biblioth. Orient. vol. i. p. 1, 2), and state that he was the disciple of Papas or Phaphas, whom he succeeded in the see of Seleucia. Papas had been deposited for his arrogance and impiety, and Symeon was appointed in his room (Le Quien, Orient. Christianus, vol. iii. col. 1104, &c.; Assemani, Biblioth. Orient. vol. i. p. 186), which led Papas to utter an imprecation against Symeon that his sins might never be forgiven to him. Symeon was born of respectable and pious parents, who carried on the business of silk dyers, and appear to have supplied the Persian kings with their royal robes. The date of Symeon's accession to his see is undetermined. According to some authorities (Le Quien, col. 1106) Symeon was present at the Council of Nice, A. d. 325, as representative of his predecessor Papas, who was then archbishop of Seleucia; according to others (Assemani, p. 8, 9) Symeon had already acquired the see, and sent one of his clergy to represent him. The date of his death is also uncertain; but it was probably during the war between the Persians and the Roman emperor Constantius II. Many other Christians perished with Symeon, and in the bloody persecution which followed his death; among these martyrs was his sister Tarbula. He was buried at Susa. (Assemani, p. 4.) Symeon wrote some letters in Syriac, which are mentioned by Ebed-jesu (Assemani, p. 11); but the occasion and subject of them are not stated. Two hymns which are, it would appear, still used by the Christians of the country about Bagdad (in divinis Chaldaeorum officiis) are ascribed to him. (Assemani, Biblioth. Oriental. vol. i. p. 1—12; Le Quien, i. c.; Sozomen. H. E. ii. 8—15; Hieronym. Chronicon. Theopban. Chronog. p. 19, ed. Paris, p. 15, ed. Venice, p. 36, ed. Bonn; Cedrenus, Compend. p. 298, ed. Paris, p. i. p. 522, ed. Bonn; Nicephorus Callisthi, H. E. viii. 35, 37, 38; Menolog. Basilian. a. D. April. xiv. pars iii. p. 55, ed. Uri- binos, 1727; Henschen. apud Acta Sanctorum Aprilis, vol. ii. p. 840; Baroniæ, Annales Ecclesi. ad anno. 843, xii.—xvii.; Pagi, Critici in Baron. in loc.; Tillenius, Mémoires, vol. vii. pp. 76, &c., 662, &c.)

27. Seth or Sethus, Σήθ, or Sethi, Σήθ; or perhaps the Son of Sethus or Seth, a Byzantine writer of some importance of the eleventh century. He is known also by the titles which he bore of Magister et Philosophus, Μάγιστρος καὶ Φιλοσοφος, and of Protovetustarius Antiochii, Πρωτοετεράρχης τῶν Ἀρχόντων, i. e. Master of the Robes in the palace of Antiochus (Flavius Antiochus the Eunuch, who was consul, a. D. 431) at Constantinople, in which the imperial jewels or costly articles were kept. (Comp. Ducange, Glossar. Med. et Lat. Græcecar. i. e. πρωτοκατάρχης τῶν Αρχόντων, inter derivat. voc. Βάτης; et Constantinop. Christiana, lib. ii. sect. xiii. § 5.) By a corruption of his title he has been improperly styled Antiochenus, Αντίοχος, and Magister Antiochiae, Μάγιστρος Ἀρχόντων, and Bestus, Βέστος. It is pro-
The principal works of Symeon Seth are as follows:

1. Сυμεωνικα κατα στοιχεια περι προσωπων διανομεων, Syntagma per literarum ordinem de cibiorum facultate. This is a descriptive catalogue, alphabetically arranged, of the chief articles of human food: the materials for the most part taken from Symeon's contemporary, Michael Psellus [Psellus, No. 3]. It was published, with a Latin version, by Lilius Gregorius Gyraldus of Ferrara, 12mo. Basel, 1539. The arrangement of the text differs from that of the version: the alphabetical order in the one being of the Greek titles to each article, in the other of their Latin equivalents; but in an edition of the version revised by Dominicus Montesaurus of Verona, 12mo. Basel, 1561, the Greek titles are prefixed to each article, and the original order is restored.

2. Симеониз кατα απαιτηματα φυσικων τε και φιλοσοφων δογματων, Compendium et florid naturalium et philosophorum placitorum. Of this work, which is also in great part pillaged from Psellus, Allatius (ubi infra) has given a short extract, with a Latin version. The first two of the five books of which the work consists are extant in some MSS. under the name of Psellus. They bear the title of Συμεωνικα κατα στοιχεια περι προσωπων διανομεων, Stephanides et Ichnolates, s. Coronarius et Vestinctor, and a Latin version of a considerable part of it was subjoined by Possin to his edition of Georgius Pachymeres, fol. Rome, 1666; but it is omitted in the Bonn reprint of that version. The Greek text, not however in a complete form, was published under the title of Specimen Serpentini Indorum veterum, by Seb. Godof. Starkius, 12mo. Berlin, 1697.

The introductory chapters, which were prefixed to Bidpai's work, and had been also translated by Seth but omitted by Starkius, were published under the title of Prolegomena ad Librum, Сτεφανικα κατα Χηριανατη, by Loderer, Upsala, 1789. From a more prolix title or introduction prefixed to the work we learn that it was brought from India by Περγεθ, Perzoe, or Barzouyeh, physician to Chosroes or Khoosr I. Nushirwan [Sasanian, No. 21], King of Persia, who reigned from a.d. 531 to 579, and that it was presented to that King. It is probable that what Barzouyeh presented to Khosro was a Pehlevi or old Persian version, not the Sanscrit original. It was, according to the title just cited, translated into Arabic, and this Arabic version Symeon Seth translated into Greek. A succinct account of this ancient and curious work is given in the Penny Cyclopaedia, s. v. Bidpai, where are given numerous references to the authorities used.

A history of Alexander the Great, replete with fabulous incidents, and falsely bearing the name of Callisthenes [Callisthenes, No. 1], which is found in some libraries (comp. Catal. M. Siorum Biblioth. Regiae, vol. ii. p. 338, Cod. mlcxxx. fol. Paris, 1740), is said by Fabricius (Bibl. Graec. vol. iii. p. 36) and Wharton (Hist. of Eng. Poetry, vol. i. p. 120) to have been translated from the Persian by Symeon Seth, but on what authority to this and the rest of the later versions of the work seem to bear any internal marks of belonging to Seth. The opening portion of a history of Alexander which some identify with this work, is given by Berekel (in a note to Stephanus Byzant. De Urbibus, ad voc. Boukeleia) and by Fabricius (Bibl. Graec. vol. xiv. p. 148, ed. vol.): it bears the title of Θητ Αλεξανδρου του Μακεδωνος και παλαις, Vita et Gesta Alexandri Macedoniae Regis. A Latin history of Alexander closely resembling this Greek work, and considered by some as a version though it varies much from the original, was printed in black letter, fol. Argentin, 1489 and 1494. This work bears, both of them, considerable resemblance to the work said to have been written in Greek by Aesopous [Aesopus, p. 40], and translated into Latin by Julius Valerius, whose translation was first published from an imperfect MS. by Angelo Mai, at Milan, 1842, and again more complete in vol. ii. of his Classici Scriptorum et Vaticanorum Cod. edit., Bologna, 1843. It is also given from Mai's first edition as an appendix to the edition of Quintus Curtius in the Bibliotheca Classica Latina of Lemaire, 8vo. Paris, 1824. Considerable information respecting these works of the Pseudo Callisthenes, Aesopous or Julius Valerius and others, which have much in common with each other and appear to have had a common origin, may be found in the preface of Mai (reprinted by Lemaire) in the Journal des Savans for 1818, pp. 401, &c., 609, &c., and in the Bibliothéque Universelle for the same year, pp. 218, &c., 522, &c. But of these works neither by Mai nor in the periodicals is any one ascribed to Symeon Seth. Some other works of Symeon are extant in MS. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. ii. ec. vol. vii. p. 472; vol. xi. p. 320; Alat. De Symeon. Scriptis, p. 101, &c.; Vossius, De Historia Graec. lib. iv. c. 21.)

28. Studia. [Nos. 16 and 24.]

29. Studia Studii. Some Tracopas, Canonia, or hymns, by Symeon, a monk of the Convent of Studium.
at Constantinople, were among the MSS. of the monastery of Cryptae Ferratae at Rome. Alattus, who had read them, says that they were worthy to be preserved and published, and to be used in the services of the church. He has given the initial parts of each, from which it appears that they related to the ascension, burial, and resurrection of Christ. Of the times and history of this Symeon nothing is known. A Symeon appears among the correspondents of Theodores Studites, who addresses him as his son; but whether this was the writer of the Cantica or not is unknown. Alattus judges the writer to be a different person from the Symeon Studites mentioned with such high praise by Symeon of St. Mamas, in his oration De Poenitentia et Compunctione, and who is doubtless the Symeon the Pious already mentioned [No. 24]. (Allattus, De Symeon, Script. p. 23; Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vol. x. p. 444, vol. xi. p. 299; Cave, Hist. Litt. vol. ii. Dissert. Prima, p. 16.)

30. Stylitus or Salus (♂ Στυλίτης), a fanatic of the Eastern Church, apparently born about A.D. 522, in the reign of the emperor Justin I. He lived in a cell or cella, and is supposed to have been the original Stylites. A few are still to be seen on a hill near the eastern shore of the Dead Sea. He afterwards visited Jerusalem. He then went to Emesa, where he continued till his death. He lived to, if not after, the reign of the emperor Maurice. The life of this Symeon, written by Leontius of Neapolis [Leontius, No. 29], his contemporary, abounds with absurd stories of his miracles. (Leontius, Vita S. Simeonis Salii, apud Acta Sanctor. Julii. vol. i. p. 136, &c.; Nicephorus Callistus, H. E. lib. xvi. c. 22.)

31. Stylytes (Συμμύχας & Σύσύλης), the PILAR-SAINT, a celebrated ascetic of the fifth century, who derived his distinguishing epithet from the pillar on which he passed a considerable part of his life. He was the first of a tolerably numerous class of "Pillar-saints" or "Stylytes." He was born at the village of Sisai, on the confines of Syria and Cilicia, about A.D. 383, according to Tillemont, whose dates we follow. After leading an ascetic life for many years in various monasteries and solitary places, he resolved to take his stand on a pillar or pedestal, in order to escape from the honour paid him by men, according to the testimony of Theodoret, though it is not so easy to see how so conspicuous a position consisted with the modesty ascribed to him by that writer. This was in A.D. 423. At first his pillar was only six cubits, or nine feet high; it then rose to twelve cubits, then to twenty-two; and when Theodoret wrote, which was in Symeon's lifetime, it was thirty-six cubits, or fifty-four feet high; "for," adds Theodoret, "he desires to touch heaven, and to be released from all communication with earthly things." The circumference of his column is stated by Evagrius to have been two cubits, or three feet, the height forty, which is, perhaps, only a round number for the thirty-six of Theodoret.

This proceeding of the saint, however admired by some, incurred the reprehension of others, to whom Theodoret thought it necessary to reply by referring to certain simbholical actions of the Old Testament prophets. The saint's proceeding was, however, so far in conformity to Oriental sentiments, and appealed so strongly to Oriental feelings, that it led to the conversion of many hundred heathens, Persians, Armenians, and Iberians, who probably have resisted a more rational mode of argument. Tribes, apparently of Bedouin Arabs, contended for the blessing of the holy man, and were near coming to blows in their jealous rivalry. The gifts of working miracles and of prophesying are claimed for him by Theodoret, who professes to have been an eye and ear witness of their exercise. In this extraordinary manner he passed the last thirty-seven years of his life, attracting the reverence alike of believers and unbelievers.

Symeon died about A.D. 460 according to Tillemont, Theophanes, and Cedrenus. His body was brought to Antioch. The emperor Leo proposed to remove it to Constantinople, but yielded to the entreaties of the people of Antioch that it should remain among them. His relics were held in high esteem.

The abode of Symeon before and after his ascent of the column, was locally called Mandra (whence he sometimes bore the name of Mandrata), and was distant, according to Evagrius, three hundred stadia, or nearly three miles from Antioch. A small part of his admirers subsequently erected a church or monastery on the spot, in the midst of which was a richly ornamented court, open to the sky, and enclosing the column on which he had passed his days. The Western Church commemorates this saint on January 5th, the Greek Church on September 1st.

It is known that Symeon wrote several pieces:

1. Epistola ad Theodosium Imperatorem, relating to the restitution of the Jewish synagogues; a proof, unhappily, that a clear perception of right and wrong is not to be enumerated among our saint's excellences. (Evag. H. E. i. 13; Nicephor. l. c.)

This letter is not extant. 2. Ad Eulogium Imperatricem Epistola, concerning her return to the church. A short extract from this is preserved by Nicophorus Callisti (H. E. xv. 13). 3. Πρὸς Δέων τον αυτοκράτορα ἐπιστολή, Ad Leonem Imparatorum Epistolae, on the election of Timotheus Aelurus, and the authority of the Council of Chalcedon; mentioned by Evagrius (H. E. ii. 10, Comp. Phot. Biblioth. cod. 229). 4. Πρὸς Βασιλείου ἐπιστολή τοῦ Ἀρτέχου (sic in Evag.), an Epistola, Ad Basilium Antiochiae Episcopi Epistolae, on the same subjects, preserved by Evagrius (ibid.), and Nicophorus Callisti (H. E. xx. 19). 5. Allatius mentions also a Confessio fidei, and refers to Eulogius (apud Phot. l. c.); but Eulogius evidently speaks of the saint's letter to the emperor Leo. (Allatius, Cave, Fabriacus, i. loc.)

The discourse De morte sempere meditando, printed in a Latin version in the Bibliotheca Patrum, under the name of our Syeomen, is noticed elsewhere as being more correctly ascribed to Syeomen of Mesopotamia [No. 21].

32. Styliites Junior, or Thaumastorites, or A Monte Thaumastorite, or A Monte Thaumastorite (ὁ Θαυμαστός ὦρος), or Thaumastorites. The Greek and other Eastern churches reverence the memory of a younger Syeomen Styliites, who has, however, no place in the Latin calendar, and is indeed of far less celebrity than the subject of the preceding article. He was born at Antioch of parents in humble life, about a. d. 521, as Conrad. Janningshus calculates. His mother Martha was a woman of great piety. He embraced a monastic life, when yet a child, in a monastery near Seleucia, the port of Antioch, in which monastery he found an eminent styliete or pillar saint, Joannes; and Syeomen, desiring to imitate his example, had a priest erected opposite John's, on the top of which, within a wooden enclosure, which may perhaps be compared to a circular pulpit, he took up his abode for eight years, being only seven years old when he ascended it. He was ordained priest by Dionysius, bishop of Seleucia, but in what year is not known. He died in his seventy-fifth year, and in the forty-fifth of his abode on his second column, probably in or about a. d. 596. The profic life of him from which we have taken the above particulars, was written by "Nicophorus Magister Antiochiae," a writer of a later but unascertainable period, and is full of miracles, visions, and other legendary matters. It is given, with a valuable Commentarius Praeculis by Conrad Janningshus, in the Acta Sanctorum Maii, a. d. xxiv. vol. v. p. 293, &c.

Several writings are ascribed to the younger Syeomen the Styliete. They are, I. Περὶ εἰδώλων, De Imaginalibus, mentioned by Joannes Damascenus, who cites a passage from it among the passages subjoined to his own third oration on the same subject. It may be doubted, however, whether the very passage from which the citation is made, or merely describes the subject of the cited passage. (Damascenus, Opera, vol. i. p. 386, ed. Le Quien.) 2. Εἰστολὴ πρὸς τὸν ᾨσυρμίναν Βασίλεια, Epistolae ad Justinianum Imparatorum, cited by Sophronius of Jerusalem in his Συνδέα, Epistola Symodoica (apud Phot. Biblioth. cod. 231). This letter of Syeomen was directed against the Nestorians and Eutychians, and was much prized by Justinian, who called it "a treasure." (Phot. ibid.) 3. Πρὸς βασιλεία Ιουστίνου τὸν νέον ἐπιστολή, Ad Imperatorum Justinianum Epistolae, of two lines only, given in the life of Syeomen by Nicophorus (c. xxiv. § 189). 4. Εἰστολὴ πρὸς τὸν βασιλεία Ἰουστίνου τὸν νέον, Ad Imperatorum Justinianum Epistolae Quinta, exciting him to punish the Samaritans, given at length in the Acta Concilii Niceni secundi Oecumenici Septimii, Actio V. (see Concil. vol. iv. coll. 289, 663, ed. Hardouin.) It is uncertain whether the title indicates that this passage in some general collection of the Epistolae of Syeomen, or the fifth which he had written to the emperor. Its genuineness also has been disputed and is vindicated at some length by Allatius (De Syeomen. Scriptis, p. 18, &c.). 5. On the year in Ἱεροσολύμων ὁμίχλων σταιροφόρων θαυμάτων ἐπιστολή, Ad Sanctissimum in Hierosolymis Sanctae Crucis Custodiorem Thomam Epistolae, given at length in the Vita S. Marthae matrix Syeomnis Junioris, written by him, &c. (apud Acta Sanctorum Maii, vol. v. p. 426). 6. A letter to Evagrius the ecclesiastical historian, mentioned by him (H. E. vi. 25). 6. Devotional compositions, as Τροπάρια, Τροπαρία s. Hymnai, and Euchar. Process. written by Allatius (ibid. p. 21) as extant in MS. A short Ἱερά, Ode s. Hymnus is given in the life of Syeomen by Nicophorus, c. xiii. § 109. 7. Σερμονες Ασητικες ΙΩΧΧΙ, 3. Responsoria ad quasi F.XXXV, and Sententiae XXXV, are extant in an Arabic version at Rome (Assemani, Biblioth. Oriental. vol. ii. p. 510); and the Sermones at Oxford also. (Catalog. M. Storurn Anglice et Hispanicæ, vol. i. p. 280.)

Beside the life of Syeomen, from which our account is chiefly taken, various particulars are recorded by Evagrius (H. E. v. 21, vi. 23), the contemporary and countryman of the Saint; by the biographer of St. Martha, the mother of Syeomen, apparently a contemporary; by Joannes Damascenus (i. e. p. 576), who cites a passage from a lost life of Syeomen by Arcadius of Cypa; in the Acta Concilii Niceni Secundi, Actio IV. (Concil. vol. iv. col. 217 and 632), where two extracts are given from an anonymous life of Syeomen, perhaps that by Arcadius; and by Nicophorus Callisti (H. E. xviii. 24); Allatius (De Syeomen. Scriptis, pp. 17—22); Janningshus (apud Acta Sanctorum, l. c.); Cave (Hist. Litt. ad ann. 557, vol. i. p. 508); Fabriacus (Biblioth. Graec. vol. x. pp. 325, 524, vol. xi. p. 299); and Baronius (Annales ad ann. 574. §§ vii. viii. ix.).

33. Styliites Tertius, Presbyter et Archimandrita. A third pillar Saint of the name of Syeomen is revered by the Greek and Coptic, or Egyptian Jacobite, Churches, on the 26th or 27th July. He is mentioned here only to prevent his being confounded with either of the preceding. He is perhaps the same with the Syeomen Stylietes of Aegae in Cilicia, mentioned by Joannes Moschus (Pratum Spirituales, c. 57) as having been killed by the Saracens, and who, according to Monachus Confessor in Sicilia (perhaps an error for Cilicia), who appears in some ancient Latin Martyrologia on the 27th July. (Acta Sanctorum Juli, a. d. xxvi. vol. vi. p. 310; Allatius, De Syeomen. Scriptis, p. 22; Fabric. Biblioth. Graec. vol. x. p. 525.)

34. Thaumaturgus. There is a letter noticed by Allatius asextant in MS., which, after having been translated from the original Greek into Syriac, and from Syriac into Arabic, was, under the mistaken impresession that the original was lost, retranslated from Arabic into Greek. This letter was written by Symeon Thamaturgos to another Symeon designated Encilistus, who derived his lineage from one of the emperors or Caesars: Επιστολή τοῦ στύλου Συμεονος Θαματουργος ὑπὸ ἀντικεῖο πρὸς τοὺς ὀπίς γένους Καίσαρας ἕκειστον μὲν γεγενημένον, Epistola S. Symeonis Thamaturghi quem visis ad quemdam Encilistum genus trahentem a Caesare. There is some reason to conjecture that Symeon Thamaturgos is identical with the younger Symeon the Stylete [No. 32]. (Allatius, De Sym. Scriptis, p. 179; Fabricius, Biblioth. Graec. vol. xi. p. 299.)

33. THEOLOGIUS JUNIOR s. NOVUS THEOLOGIS (d véos éklycous). [No. 16.]

36. OF THESSALONICA. Little is known of the personal history of Symeon, archbishop of Thessalonica, except that he lived in the first half of the fifteenth century, and held his see for between five and six years, dying Sept. A.D. 1429, about six months before Thessalonica was taken by the Turks under Murad. Joanna Anagnostes, in his De Thessalonicensi Excidio Narratio (c. 3), has noticed the death of Symeon, who was generally lamented; and relates a curious dream, by which his decease and the subsequent ruin of the city were supposed to be portended. Symeon was the author of several theological works much esteemed in the Greek Church. They were published under the care of Dositheus, patriarch of Jerusalem, and, Jassy, 1683. A Romanic version of the whole was published, 4to. Leipsic, 1791. Some of the works have been also published separately. (Allatius, De Symeon, Scriptis, pp. 185-194; Fabric. Biblioth. Graec. vol. xi. p. 328, &c.; Cave, Hist. Litt. Appendix by Wharton and Gery, ad annos 1410, 1418, vol. ii. pp. 113, 114; Le Quien, Orient Christians, vol. ii. col. 58; Oudin, Commentarius de Scriptorib. Ecles. vol. iii. col. 3242, &c.)

37. VENERABILIS. [No. 24.]

39. XVLOCERCIUS. [No. 16.37] [J.C. M.]

SYMMAChUS. 1. SYMMACHUS, proconsul of Achaea, to whom two laws of Constantine the Great were sent in a. d. 319 (Cod. Theod. 2. tit. 4. ss. 1, 15), was probably the father of I. Aurelius Symmachus, who flourished about the middle of the fourth century, and is described by Ammianus Marcellinus (xxvii. 3. § 3), as worthy of being ranked among the brightest models of learning and virtue. From an inscription formerly preserved in the Capitoli, and now in the vestibule of the Vatican Library, we learn that he enjoyed at various periods the dignities of praefect of the city (a. d. 364), an office in which he was the successor of Apronianus (Amm. Marc. L.c.), of consul (suffect. a. d. 376?), of praefect of the praetorium at Rome and praeprefect of the neighbouring provinces, of praepectus annonee, of pontifex major, and of quindecemvir S. F. In a. d. 300, he was despatched on an embassy to the emperor Constantius, at that time in the East (Amm. Marc. xxi. 12. § 24), and at different periods executed various diplomatic missions, to the entire satisfaction of the nobility. As a tribute to his wisdom, influence, and eloquence, he was usually called upon to deliver his opinion first in deliberations of the senate, and that body, with the consent and approbation of the emperors Valens and Valentinianus, passed a vote that a gilded statue should be erected in honour of him, which was dedicated on the 29th of April a. d. 377 in the consulate of Gratianus Augustus (1v.) and Merobaudes. By his wife, the daughter of Aeyninus, he was the father of

3. Q. AURELIUS SYMMACHUS, who flourished towards the close of the fourth century, and stood foremost among his contemporaries as a scholar, a statesman, and an orator. Educated in Gaul (Symmachus. Ep. ix. 83), apparently at Bourdeaux or Toulouse, in that age the most renowned seminaries in the world, in early life he became devoted to the liberal arts. By his example and authority he, at a subsequent period, inspired for a time new life and vigour into the literature of his country, which had long been wasting by gradual decay, and seemed now to be fast approaching the hour of dissolution. Having discharged the functions of quaestor and praetor, he was afterwards appointed (a. d. 363, Cod. Theod. 8. tit. 5. s. 23) Corrector of Lucania and the Bruttii; in a. d. 373 (Cod. Theod. 12. tit. 1. s. 73; comp. Symmach. Ep. viii. 10, x. 3) he was proconsul of Africa, and became, probably about the same time, a member of the pontifical college. His zeal for the ancient faith of Rome, which exercised throughout life a marked influence on his character, checked for a while the prosperous current of his fortunes, and involved him in danger and disgrace. For having been chosen by the senate on account of his surpassing eloquence to remonstrate with Ottoman on the removal of the altar of victory (a. d. 382) from their council hall, and on the curtailment of the sums annually allowed for the maintenance of the Vestal Virgins, and for the public celebration of sacred rites, he was ordered by the ignobler emperor to quit the presence, and to withdraw himself to a distance of one hundred miles from Rome. Nothing daunted by this repulse, when appointed praefect of the city (a. d. 384) after the death of his persecutor, he addressed an elaborate epistle to Valentinianus again urging the restoration of the pagan deities to their former honours. The application was again unsuccessful, but did not upon this occasion prove personally injurious to the promoter, who, however, soon exposed to a hazard still more perilous than any which he had previously encountered. In consequence of the hostile factions which he naturally cherished against Gratian, he had always sympathised with Maximius, by whom that prince had been conquered and slain. When the pretender was threatening (a. d. 387) to invade Italy his cause was openly advocated by Symmachus, who, upon the arrival of Theodosius was impeached of treason, and forced to take refuge in a sanctuary. Having been speedily pardoned through the intercession of numerous and powerful friends he expressed his contrition and gratitude in an apologetic address to the conqueror, by whom he was not only freely forgiven, but was received into favour and elevated to the consulate in a. d. 391, and during the remainder of his life he appears to have taken an active part in public affairs. The notice of his death is unknown. Except a few of his letters (vii. 50) was written as late as a. d. 402, and he was certainly alive when the poem of Prudentius, usually assigned to a. d. 404, was published. His personal character seems to have been unimpeachable, as he performed the duties of the high offices which he filled in succession with a degree of mildness, firmness, and integrity, seldom found among statesmen in that corrupt age. The charge vaguely preferred, and unsupported by any distinct evidence, that he abused his power when chief magistrate of Rome, in order to oppress the Christians, seems totally destitute of foundation.
That his leisure hours were devoted exclusively to literary pursuits, seems evident from the numerous allusions in his epistles to the studies in which he was engaged, and his friendship with Ausonius and other distinguished authors of that epoch proves that he delighted in associating and corresponding with the learned. His wealth must have been prodigious, for in addition to his town mansion on the Caelian Hill (*Ep. iii. 12, 58, vii.
18*), and several houses in the city which he lent to his friends, he possessed upwards of a dozen villas in the most delightful parts of Italy, many detached farms, together with estates in Sicily and Mauritania.
The following inscription contains a list of his honours and titles as recorded by his son:

Basil. et Lyc. El. et Pannon. et Africae Praef. Ubr. Cons. Ordinarii. Oratorii. Dissertissimo. Q. Fab. Mem. Sym-machus. V. C. Patrif. Optimo.

The extant works of Symmachus consist of letters and fragments of speeches.

I. Epistolarum Libri X, published after his death by his son. The last book contains his official correspondence, and is chiefly composed of the letters presented by him when prefect of the city to the emperors under whom he served. The remaining books comprise a multitude of epistles, many of them notes extending to a few lines only,
addressed to a wide circle of relations, friends, and acquaintances. They relate for the most part matters of little moment, and notwithstanding the praises so liberally lavished by Politian and Laetus, are, taken as a whole, uninteresting and destitute of value. The style is elaborated with great and painful diligence. Pliny was the object proposed for imitation by the author, and the epistles show the careful copy of a stiff model, in which the degenerate taste and decaying Latinity of the fourth century are engrafted on the solemn pedantry and cold affectation of the original. We must, however, make an exception in favour of the most highly finished and important piece in the collection, the celebrated epistle "DDD. Valentianino, Theodosio et Arcadio semer Augg.," entertaining them to restore the Altar of Victory to its ancient position in the senate house. This document, whether we consider the judicious choice of the arguments employed, the skilful arrangement according to which they succeed and mutually support each other, the art with which they are developed, the pointed energy with which they are enforced, and at the same time the tone of moderation and liberality which pervades the whole, impresses us with deep admiration of the genius, learning, dialectic acuteness, and eloquence of the author, who seems to have lacked nothing but a good cause for the display of his talents. Notwithstanding the folly and falseness of the doctrines which he advocates, this state paper is infinitely superior as a literary composition and a work of art to the well-known reply of St.
Ambrosius, which is verbose, abusive, and not ever honest.

II. Novem Orationum Fragmenta. Although
we were told by Socrates (H. E. v. 14) and Callitxus (Hdt. xii. 21) that Symmachus had published many speeches which were greatly admired (graepriores), not a single remnant of these was known to exist until very recently, when Mai discovered in one of the palimpsests of the Ambrosian library, fragments of eight orations, and subsequently in another portion of the same palimpsest, deposited in the Vatican, some additional fragments of these eight and also a portion of a ninth. The titles are,
1. Laudes in Valentinianum seniore August-um I. We have twenty-three short chapters nearly entire; the beginning and the end of the speech are both wanting. 2. Laudes in Valentinianum seniore Augustum II. Extending to twenty chapters, in which there are several blanks and imperfections; the beginning and the end are wanting. 3. Laudes in Gratianum Augustum.
Extending to twelve chapters interrupted by two blanks; the beginning and the end are wanting.
4. Laudes in Patres. Extending to four chapters;
the beginning and the end are wanting. 5. Oratio pro Patre, returning thanks for the elevation of his patron. Ten chapters, interrupted by one blank; the beginning and the end both wanting. 6. Oratio pro Trygetio, recom-manding the son of his friend Trygetius for the praetorship (see Ep. i. 44). Four chapters; the beginning and the end both wanting. 7. Oratio pro Synesio, recommending the elevation of Synesius, the son of his friend Julianus, to the dignity of a senator (see Ep. v. 43). Seven chapters interrupted by a blank, the portion which follows the third chapter having been obtained from the Vatican MS. We have here the commencement of the speech. 8. Oratio pro Flacio Secero. Four chapters; the beginning and the determine both wanting. 9. Oratio pro Valerio Fortunato, on behalf of a high-born but poor individual who was unable to defray the expenses incurred by officers of the state. Five chapters; the begining and the end are both wanting. It will be seen that the above are all of a panegyric or complimation nature. We are unable to awaken in the minds of the public an admiration of language and grace of expression, do not afford an opportunity for the development of oratorical powers of a high order.

We may gather from notices in the epistles and in other writers the arguments of several lost orations, such as Panegyricus Theodosii senioris (Ep. ii. 13); Panegyricus Maximi tyranni (Soemt.
H. E. v. 14, comp. Ep. ii. 31); Oratio de abroganda censura (Ep. iv. 29, 45, 9); Oratio de Polibii filio (Ep. iv. 45); Oratio contra Gildomer (Ep. iv. 4); Gratianum actio (Ep. vii. 50). This, as Mai suggests, was perhaps not an oration but an epistle, comp. Ep. ii. 22, iii. 81.

Symmachus composed in verse as well as prose,
among other productions a poetic history of Bauli.
See the lines in Ep. i. 1.

Jornandes (de Rebis Get. 15) quotes a long passage from an historical work by Symmachus, but it is extremely doubtful whether this Symmachus was the same person with the Symmachus we have now been discussing.

The editio princeps of the epistles of Symma-chus, which contains but a small number of letters, was printed in 4to., by Bartholomæus Cynichus of Ameria, and although without date or name of place, is known to have been published during the pontificate of Pope Julius II., that is, A. D. 1503—1513. The second edition, 4to. Argentorat. 1510, SYNGELUS (Michael), a Greek writer of the lower empire, several of whose works have been published. From his life of Theode-

Syngelus, 391

Stodita, and from a letter of Theodora Studita to him (Theodor. Studit. Epistol. lib. ii. Ep. 213, apud Sirmond. Opera Varia, vol. v. p. 733), we learn that he was a contemporary, or perhaps a disciple in the monastic life of that busy ecclesiastic (who died A.D. 826), that he was Syngelus of the Greek patriarch of Jerusalem, Michaela συγκλέλα Άγιοςάλτη, and that he supported the worship of images in the great controversy on that subject in the ninth century. From the title to his Greek version of a letter of Theodore Abucaura (Theodorus, literary and ecclesiastical, No. 3) we gather that he was Syngelus to Thomas who held the patriarchate of Jerusalem for about twenty years, from A.D. 801, or, according to other accounts, from 807. Michael, however, must have survived both Theodore Studita and the patriarch Thomas, for he suffered a long imprisonment for his defence of image worship in the reign of the iconoclastic emperor Theoph-

is also very imperfect; but in those printed at Basle, 8vo. 1549, Paris, 4to. 1560, and by Vignon and his heirs, 1507, 1538, and 1601, the collection was gradually enlarged from MSS., until it attained to its present magnitude. No really good edition of these letters has yet appeared, but the most useful for general purposes are those of Juretus, 4to. Paris, 1604, and of Scioppius, 4to. Magnunt. 1608.

The fragments of the eight speeches were first published by Angelo Mai, 8vo. Mediolan. 1815, in a volume which was reprinted, page for page, at Frankfort, 8vo. 1816, and they are now been appended to Niebuhr's edition of Fronto, 8vo. 1816. The extended fragments, comprising the additions to the eight speeches, and the remains of the ninth obtained from the Vatican MS., are contained in the "Scriptorum Veterum Novae Collectio et Vaticani Codicis edita ab Angelo Mai," 4to. Rom., 1825, vol. i.; see also Meyer, Orat. Roman. Fragmenta., pp. 627—636., 2d ed.

4. Q. Fabianus Memmius Synmachus, son of the scribe, and his wife Rusticiana, daughter of Ortius. Like his father he held the offices of quaestor, praetor, and proconsul of Africa; the latter in A.D. 415 (Cod. Theod. 11. tit. 30. s. 65). It is uncertain whether he ever attained to the consulsip, but Mai seems to have proved that he was city prefect in A.D. 418.

5. Q. Aurelius Synmachus, who held the consulsip along with Arsinius, in A.D. 446, was in all probability the son of the preceding, and therefore the grandneph of the orator. He was the father of

6. Q. Aurelius Memmius Synmachus, who was a Christian and the father-in-law of Boethius. (For full information regarding the life and writings of Symmachus, of his ancestors and of his descendants, see the "Commentarii Praeventi de Symmaco" by Mai, in the first volume of the "Scriptorib Vetum Novae Collectio," noticed above. In this dissertation references will be found to all those passages in the ancient writers which bear upon the subject.)

SYMPHOSIUS, CAELIUS FIRMIANUS. [FIRMIANUS.]

SYNCHELUS, an ecclesiastical title borne by several Byzantine writers. The Syncelus was the \nchosen and confidential companion, commonly the destined successor, of a patriarch. Among the personages who bore this title were Demetrius Syncelus, metropolitan of Cyzicus [Demetrios, literary, No. 17]; Elias Syncelus [Elia-

Metas, No. 9]; Georgius Syncelus the Chronologist, quoted frequently by his title only, "Syncelus." [GEOGRJUS, literary and ecclesiastical, No. 46]; Michael Syncelus of Jerusalem, of whom we subjoin an account, Michael Syncelus of Constantinople, otherwise Michael Monachus [Michael, Byzant-tine writers, No. 9], and Stephanus Syncelus, Metropolitan of Nicomedia, whose treatise, De tzepiic Ainae Divisione was (perhaps is extant in MS. in the original Greek text in the King's Library at Paris. Codd. medix. No. 2, and indiv.

SYNCHELUS or SYNGELUS (MICHAEL), a and ecclesiastical, No. 30), and was printed under the name of the real author, with the grammatical treatise of Alexander Maurocordatos. 8vo. Venice, 1745. 5. Bίοι καὶ πολεμία τῶν δύο πατρῴ ἱερών καὶ ὁμολογία τοῦ Θεοδότου τῶν Στοιχείων γεγραμμένου συγγράφα πρὸς Μιχαὴλ μοναχοῦ. Vitæ et Mores S. Patris nostri et Confessoris Theodori Praepositi Studiarum conscripta a Michaelo Monacho. It is with some hesitation that we class this biography, which is given with a Latin version in the fifth volume of the Opera Varia of the Je-suit Sirmond, among the works of Michael Synelcu-sus. It is elsewhere [MICALAY, Byzantine writers, No. 91] given among the works of Michael, monk and Syneculus of Constantinople, who lived somewhat later than our Michael. The authorship is a question on which critics are divided; the work, however, bears marks of being written by a contemporary of Theodore, which our Michael was, but which the other Michael could hardly be. Several other works of Michael Syneculus, including Carmina varia, are extant in MS. (Fac. Bibl. Graec. vol. vi. pp. 133, 298, 333, 345, 382, vol. x. pp. 199, 220, vol. xii. pp. 186, &c. 203; Bandini, Catalog. Cod. MStor. Am. &c. l.; Itigius, De Biblioth. Patrum; Cave, Hist. Litt. ad ann. 830, vol. ii. p. 19, ed. Oxford, 1740—43; Oudin, Comment. de Scriptorib. Eccles. vol. ii. col. 43, &c.)

SYNESIUS (Συνείσιος), one of the most ele-gant of the ancient Christian writers, was a native of Cyrene, and traced his descent from the Spartan king Eurysthenes. He devoted himself to the study of all branches of Greek literature, first in his own city, and afterwards at Alexandria, where he heard Hypatia; and became celebrated for his skill in eloquence and poetry, as well as in philo-sophy, in which he was a follower of Plato. About A.D. 397, he was sent by his fellow-citizens of Cyrene on an embassy to Constantinople, to present the emperor Arcadius with a crown of gold; on which occasion he delivered an oration on the government of a kingdom (περὶ βασιλείας), which is still extant. Soon after this he embraced Christianity, and was baptized by Theophilus, the patriarch of Alexandria, who had such a sense of his merits that, in the year 410, he ordained him as bishop of Ptolemais, the chief city of the Libyan Pentapolis, although Synesius was very unwilling to accept the office, and enforced his nolo episcopi by declaring that he would not put away his wife, that he disbelieved the resurrection of the body, and that in other respects his studies and opinions and pursuits were of a nature not quite consistent with the notions of the strictly orthodox. Theophilus, however, overrode these objections: Synesius was permitted to retain his wife; and he very soon made a public profession of his belief in the resurrection of the body. He presided over his diocese with energy and success for about twenty years. Among his most remarkable acts were the conversion to Christianity of the philosopher Evagrius, and the humiliation of Andronicus, the tyrannical president of Libya, whom he brought, by the combined effect of the terrors of excommunication, and a complaint to the emperor, to supplicate the pardon of the church. The time of his death is not stated; but he cannot have lived beyond A.D. 430 or 431, since in the latter year his younger brother and successor Eupoites appeared at the council of Ephesus as bishop of Ptolemais. His writings have been objects of ad-miration both to ancient and modern scholars, and have obtained for him the surname of Philosopher. Those of them still extant are the following:—

1. Εἰς τὸν αὐτοκτόνον Ἀρκάδων περὶ βασιλείας, the oration already referred to. 2. Δίων, ἕ τις τῆς κατ' έαυτόν διαγωγῆς, Dio, sive de suo ipsius Insti-tuto, a work in which he professes his intention, after the example of Dio Chrysostom, to devote his life to true philosophy. It appears to have been written about A.D. 404, soon after his marriage.

3. Φαλάκρας ἐγκώμιον, Encomium eulogii, a sort of exercise of wit, in which he defends the condition of baldness in opposition to the κώμη ἐγκώμιον of Dio Chrysostom. (See Tzet., Chil. xi. 725.) The work of Chrysostom is now lost.

4. Αλεξάνδρης ἕ τις περὶ προμαχίων, ιερατικαὶ σιταὶ de Proveneria, in two books, in which he gives an allegorical de-scription of the evils of the time, under the guise of the fable of Osiris and Typhon. 5. Περὶ ἐπιμωνῶν, De Insomniosis, on Dreams, a work which Cave and others have supposed, from internal evidence, to have been written before he became a Christian.

6. Ἔμπειταλά, a collection of 156 (not 155) Letters, which form by far the most interesting portion of his extant works. 7. Οὐμαλία, a short discourse on Psalm lxvv. 8. Οὐμαλία, another short dis-course on the Eve of the Nativity of Christ. 9. Κατάστασις ρήσεως ἐπὶ τῆς μεγίστης τῶν Ῥωμαίων ἐφόδου, ἡγεμονευόντος Εὐσταθίου καὶ Δουκίου ὅτος Ἡρωκράτους, an oration describing the calamities suffered by the Pentapolis from the great incursion of the barbarians in A.D. 412. 10. Κατάστασις, an oration in praise of Aysius, the prefect of Libya.

11. Πρὸς Παιδίων ὑπὲρ τῶν διαθέματος, ὑπὲρ τῶν Ἀστραλοβοίκων εὐθυμίας, a ten lines long; which appear to have been only a small portion of his poetical compositions. The Greek Anthology contains three epigrams ascribed to him, two of which consist each of a single hexameter verse (Brum, Am. vol. ii. p. 449; Jacobs, Anth. Græc. vol. iii. p. 155, vol. xii. p. 956), and he himself refers to tragedies and comedies of his own composition. (Dion, p. 62, c.; Wecker, die Griech. Tragöid. p. 1323.)

A few other writers of this name, none of whom deserve special notice, are mentioned by Fabricius (i.e. p. 294). In the Greek Anthology, besides the epigrams of the celebrated Synesius, there is one, on a statue of Hippocrates, ascribed to a cer-tain Synesius Scholasticus, who appears to have flourished shortly before the destruction of Berytos by an earthquake in A.D. 551. (Brum, Am. Græc. vol. iii. p. 11; Jacobs, Anth. Græc. vol. iii. p. 232, vol. xiii. p. 956.)

SYNESIUS (Συνέσιος). Under this name a short Greek treatise on Fevers was published in 1749, 8vo. Amstel. et Lugd. Bat., with the title, «συνεσίους de Febris, quem nunc primum ex Codice MS. Bibliothecae Lugduno-Batavæ eadid, SYNESIUS.

verit, Notisque illustravit Jo. Steph. Bernard. Accedit Viatici Constantino Africano interp. lib. vii. pars." The medical contents of this little work do not require any particular notice here. It is probably the earliest Greek medical work containing a distinct account of the Small Pox and Measles (c. 9, p. 368, Πέρι τῆς φλεκταιρίας λαμπητικῆς, καὶ τῆς ἐπίρροης λαμπητικῆς), and the author's description of these diseases and his directions respecting their treatment, agree upon the whole very nearly with those given by Rhazes. [RHazes.] There are several questions respecting the date and authorship of this work which have never hitherto been completely and satisfactorily settled, and which therefore require to be discussed here. Bernard published the work under the name of Synesius, because the author is so called in the Leyden Catalogue (p. 394. § 65), and also at the back of the MS. (Bernard's Pref. p. xviii.), but, as there appears to be no good authority for attributing it to a physician of this name, we must first try to determine who was the author of this Greek fragment,—for the very first lines show that it is not a complete work in itself. There exists in MS. in several European libraries rather a long Greek medical work, divided into seven books, and entitled, Βιβλία λεσχομένα Τόν Ἐρείδα τοῦ Ἀπόστολος Ἰωάννου, ως ἅμα τοῦ τόν Εἵλιδα γενομένη παρὰ Εἰρικοῦ Βρυζίδου τοῦ Ἑραλδέας, metadlambanetai etwv εἰρικός γενομένη πάνω Κωνσταντίου πρωτασσόμενον ἐπὶ ἀρριπόν, a full account of which may be found in Lambecii Catal. Biblioth. Vindob. vi. p. 234 &c. ed. Kollar, and Bandini Catal. Biblioth. Laurent. vol. iii. p. 142. There is a MS. of this work in the Bodleian Library at Oxford (Laud. Gr. 59), which the Writer has had an opportunity of examining, and he finds that the printed work corresponds to the commencement of the seventh book of the MS. He has collated the printed book partially with the MS. from beginning to end, and finds that two of the chapters are transposed, and that the differences of reading are very numerous; but that the substance, and in general the words also, are so exactly the same that there can be no doubt about the identity of the two works, unless (which is just possible,) they should turn out to be two different (but very literal) translations of the same original treatise. It is therefore tolerably certain that the Pseudo-Synesius is, in fact, the writer commonly known by the designation of Constantinus Africanus, of whom it is necessary to say a few words here, as he is not mentioned in the first volume of this work, because all his published works are written in the Latin language, and he himself lived later than the date fixed on for the admission of Roman writers. He was a native of Carthage in the eleventh century, who spent nearly forty years in travelling in different parts of Asia, where he acquired a knowledge of many useful sciences, and also of several Eastern languages. Upon his return to Africa he was forced, apparently by the jealousy of his countrymen, to leave once more his native land, and settled in Calabria, where he was taken into the service of the Duke Robert Guiscard, and whence he sometimes called in Greek MSS. Κωνστ. α' Ἑρικίου. Hence also his title of Πρωτοσάκηρτης or Πρωτοσακρήτης, that is, Protosecretarius, a word whose meaning may be found in the glossaries of Du Cange and Meurinus, and which, in the case of Constantinus, has occasioned his being sometimes called (by a curious series of errors) "Asyntritus" and "Asynkytus." (See Lambec. loco cit. p. 295.) At last he became a monk in the Monastery of Cassinis, A.D. 1072, where he employed part of his time in writing and translating various medical works, and where he died at a great age, A.D. 1087. It is not necessary to mention here all his numerous works, a list of which may be found in Fabricius, Bibli. Gr. vol. xii. p. 124, ed. vet., and in Choulandi's Haandb. der Biecherkunde für die ältere Medicin. They were collected and published in 2 vols. fol. Basil. 1536, 1539. The only one of his writings with which we are at present concerned is that which consists of seven books, and is entitled, "De omnium Morborum, qui Homini accedit possunt, Cognitione et Curatione," or in some other editions simply "Viatium." This work is the same as the Ερείδα τοῦ Απόστολος Ἰωάννου mentioned above, and consequently contains (at the beginning of the seventh book) the Pseudo-Synesius "De Febribus." It appears also that Constantinus is the author of both works, or, in other words, that he translated the original work into both Greek and Latin. The Latin work indeed (at least as we now possess it,) does not profess to be merely a translation, and this circumstance, added to a similar omission in the case of one of his other works, has exposed Constantinus to the charge of plagiarism and dishonesty,—but whether the accusation be altogether well-founded or not, the Writer is unable to decide, as he has never had occasion to examine the other work alluded to with sufficient minuteness to enable him to form an opinion on the subject. (See Russell's Nat. Hist. of Aleppo, Append. p. xii. &c.) It only remains to determine the name and author of the original work; for, even if we had not the title of the Greek MSS. to aid us, it would be sufficiently evident from the inspection of the Pseudo-Synesius that the fragment is translated from the work of some oriental author; the writer not only making constant mention of the natural productions of Eastern countries, but also having preserved two Arabic words in Greek characters. The name of the writer so strangely metamorphosed in the titles of the Greek MSS. of Constantinus is Aby Ja'far Ahmad Ibn Ibrahim Ibn Abi Chaled, who is also called Ibnul-jezzar.

Constantinus never gives his author's complete name, but calls him sometimes Aby Ja'far Ibnul-jezzar, sometimes Ahmad Ibn Ibrahim Ibn Abi Chaled; which has led Lambecius and Bandini, in their excellent catalogues, to state that the original work "partim ab Epro filio Zaphar nepote Elgezar,

* As some difference of opinion has existed respecting one of these words, it may be stated that berexis (p. 70) should be written berexis, that is, berinuthallath; see Avicenna, Canon, i. 2. § 7 (vol. i. p. 38, 1, ult. ed. Arab.). The other word, almuveleva (p. 120), should of course be written almuveleva, that is, almuveleva; see Avicenna, ii. 2. 436 (vol. i. p. 290 l. 41, ed. Arab.).
partim autem ab Achmede filio Abrami, nepote Chalaei mediici, primum huius compositionem. Inhnu-l-Jezzar was a pupil of Ishak Ibn Soleiman Al-Israili (commonly called Isaac Judaeus), and lived at Kairawan in Africa. He died at a great age, A.D. 935 (A.D. 1004). He was a man of considerable eminence, and wrote several works on medicine, metaphysics, history &c., some of which are extant in MS. in different European libraries. The only one of these with which we are here concerned is entitled Zad al-masā'ir. Zādā-l-Muṣāfer, "Vitaeum Peregrinantium," and consists of seven books. There is an incomplete Arabic MS. of this work in the Bodleian Library at Oxford (Hunt. 302), which the Writer has examined partially throughout, more especially the part corresponding with the Pseudo-Syrius; and he finds (as Reiske had done before him,) that it agrees (upon the whole) very exactly with the Greek and Latin translations mentioned above. A more minute examination of the Arabic, Greek, and Latin texts will probably enable some future editor to give some further information respecting the two translations: the Writer can only say of the conjecture that the Latin version was made from the Greek rather than from the original Arabic, that it appears to him to be wholly without foundation, insomuch as the Latin translation in some places agrees more closely with the Arabic text than with the Greek. Inhnu-l-Jezzar's work was also translated into Hebrew by Rabbi Moshe Ben Tibbon (Uri, Catal. MSS. Heb. Bibl. Bodl. § 413), and thus enjoys the singular honour of having been translated into no less than three languages during the middle ages. (For further information see Bernard's Preface to Syrius; Nicoll and Pusey's Catal. MSS. Arab. Bibl. Bodl. p. 587; Wustenfeld, Gesch. der Arab. Aerzte und Naturforscher, § 120; Choulant, Handb. der Bücherkunde für die Aeltere Medicin, §§ 46, 70, 80.)

SYNNOON (Συννόον), statuary. [Aristoc.-Cels.]

SYNTIPAS, a Persian sage, to whom are attributed two works of which we possess Greek translations, which bear the name of Michael Andreopolus. One of these works is a romance, or collection of stories, very much on the plan of the Thousand and One Nights. By an Arabic author, however, the work is ascribed to one Sendedab, the head of the philosophers of India, who lived somewhere about 100 years before Christ, and wrote a work entitled "The Book of the Seven Counsellors, the Teacher and the Mother of the King." This work was translated into Persian, Arabic, Hebrew, and Syriac, and it is from this last translation that the Greek translation was made. The Greek translation seems to belong to about the eleventh century. It appears not unlikely that this work became known to Europe through the crusades. In the form in which we at present possess it, the work has been re-modulated to Christian ideas. The Greek text was published by Boissoneaud (De Syniptais et Coryis Filio Andreopolis Narratio, Paris, 1823).

The other work attributed to Syniptas, and, like the former, translated into Greek from the Syriac, is a collection of fables (παραστηγματος λόγοι). An edition of this work was published by F. Matthaei at Leipzig, in 1781. (Schiöfl, Gesch. der Grisch. Litteratur, vol. iii. p. 429, &c.) [C.P.M.]

SYNTROPHUS, P. RUTILiUS, is designated Marmorarius in an extant inscription, found at Cadiz, which records the accomplishment of a vow which he had made to erect in the temple of Minerva a Theostasis decorated with marbles, wrought by his own hand (Muratori, Thes. vol. i. p. cxxv. 2; Orelli, Inscrip. Lat. Sch. No. 2507). It is doubtful whether the word Marmorarius signifies a sculptor, or a common worker in marble. Roaul-Rochette quotes a passage from Seneca (Epist. 80), in which it appears to have the former sense; and, of course, if such be its meaning in this inscription, the name of Syntrophus must be added to the lists of ancient artists. (R. Rochette, Lettre à M. Schorn, pp. 411, 412, 2d ed.) [P.S.]

SYPHAX (Σύφαξ), a Numidian prince, frequently called king of Numidia, but properly, or at least originally, only king of the Massaeasians, the westernmost tribe of the Numidians. (Polyb. xvi. 23; Liv. xxvii. 17.) The period of his accession is unknown, nor do we learn anything of the relations in which he had stood towards the Carthaginians, whether as an ally or an enemy, until we find him engaged in hostilities with the Romans in 218, when this circumstance, together with the successes of the Roman army in Spain at that juncture, induced the two Scipios to enter into friendly relations with him; they accordingly sent three officers as envoys to him, with promises of assistance from Rome if he persevered in his hostility to their common enemy; and one of these legates, Q. Statius, even remained in Numidia to instruct him in the art of war. Under his direction Syphax levied a regular army, with which he was able to meet the Carthaginians in the field, and defeat them in a pitched battle. Hereupon they recalled Hasdrubal from Spain to take the command against him, at the same time that they concluded an alliance with Gaia, king of the Massignians, who sent his whole forces, under the command of his son Masinissa, to the support of the Carthaginians. Syphax was unable to contend with their united strength; he was totally defeated in a great battle in which 30,000 men are said to have fallen, and compelled to take refuge in Mauritania. Here he soon gathered a fresh force around him, but was pursued and again defeated by Masinissa. (Liv. xxiv. 48, 49; Appian. Hisp. 15, 16.) Of his subsequent fortunes we know nothing for some time; but he appears to have concluded a treaty of peace with Carthage, by which he apparently regained possession of his dominions. In b.c. 210, we find him renewing his overtures to the Romans, and recounting his successes over the Carthaginians (Liv. xxvii. 4), with whom he appears to have been at that time again at war; but in b.c. 206 he was once more on peaceful, and even friendly terms with the same people. At that time, however, the successes of the young Scipio in Spain led him to cast his eyes towards Africa also, and he sent his friend Lælius an embassy to Syphax, in the hope of detaching him from the Carthaginian alliance. The Numidian king lent a favourable ear to his overtures, but refused to treat with any one but the Roman general in person. Hereupon Scipio boldly ventured over to Africa, where he was received by Syphax in the most friendly manner, although he accidentally arrived at the same time with the Carthaginian general Hasdrubal, the son of Gisco. The personal influence of Scipio for a time obtained the ascendency, and Syphax was induced to enter into friendly relations with Rome, though it is doubtful whether (as asserted by Livy) he concluded any definite treaty; at least, it appears to have been shortly after gained over by Hasdrubal to the opposite cause. To this result the charms of Sophonisba, the beautiful daughter of Hasdrubal, whom he offered in marriage to the Numidian king, are said to have powerfully contributed; Syphax accepted the proffered alliance, and became from this time a staunch friend to the Carthaginians. (Liv. xxviii. 17, 18, xxix. 23; Polyb. xiv. 1, 7; Appian. Hist. 29, 30, Pan. 10; Zonar. ix. 10, 11.)

Meanwhile another opening had presented itself to his ambition. After the death of Gala, the Massylian kingdom had been a prey to civil dissensions, in which, however, Syphax at first took little part; and though he lent some assistance to Lacunaces and his pupil Mezentius, he did not succeed in preventing his old enemy Masinissa from establishing himself on his father's throne. Masinissa. He was even disposed, we are told, to acquiesce altogether in the domination of his rival, had not the representations of Hasdrubal warned him of the danger of such a course. But he yielded to the suggestions of the Carthaginian general, and assembled a large army, with which he invaded the territories of Masinissa, defeated him in a pitched battle, and made himself master of his whole kingdom. The Massylian king was thenceforth compelled to restrict himself to a predatory warfare, in the course of which he obtained various advantages, and at one time compelled Syphax himself (in conjunction with his son Vermina) once more to take the field against him. Though again defeated, he was still able to maintain himself at the head of a small force until the landing of Scipio in Africa, b. c. 204. (Liv. xxix. 29—33; Appian. Pan. 10—12.)

On that event Syphax, who had already sent an embassy to Scipio in Sicily to warn him against taking such a step, did not hesitate to support the Carthaginians, and joined Hasdrubal with an army of 50,000 foot and 10,000 horse. But his desire was not so much for the decided victory of either of the two parties, as to become the means of mediating a peace between them, which he hoped to effect on condition of the Romans withdrawing their troops from Africa, in return for the evacuation of Italy by Hannibal. He in consequence took advantage of the long protracted operations of the siege of Utica, during which his own army and that of Hasdrubal were encamped in the immediate neighbourhood of Scipio, to open negotiations with the Roman general. These were protracted throughout the whole winter; but Scipio, while he pretended to lend a willing ear to the overtures of the Numidian king, secretly entertained wholly different designs, and early in the spring of b. c. 203, having abruptly broken off the treaty, he suddenly attacked the camp of Syphax in the night, and set fire to the straw huts under which his soldiers were sheltered. The Numidians were taken completely by surprise, and their whole army perished in the conflagration, or was put to the sword in the confusion that ensued. The Carthaginian camp shared the same fate. (Polyb. xiv. 1—5; Liv. xxx. 3—7; Appian. Pan. 13, 14, 17—22; Zonar. ix. 12.) Syphax himself, with a few fugitives, made his escape to Numidia, where he again began to collect troops; but disheartened at this great disaster, he was unwilling again to take the field, and was with difficulty induced, by the united entreaties of Hasdrubal and Sophonisba, to try his fortune once more. Having at length assembled a fresh army, he again joined his forces with those of Hasdrubal, but they were once more totally defeated by Scipio, and Syphax fled for refuge to his hereditary dominions among the Masaesylians, leaving Laelius and Masinissa to recover, without opposition, the kingdom of the latter. But while his enemies were thus employed, he contrived to assemble for the third time a large army, with which he met the invaders on their advance to Cirta. An obstinate contest ensued, but the army of Syphax was at length totally routed, and the king himself fell into the hands of the Romans, who immediately sent him as a prisoner to Scipio. Meanwhile his capital city of Cirta was occupied by Masinissa. (Polyb. xiv. 9—9; Liv. xxx. 7—9, 11, 12; Appian. Pan. 26, 27; Zonar. ix. 13.)

Scipio treated his royal prisoner with distinction, for the purpose of enhancing his own victory, but immediately returned him (together with one of his sons who had been taken prisoner at the same time), under the charge of Laelius, to Rome. Here he was ordered by the senate to be imprisoned at Alba, for safe custody, where he remained until the return of Scipio, after the close of the war. Polybius states expressly that he was one of the captives who adorned the triumph of the conqueror upon that occasion, and that he died in confinement shortly after. Livy, on the contrary, asserts that he was saved from that ignominy by a timely death at Tibur, whither he had been transferred from Alba. (Polyb. xvi. 23; Liv. xxx. 13, 16, 17, 43; App. Pan. 27, 28.) The statement of Polybius, as well as the fact that his death occurred at Tibur, are confirmed by an inscription preserved in the Vatican, the authenticity of which is, however, very doubtful. (See Niebuhr's Lect. on Rom. Hist. vol. i. p. 218; Schmitz; Burton's Description of Rome, vol. ii. p. 312.)

If we may trust the same authority he was 48 years old at the time of his death. [E. H. B.]

SYRIA DEA (Συρία δέα), "the Syrian goddess," a name by which the Syrian Astarte or Aphrodite is sometimes designated. This Astarte was a Syrian divinity, resembling in many points the Greek Aphrodite, and it is not improbable that the latter was originally the Syrian Astarte, the opinions concerning whom were modified after her introduction into Greece; for there can be no doubt that the worship of Aphrodite came from the East to Cyprus, and thence was carried into the south of Greece. (Lucian, De Syria Dea; Paus. i. 14, § 6; Aeschyl. Suppl. 562.)

SYRIACUS, val. ill. 1, a friend of Asinius Gallus, unjustly slain by Tiberius. He is frequently mentioned by the elder Seneque as a distinguished rhetorician. (Dion Cass. lviii. 3; Senec. Controv. i. 9, 14, 21, 27.)

SYRIANUS (Συριανός), a Greek philosopher of the Neo-Platonic school, was a native of Alexandria, and the son of Philoxenus. We know little of his personal history, but that he came to Athens, and studied with great zeal under Plutarchus, the head of the Neo-Platonic school, who regarded him with great admiration and affection, and appointed him as his successor. The most distinguished of his disciples was Proclus, who regarded him with the greatest veneration, and gave directions that at his death he should be buried in the same tomb with Syrianus. Suidas attributes to Syrianus the following writings:—1. Εἰς ὅπερν ὑπὸν ὑπεmνυμα, in 7 books. 2. Εἰς τὴν Πολειτικὴν Πάλμω-ρος, in 4 books. 3. Εἰς τὴν Ὀρφεὺς Θεολογίαν, in 2 books. 4. Εἰς τὰ Ἀκολούθία των παρ᾿ Ὀμήρῳ Θεόν. 5. Συμφωνών Ὀρφεῶς Πολειτικῆν καὶ Πάλμων. 6. Περὶ τὸ λέγειν, in 10 books. 7. Various other works of an exegetical character. There is, however, a good deal of difficulty about this list. The very same series of works is assigned by Suidas himself to Proclus (s. v. Προκλ.), and we can hardly suppose that Syrianus wrote a commentary on a work of his successor, as Suidas states. On the other hand, Suidas makes no mention of works which we find Syrianus stated by other authorities to have written, or even of works by him which are still extant. No reliance whatever, therefore, can be placed on the list of Suidas. Syrianus wrote commentaries on various parts of Aristotle's writings. 1. On the book De Caudo. (Fabr. Bibliogr. iii. p. 230.) 2. On the book De Interpretes. (Ib. 213.) 3. A Commentary on the Metaphysics is still extant. The Latin translation of the third, fourth, and seventh books by Hiero Bucarelli has been published (Venet. 1558), and various portions of the Greek text are printed in the Scholia on Aristotle, edited by Brandis. From various references in the commentary of Proclus on the Timaeus of Plato, we learn that Syrianus also wrote a commentary on the same book, as well as συμφωνία γραμματικα, answering to the work of the same kind mentioned in the list of Suidas.

Theodorus Meliteniotes, in his Prooemium in Astronomiae (printed in Fabricius, Bibliog. vol. x. pp. 401, &c.), mentions commentaries on the Magna Syntaxis of Ptolemaeus, by the philosopher Syrianus (l. c. 406). There is also extant a treatise by Syrianus on ideas (Συμφωνία εἰς τὸ περὶ ἑδεων) published by Leonh. Spengel (Συμφωνῖ ιπτερν, pp. 193—200), and a commentary on the Στροκεία of Hermogenes, published in Greek in 1812 by Alida (Rheotorum, vol. ii.) and in 1833 by Valet (Rhetor. Grec. de Philo). These most valuable remains that we possess, however, are the commentaries on the Metaphysics of Aristotle. In explaining the propositions of Aristotle, he appends the views held by his school on the subject in hand, and endeavours to establish the latter against the former. One of his fundamental principles is, that it is a proposition of general applicability, that the same cannot be both affirmed and denied at the same time of the same thing; but that in any sense involving the truth of either the affirmation or the denial of a proposition, it applies only to existing things, but not to that which transcends speech and knowledge, for this admits neither of affirmation nor of denial, since every assertion respecting it must be false. (In Met. ii. fol. 13, b.) On the whole, the doctrines laid down in this work are those of the Neo-Platonic school generally. (Fabric. Bibliogr. x. p. 356, &c.; Ritter, Greek der Philo, vol. iii. p. 367.) [C. P. M.]

SYRINX, an Arcadian nymph, who being pursued by Pan, fled into the river Ladon, and at her own request was metamorphosed into a reed, of which Pan then made his flute. (Or. Met. i. 690, &c.; comp. Voss. ad Virg. Ecl. p. 55.) [L. S.]

SYRMYUS (Σύρμυος), a king of the Triballians, who, as soon as he was aware of the intention of Alexander the Great to invade his territory, in b. c. 333, sent all the women and children of his nation to an island of the Dnunbe, called Peru, and afterwards, on the nearer approach of the Macedonians, took refuge there himself, with his personal followers. Although having made an unsuccessful attempt to effect a landing on the island, crossed the river and attacked the Gets, whom he defeated; and on his return Syrus sent ambassadors to sue for peace, which was granted. Plutarch says that Syrus was conquered by Alexander in a great battle, a statement which would contradict the account of Arrian, as given above, if we were to understand it of a personal defeat (Arr. Anat. i. 2—4; Plut. Alex. 11; Strab. vii. p. 301). [E. E.]

SYRUS, a slave brought to Rome some years before the downfall of the republic, and designated, according to the usual practice from the country of his birth. He attracted attention while yet a youth, by his accomplishment and wit, was manu-mitten, in consequence of his pleasing talents, by his master, who probably belonged to the Clodia gens, assumed the name of Publius, from his patron, and his work became highly celebrated as a mimo-grapher. At the splendid games exhibited by Caesar in b. c. 45, he invited all the dramatists of the day to contend with him in extempore nervous effusions upon any given theme, and no one having declined the challenge, the foreign freedman bore away the palm from all competitors, including Laberius himself, who was taunted with this defeat by the dictator:—

"Favente tibi me victus est, Laberi, a Syro."

Publius is frequently mentioned with praise and repeatedly quoted by ancient writers, especially by the Senecas, by A. Gellius, and by Macrobius. Hence we conclude that his mimes must have been committed to writing, and extensively circulated at an early period; and a collection of pithy moral sayings extracted from his works appears to have been used as a school-book in the boyhood of Hieronymus. A description of this compilation, extending to upwards of a thousand lines in iambic and Trochaic measures, every anaphora being comprised in a single line, and the whole ranged alphabetically, according to the initial letter of the first word in each, is now extant under the title Publii Syri Sententiae. These proverbs, many of which exhibit much grace, both of thought and expression, have been drawn from various sources, and are evidently the work of many different hands; but a considerable number may with considerable confidence be ascribed to Syrus and his contemporaries. In addition, a fragment upon luxury, extending to ten iambic verses, has been preserved by Petru-nus (c. 55.).

A portion of the Sententiae was first published by Erasmus, from a Cambridge MS., in a volume containing also the distichs of Catu, and other opus-cules of a like character (4to, Argent. 1516); the number was increased by Fabricius in his Syntagmus Sententiarum (Bv. Lips., 1536, 1560), and still further extended of the collections of Gruterus (Bv. 1604), of Vischerus (Bv. Ingolst. 1608), and of Havercamp (Bv. Lug. Bat. 1708, 1727). The best editions are those of Orellius (Bv. Lips. 1822) and of Botlie, in his Poetarum Latin. Scien-corum Fragmenta, vol. ii. p. 219 (Bv. Lips. 1834), to which we may add a second impression, with improvements, by Orellius, appended to his Phaedrus (8vo. Turic. 1829).

TACITUS (Tākîtus), a Persian, whom Cyrus, after he had taken Sardis, left there in command of the garrison. Here Tabalus was soon after besieged by the rebel Parthians, but was delivered by Mazeraz (Hierod. i. 153, &c.) [Mazeraz; Pactyas.]

TUBUS (Tōbūs), a hero in Lydia, from whom the town of Tabae in Lydia was believed to have derived its name. (Steph. Byz. s. e. Tābāūs.) [LS]

TACFARINAS, a Numidian, who gave some trouble to the Romans in the reign of Tiberius. He had originally served among the auxiliary troops in the Roman army, but he deserted; and, having collected a body of freebooters, among whom he gradually introduced the Roman discipline, he became at length the acknowledged leader of the Musulamii, a powerful people in the interior of Numidia, bordering on Mauritania. Having been joined by the Mamures under the command of Mazippa, he ventured, in a. d. 18, to measure his strength with Furius Camillus, the proconsul of Africa, but was defeated with considerable loss. In a. d. 20 Tacfarinas again attacked the Roman province. To carry his devastations far and wide, and defeated a Roman cohort which was stationed not far from the river Pagysa (perhaps the modern Aetaabu), but, after meeting with considerable success, he was defeated in his turn by Apronius, who had succeeded Camillus, and was compelled to retire into the deserts. Nothing daunted by these defeats, Tacfarinas found means to collect a fresh army, and in a. d. 22 had the impudence to send ambassadors to Tiberius, soliciting abodes for himself and his troops, and menacing the emperor, in case of refusal, with perpetual war. Tiberius was indignant at receiving such a message from a deserter and a robber, and gave strict injunctions to Junius Blaesus, who had been appointed governor of Africa, to use every effort to obtain possession of the person of Tacfarinas. In this, however, Blaesus was unable to succeed, for although he defeated Tacfarinas, and took his brother prisoner, Tacfarinas himself succeeded in making his escape. At length, in a. d. 24, the Romans were delivered from this troublesome foe. In this year Tacfarinas, having again collected a large force, attacked the Roman province, but P. Dolabella, more fortunate than his predecessors in the government, not only defeated but slew Tacfarinas in battle. Dolabella was assisted in this campaign by Ptolemaeus, king of Mauritania, the son and successor of Juba II., who was rewarded by Tiberius, after the ancient fashion, with the presents of a toga picta and sceptre, as a sign of the friendship of the Roman people. (Tac. Ann. ii. 52, iii. 20, 21, 75, 74, iv. 24, 25.)

TACHOS (Taχōs), king of Egypt, succeeded Acoris, and maintained the independence of his country for a short time during the latter end of the reign of Artaxerxes II. When the formidable revolt which was afterwards raised in n. c. 362, by the treachery of Orontes, the satrap of Mysia [Orontes, No. 3], Tachos feared that he might have to resist the whole power of the Persian empire, and he therefore resolved to obtain the aid of Greek mercenaries. He prevailed upon Chabrias, the Athenian, to take the command of his fleet, and sent an embassy to Sparta, soliciting Agesilaus to undertake the supreme command of all his forces. The Spartan government gave their consent, and Agesilaus readily complied with the request; for, although he was now upwards of eighty, his vigour of mind and body remained unimpaired, and he was anxious to escape from the control to which a Spartan king was subject at home. Upon his arrival in Egypt, Agesilaus was greatly disappointed in having only the command of the mercenaries entrusted to him, Tachos reserving to himself the supreme command of all his forces, both by sea and land. Nevertheless he submitted to this arrangement, and accompanied the Egyptian monarch into Syria, in n. c. 361, along with Chabrias, and, according to Plutarch, endured for some time in patience the insolence and arrogance of Tachos. Meanwhile Nectamnias, probably the nephew of Tachos, and a certain Mendesian, disputed with Tachos for the crown. Agesilaus forthwith espoused the cause of Nectamnias; and Tachos, thus deserted by his own subjects as well as by his mercenaries, took refuge in Sidon, and from thence fled to the Persian monarch, by whom he was favourably received, and at whose court he died. By the help of Agesilaus, Nectamnias defeated the other competitor, who had collected a large army, and became firmly established on the throne. This is the account of Xenophon and Plutarch, and is in accordance with incidental notices in other writers. The statement of Dio Diodorus, that Tachos returned from Persia, and was again placed upon the throne by Agesilaus, is undoubtedly an error. (Diod. xv. 92, 93; Xen. Ages. ii. §§ 28—31; Plut. Ages. 36—40; Corn. Nep. Chab. 2, 3, Ages. 8; Polyena. ii. 1 § 22; Ath. xiv. p. 616, d, e; Aelian, V. H. v. 1.)

TACITA, "the silent," one of the Camenae, whose worship was believed to have been introduced at Rome by Numa. He is, moreover, said to have particularly recommended the worship of Tactia, as the most important among the Camenae. (Plut. Numa, 6.) [LS]

TACITUS, M. CLAUDIUS, Roman emperor from the 17th September, a. d. 275, until April, a. d. 276. After the death of Aurelian, the army in Thrace, filled with remorse on account of their fatal mistake [Aurelianus], and eager to testify their penitence, instead of proclaiming a new emperor with tumultuous haste, despatched a submissiue letter to the senate, requesting that assembly to nominate out of their own body a successor to the vacant throne, and pledging themselves to ratify the choice. The senate at first received this most unlooked-for communication with mingled surprise and distrust, and, fearing to take advantage of what might prove a very transient ebullition of feeling, courteously declined to accede to the proposal. At the same time, expressing their full confidence in the discretion of the soldiers, they referred the election to the voice of the legions. The troops, however, again urged the fathers to yield to their wishes; and although again met with the same reply, still persisted in their original solicitation. This extraordinary contest continued for upwards of six months, "an amazing period," says Gibbon, "of tranquil anarchy, during which the Roman world remained without a sovereign, without an usurper, and without sedition."

Such a state of things could not however long endure. The barbarians on the frontiers, who had been quelled and daunted by the skill and daring valour of Aurelian, were not slow to take advantage of the opportunity presented by this strange position of public affairs. The Germans had already crossed the Rhine: Persia, Syria, Africa, Illyria and Egypt were in commotion; when the senate, at length convinced that the soldiers were sincere, joyfully prepared to discharge a duty so unexpectedly devolved upon them. At a meeting convoked on the 25th of September, A.D. 275, by the consul Velius Corfinius Gordianus, all with one voice declared that no one could be found so worthy of the throne as M. Claudius Tacitus, an aged consular, a native of Interamna (Vopisc. Florian. 2), who claimed descent from the great historian whose name he bore, who was celebrated for his devotion to literature, for his vast wealth, for his pure and upright character, and who stood first on the roll. The real or feigned earnestness with which he declined the proffered honour, on account of his advanced age and infirmities, was encountered by the reiterated acclamations of his brethren, who overpowered him with arguments and precedents, until at length, yielding to their importunate zeal, he consented to proceed to the Campus Martius, and there received the greetings of the people, and the praetorians assembled to do homage to their new ruler. Quitting the city, he repaired to the great army still quartered in Thrace, by whom, on their being promised the arrears of pay and the customary donative, he was favourably received. One of his first acts was to seek out and put to death all who had been concerned in the murder of his predecessor, whose character he held in high honour, commanding statues of gold and silver to be erected to his memory in the most frequented thoroughfares of the metropolis. He likewise directed his attention to the improvement of public morals by the enactment of various sumptuary laws regulating the amusements, luxurious indulgences, and dress of the citizens, he himself setting an example to all around, by the abstemiousness, simplicity, and frugality of his own habits. His great object was to revive the authority of the senate, which now for a brief period asserted and maintained a semblance of its ancient dignity, and the private letters preserved by Vopiscus (Florian. 6) exhibit an amusing picture of the sacrifices and banquets by which the senators manifested their exultation at the prospect opening up before them of a complete restoration of their ancient privileges.

The only military achievement of this reign was the defeat and expulsion from Asia Minor of a party of Goths, natives of the shores of the sea of Asop, who having been invited by Aurelian to cooperate in his meditated invasion of the East, and having been disappointed of their promised reward by the death of that prince, had turned their arms against the peaceful provinces on the southern coasts of the Euxine, and had carried their devastations across the peninsula to the confines of Cilicia.

But the advanced years and falling strength of Tacitus were unable any longer to support the cares and toils so suddenly imposed upon him, and his anxieties were still further increased by the mutinous spirit of the army, which soon ceased to respect a leader whose bodily and mental energies were fast hurrying to decay. After a short struggle, he sunk under the attack of a fever, either at Tarsus or at Tyana, about the 9th of April, A.D. 276; according to Victor, exactly two hundred days after his accession. By one account, he fell a victim to the anger of the soldiers; but the weight of evidence tends to prove that they were not the direct instruments, at least, of his destruction.

Our best authority is the biography of Vopiscus, who, if not actually an eyewitness of what he recounts, had an opportunity of consulting the rich collection of state papers stored up in the Ulpin Library; and from these he gives several remarkable extracts. He refers also to a more complete life of Tacitus by a certain Suetonius Optatianus, but of this no fragment remains. See likewise Eutrop. ix. 10; Aurel. Vict. de Caes. xxxvi. Epit. xxxvi.; Zonar. xii. 28, who says that he was seventy-five years old, and in Campania, when proclaimed emperor.

COIN OF M. CLAUDIUS TACITUS.

TACITUS, C. CORNELIUS, the historian. The time and place of the birth of Tacitus are unknown. He was nearly of the same age as the younger Plinius (Plin. Ep. vii. 20) who was born about A.D. 61 [C. PLINII C. BARCILIUS SECUNDUS], but a little older. His gentle name is not sufficient evidence that he belonged to the Cornelia gens; nor is there proof of his having been born at Interamna (Terni), as it is sometimes affirmed. Some facts relative to his biography may be collected from his own writings and from the letters of his friend, the younger Plinius.

 Cornelius Tacitus, a Roman eques, is mentioned by Pliny (H. N. vii. 16, note, ed. Hardouin) as a procurator in Gallia Belgica. Plinius died A.D. 79, and the procurator cannot have been the historian; but he may have been his father. In an inscription of doubtful authority he is named Cornelius Verus Tacitus. Tacitus was first promoted by the emperor Vespasian (Hist. i. 1), and he received other favours from his sons Titus and Domitian. C. Julius Agricola, who was consul A.D. 77, betrothed his daughter to Tacitus in that year, but the marriage did not take place until the following year. In the reign of Domitian, and in A.D. 88, Tacitus was praetor, and he assisted as one of the quindecemviri at the solemnity of the Ludi Secuanae which were celebrated in that year, Agricola died at Rome A. D. 93, but neither Tacitus nor the daughter of Agricola was then with him. It is not known where Tacitus was during the last illness of Agricola, for the assumption that he ever visited either Britain or Germany cannot be proved. He appears to say that he was himself a witness of some of the atrocities of Domitian (Agricola, c. 45). In the reign of Nerva, A. D. 97, Tacitus was appointed consul suffectus, in the place of T. Virginiaus Rufus, who had died in that year. Tacitus pronounced the funeral oration of Rufus, "and it was," says Plinius, "the completion of the felicity of Rufus to have his panegyric pronounced by so eloquent a man." (Plin. Ep. ii. 1) Tacitus had attained oratorical distinction when Plinius was commencing his career. He and Tacitus were appointed in the reign of Nerva (A. D. 99) to conduct the prosecution of Marius, proconsul of Africa, who had grossly misconducted himself in his province. Salvius Liberalis, a man of great acuteness and eloquence, was one of the advocates of Marius. Tacitus made a most eloquent and dignified reply to Liberalis.

Tacitus and Plinius were most intimate friends. In the collection of the letters of Plinius, there are eleven letters addressed to Tacitus. In a letter to his friend Maximus (ix. 29), Plinius shows that he considered his friendship with Tacitus a great distinction, and he tells the following anecdote:

On one occasion, when Tacitus was a spectator at the Ludi Circenses, he fell into conversation with a Roman equus, who, after they had discourse on various literary subjects for some time, asked Tacitus if he was an Italian or a provincial; to which Tacitus replied, "You are acquainted with me, and by my pursuits." "Are you," rejoined the stranger, "Tacitus or Plinius?" The sixteenth letter of the sixth book, in which Plinius describes the great eruption of Vesuvius and the death of his uncle, is addressed to Tacitus; and for the purpose of enabling him to state the facts in his historical writings. Among other contemporaries of Tacitus were Quintillian, Julius Florus, Maternus, M. Aper, and Vipsanius Messala.

The time of the death of Tacitus is unknown, but we may perhaps infer that he survived Trajan, who died A. D. 117. (Hist. i. 1.) Nothing is recorded of any children of his, though the emperor Trajan claimed a descent from the historian, and ordered his works to be placed in all (public) libraries; and ten copies to be made every year at the public expense, and deposited in the Archæa. (Vopiscus, Tacitus Imp. c. 10.) Sidonius Apollinaris mentions the historian as an ancestor of Polienius, who was a prefect of Gaul in the fifth century.

The extant works of Tacitus are, the Life of Julius Agricola, a treatise on the Germans, Annals, Histories, and a Dialogue on the Causes of the Decline of Eloquence. It is not certain if Tacitus left any orations: no fragments are extant. (Meyer, Ora- torum Roman. Praem. p. 694, 28 ed.)

The life of Agricola was written after the death of Domitian A. D. 96, as we may probably conclude from the introduction, which was certainly written after Trajan's accession. This life is justly admired as a specimen of biography, though it is sometimes very obscure; but this is partly owing to the corruption of the text. It is a monument to the memory of a good man and an able commander and administrator, by an affectionate son-in-law, who has portrayed in his peculiar manner and with many masterly touches, the virtues of one of the most illustrious of the Romans. To Englishmen this life is peculiarly interesting, as Britain was the scene of Agricola's great exploits, who carried the Roman eagles even to the base of the Grampian mountains. It was during his invasion of Caledonia that Britain was first circumnavigated by a Roman fleet. (Agricola, c. 96.) The Agricola is not contained in the recently edition of Tacitus; and it was first edited by Puteolanus.

The Histories were written after the death of Nerva, A. D. 98, and before the Annals. They comprehended the period from the second consulship of Galba, A. D. 68, to the death of Domitian, and the author designed to add the reigns of Nerva and Trajan (Hist. i. 1). The first four books alone are extant in a complete form, and they comprehend only the events of about one year. The fifth book is imperfect, and goes no further than the commencement of the siege of Jerusalem by Titus, and the war of Civilis in Germany. It is not known how many books of the Histories there were, but it must have been a large work, if it was all written on the same scale as the first five books.

The Annals commence with the death of Augustus, A. D. 14, and comprehend the period to the death of Nerva, A. D. 68, a space of four and fifty years. The greater part of the fifth book is lost; and also the seventh, eighth, ninth, tenth, the beginning of the eleventh, and the end of the sixteenth, which is the last book. These lost parts comprised the whole of Caligula's reign, the first five years of Claudius, and the two last of Nero. The imperfections of the Annals and the Histories are probably owing to the few copies which were made during the later empire; for the care of the emperor Tacitus to have them copied seems to imply that without these works might have been forgotten. If they had been as popular as some other works, copies would have been multiplied to satisfy the demand. The first five books of the Annals were found, at the beginning of the sixteenth century, in the Abbey of Corvey in Westphalia, and they were first published at Rome, by Philippus Berolus, in 1515.

The treatise entitled De Moribus et Populis Germaniae treated of the Germanic nations, or of those whom Tacitus comprehended under that name, and whose limits he defines by the Rhine and the Danube on the west and south, the Sarmatae and Duci on the east, and on the north-west and north by the sea. It is of no value as a geographical description; the first few chapters contain as much of the geography of Germany as Tacitus knew. The main matter is the description of the political institutions, the religion, and the habits, of the various tribes included under the denomination of Germans. The sources of the author's information are not stated, but as there is no reason to suppose that he had been to Germany, all that he could know must have been derived from the Roman expeditions, east of the Rhine and north of the Danube, and from the accounts of traders, who went at least as far as the Roman eagles, and perhaps farther. The value of the information contained in this treatise has often been discussed, and its credibility attacked; but we may estimate its true character by observing the precision of the writer as to those Germans who were best known to the Romans from being near the Rhine. That the hearsay accounts of more remote tribes must partake of the defects of all such evidence, is obvious; and we cannot easily tell whether Tacitus embellished that which he heard obscurely told. But to consider the Germany as a fiction, is one of those absurdities which need only be recorded, not refuted. Much has been written as to the special end that Tacitus had in view in writing this work; but this discussion is merely an offshoot of ill-directed labour; a sample of literary intemperance. [Seneca, p. 782.]

The dialogue entitled De Oratoribus, if it is the work of Tacitus, and it probably is, must be his earliest work, for it was written in the sixth year of Vespasian (c. 17). The style is more easy than that of the Annals, more diffuse, less condensed; but there is no obvious difference between the style of this Dialogue and the Histories, nothing so striking as to make us contend for a different authorship. Besides this, it is nothing unusual for works of the same author which are written at different periods and in the same country if they treat of different matters. The old MSS. attribute this Dialogue to Tacitus. One of the speakers in the dialogue attributes the decline of eloquence to Rome at the neglect of the arduous study of the old Roman orators, to which Cicero has left his testimony; but another speaker, Maternus, has assigned a direct and immediate cause, which was the change in the political constitution. Oratory is not the product of any system of government, except one in which the popular element is strong.

The Annals of Tacitus, the work of a mature age, contain the chief events of the period which they embrace, arranged under their several years (Annal. iv. 71). There seems no peculiar propriety in giving the name of Annales to this work, simply because the events are arranged in the order of time. The work of Livy may just as well be called Annales. Annals, or the work of Tacitus the Princeps or Emperor is the centre about which events are grouped, a mode of treating history which cannot be entirely thrown aside in a monarchical system, but which in feeble hands merges the history of a people in the personality of their ruler. Thus in Tacitus, the personal history of Tiberius, Claudius, and Nero, fill up a large space. Yet the most important public events, both in Italy and the provinces, are not omitted, though every thing is treated as subordinate to the exhibition of imperial power. The Histories which were written before the Annals, are in a more diffuse style, and the treatment of the extant part is different from that of the Annals. Tacitus wrote the Histories as a contemporary; the Annals as not a contemporary. They are two distinct works, not parts of one; which is clearly shown by the very different proportions of the two works: the first four books of the Histories comprise about a year, and the first four books of the Annals comprise fourteen years.

It was his purpose in the Annals to show the general condition of the empire of which Rome was the centre, and the emperor the representative: not only to show the course of events, but also their causes (Hist. i. 4); for this remark, which is made in the Histories, may be applied also to the Annals. But the history of despotism in any form does not convey the political instruction that is derived from the history of a free people. Tacitus claims the merit of impartiality (Annal. i.,) because he lived after the events that he describes; but a writer who is not a contemporary may have passions or prejudices as well as one who is. In his Histories (i.) he states that neither to Galba, nor to Otho, nor to Vitellius, did he owe obligations, nor had he received from them any wrong. From Vespasian and his sons, Titus and Domitian, he had received favours; yet, in the commencement of his life of Agricola, he has recorded the horrors of Domitian's reign; nor can we suppose that in the lost books of the Histories, he allowed the tyrant to escape without merited chastisement.

The history of the empire presents the spectacle of a state without any political organisation, by which the tyranny of a ruler could be checked when it became insupportable. The only means were assassination; and the only power that either the emperor could use to maintain himself, or a conspirator could employ to seize the power or secure it for another, was the scaffold. From this alternately tyrannical and despotic, where cruelty, or violence, there were no means of escape, nor does Tacitus ever give even the most distant hint that the restoration of the republic was either possible or desirable; or that there were any means of public security, except in the accident of an able emperor to whom a revolution might give the supreme power. Yet this empire, a prey to the vices of its rulers, and to intestine commotion, had its favourable side. The civilised world obeyed a revolution which was accepted in Rome, and the provinces were at peace with one another under this despot's yoke. France did not invade Italy nor Spain; Greece was not invaded by barbarians from the north; Asia Minor and Syria were protected from the worse than Roman despotism, the despotism of Asia; and Egypt and the north of Africa enjoyed protection against invaders, even though they sometimes felt the rapacity of a governor. The political condition of the empire under Caesar is a peculiar phase of European history. Tacitus has furnished some materials for it; but his method excluded a large and comprehensive view of the period which is comprised within his Annals. The treatment in the Histories has a wider range. The general review of the condition of the empire at the time of Nero's death is a rapid, but comprehensive sketch (i. 1, &c.).

The moral dignity of Tacitus is impressed upon his works; the consciousness of a love of truth, of the integrity of his purpose. His great power is in the knowledge of the human mind, his insight into the motives of human conduct; and he found materials for this study in the history of the emperors, and particularly Tiberius, the arch-hypocrite, and perhaps half madman. We know men's intellectual powers, because they seek to display them: their moral character is veiled under silence and reserve, which are sometimes indifference, but more frequently dissimulation. But dissimulation alone is not a sufficient cloak; it merely seeks to hide and cover, and, as the attempt to conceal excites suspicion, it is necessary to divert the vigilance of this active inquisitor. The dissembler, therefore, assumes the garb of goodness; and thus he is hypocrite complete. The hypocrite is a better citizen than the shameless man, because by his hypocrisy he acknowledges the supremacy of goodness, while the shameless ran rebels against it. The hypocritical is the common character, or society could not exist. In the Annals of Tacitus we have all characters; but the hypocritical prevails in a despotic government and a state of loose positive morality. There may be great immorality and also great shamelessness, but then society is near its dissolution. Under the empire there was fear, for the government was despotic; but there was not universal shamelessness, at least under Tiberius: there was an outward respect paid to virtue. The reign of Tiberius was marked by the reign of hypocrisy in all its forms, and the emperor himself was the great adept in the science; affectation in Tiberius of unwillingness to exercise power, a lesson that he learned from Augustus, and a show of regard to decency; flattery and servility on the part of the great, sometimes under the form of freedom of speech. To penetrate such a cloud of deception, we must attend even to the most insignificant external signs; for a man's nature will show itself, he be ever so cautious and cunning. In detecting these slight indications of character lies the great power of Tacitus: he penetrates to the hidden thoughts through the smallest avenue. But the possession of such a power implies something of a suspicious temper, and also cherishes it; and thus Tacitus sometimes discovers a hidden cause, where an open one seems to offer a sufficient explanation. Tacitus employs this power in the history of Tiberius, Caligula, Claudius, and Nero. Suetonius tells us of a man's vices simply and barely; Tacitus discovers what a man tries to conceal. His Annals are filled with dramatic scenes and striking catastrophes. He laboured to produce effect by the exhibition of great personages on the stage; but this is not the business of an historian. The real matter of history is a whole people; and their activity or suffering, mainly as affected by systems of government, is that which the historian has to contemplate. This is not the method of Tacitus in his Annals; his treatment is directly biographical, only indirectly political. His method is inferior to that of Thucydides, and even of Polybius, but it is a method almost necessitated by the existence of political power in the hands of an individual, and modern historians, except within the present century, have generally followed in the same track from the same cause.

Tacitus knew nothing of Christianity, which, says Montaigne, was his misfortune, not his fault. His practical morality was the Stoical, the only one that could give consolation in the age in which he lived. The highest example of Stoical morality among the Romans is the emperor Aurelius, whose golden book is the noblest monument that a Roman has left behind him. Great and good men were not wanting under the worst emperors, and Tacitus has immortalised their names. Germanicus Caesar, a humane man, and his intrepid wife, lived under Tiberius; Corbulus, an honest and able soldier, fell a victim to his fidelity to Nero. The memory of Agricola, and his virtues, greater than his talents, has been perpetuated by the affection of his son-in-law; and his prediction that Agrigola will survive to future generations is accomplished. Tharsus, Paetus and Helvidius Priscus were models of virtue; and Arria, the wife of Paetus, remembered the virtues of her mother. The jurists of Rome under the empire never forgot the bright example of the Scævolae of the republic: strange, though true, the great lawyers of Rome were among the best men and the best citizens that she produced. As to the mass of the people we learn little from Tacitus: they have only become matter for history in recent days. The superficial suppose, that when rulers are vicious the people are so too; but the mass of the people in all ages are the most virtuous, if not for other reasons, they are so because labour is the condition of their existence. The Satires of Juvenal touch the wealthy and the great, whose vices are the result of idleness and the command of money.

Tacitus had not the belief in a moral government of the world which Aurelius had; or if he had this belief, he has not expressed it distinctly. He loved virtue, he abhorred vice; but he has not shown that the constitution of things has an order impressed upon it by the law of its existence, which implies a law-giver. His theology looks something like the Epicurean, as exhibited by Lucretius. A belief in existence independent of a corporeal form, of a life after death, is rather a hope with him than a conviction. (Compare Agricola, c. 46, Annals, iii. 18, vi. 22, and the ambiguous or corrupt passage, Hist. 1. 4.) The style of Tacitus is peculiar, though it bears some resemblance to Sallust. In the Annals it is concise, vigorous, and pregnant with meaning; laboured, but elaborated with art, and stripped of every superfluity. A single word sometimes gives effect to a sentence, and if the meaning of the word is missed, the sense of the writer is not reached. He leaves something for the reader to fill up, and does not overpower him with words. The words that he does use are all intended to have a meaning. Such a work is probably the result of many transcriptions by the author; if it was produced at once in its present form, the author must have practised himself till he could write in no other way. Those who have studied Tacitus much, end with admiring a form of expression which at first is harsh and almost repulsive. One might conjecture that Tacitus, when he wrote his Annals, had by much labour acquired the art of writing with difficulty.

The materials which Tacitus had for his historical writings were abundant; public documents, memoirs, as those of Agrippinus; histories, as those of Fabius Rusticus and Vipsanius Messala; the Fasti, Orations Principum, and the Acta of the Senate; the conversation of his friends, and his own experience. It is not his practice to give authorities textually, a method which adds to the value of a history, but impairs its effect simply as a work of art. He who would erect an historical monument to his own fame will follow the method of Tacitus, compress his own researches into a narrow compass, and give them a form which is stamped with the individuality of the author. Time will confer on him the authority which the rigid critic only allows to real evidence. That Tacitus, in his Annals, purposely omitted every thing that could impair the effect of his work as a composition, is evident. The Annals are not longer than an epitome would be of a more diffuse history; but they differ altogether from those worthless literary labours. In the Annals Tacitus is generally brief and rapid in his sketches; but he is sometimes minute, and almost tedious, when he comes to work out a dramatic scene. Nor does he altogether neglect his rhetorical art when he has an opportunity for displaying it: a Roman historian could never forget that a Roman was an orator. The condensed style of Tacitus sometimes makes him obscure, but it is a kind of obscurity that is dispelled by careful reading. Yet a man must read carefully and often in order to understand him; and we cannot suppose that Tacitus was ever a popular writer. His real admirers will perhaps always be few; his readers fewer still. Montaigne read the whole of Tacitus from the beginning to the end, and he has given an opinion of Tacitus in his peculiar way; and his opinion is worth more than that of most people. (Montaigne's Essays, iii. ch. 8 Of the art of discoursing.) Montaigne justly commends Tacitus for not omitting to state rumours, reports, opinions; for that which is generally believed at any time is an historical fact, though it may be fact in no other sense.

The first edition of Tacitus, which is very rare, was printed at Venice, 1470, by Vindelini de Spira: it contains only the last six books of the Annals, the Histories, the Germania, and the Dialogue on Ora-tory. The edition of P. Deroaldius contains all the works of Tacitus. That of Bertanus Rhenanus, Basle, 1533, folio, was printed by Froben. Subsequent editions are very numerous; and for a list of them, such works as Hain's Repertorium and Schweigger's Handbuch der Classischen Biographie, may be consulted. The edition of Mainz, 1831, 8vo., is useful, for it contains the notes and excursus of Justus Lipsius. The edition of G. Brotier, Paris, 1771, 4 vols. 4to., has been much praised, and much bought; but it is a poor edition. There is an edition by I. Bekker, Leipzig, 1831, 2 vols. 8vo.; and by Orelli, Zürich, 1846 and 1843, 2 vols. 8vo. The Lexicon Taciteum of Bötticher, Berlin, 1830, 8vo., is not complete enough, nor exact enough, though it is of some use. The labours of Ruperti on Tacitus are of little value. The modern commentators are in all respects inferior to Lipsius, who did every thing that could be done at the time. Measured by his means, he is infinitely above all other commentators on Tacitus.

There are many editions of the several parts of Tacitus, particularly the Germania, the Agricola, and the Dialogi. The edition of G. L. Walch, Berlin, 1827, 8vo., contains the text and a German translation. The edition of E. J. Trendelenburg published the text of the Germania, and all other passages relating to Germany, selected from the other parts of Tacitus, Göttingen, 1835, 8vo. The best and most complete edition of the Dialogi is by J. C. Orelli, Zürich, 1830, 8vo.

There are translations of Tacitus, or parts of Tacitus, in almost every European language. The Italian translation of Davanzati is considered to have great merit; and perhaps the Italian language, in able hands, is one of the best adapted for a transla-tion of Tacitus. The French translations have little merit. D'Alembert translated various pas-sages from Tacitus. There are English versions by Greenway, 1598, of the Annals and the Germania, and by Henry Savile, 1596, of the Histories and the Agricola; also versions by Gordon and by Murphy. Gordon's is a harsh version, but, on the whole, faithful. That of Murphy is excessively diffuse; perhaps it is only a revision of Gordon. [G. L.]

TACO'NIDES or SACO'Nides, a vase-painter, whose name appears on a vase found at Vulci, and published by Gerhard, who gives the name in the first of the above forms. (Rappori, Vol. cant. p. 180.) Raoul-Rochette, however, states that he has been informed by Gerhard himself that the true reading of the name is ΣΑΚΟΝΙΔΕΣ. (R. Rochette, Lettre à M. Schorn, p. 60, 2d ed.) [P. S.]

TAL'DIUS. 1. Appears to have held some property, which was said to belong to a girl who was in legitima tuta (Verr. ii. 49). Atticus thought that Tadius had a title to it by usucom, at which Cicero expressed his surprise, as there could be no usucom in case of a ward. (Cic. ad Att. i. 5, 8.)

2. Q TADIUS, a relation of Verres, bore witness against him when he was impeached by Cicero. (Cic. terr. i. 49, iv. 13.)

3. P. TADIUS, a Roman citizen, carried on the business of a negotiator or money-lender at Athens, and was subsequently a legatus of Verres in Sicily. Notwithstanding the latter connection, he is spoken of by Cicero as a man of honour. (Cic. terr. i. 39, ii. 20, v. 25.)

TA'ENARUS (Tala'apos), a son of Eutatus and Erimeida, from whom the promontory and town of Tauranum, in Laconia, were believed to have their name. (Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. i. 103; comp. Paus. iii. 14, § 2; Steph. Byz. s. v.) [L. S.]

TAGES, a mysterious Etruscan being, who is described as a boy with the wisdom of an old man. Once when an Etruscan was being tried by Tages, he was drawing a deep furrow in the neigh-bourhood of Tarquinii, there suddenly rose out of the ground Tages, the son of a genius Jovialis, and grandson of Jupiter. When Tages addressed Tar-chon, the latter shrieked with fear, whereupon other Etruscans hastened to him, and in a short time all the people of Etruria were assembled around him. Tages now instructed them in the art of the haruspices, and died immediately after. The Etrus-cans, who had listened attentively to his instruc-tions, afterwards wrote down all he had said, and thus arose the books of Tages, which, according to some, were twelve in number. (Cic. de Div. ii. 23; Ov. Met. xv. 583; Festus, s. v. Tages; Isid. Orig. viii. 9; Serv. ad Aen. vi. 808.) [L. S.]

TAL′ASSIUS or TALASSIUS. [Thalassius.]

TALAUS (Talaoz), a son of Bias and Pero, and king of Argos. He was married to Lysimache Everme, Hygin. Fab. 70, or Lysianassa, Paus. ii. 6, § 3, and was father of Adrastos, Panthæmos, Pronax, Mecisteus, Aristomachus, and Eryphile. (Apollod. i. 9, § 13; Pind. Nem. ix. 14.) Hyginus (l. c.) mentions two other daughters of his. He also occurs among the Argonauts (Apollon. Rhod. i. 118), and his tomb was shown at Argos. (Paus. ii. 21, § 2.) Being a great grandson of Cretheus, Antimachus in a fragment preserved in Pausanias (viii. 25, § 5) calls him Creteiades. His own sons, Adrastos and Mecisteus, are sometimes called Talanoides, as in Hom. II. ii. 566; Pind. Od. vi. 24. [L. S.]

TA'LEIDES, a maker of painted vases, an interesting work by whom has been found in a tomb at Agrigentum, representing the destruction of the Minotaur, in the stiff archaic style. It is now in the collection of Mr. Hope, and is one of the vases engraved by Moses. (Lanzi, dei Has antichi dipinti, pl. iii. p. 147; Millin, Peint. de Vas. vol. ii. pl. lvi.) Another specimen of his work-manship has been more recently discovered at Vulci, namely, a small cup, bearing the inscription TAMPHIUS, TALOS, TALIUS GEMINUS, is mentioned by Tacitus under A.D. 62. The name of Talus is of rare occurrence, and is only found elsewhere in one or two inscriptions. (Tac. Ann. xiv. 50.)

TALOS (Tαλαὸς). 1. A son of Perdix, the sister of Daedalus. He himself was a disciple of Daedalus, and is said to have invented several instruments used in the mechanical arts; but Daedalus incensed by envy thrust him down the rock of the Acropolis at Athens. The Athenians worshipped him as a hero. (Apollod. iii. 15. § 9; Diod. iv. 76; Schol. ad Aed. Eryst. 1643; Lucian, Pisc. 42.) Pausanias (i. 21. § 6, 26. § 5, vii. 4. § 5) calls him Calos, and states that he was buried on the road leading from the theatre to the Acropolis, Hyginus (Fab. 39. 274) and Ovid (Met. viii. 255; comp. Serv. ad Virg. Geor. i. 143, Aen. v. 14) call him Perdix, according to the common tradition, was the name of his father.

2. A man of brass, the work of Hephaestus. This wonderful being was given to Minos by Zeus or Hephaestus, and watched the island of Crete by walking round the island thrice every day. Whenever he saw strangers approaching, he made himself red-hot in fire, and then embraced the strangers when they landed. He had in his body only one vein, which ran from the head to the ankles, and was closed at the top with a nail. When he attempted to keep the Argonauts from Crete by throwing stones at them, Medea by her magic powers threw him into a state of madness, or, according to others, under the pretence of making him immortal, she took the nail out of his vein and thus caused him to bleed to death. Others again related that Poenas killed him by wounding him with an arrow in the ankle. (Apollod. i. 9. § 26; Apollon. Rhod. iv. 1638, &c.; Plat. Min. p. 320.)

3. A son of Oenopion. (Paus. vii. 4. § 6.)

4. A son of Cres, and father of Hephaestus. (Paus. viii. 53. § 2.)

TALTHYBIUS (Ταλθύβιος), the herald of Agamemnon at Troy. (Hom. ii. i. 320; Od. ier. iii. 9.) He was worshipped as a hero at Sparta and Argos, where sacrifices also were offered to him. (Paus. iii. 12. § 6, vii. 23, in fin.; Herod. vii. 334.)

TAMYSIS MUSTELA. (MüSTELA.)

TAMOS (Τάμως), a native of Memphis in Egypt, was lieutenant-governor of Ionia under Tissaphernes. In b. c. 412, we hear that the Athenians under Astyochus, the Persian admiral, in the unsuccessful endeavour to persuade the partisans of Athens at Clazomenae to remove to Daphnis,—a place on the main land, and therefore beyond the reach of the Athenian navy. (Thucyd. vii. 31; Arnold and Gyller, ad loc.) In b. c. 411, when Tissaphernes went to Aspendus, with the professed intention of bringing to the aid of the Peloponnesians the Phoenician fleet which he had promised, he commissioned Tamos to provide for the maintenance of the Peloponnesian forces during his absence. (Thucyd. vii. 37.) Tamos afterwards attached himself to the service of the younger Cyrus, and, acting as his admiral, in b. c. 401, blockaded Miletus, which had refused to transfer its obedience from Tissaphernes to the prince. When Cyrus marched eastward against his brother, Tamos conducted them, and accompanying the movements and second the operations of the army which he joined at Issus in Cilicia. After the death of Cyrus and the consequent failure of the rebellion, Artaxerxes sent Tissaphernes into Western Asia to take, in addition to his own satrapy, the command of the provinces which had been subject to the prince, whereupon Tamos, in alarm, fled from Ionia with his treasures and all his children but one, and sailed to Egypt, where he hoped to find refuge with Psammetichus, on whom he had conferred an obligation. Psammetichus, however, put him and his children to death, in order to possess himself of his money and ships. (Xen. Anab. i. 2. § 21, 4. § 2. ii. 1. § 3; Hell. iii. 1. § 1; Diod. xiv. 19. 21. 33.)

TAMPHIUS or TAMPLUS, the name of a family of the plebeian Baebia gens. In the Fasti Capitolini we find Tamphius, but on coins Tamphilus.

1. Q. BARBUS TAMPHIUS, was sent in b. c. 219, along with P. Valerius Flaccus, by the Roman senate to Hannibal at Saguntum, and afterwards proceeded to Carthage, where Hannibal would not listen to them. Tamphius was also sent in the following year on another embassy to Carthage. (Liv. xxi. 6, 9, 18; Cic. Phil. v. 10.)

2. CN. BARBUS TAMPHIUS, tribune of the plebs, b. c. 204, impeached the censors, M. Livius Salinator and C. Claudius Nero, on account of the way in which they had administered the duties of their office; but the senate, although discontented with the conduct of the censors, obliged the tribune to drop the prosecution, as they thought it more advisable to uphold the principle of the irresponsibility of the censors than to inflict upon them the punishment they deserved. In b. c. 190 Tamphius was procurator, and received the command of the legions of the preceding year, C. Aurelius Cotta, which were stationed in the neighbourhood of Ariminum, with instructions to await the arrival of the new consul, C. Cornelius Lentulus. But Tamphius, anxious to obtain glory, made an incursion into the country of the Insurbii, by whom he was defeated with great loss. On the arrival of Lentulus soon afterwards, he was ordered to leave the province, and was sent back to Rome in disgrace. In b. c. 186 Tamphius was one of the triumviri for founding two colonies, and in b. c. 182 he was consul with L. Aemilius Paullus. In conjunction with his colleague, Tamphius fought against the Ligurians with success, and remained in the country as proconsul in the following year. (Liv. xxxviii. 37; Val. Max. vii. 2. § 6; Liv. xxxi. 49, 50, xxxii. 1. 7, xxxiii 23, 56, xi. 16. 25.)

3. M. BARBUS TAMPHIUS, brother of No. 2, was one of the triumviri for founding a colony in TANTALUS.

In b. c. 184, he was praetor in b. c. 192, when he received Bruttiæ as his province, with two legions, and 1500 foot-soldiers and 500 horse of the allies. In consequence of the threatened war with Antiochus the Great, he was ordered to march with these troops to the neighbourhood of Brundisium and Tarentum, and soon afterwards to cross over with them to Epeirus. He remained in Greece the following year as propraetor, and took an active part in the war against Antiochus. In conjunction with Philip, king of Macedonia, he marched into Thessaly, and as Antiochus retreated before them, Tantalus obtained possession of many important towns in Thessaly. The consul M. Acilius Glabrio arrived soon afterwards, and took the command of the troops, but Tantalus continued in Greece, serving under the consul. (Liv. xxxiv. 45, xxxv. 10, 23, 24, xxxvi. 8, 10, 13, 14, 22.)

In b. c. 186, Tantalus was one of the three ambassadors sent to settle the disputes between Eumenes and Philip and the Thessalian states. In b. c. 181 he was consul with P. Cornelius Cethegus. Both consuls received Liguria as their province, but they did not engage in any military operations. In the following year, however, when their command was prolonged till the arrival of the new consuls, they marched at the commencement of the spring into the territory of the Apuani Ligures, who, taken unawares, found themselves obliged to surrender. In order to prevent a renewal of the war, the consuls transported 40,000 of these people, with their wives and children, to Samnium. On account of this success, they triumphed on their return to Rome, being the first instance in which this honour had been conferred upon generals who had not carried on a war. (Liv. xxxix. 23, 24, xl. 18, 35, 37, 38.)

4. Cn. Baebius Tantalus, probably son of No. 2, was praetor urbanus, b. c. 168. In the following year he was one of the five legati sent into Illyricum. (Liv. xlv. 17, xlv. 17.)

The following coin of C. Baebius Tantalus has on the obverse the head of Pallas, and on the reverse Apollo driving a quadriga.

TANAGRA (ταναγρα), a daughter of Aeolus or Asoos, and wife of Poemandier, is said to have given the name to the town of Tanagra in Boeotia. (Paus. ix. 20. § 2; Strab. iv. p. 403.) [L. S.]

TANAQUIEL [ΤΑΝΑΚΙΥΙΟΣ]

TAN'ITALUS (τανταλος). 1. A son of Zeus by Pluto, or according to others (Schol. ad Eurip. Orest. 5; Tzetz. Chil. v. 444; Apostol. Cent. xviii. 7) a son of Tmolus. (Hygin. Fab. 82, 154; Anton. Lib. 36.) His wife is called by some Euryanassa (Schol. ad Eurip. l. c.; Tzetz. ad Lyceoph. 52), by others Tagyete or Dione (Hygin. Fab. 82; Or. Met. vi. 174), and by others Clytia or Eurypto (Schol. ad Eurip. Or. 11; Apostol. l. c.). He was the father of Pelops, Broteas, and Niobe. (Schol. ad Eurip. Or. 5; Diod. iv. 74.) All traditions agree in stating that he was a wealthy king, but while some call him king of Lydia, of Sipylus in Phrygia or Paphlagonia, others describe him as king of Argos or Corinth. (Hygin. Fab. 124; Serv. ad Aen. vi. 603; Diod. l. c.) Tantalus is particularly celebrated in ancient story for the severe punishment inflicted upon him after his death in the lower world, the causes of which are differentially stated by the ancient authors. The common account is that Zeus invited him to his table and communicated his divine counsels to him. Tantalus divulged the secrets intrusted to him, and the gods punished him by placing him in the nether world in the midst of a lake, but rendering it impossible for him to drink when he was thirsty, the water always withdrawing when he strooped. Branches laden with fruit, moreover, hung over his head, but when he stretched out his hand to reach the fruit, the branches withdrew. (Hom. Od. xi. 382.) Over his head there was suspended a huge rock ever threatening to crush him. (Pind. Ol. ii. 90, &c., Islum. viii. 21; Eurip. Or. 5, &c.; Diod. v. 74; Philostr. Vit. Apollon. iii. 25; Hygin. Fab. 82; Horat. Sat. i. 1. 63; Tibull. i. 3. 77; Or. Met. iv. 457, Art. Am. ii. 605; Senec. Herc. Furt. 752; Cic. de Fin. i. 18, Tusc. iv. 16.) Another tradition relates that he, wanting to try the gods, cut his son Pelops in pieces, boiled them and set them before the gods at a repast. (Hygin. Fab. 83; Serv. ad Aen. vi. 603, ad Georg. ii. 7.) A third account states that Tantalus stole nectar and ambrosia from the table of the gods and gave them to his friends (Pind. Ol. i. 90; Tzetz. Chil. v. 465) and a fourth relates the following story. When Pelops was sent to be guarded in Crete by a golden dog, whom subsequently Zeus appointed guardian of his temple in Crete, Pandareus stole this dog, and, carrying him to Mount Sipylus in Lydia, gave him to Tantalus to take care of. But afterwards, when Pandareus demanded the dog back, Tantalus took an oath that he had never received him. Zeus thereupon changed Pandareus into a stone, and threw Tantalus down from Mount Sipylus. (Anton. Lib. 36.) Others again relate that Hermes demanded the dog of Tantalus, and that the perjury was committed before Hermes. (Pind. Ol. i. 90.) Zeus buried Tantalus under Mount Sipylus as a punishment. (Schol. ad Pind. Ol. 90, 97.) There his tomb was shown in later times. (Paus. ii. 22. § 4, v. 13. § 4.) In the Lesche of Delphi Tantalus was represented by Polygnotus in the situation described in the common tradition: he was standing in water, with a fruit-tree over his head, and threatening the mid-overhanging rock. (Paus. x. 31. § 2.) The punishment of Tantalus was proverbial in ancient times, and from it the English language has borrowed the verb "to tantalize," that is, to hold out hopes or prospects which cannot be realized. Tzetzes (ad Lyceoph. 355) mentions that Tantalus was in love with Ganymede, and engaged with Ilus in a contest for the possession of the charming youth.

2. A son of Thestues, who was killed by Atreus (Hygin. Fab. 88, 244, 246; others call him a son of Broteas). He was married to Clytaemnestra before Agamemnon (Paus. ii. 22. § 4), and is said by some to have been killed by Agamemnon. (Paus. ii. 16. § 2, comp. iii. 23. § 4.) His tomb was shown at Argos.
TARATIA.

3. A son of Amphion and Niobe. (Apollod. ii. 5. § 6; Ov. Met. vi. 240.) [L.S.]

T'ANTALUS, the name of the general who succeeded Viniatus and who shortly afterwards submitted to Caepio. He is called Tantuus by Diodorus (Appian, Hosp. 75; Diod. Eccl. xxxii. vol. ii. p. 524, ed. Wess.)

L. TANTA'SIUS, slain by Catiline in the times of Sulla. (Ascon. in Cic. Tog. Cand. p. 84, ed. Orelli.)

TANUSII, people of property proscribed by Sulla. (Q. Cic. de Pet. Cons. 2.)

TANUSIUS GEMINUS. [GEMINUS.]

TANYYOARCES. [SMERDIUS.]

TA'PHIUS (Taphos), a son of Poseidon and Hippothea, was the father of Piterclus. He led a colony to Taphos, and called the inhabitants Telebeans. (Apollod. ii. 4. § 5.) [L.S.]

TAPPO, VALERIUS. 1. L. VALERIUS TAPPO, praetor b.c. 192, obtained Sicily as his province. He was one of the triumvirs in b.c. 190 for settling new colonists at Placentia and Cremona in northern Italy. (Liv. xxxv. 10, 20, xxxvii. 46.)

2. C. VALERIUS TAPPO, tribune of the plebs, b.c. 188, proposed that the suffrage should be given to the Forniani, Fundani and Arpinares. (Liv. xxxviii. 36.)

TAPPULUS, VILLIUS. 1. L. VILLIUS TAPPULUS, plebeian aedile, b.c. 213. (Liv. xxxv. 2.)

2. P. VILLIUS TAPPULUS, plebeian aedile, b.c. 204, and praetor b.c. 203, with Sicily as his province. In b.c. 201, he was one of the decemviri for assigning some of the public land in Samnium and Apulia to the soldiers who had served under P. Scipio in Africa, and in b.c. 199 he was consul with L. Cornelius Lentulus. In his consilium he had the conduct of the war against Philip in Macedonia, but he performed nothing of importance. In the following year he served as legatus under his successor T. Quintius Flamininus, and on the conquest of Philip in b.c. 196, he was one of the ten commissioners appointed by the senate to determine with Flamininus upon the conditions of the peace. After concluding the peace with Philip, Tappulus and one of his colleagues went on a mission to Antiochus in Asia. In b.c. 193 he was again sent to Antiochus, and in the following year was also one of the ambassadors sent to Greece. (Liv. xxxix. 38, xxx. 1. xxxi. 4, 49, xxxii. 3, 6, 28, xxxiii. 24, 35, 39, 40, xxxiv. 59, xxxv. 13—15, 23, 39.)

3. L. VILLIUS TAPPULUS, praetor b.c. 199, obtained Sardinia as his province. (Liv. xxxi. 49, xxxii. 1.)

TARACUS. [SABAON.]

TARANTUS, a nickname bestowed on Caracalla, after his death, from a gladiator of diminutive stature and repulsive aspect. It is first mentioned by Dion Cassius in the ninth chapter of his seventy-eighth book, and in the subsequent portions of his history he uniformly designates the son of Severus by this appellation. [W. R.]

TARAS (Ta'gas), a son of Poseidon by a nymph, is said to have traversed the sea from the promontory of Tarentum to the south of Italy, riding on a dolphin, and to have founded Tarentum in Italy (Paus. x. 10. § 4, 13, § 5), where he was worshipped as a hero. (Strab. vi. p. 279.) [L.S.]

TARATIA, CAI'A, a Vestal Virgin, who is said to have given the campus Thermain to the Roman people, and to whom, on that account, a statue was erected. (Plin. H. N. xxiv. 6. s. 11.)

TARAXIPPUS (Tarakippas), was the name of a particular spot in the race-course at Olympia, where horses often became shy and frightened. Superstition was not at a loss to account for this phenomenon, for some said that on that spot Oenelius or Demeon had been slain by Cteatus, or because it was the burial-place of Myrtilus (who had frightened the horses of Oenomus), Alcathous, or Pelops. Pausanias, however, considers Taraxippus to be a surname of Poseidon Hippius. On the isthmus of Corinth, Glaucus, the son of Sisyphus, was believed to be a Taraxippus. (Paus. vi. 20. § 8, &c.; comp. x. 57. § 4.) [L.S.]

TARCHE'SIUS, an architectural writer, whom Vitruvius mentions as one of those who maintained that the proportions of the Doric order were unsuitable to temples. He attributes the same opinion to Pytheus and Hermogenes. (Vitr. iv. 3. § 1.)

TARCHE'TIUS (Tarxh'thos), a mythical king of Alka, who, in some traditions is connected with the founders of Rome. Once a phallus was seen rising above one of his flocks. In compliance with an oracle he ordered one of his daughters to approach the phallus; but she sent one of her maid servants, who became pregnant, and gave birth to the twins Romulus and Remus. Tarchethius caused them to be exposed, but they were suckled by a she-wolf and brought up by a shepherd, and when they had grown up to manhood they dethroned Tarxcius. (Plut. Romul. 2.) [L.S.]

TARCHON. [TARKH'NENUS.]

TARCON'DIMOTUS (Tarkon'dimotos), the king of Cilicia, fought on Pompey's side against Caesar, in b.c. 48, but was pardoned by Caesar, and allowed to retain his dominions. After the death of Caesar he joined C. Cassius, and subsequently espoused the side of Antony against Octavian. He was killed in a sea-fight in b.c. 31, while fighting under Sosius against M. Agrippa. His name is variously written in the ancient authors, but we learn from coins that Tarcondimotus is the correct form (Dion Cass. xii. 63, xiv. 26, l. 14; Strab. xiv. p. 676; Cic. ad Fam. xv. 1; Flor. iv. 2. § 5; Plut. Ant. 61.) The sons of Tarcondimotus deserted Antony after the battle of Actium, and united themselves to Octavian; but Philopator, who had succeeded his father, was deprived by Octavian of the part of Cappadocian Pontus, which he held. In b.c. 20, however, Tarcondimotus, one of the sons, received from Octavian all the possessions of his father, with the exception of a few places on the coast. (Dion Cass. li. 2, 7, liv. 9.)

TARGITAUS. [Targitaus] (Tail'don), a son of Zeus by a daughter of Borysthenes, was believed to be the...
as a stranger, from all power and influence in the state. Discontented with this inferior position, and urged on by his wife, he resolved to leave Tarquinii and remove to Rome, where a new citizen had more chance of obtaining distinction. He accordingly set out for Rome, riding in a chariot with his wife, and accompanied by a large train of followers. When they had reached the Janiculum and were already within sight of Rome, an eagle seized his cap, and after carrying it away to a great height placed it again upon his head. Tanaquil, who was skilled in the Etruscan science of augury, bade her husband hope for the highest honour from this omen. Her predictions were soon verified. The stranger was received with welcome, and he and his followers were admitted to the rights of Roman citizens. He took the name of Tarquinii, to which Livy adds Priscus. His wealth, his courage, and his wisdom, gained him the love both of Ancius Marcius and of the people. The former appointed him guardian of his children; and, when he died, the senate and the people unanimously elected Tarquinii to the vacant throne.

The reign of Tarquinii was distinguished by great exploits in war, and by great works in peace. The history of his wars is related very differently by Livy and Dionysius. According to the former writer he waged war with the Latins and Sabines with great success. He first destroyed the wealthy town of Apiole, which belonged to the Sabines, and subsequently took the Latin towns of Cameria, Crustumenerium, Medullia, Amerilia, Ficulnea, Cornecium, and Nomentum. But his most memorable exploit was the defeat of the Sabines, who had advanced up to the very gates of Rome. They were at first driven back after a doubtful struggle, but were subsequently overthrown by Tarquinii upon the Anio, and compelled to sue for peace. They ceded to the Romans the town of Collatia, where Tarquinii placed a strong garrison, the command of which he entrusted to Egerius, the son of his deceased brother Aruns, who, with his family, took the surname of Collatinius. Several traditions are connected with this war. The king’s son, a youth of fourteen, slew a foe with his own hand, and received as a reward a golden bulla and a robe bordered with purple; and these remained in after times the ornaments and dress of youths of noble rank. In this war, also, Tarquinii is said to have vowed the building of the Capitol.

Livy says nothing more respecting the war of this king, but Dionysius relates at great length his wars with the Etruscans. According to the latter writer five of the great Etruscan cities sent assistance to the Latins, which proved ineffectual; and subsequently all the twelve cities united their forces against Rome. They were, however, vanquished, and compelled to submit to his authority. They are further stated to have done homage to him by presenting him with a golden crown, an ivory throne and sceptre, a purple tunic and robe figured with gold, and other badges of kingly power, such as the Etruscans used when their twelve cities chose a common chief in war. (Dionys. iii. 57, 59, 61.) Thus, according to this story, Tarquinii ruled over the Latins, Sabines, and Etruscans, as well as Romans; but no Latin writer mentions this war with the Etruscans, with the exception of Florus (i. 5), and the compiler of the triumphal Fasti. Cicero (de Rep. ii. 20) and Strabo (v. p. 231) relate that Tarquinii also subdued the Aequi.

TARQUINIUS.

but this war is not mentioned by Dionysius, and is referred by Livy (i. 55) to Tarquinus Superbus. Although the wars of Tarquinus were of great celebrity, the important works which he executed in peace have made his name still more famous. Many of these works are ascribed in some stories to the second Tarquinus, but almost all traditions agree in assigning to the elder Tarquinus the erection of the vast sewers by which the lower parts of the city were drained, and which still remain, with not a stone displaced, to bear witness to his power and wealth. (See Dict. of Antiq art. Cloaca.) The work by which the Tiber is banked, and through which the sewer opens into it, must clearly have been executed at the same time, and may therefore be safely ascribed to the elder Tarquinus.

The same king is also said in some traditions to have laid out the Circus Maximus in the valley which had been redeemed from water by the sewers, and also to have instituted the Great or Roman Games, which were henceforth performed in the Circus. The Forum, with its porticoes and rows of shops, was also his work, and he likewise began to surround the city with a stone wall, a work which was finished by his successor Servius Tullius. The building of the Capitol temple is moreover attributed to the elder Tarquinus, though most traditions ascribe this work to his son, and only the vow to the father.

Tarquinus also made some changes in the constitution of the state. He added a hundred new members to the senate, who were called patres minorum gentium, to distinguish them from the old senators, who were now called patres majorum gentium. He wished to add to the three centuries of equites established by Romulus three new centuries, and to call them after himself and two of his friends. His plan was opposed by the augur Attus Navius, who gave a convincing proof that the gods were opposed to his purpose. [Navius.] Accordingly he gave up his design of establishing new centuries, but to each of the former centuries he associated another under the same name, so that henceforth there were the first and second Ramnes, Titises, and Luceres. He increased the number of Vestal Virgins from four to six.

Tarquin had reigned thirty-eight years, when he was assassinated by the contrivance of the sons of Ancus Marcus. They had long wished to take vengeance upon him on account of their being deprived of the throne, and now fearing lest he should secure the succession to his son-in-law Servius Tullius, they hired two countrymen, who, feigning to have a quarrel, came before the king to have their dispute decided; and while he was listening to the complaint of one, the other gave him a deadly wound with his axe. But the sons of Marcus did not secure the reward of their crime, for Servius Tullius, with the assistance of Tanaquil, succeeded to the vacant throne. Tarquinus left two sons and two daughters. His two sons, L. Tarquinus and Aruns, were subsequently married to the two daughters of Servius Tullius. One of his daughters was married to Servius Tullius, and the other to M. Brutus, by whom she became the mother of the celebrated L. Brutus, the first consul at Rome. The principal authorities for the life of Tarquinus Priscus are Livy (i. 34—41), Dionysius (iii. 46—73, iv. 1), and Cicero (de Rep. iii. 20.).

The life of Servius Tullius is given under Tullius. There it is related how he was murdered, after a reign of forty-four years, by his son-in-law, L. Tarquinus, who had been urged on by his wicked wife to commit the dreadful deed. The Roman writers represent the younger Tarquinus as a cruel and tyrannical monarch, and the fact of his being the last king of Rome has doubtless contributed not a little to blacken his character. The estimation in which he was held by the Romans is shown by his surname of Superbus.

L. TARQUINIUS SUPERBUS commenced his reign without any of the forms of election. He seized the kingdom as a recovered inheritance, and did not wait to be elected by the senate or the people, or to receive the imperium from the curia. One of the first acts of his reign was to abolish all the privileges which had been conferred upon the plebeians by Servius, since the patricians had assisted him in obtaining the kingdom. He forbade the meetings of the tribes, and repeated the laws which had conferred civil equality upon the plebeians, and which had abolished the right of seizing the person of a debtor. He also compelled the poor to work at miserable wages upon his magnificent buildings, and the hardships which they suffered were so great that many put an end to their lives. But he did not confine his oppressions to the poor. All the senators and patricians whom he mistrusted, or whose wealth he coveted, were put to death or driven into the exiles. The vacant places in the senate were not filled up, and this body was scarcely ever consulted by him. He surrounded himself by a body-guard, by means of which he was enabled to do what he liked. But, although a tyrant at home, he raised the state to great influence and power among the surrounding nations, partly by his alliances and partly by his conquests. He gave his daughter in marriage to Octavius Mamilius of Tusculum, the most powerful of the Latin chiefs, and by his means he acquired great influence in Latium. Under his sway Rome became eventually the acknowledged head of the Latin confederacy. According to Cicero (de Rep, ii. 24) he subdued the whole of Latium by force of arms; but Livy and Dionysius represent his supremacy as due to his alliances and intrigues. Any Latin chiefs, like Turnus Herdonius, who attempted to resist him, were treacherously betrayed. At a solemn meeting of the Latins at the Alban Mount, Tarquinius sacrificed the bull on behalf of all the allies; and distributed the flesh to the people of the league. So complete was the union of the Romans and the Latins that the soldiers of the two nations were not kept separate, but each maniple in the army was composed of both Romans and Latins. The Hernici also became members of the league, but their troops were kept apart from the Roman legions.

Strengthened by this Latin alliance, and at the head of a formidable army, Tarquinius turned his arms against the Volscians. He took the wealthy town of Suessa Pometia, with the spoils of which he commenced the erection of the Capitol which his father had vowed; but great as these were, they were scarcely sufficient even for the foundations of this magnificent edifice, and the people were heavily taxed to erect the building. In digging for the foundations, a large thorn was discovered at Ardea beneath the earth, undecayed and trickling with blood; and Etruscan soothsayers expounded the prodigy as a sign that Rome was destined to become the head of the world. In the vaults of this temple he deposited the Sibylline books, which the king purchased from a sibyl or prophetess. She had offered to sell him nine books for three hundred pieces of gold. The king refused the offer with scorn. Thereupon she went away, and burned three, and then demanded the same price for the six. The king still refused. She again went away and burnt three more, and still demanded the same price for the remaining three. The king now purchased the three books, and the sibyl disappeared.

In order to secure his Volscian conquests, Tarquinius founded the colonies of Signia and Cirene. He was next engaged in a war with Gabii, one of the Latin cities, which refused to enter into the league. Unable to take the city by force of arms, Tarquinius had recourse to stratagem. His son, Sextus, pretending to be ill-treated by his father, and covered with the bloody marks of stripes, fled to Gabii. The infuriated inhabitants intrusted him with the command of their troops, and when he had obtained the unlimited confidence of the citizens, he sent a messenger to his father to inquire how he should deliver the city into his hands. The king, who was walking in his garden when the messenger arrived, made no reply, but kept striking off the heads of the tallest poplars with his stick. Sextus took the hint. He put to death or banished, on false charges, all the leading men of the place, and then had no difficulty in compelling it to submit to his father.

In the midst of his prosperity, Tarquinius was troubled by a strange portent. A serpent crawled out from the altar in the royal palace, and seized on the entrails of the victim. The king, in fear, sent his two sons, Titus and Aruns, to consult the oracle at Delphi. They were accompanied by their cousin, L. Junius Brutus. One of the sisters of Tarquinius had been married to M. Brutus, a man of great wealth, who died, leaving two sons under age. Of these the elder was killed by Tarquinius, who coveted their possessions; the younger escaped his brother's fate only by feigning idiocy. On arriving at Delphi, Brutus propitiated the priestess with the gift of a golden stick encrusted with pearls. After executing the king's commission, Titus and Aruns returned to Rome, who was to reign at Rome after their father. The priestess replied, whichever should first kiss his mother. The princes agreed to keep the matter secret from Sextus, who was at Rome, and to cast lots between themselves. Brutus, who better understood the meaning of the oracle, fell, as if by chance, when they quitted the temple, and kissed the earth, mother of them all. The fall of the king was also foreshadowed by other prodigies, and it came to pass in the following way:—

Tarquinius was besieging Ardea, a city of the Rutulians. The place could not be taken by force, and the Roman army lay encamped beneath the walls. Here as the king's sons, and their cousin, Tarquinius Collatins, the son of Egerius, were feasting together, a dispute arose about the virtue of their wives. As nothing was doing in the field, they mounted their horses to visit their homes by surprise. They first went to Rome, where they suspected their wives of unchastity. They then hastened to Collatia, and there, though it was late in the night, they found Lucretia, the wife of Collatins, spinning amid her handmaidens. The beauty and virtue of Lucretia had fired the evil passions of Sextus. A few days he returned to Collatia, where he was hospitably received by Lucretia as her husband's kinsman. In the dead of night he entered the chamber with a drawn sword; by threatening to lay a slave with his throat cut beside her, whom he would pretend to have killed in order to avenge her husband's honour, he forced her to yield to his wishes. As soon as Sextus had departed, Lucretia sent for her husband and father. Collatins came, accompanied by L. Brutus; Lucretius, with P. Valerius, who afterwards gained the surname of Publicola. They found her in an agony of sorrow. She told them what had happened, enjoined them to avenge her dishonour, and then stabbed herself to death. They all swore to avenge her. Brutus threw off his assumed stupidity, and placed himself at their head. They carried the corpse into the marketplace of Collatia. There the people took up arms, and resolved to renounce the Tarquins. A number of young men attended the funeral procession to Rome. Brutus, who was Tribunus Celerum, summoned the people, and related the deed of shame. All classes were inflamed with the same indignation. A decree was passed deposing the king, and banishing him and his family from the city. Brutus now set out for the army at Ardea. Tarquinius meantime had hastened to Rome, but found the gates closed against him. Brutus was received with joy at Ardea; and the army likewise renounced their allegiance to the tyrant. Tarquinius, with his two sons, Titus and Aruns, took refuge at Caere in Etruria. Sextus repaired to Gabii, his own principality, where, according to Livy, he was shortly after murdered by the friends of those whom he had put to death. Tarquinius reigned twenty-five years. His banishment was placed in the year of the city 244, or B.C. 510. (Liv. i. 49—60; Dionys. iv. 41—75; Cic. de Rep. ii. 24, 25.)

The remainder of the story may be told with greater brevity. The history of the establishment of the republic and of the attempts of Tarquinii to recover the sovereignty, has already been related in detail in other articles. L. Brutus and Tarquinii Collatinius were the first consuls; but the people so hated the very name and race of the dethroned King, that Collatinius was obliged to resign his office, and retire from Rome. P. Servius was elected consul in his place. [COLLATINIUS.] Meantime ambassadors came to Rome from Tarquinii, to which city Tarquinii had removed from Caere, demanding the restitution of his private property. The demand seemed just to the senate and the people; but while the ambassadors were making preparation for carrying away the property, they found means to organize a conspiracy among the young Roman nobles for the restoration of the royal family. The plot was discovered by means of a slave, and the consul Brutus ordered the execution of his two sons, who were parties to the plot. The agreement to give up the property was made void by this attempt at treason. The royal goods were abandoned to the people to plunder, and their landed estates were divided among the poor, with the exception of the plain between the city and the river, which was reserved for public uses. This plain was consecrated to Mars, and called the Campus Martius.

Tarquinius now endeavoured to recover the throne by force of arms. The people of Tarquinii and Veii espoused his cause, and marched against Rome. The two consuls advanced to meet them. A bloody battle was fought, in which Brutus and Aruns, the son of Tarquinii, slew each other. Both parties claimed the victory, till a voice was heard in the dead of night, proclaiming that the Romans had conquered, as the Etruscans had lost one man more. Alarmed at this, the Etruscans fled, and Valerius, the surviving consul, entered Rome in triumph.

Tarquinius next repaired to Lars Porsena, the powerful king of Clusium, who likewise espoused his cause. He was repulsed and pursued as he marched against Rome at the head of a vast army. The history of this memorable expedition, which was long preserved in the Roman lay, is related under PORESEA.

After Porsena quitted Rome, Tarquinius took refuge with his son-in-law, Mamilius Octavius of Tusculum. Under the guidance of the latter, the Latin states espoused the cause of the exiled king, and eventually declared war against Rome. The contest was decided by the battle of the lake Regillus, which was long celebrated in song, and the description of which in Livy resembles one of the battles in the Iliad. The Romans were commanded by the dictator, A. Postumius, and by his lieutenant, T. Aebutius, the master of the knights; the Latins were headed by Tarquinius and Octavius Mamilius. The struggle was fierce and bloody, but the Latins at length turned to flight. Almost all the chiefs on either side fell in the conflict, or were grievously wounded. Tarquinii himself was wounded, but escaped with his life; his son Sextus is said to have fallen in this battle, though, according to another tradition, as we have already seen, he is said to have been slain by the inhabitants of Gabii. It was related in the old tradition, that the Romans gained this battle by the assistance of the Dioscuri (Castor and Pollux), who were seen charging the Latins at the head of the Roman cavalry, and who afterwards carried to Rome the intelligence of the defeat of the Latins. A temple was built in the forum on the spot where they appeared, and their festival was celebrated yearly on the Ides of Quintilis (the 15th of July), the day of the battle of Regillus, on which all the knights passed in solemn procession to their temple. According to Livy the battle of the lake Regillus was fought in B.C. 498, but he says that some of the annals placed it in B.C. 496, in which year it is given by Dionysius (vi. 3) and in the Fasti Capitolini.

The Latins were completely humbled by this victory. Tarquinii Superbus had no other state to whom he could apply for assistance. He had already survived all his family; and he now fled to Aristobulus at Cumae, where he died a wretched and childless old man. (Liv. ii. 1—21; Dionys. v. 1—vi. 21.)

In the preceding account we have attempted to give the story of the Tarquinii as nearly as possible in the words of the ancient writers. But it is hardly necessary to remark in the present day that this story cannot be received as a real history, or to point out the numerous inconsistencies and impossibilities in the narrative. It may suffice as a sample to remind the reader that the younger Tarquinii was expelled from Rome in maturity, was the son of the king who ascended the throne 107 years previously in the vigour of life; and that Servius Tullius, who married the daughter of Tarquinii Priscus, shortly before he ascended the throne, immediately after his accession is the father of two daughters whom he marries to the brothers of his own wife. It would be a fruitless task to endeavour to ascertain the real history of the later Roman monarchy; for although the legend has doubtless preserved some facts, yet we have no criteria to determine the true from the false. The story of the Tarquinii has evidently been drawn from the works of several popular poets, and there can be little doubt that one at least of the writers must have become acquainted with Greek literature from the Greek colonies in southern Italy. The stratagem by which Tarquinii obtained possession of Gabii is obviously taken from a tale in Herodotus (iii. 154), and similar cases might easily be multiplied. Hence we may account for the Greek origin of the Tarquinii. There is, however, one fact in the common tale which it is impossible to disbelieve, although it has been questioned by Niebuhr, we mean the Etruscan origin of the Tarquinii.

TARQUITIA.

TARQUITIA. and MuUer, and [L. and [20x131]cities. with enlarged, of that quinii and many others; and lastly, that the wife of the elder Tarquinius was called in one tradition, not Tanaquil, but Caia Caecilia, a name which may be traced to Caeculus, the mythic founder of Praeneste. These arguments, however, have not much weight, and certainly are insufficient to refute the universally received belief of antiquity in the Etruscan origin of the Tarquins, which is made probable by the great architectural works undertaken in the time of the last Roman kings, works to which no Sabine or Latin town could lay claim, and which at that time could have been accomplished by the Etruscan alone. Moreover the tradition which connects Tarquinii with the Luceres, the third ancient Roman tribe, again points to Etruria; for although Niebuhr looks upon the Luceres as Latins, most subsequent scholars have with far more probability supposed the third tribe to have been of Etruscan origin. (Comp. Becker, Handbuch der Hóminischen Altherthümer, vol. ii. part i. p. 30.) The statement of Dionysius that Tarquinius Priscus conquered the whole of Etruria, and was acknowledged by the twelve Etruscan cities as their ruler, to whom they paid homage, must certainly be rejected, when we recollect the small extent of the Roman dominions under the preceding king, and the great power and extensive territory of the Etruscans at that time. It is far more probable that Rome was conquered by the Etruscans, and that the epoch of the Tarquins represents an Etruscan rule at Rome. This is the opinion of K. O. Müller. He supposes that the town of Tarquinii was at this time at the head of Etruria, and that the twelve Etruscan cities did homage to the ruler of Tarquinii. He further supposes that Rome as well as a part of Latium acknowledged the supremacy of Tarquinii; and that Rome was the most important of the possessions of Tarquinii towards the south, it was fortified and enlarged, and thus became a great and flourishing city. Many Tarquinian nobles would naturally take up their abode at Rome, and one of them might have been entrusted by Tarquinius with the government of the city. Müller however thinks that L. Tarquinius is not the real name of the Etruscan ruler, but that Lucius is the Latinized form of Lucumo, and that Tarquinius merely indicates his origin from Tarquinii. According to Müller the banishment of the Tarquins was not an isolated event confined to Rome, but was connected with the fall of the city of Tarquinii, which lost at that time its supremacy over the other Etruscan cities. (Müller, Etrusker, vol. i. p. 118, &c.)

TARQUINII. 1. P. TARQUINIUS, tribune of the plebs with Livius Drusus, b.c. 91, supported the latter in the laws which he proposed. (J. Oeag. c. 114.)

2. L. TARQUINIUS, one of Catiline's conspirators, turned informer, and accused M. Crassus of being privy to the conspiracy. (Sall. Cat. 48.)

TARQUITIA GENS, was of patrician rank, and of great antiquity, but only one member of it is mentioned, namely L. Tarquinius Flaccus, who wasmagister equitum to the dictator Cincinnatus in b.c. 458 [Flaccus]. The other Tarquinius whose names occur towards the end of the republic, can scarcely be regarded as members of the patrician gens.

2. L. TARQUIN, mentioned by Cicero in b.c. 50. (Cic. ad Att. vii. 8. § 4.)

3. Q. TARQUIN, occurs only on coins, of which a specimen is annexed. The obverse represents a woman's head with c. Anniius, and the reverse Victory in a biga, with q. TARQUIN. A similar coin is figured in Vol. i. p. 180, with the name of L. Fabius on the obverse; and Eckhel supposes that Q. Tarquinus and L. Fabius were the quaeones of C. Annius, who fought in Spain against Sertorius in b.c. 82. (Eckhel, vol. v. pp. 134, 322.)

T'A'R'TARIUS (Tárra'tos), a son of Aether and Ge, and by his mother Ge the father of the Gigantes, Typhoeus and Echidna. (Hygin. Poet. p. 3, &c.; Fab. 152; Hes. Theog. 821; Apollod. ii. 1. § 2.) In the liad Tartar is a place far below the earth, as far below Hades as Heaven is above the earth, and closed by iron gates. (Hom. Ill. viii. 13, &c., 481; comp. Hes. Theog. 807.) Later poets describe Tartarus as the place in the lower world in which the spirits of wicked men are punished for their crimes, and sometimes they use the name as synonymous with Hades or the lower world in general; and poter Tartarus is used for Pluto. (Val. Flacc. iv. 258.) (L. S.)

TASIACES. [SABACES.]

TATIANUS. [Tatias], a Christian writer of the second century, was born, according to his own statement (Orat. ad Graecos, sub fin.) in Assyria, and was educated in the religion and philosophy of the Greeks. (ibid.) Clement of Alexandria (Strum. lib. iii. c. xii. § 81, ed Klotz. Lips. 1831), Epiphanius, in the body of his work (Haeres. xlvii.), and Theod-rect (Hae ret. Fedal. Compendium, lib. i. c. 29), call him "the Syrian," or "a Syrian by race;" but Epiphanius, in another place (adv. Haeres. Indicul. ad lib. i. vol. iii.), followed by Joannes Damascenus (De Haeresib. apud Coteler. Eccles. Graec. Monum. vol. l. p. 292), says he was a Mesopotamian; a statement which is adopted by Cave and some other moderns. Tatian's own authority would of course be decisive; were it not for the vagueness with which the names Assyria and TATIANUS.

Syria are used by the ancients; however, it think it most probable that by "the land of the Assyrians" (ἐν τῇ τοῦ Ασσυρίων γῇ) Tatian means the country east of the Tigris; but his mode of expression affords some ground to think that though born in the land of Assyria, he was not of Assyrian race; and his name has some appearance of being Roman. He appears to have followed the profession of a sophist, or teacher of rhetoric; and he was perhaps a teacher of philosophy also (comp. Tatian. Orat. ad Graec. c. ii. and i.iii.; Euseb. H. E. iv. 16; Hieron. De Viris Illust. c. 29; Theodoret. i. c.), though Valesius (Not. in Euseb. H. E. v. 16) has argued against the supposition. He certainly acquired a considerable knowledge of Greek literature. His travels over many countries, and appears to have engaged in a variety of pursuits (τέχνες καὶ ἐπιστοικεῖα ἑγκρίψας πολλακις, Orat. ad Graec. c. ivi.) until, at last, he came to Rome. He had probably imbibed the doctrines of the Platonic philosophy (comp. Orat. ad Graec. c. xix. and Worth's note in loc.), but he was dissatisfied with the hollowness of the professions of the philosophers of his day, and disgusted with the cruelty and impurity of the worship both of the Greeks and Romans (Orat. ad Graec. cc. xliii.—xlvii.); and his mind was anxiously longing for something more ennobling, when he met with the Scriptures of the Old Testament. By the perusal of these, his conversion to Christianity was effected. Whether his connection with Justin Martyr, of whom, according to the testimony of Irenæus (Adr. Haeres. lib. i. c. 31), Epiphanius (Haeres. xlvi.), Jerome (l. c.), Philastrius (De Haeres. c. 48), and Theodoret (l. c.), he was the earner or disciple, was previous to his conversion or subsequent to it, is not clear.

During Justin's life, Tatian remained in connection with the Catholic church; but after Justin's death he embraced views of a Gnostic character, with which probably the notions imbibed during his early residence in the East disposed him to sympathize. Whether he had been previously restrained by the influence of Justin from embracing those views, is not clear, though Irenæus, Jerome, and Epiphanius seem to intimate that he had. He appears to have remained for a time after Justin's death in communion with the church. Tillemont thinks that after Justin's death many of his disciples, among them Rhodon (Βιογραφίαη) placed themselves under Tatian's instruction; but though Rhodon himself (apud Euseb. H. E. v. 13) states that he was a disciple of Tatian, it does not follow that this was after Justin's death. Like Justin, Tatian engaged in controversies with the philosophers of his day, attacking them on the corruptions of heathenism, and pointing out the superiority of the Jewish and Christian religions. He was involved in a dispute with the Cynic Crescens (Crescens), whom he charges with having plotted his death, as well as that of Justin. [JUSTINUS, No. 1.]

His embracing, at least his avowal of his heretical opinions, was apparently not very long after Justin's death, otherwise we cannot account for the general impression that he had been kept from him by a judicial sentence of excommunication. It appears to have broached his obnoxious sentiments at Rome. According to Epiphanius, he returned into the East, and there imbibed and promulgated them. The statement of Epiphanius (l. c.), followed by Josephus [JOSEPHUS, No. 12] in his Hypomnemation, that they were broached in Mesopotamia, leads to the conclusion that Tatian settled in that province; but when he further states that they were embraced by some persons at Antioch, the capital of Syria, and spread from thence into Cilicia and Pisidia, we cannot determine whether this was through the personal exertions and teaching of Tatian, or whether through some of his disciples. We have no further account of him; and neither the time nor place of his death is known. In fact, the chronology of his whole life is uncertain; we only know that he was contemporary with Justin, and was at Rome before and at the time of Justin's death, and that which, as we have shown elsewhere [JUSTINUS, No. 1], is by no means determined, but may be probably fixed in or near A.D. 166 or 167.

The followers of Tatian constituted a sect, designated from him Tatiani. (Epiph. Haeres. xlvi.; Augustin. Haeres. xxv.) They appear to have been nearly identical with the Encratitae (the name is variously written "Ἐγκρατεῖς, Irenæus, Adv. Haeres. lib. i. c. 30, "Ἐγκρατιταῖς, Epiph. Haeres. xlvi.; or "Ἐγκρατιταῖς, Clem. Alex. Strom. lib. i. c. 15, "Σιασικοί, Euseb. H. E. iviv.; and the Severiani, who derived their name from Severus, a contemporary of Tatian. [SEVERUS, Greek, literary and ecclesiastical, No. 3.] These sects were also known by the name of "Θησαπαραττάται, "Hydroparastatae," or "Offerers of water," from their use of water in the Eucharist. From this last peculiarity they were called by some of the Latin fathers (Augustin. Haeres. lviii.; Philastrius, Haeres. lxviii.) "Aquearii." Tillemont has collected a number of other names which he supposes he has been given them. The tenets of the Tatiani and Encratitae and Severiani, whether these names denote one sect, or different, but kindred sects, partook of the usual character of the Gnostic body to which they belonged. Tatian held the doctrine of Aeons, which he is said to have derived from Valentine or Marcion (Philastrius, Haeres. lxviii.), and to have given further development to it. He distinguished the Demiurgus, the Creator of the world and giver of the Mosaic law, from the Supreme and Benignant God, from whom the Gospel came. Epiphanius (a not very trustworthy authority), ascribes to the Severiani the belief that beside the Supreme Being there was a great ruler of the powers" named "Iadabatho, or Sabeloth, "Saiasoth" (an obvious corruption of the "Jehovah-Sabaoth" of the Jewish Scriptures), of whom Ω διάδελλων, "the devil," was the son; and that the devil, being by the Supreme God cast down to the earth in the form of a serpent, produced the vine, the tendrils of which indicated their origin by their serpent-like form; they ascribed also to the devil the formation of woman, and of the lower part of the man. The "ruler of the powers," Iadabatho, is apparently the Demiurgus of Tatian; but how far the other opinions described were held by him is not clear; it is, however, remarkable that he and his followers abstained from wine and animal food, and condemned marriage. But what especially shocked the piety and charity of the Catholics was Tatian's affirming the damnation of Adam, a "blasphemy" which is said to have originated with him, and drew upon him especial odium.

The sects of the Tatiani and Severiani are said by Epiphanius to have been nearly extinct in his time: but this can hardly mean more than that the names had gone into disuse; for the Encyclopaedists, whom we take to have been substantially the same, were still numerous in Pisidia, the Torrid Phrygia (πῆς Κεκαυμένης), and other districts of Asia Minor.

Tatian is said to have rejected some of St. Paul's Epistles (Hieronym. Proem. in Comment. in Titum), but to have received others. He also received, but not without mutatio, the four Gospels. (Irenaeus, l. c. and c. 61; Clem. Alex. l. c. and Fragmenta Propheticer. selecta, c. 30; Origen, De Oratione, p. 17, ed. Oxford; Hieronym. De Viris Illust. c. 17, alibi; Epiphanius, Angustia Philos. De Excidio Babylon, ii. 16, and rather his anonymous continuator, De Praeceptor. Haereticor. c. 52; Theodoret, Haeretic. Fustb. Compend. lib. i. c. 20; Chron. Paschale, p. 260, ed. Paris, p. 486, ed. Boun; comp. Neander, Church History (by Rose), vol. ii. p. 109.)

Tatian was a voluminous writer. Eusebius speaks of him in one place (H. E. iv. 16) as "leaving many memorials in his writings;" and in another place (H. E. iv. 29) he says, "he left a great number of writings, of which the most celebrated is his Discurso to the Greeks." Jerome also states (De Viris Illust. c. 17) that he wrote "a countless number of volumes" (infinita volumina); of which, however, even then, the above-mentioned discourse was the only one extant, at least so far as Jerome was informed. The Diatessaron was, however, still in existence, though Jerome does not mention it, either because he did not regard it as an original work, but only an arrangement of the Gospels, or perhaps because its existence was not known to him. The other works of Tatian were probably either such as the early Christians were little interested in, or were so replete with wild speculations of his later years, as never to have had any circulation in the orthodox portion of the church.

The Pròs Ἐλλάνωρν, Oratio adversus Græcos, as the title is commonly though incorrectly rendered (we believe it should be ad Græcos), is still extant, and is a remonstrance addressed to the Greeks on their repugnance to, and contempt for, the opinions of foreigners. Jerome (De Viris Illust. c. 17) and Rufinus translate the title Contra Gentiles; but the contents of the work show that Ἐλλάνωρ is not used as equivalent to Ἑλληνικα, "Gentiles" (a usage not doubt sufficiently common), but in its proper significance of "Greeks," as distinguished from Βαρβάροι, "Foreigners." This is clear from the opening sentence of the work, Μῆν ἐπήκθον εἰς ἔργως συμβαίνει τῶν τούτων ἐλλήνων, καὶ ἀδρές Ἐλλάνωρ, μὴ διάφρημνη τοῖς τούτω οἴκειμαι. "Be not quite hostile, O Greeks, in your disposition towards foreigners, and do not regard their opinions unfavourably." He then proceeds to show that they (the Greeks) had derived their own usages from the very foreigners whom they despised, borrowing from Telmessus the art of divination from dreams, astrology from the Carians, augury from the flight of birds from the ancient Phrygians and Issarians, the practice of sacrifice from Cyprus, astronomy from Babylon, magic from Persia, geometry from Egypt, and alphabetic writing from Phoenicia, &c. (c. 1. 2.) He rakes together the current charges of folly against their philosophers, and of wickedness against their heroes. (c. 3—6.) He unfolds his views of the Supreme Being (c. 6, 7), of the Logos (c. 7, 8), of the resurrection (c. 9, 10), of the freedom of the will, both of men and angels (c. 10), and of the fall (c. 11). He then exposes the follies and crimes ascribed to the divinities of the Greeks in the popular theology (c. 12—17), and contrasts with them the purer morality, and the more elevated views of the universe and of God, and of the divine administration, which he had received (c. 17, foll.). Throughout the work he pursues a similar strain of argument, examining the metaphysics and theology of his opponents, pointing out the superiority of the religion of the Jewish and Christian Scriptures, and insisting on the superior antiquity of Moses, the oldest Jewish writer, when compared with Homer, the oldest Greek writer. It has been a subject of dispute with the learned, how far this work of Tatian shows indications of those heretical views, the development of which afterwards entailed upon him so much odium. Brucker, in his Historia Critica Philosophiae, endeavours to show that Tatian's philosophy, even while he was accounted orthodox, was grievously corrupted by the mixture of Cabalistic, Gnostic, and Neoplatonic notions; on the other hand, Lange (Historia Dogmatica, vol. i. p. 233, &c.), Bull (De fide, Fidei, Novae, sect. iii. c. 6), and Cellier (Auteurs Sacrés, vol. iii. p. 127), contend for his orthodoxy. Certainly some of his sentiments are of a very fanciful character, and his speculations very remote from the simplicity of Christian truth, but he was, when he wrote this work, far from holding the characteristic doctrines of Gnosticism, such as the eternity and evil nature of matter, and the alienation or hostility between the Supreme God and the Demiurges or Creator.

The Greek text of this remarkable work was first published with a Latin version by Conrad Gesner, with the Sententiae of Antonius Melissas and Maximus, and the Ad Autolycum of Theophilus of Antioch, fol. Zuric. 1546. The Latin version of these works, by Gesner, was published separately, and that of Tatian was frequently reprinted in the successive editions of the Bibliotheca Patrum of De la Bigne, Paris, 1575, 1589, 1610, Cologne, 1618, 1640, Lyon, 1677, and also in the Mella Patrum of Francis Rous, 8vo. London, 1650, pp. 66, &c.; and both the Latin version of Gesner, and the original Greek, but varying from Gesner's text, are given in the Orthographograph of Heralds, fol. Basle, 1555 (Cave speaks of a previous edition in A.D. 1551), and in the Auctarium of Ducaeus (Pronto Le Duci), fol. Paris, 1624. They were published also with the writings of Justin Martyr, Athanagoras, Theophilus, and Hermeias, Paris, 1615 and 1656, and Cologne (or rather Wittenberg), 1656. The last edition has the notes of Kortholt. Cave speaks of an edition of Tatian in folio, Paris, 1616, but Fabricius does not notice it. But the most valuable edition was that of William Worth, archdeacon of Worcester, 8vo. Oxford, 1700, which contained, besides a revised Greek text of Tatian, and of the Irrisio Gentilium Philosophorum of Hermeias, the Latin versions of Tatian by Gesner, and of Hermeias by Seiler, the entire notes of Gesner, Ducaeus, Kortholt, and others, and some valuable Dissertations. The Oratio ad Græcos was also given by Prudentius Marin. in his (the Benediction) edition of Justin Martyr, fol. Paris, 1742, in the first vol. of Gaillard's Bibliotheca Patrum, fol. Venice, 1765, and in the third vol. of theSynopsis Patrum Opera Politiana, 8vo. Wurzurg, 1777.

Of the other works of Tatian only a few fragments are preserved: indeed we do not even know the names of more than a few of his "infinita volumina." They are as follows. 1. Περὶ τοῦ κατά τὴν Σοφίαν καταρτισμοῦ, De Perfectione secondum Servatorem. This work is quoted by Clement of Alexandria (Stron. lib. iii. c. 12). It was written after he had become heretical, for the passage cited by Clement is in condemnation of matrimony. 2. Προδιδακτάς βιβλίων, Quaestionum Liber, mentioned by Rhodon (apud Euseb. H. E. vi. 13), but it is not clear that Tatian ever completed the work, or did more than form the plan: it was to be on the difficulties of the Scriptures. 3. Πρὸς τὸν ἅγιον Ἱστορίαν, Adversus eos qui sese detrueunt rebus divinis. This work is mentioned by Tatian himself in his Oratio ad Graecos, c. 92, but in terms which render it doubtful whether he had then written the work or only projected it. 4. Περὶ γένους, De Animalibus, mentioned by Tatian as already written by him (ib. c. 24). 5. He wrote also, as he tells us, a work in which he had treated of demons, and of the state of the soul after death (ib. c. 24), but he does not mention the title of the work. 6. Διὰ τεσσάρων, Divissorium, s. Harmonia Evangeliorum. Eusebius mentions the work (H. E. vi. 29), but in such a way as to show he had not seen it: Jerome does not even mention it (De Vir. Illustr. c. 17), but Theodoret says it was used not only by Tatian's more immediate followers, but by some other heretics, and even by the orthodox; for Theodoret himself collected above two hundred copies from what he calls "our churches" (ταΐς παν τῆι ἐκκλησίαις), apparently the churches of his own diocese, in exchange for which he gave or procured for them copies of the four gospels. According to him, not only the genealogies, but all the parts which recognized the descent of Jesus from David were omitted, so that the compilation was evidently made after Tatian had become heretical, and on a principle consistent with his heretical sentiments. The work has perished. There is extant an Harmonia Evangeliorum in Latin, translated by Victor, bishop of Capua, a writer of the middle of the sixth century, from a Greek manuscript, which did not contain any author's name. Victor sought to discover the author, and after weighing and rejecting the claims of Ammonius of Alexandria to be so considered, ascribed it to Tatian. There is also extant an ancient Tuscan or German version (versio Theotisca) of this Harmonia. The Latin version was published under the name of Tatian in the Orthodoxographia of Heliodrus, fol. Basel, 1555, and of Grynaeus, fol. Basel, 1569, and in successive editions of the Bibliotheca Patrum of De la Bigne, fol. Paris, Prolegom. vii. 10. 1654, and Cologne, 1618. But as this Harmonia, which contains the words of the sacred writers, contains the genealogies, critics discovered that it had been incor- rectly ascribed to Tatian; and in the Lyon edition of the Bibliotheca Patrum, fol. 1677, and in the Bibliotheca Patrum of Galland, fol. Venice, 1765, &c., it appears under the name of Ammonius, to whom most critics, but not all, now ascribe it. [AMMONIUS SACAS.] The ancient German version was published, but in an incomplete form, by Paltenius, 4to. Griesfeld, 1706, and more fully, but still far from completely, in the Theologiae Antiquitatum Tentamenarum of Schlüter, fol. Ulm, 1729, vol. ii. p. 57, &c. Some supplementary portions are given by Hess, in the Biblioth. der Hist. Gesch. Hesse, part ii. p. 543—570. Another Latin Har- monia, so called, but which is in fact a condensed narrative of the History of Jesus Christ, arranged chronologically under the three years to which the writer supposed, the public ministry of the Saviour extended, was published in the Microprophylogion, fol. Basel, 1556, in the two editions of the Orthodoxographia, and in the successive editions of the Bibliotheca Patrum of De la Bigne. In nearly all these it is given under the name of Ammonius, but it appears in the edition of the Bibliotheca, Lyon, 1677, under that of Tatian, to whom some critics have been disposed to ascribe it. Even Cave at one time held that opinion, though he afterwards renounced it; and the cautious and judicious Lardner was strongly inclined to it. Yet the work is by no means such as the description of Theodoret implies; and the general opinion of critics is unfavourable to the authorship of Tatian, to whom we can only wonder that any should have ascribed it. Le Nourry, the editor of the Lyon Bibliotheca, in his Dissertation in Tatianum, justly rejects the opinion which ascribes it to him. Rufinus, in his Historia Ecclesiastica (vi. 11), ascribes to Tatian a Chronicorum. This statement is usually considered as erroneous, and is supposed to rest on the misinterpretation of a passage in Eusebius (H. E. vi. 13); but it is to be observed that the author of the Chronicon Paschale (l. c.) and Joannes Malalas, call Tatian "a chronicographer," and refer to his notice of the quarrel of Peter and Paul at Antioch. Jerome (Epist. ad Magnus, ep. 61, edit. vett.; 83, ed. Benedictin.; 70, ed Vallarsi) says that Tatian had pointed out that various here- laces had arisen from the opinions of the heathen philosophers; but he does not say to what work he refers. Eusebius says that some had charged Tatian with corrupting certain passages in the writings of the apostle Paul, under the plea of correcting their inaccuracies of construction; but we know not to what work of Tatian he refers; nor would the charge imply more than that he had paraphrased those passages. The ancient authorities for this article have been referred to in the course of it. We subjoin those of modern date:—Cave, Hist. Litt. ad ann. 172, vol. ii. p. 75, and ad ann. 220 (s. v. Ammonius), p. 109, &c., ed. Oxford, 1740—1743; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. vii. p. 87, &c.; Maran, Præfatio ad Justini Martyrium Opera, fol. Paris, 1742, pars iii. c. 10—12; Le Nourry and Anonym. (Rose's translation). [J. C. M.] T. TATTIUS, king of the Sabines. [ROMULUS.] T. TAURÉA, JUBELLIIUS, a Campanian of high rank and distinguished bravery in the second Punic war. He fought with Claudius Asellus in single combat in b. c. 215, and put an end to his own life on the capture of Capua by the Romans in b. c. 211. (Liv. xxxii. 3, 46, 47, xxvi. 15; comp. Cic. in Piso. 1.) T. TAUREUS (Taurpeus), a surname of Poseidon, given to him either because bulls were sacrificed to him, or because he was the divinity that gave green 316.
TAURION, a Macedonian officer in the service of Antigonus Doson, king of Macedonia, who had risen to so high a place in the confidence of that monarch the latter appointed him, by his last will, his regent in the minority of Philip V. (Polyb. iv. 6, 87.) In this position we find him in B.C. 221, assisting the Athenian praetor Timoxenus in reducing the strong post of Clarium, which had been occupied by the Aetolians; and again, in B.C. 220, co-operating with Aratus against the intruders of the Aetolians, which terminated in the battle of Caphyae and the destruction of Cynetha. (Id. iv. 6, 10, 19.) In B.C. 218, when Philip in person led an army into the Peloponnesse, we once more find Taurion mentioned as rendering efficient assistance to his youthful sovereign in the invasion of Elis. So great indeed was the reputation and influence which he now enjoyed, that Apelles deemed it absolutely necessary, for the furtherance of his ambitious designs, to remove Taurion from the important post which he held, an object which he sought to effect without the pretence of attaching him more closely to the king’s person. His designs were, however, detected, and Philip gave a fresh proof of his confidence in Taurion by placing under his command the troops whose fidelity had been corrupted by Leontius. (Id. iv. 80, 87, v. 27.) From this time we find him retaining the chief direction of the war in the Peloponnesse, as well as rendering other important services: thus, in B.C. 217, we find him sent, together with Aratus, to treat with the Aetolians at Naupactus. He had, however, already displayed some jealousy of the Athenian leader, and appears to have done his best to inflame the growing enmity of Philip towards Aratus, until he at length lent his aid to the young king to remove his former friend and counsellor by means of secret poison, B.C. 214. (Id. v. 92, 93, 103, viii. 14; Plat. Arat. 52.) The part taken by Taurion in this transaction, is sufficient evidence of his character; and it is to him, in conjunction with Demetrius the Pharan, that Polybius imputes the blame of perverting and corrupting the naturally good disposition of Philip. (Polyb. ix. 23.)

TAURIONE, TAURO, TAUROPOLOS, or TAUROPOPOS (Ταυρόπος, Ταυρόφωλας, Ταυροπόλος), originally a designation of the Taurian goddess, but also used as a surname of Artemis or even Athena, both of whom were identified with the Taurian goddess. (Hesych. s.v. ταυροπόλας.) The name has been explained in different ways, some supposing that it means the goddess worshiped in Tauris, going around (ι.e. protecting) the territory of Tauris, or the goddess to whom bulls are sacrificed; while others explain it to mean the goddess riding on bulls, drawn by bulls, or killing bulls. Both explanations seem to have some thing in common, namely, that the bull was probably the ancient symbol of the bloody and savage worship of the Taurian divinity. (Schol. ad Soph. Arg. 172; Eurip. Iphig. Taur. 1457; Müller, Orph. p. 305, &c. 2d ed.)

TAURISCUS, a Greek grammarian, and a disciple of Crates. (Sextus Empir. adv. Mathem. i. 248, p. 268, ed. Fabrie.) The Greek actor of this name, spoken of by Theophrastus, must have been a different person. (Cic. de Orat. iii. 59.)

TAURISCUS, artists. 1. A sculptor of Tralles, who, with his brother Apollonius, made the celebrated Toro Farnese. (Apollonius.) Pliny also mentions his Hieraerides, in the collection of Asintus Polio. (H. N. xxxvi. 5. s. 4 § 10.)

2. Of Cyzicus, a distinguished silver-chaser (exx. 3d cent.) from whom Pliny distinguishes from the above artist (l.c.) He elsewhere mentions him, in his list of silver-chasers, as forging better soon after Stratoniceus. (xxxiii. 12. 85.)

3. A painter, mentioned by Pliny among the artists who were præmiis proximi. His works were a Dieocles, Cynthiaeæstra, Paniscus, Polynikes regum repetens and Cayanes. The Polynikes and Cayanes, it may be presumed, formed parts of one composition, representing the battle of the Seven Chiefs against Thebes. (Plin. H. N. xxxv. 11. s. 40. § 40.)

TAUROCEPHALUS (Ταυροκεφαλός, also Ταυρόκεφαλος, Σταυροκέφαλος, &c.), a surname of Dionysus in the Orphic mysteries. (Orph. Hymn. 51. 2; comp. TAURUS.) It also occurs as a surname of rivers and the ocean, who were symbolically represented as bulls, to indicate their fertilising effect upon countries. (Eurip. Iphig. Aur. 275, Orest. 1378; Aelian, V. H. II. 33; Horat. Carm. iv. 14, 25.)

TAUROPOLOS (Ταυροπόλος). 1. A daughter of the Megarian Cleson, who was believed, together with her sister Cleso, to have found and buried the body of Iuno, which had been washed on the coast of Megara. (Paus. i. 42, in fin.)

2. A son of Dionysus and Ariadne. (Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. iii. 957.)

TAURUS (Ταῦρος), a bull, occurs: 1. as a surname of Dionysus. (Eurip. Bacch. 918; Athen. xi. p. 476; Plut. Quaest. Græc. 36; Lycoeph. Cass. 209.)

2. According to some, another name for Tale. (Apollod. i. 9, § 26.)

3. A son of Neleus and Chloris. (Apollod. L. 9, § 9.)

TAURUS, ANTΩNIUS, a tribune of the praetorian cohorts, a.d. 69. (Tac. Hist. i. 28.)

TAURUS BERTYTIUS, a Platonic philosopher, who defended the Platonic philosophy.
TAURUS. against Aristotle. (Fabric. Bibli. Graec. vol. iii. p. 144.)

TAURUS. PACUVIUS [Pacuvius, No. 3].

TAURUS. STATILIIUS. 1. Statilius Taurus, one of the most distinguished of Octavian's generals. His name appears in the Fasti as consul suffectus in B. c. 37, but he is first mentioned by ancient writers in the following year in the war against Sex. Pompeius, in Sicily. He commanded Antony's fleet, which sailed from Tarentum, and he rendered important services in the war. After the flight of Pompeius from Sicily, Taurus sailed over to Africa, which he secured for Octavian without difficulty. In B. c. 34 he received the honour of a triumph on account of his success in Africa (Fasti Capit.), and in the course of the same year he accompanied Octavian to Dalmatia, and was left in the country in command of the army when Octavian returned to Rome. At the battle of Actium, in B. c. 31, Taurus commanded the land-force of Octavian, which was drawn up on the shore. In B. c. 29 he defeated the Cantabri, Vaecae, and Astures. He was raised to the consulship in B. c. 26; and in B. c. 16, when the emperor went to Gaul, the government of the city and of Italy was left to Taurus, with the title of praefectus urbi. (Appian. B. C. v. 97—99, 103, 105, 109, 118; Dion Cass. xlv. 14. 38; Appian. Ill. 27; Dion Cass. I. 13; Plut. Ant. 63; Dion Cass. lii. 20, liii. 29, liv. 19; Tac. Ann. vii. 11; Vell. Pat. ii. 127.) In the fourth consularship of Augustus, B. c. 30, Taurus built an amphitheatre of stone at his own expenses, and at its opening exhibited a show of gladiators; and the people in the great hall allowed him to appoint one of the praetors every year. This amphitheatre was burnt down in the great fire at Rome, in the reign of Nero. (Dion Cass. lii. 23, lxii. 18; Suet. Octav. 29; Tac. Ann. iii. 72.)

There was a Statilius Taurus, who was triumvir of the mint under Augustus, as we learn from coins, but whether he was the same person as the preceding cannot be determined. The annexed coin has on the obverse the legend, TAVRVS REPVLVS PVLCHER, and on the reverse, HIPIR A A A F F (Eckhel, vol. v. p. 316).

5. TAURUS STATILIUS CORVINUS, consul A. D. 45. [Corvinus.]

TA'XILES (Ta'xiles). 1. An Indian prince or king, who reigned over the tract between the Indus and the Hydaspes, at the period of the expedition of Alexander, B. c. 327. His real name was Mophis, or Omphis, and the Greeks appear to have called him Taxiles or Talilas, from the name of his capital city of Taxila, near the modern Attock. (Diod. xvii. 86; Curt. viii. 12. §§ 4, 14.) He appears to have been on terms of hostility with his neighbour Porus, with whom he partitioned the territories east of the Hydaspes, and it was probably with a view of strengthening himself against this foe, that he sent an embassy to Alexander, while the latter was yet in Sogdiana, with offers of assistance and support. On the approach of the conqueror he hastened to meet him with valuable presents, and placed himself and all his forces at his disposal. Nor were these vain professions: he assisted Hephaestion and Perdiccas in constructing a bridge over the Indus, supplied their troops with provisions, and received Alexander himself, and his whole army, in his capital city of Taxila, with every demonstration of friendship and the most liberal hospitality. (Arr. Anab. iv. 22, v. 3, 8; Curt. viii. 12; Diod. xvii. 86; Plut. Alex. 59, 65; Strab. xv. p. 698.) On the subsequent advance of the Macedonian king, Taxiles accompanied him with a force of 5000 men, and bore a part in the contest at the passage of the Hydaspes. After that victory he was sent by Alexander in pursuit of Porus, to whom he was charged to offer favourable terms, but narrowly escaped losing his life at the hands of his old enemy. Subsequently, however, the two rivals were reconciled by the personal mediation of Alexander; and Taxiles, after having contributed zealously to the equipment of the fleet on the Hydaspes, was intrusted by the king with the government of the whole territory between that river and the Indus. (Arr. Anab. v. 8, 18, 20; Curt. viii. 14. § 35, ix. 3. § 22.) A considerable accession of power was granted him after the death of Philip, son of Machatas; and he was allowed to retain his authority at the death of Alexander himself, as well as in the subsequent partition of the provinces at Triparadeisos, B. c. 321. (Arr. op. Phot. p. 72, a; Dexippus, ibid. p. 64. b.; Diod. xvii. 3, 39; Justin. xii. 4.) But at a subsequent period we find Eudemos, the commander of the Macedonian troops in his province, possessing the sole authority: whether Taxiles had been displaced by force or removed by a natural death, we are not informed.

2. A general in the service of Mithridates the Great, and one of those in whom he reposed the highest confidence. He is first mentioned in B. c. 86, when he was sent by Mithridates, with an army of not less than 110,000 men, to Europe, to make his way, through Thrace and Macedonia, to the assistance of Archelaus in Greece. This task he successfully accomplished, reduced Amphipolis, which had at first defied his arms, and having thus struck terror into the Macedonians, advanced without further opposition through that country and Thessaly, to Phocis. Here he at first laid siege to Elatea, but was foiled in his attacks, and relinquished the enterprise, in order to form a junction with Archelaus in Boeotia. This object he effected: but though the two generals now found themselves at the head of a formidable host, their combined forces were defeated by Sulla near Claeuconeza, with great slaughter. (Plut. Sull. 15, 16, 19; Mommsen, 5; Pass. i. 20, § 6, ix. 40, § 7; v. 34, § 2.) From this time we hear no more of Taxiles till b. c. 74, when he commanded (together with Hermocrates) the great army with which Mithridates invaded Paphlagonia and Bithynia, in the autumn of that year. During the subsequent operations at the siege of Cyzicus, he is mentioned as giving the king the most judicious advice. (Appian. Mithr. 70, 72.) After the defeat of the king and his retreat into his own territories, we again find Taxiles sharing with Diophantus the actual command of the army which Mithridates opposed to Lucullus near Cabeira, b. c. 72, where their skilful arrangements for a time held the balance of success doubtful, and reduced the Roman general to considerable straits for provisions. At length, however, the campaign was terminated by a total rout, in which the royal camp fell into the hands of the enemy. (Mommsen, 4; comp. App. Mith. 79—82; Plut. Lucull. 15, 17.) Taxiles accompanied Mithridates on his flight into Armenia, and we subsequently (a. e. 69) find him mentioned as present with Tigranes at the great battle of Tilmanocotta, on which occasion he in vain endeavoured to restrain the overweening confidence of the Armenian monarch. (Plut. Lucull. 27.) This is the last time that his name occurs in history.

3. A general who commanded the auxiliary troops from the Lesser Armenia, that joined the army of Pompey before the battle of Pharsalia, b. c. 48. (Appian. B. C. ii. 71.) [E. H. B.]

TAYGETE (Tαγετή), a daughter of Atlas and Pleione, one of the Pleiades. (Apollod. iii. 10. § 1.) By Zeus she became the mother of Lacedemon (Apollod. iii. 10. § 3; Pass. iii. 1, § 2, 16, § 7, 20, § 2) and of Evrotas. (Steph. Byz. s. v. Ταγετώτος.) Mount Taygetus, in Laconia, derived its name from her. (Schol. ad Eurip. Or. 615.) According to some traditions, Taygete refused to yield to the embraces of Zeus, and in order to escape him she took her own hand and transformed herself into a cow. Taygete showed her gratitude towards Armenia by dedicating to her the Cerynian hind with golden antlers. (Schol. ad Pind. Ol. iii. 53.) Some traditions, moreover, state that by Tantalus she became the mother of Pelops. (Hygin. Fab. 82.) [L. S.]

TEBRUS (Τεβρός), a son of Hippocoon, is also called Schrus. (Apollod. iii. 10. § 5; Pass. iii. 15. § 2; comp. Hippocoon; DORCUS.) [L. S.]

TECTAEUS AND ANGELION (Τεκταεύς καὶ Αγγελιών), early Greek satirics, who are always mentioned together. They were pupils of Dipoenon and Scylis, and instructors of Callon of Aegina; and therefore they must have flourished about Ol. 58, b. c. 546. (Paus. ii. 52. § 4; Callon; Dipoenon.) They belong to the latter part of the so-called Daedalian period. [DAEDAEUS.] The only work of theirs, of which we have any notice, is the celebrated statue for Apollo at Paestum, which has been attributed to them (ix. 32. § 1, s. 4; where the corrupt word Δωνυαίον is very difficult to correct: Müller has suggested χρυσοί: see Schultart and Walz's note), and more fully described by Pintarch (de Mus. 14, p. 1136, a.) The right hand of the statue held a bow, and in the left hand were the Graces, each holding an instrument of music, one the lyre, another the flute, and the third the panpipes (στρυφιά.) The tradition which ascribed the image to the Meropes in the time of Heracles, if worth anything, must signify that it was, like other works of the early Greek artists, a copy of an older image of unknown antiquity. If so, we may conjecture that it was of wood; and this tallies with Müller's correction of Pausanias, χρυσοί, which, if the true reading, must mean that the image was of wood gilt. The statue is also mentioned by Athenagorus, who further ascribes to the artists a statue of Artemis, but this statement cannot be accepted on such authority. (Legat. pro Christ. 14, p. 61, Dechaire.) There are copies of the Delian Apollo on gems and on Attic coins. (Müller, Archäol. d. Kunst, § 86, note.) [P. S.]

TECMESSA (Τέκμισσα), the daughter of the Phrygian king Teleutas, whose territory was ravaged by the Greeks during a predatory excursion from Troy. Tecmessa was made prisoner, and was given to Ajax, the son of Telamon, who lived with her as his wife, and had by her a son, Euryseca. (Soph. Ajax; Schol. ad Hom. Il. i. 133.) [L. S.]

TEIDUS. 1. Sex. Teidus, a senator, who carried the body of Christus to Rome, after the murder of the latter by Mithridates. (Ascon, in Cist. Misc. p. 33, ed. Orelli.)

2. Teidus Afek, consul designateus under Augustus, put an end to his own life, terrified by the threats of the emperor. (Suet. Octav. 27.)

3. Q. Teidus, one of the friends of Augustus, notorious for his luxury. (Tact. Ann. i. 10.)

TEGETAES (Τέγεταίης), a son of Lycan, and the reputed founder of Tegea in Arcadia. (Paus. viii. 3, § 1, 45, § 1.) He was married to Maera, by whom he had two sons, Leon and Scephrus. (Paus. viii. 53, § 1.) His tomb was shown at Tegea. (Paus. viii. 48, § 4.) [L. S.]

TEGULIA, P. LICI'NIUS, the author of a religious poem, which was sung by the Roman virgins in b. c. 200. (Liv. xxxi. 12.) Vossius supposed that he was the same person as the comic poet C. Licinius Irmiucus, but this is not probable. [Imbr.]

TEGYPHIUS (Τεγύψιος), a Thracian king who received Eumolpus and his son Ismarus, and gave to the former his kingdom. (Apollod. iii. 15. § 4; comp. EUMOLPUS.) [L. S.]

TEIRESIAS or TIRESIAS (Τηρεσίας), a son of Evers (or Phorbas, Ptolemy Hecapoet. 1) and Charicle, whom he is sometimes called Eot-peián. (Callim. Lap. Poll. 81; Theocrit. Id. xxiv. 70.) He belonged to the ancient family of Udea at Thebes, and was one of the most renowned soothsayers in all antiquity. He was blind from his seventh year, but lived to a very old age. The cause of his blindness was believed to have been the fact that he had revealed to men things which, according to the will of the gods, the mightiest, for him to know, or that he had seen when he was bathing, on which occasion the goddess is said to have blinded him, by sprinkling water into his face. Charicle prayed to Athena to restore his sight to him, but as the goddess was unable to do this, she conferred upon him the power to understand the voices of the birds, and gave him a staff, with the help of which he could walk as safely as if he had his eyesight. (Apollod. iii. 6, § 7; Callim. Lap.
was one of the Calydonian hunters and of the Argonauts. (Apollod. i. 8. § 2. 9. § 16. iii. 12. § 7; Paus. i. 42. § 4; Hygin. Fab. 173; Tzetz. ad Lyogeph. 175.) Miltiades traced his pedigree to Telamon. (Paus. iii. 29. §§ 4.) After Telamon and Peleus had killed their step-brother Phoecs (Phocus), they were expelled by Aeacus from Aegina, and Telamon went to Cyclopes in Samos, who bequeathed to him his kingdom. (Apollod. i. c.; Paus. ii. 29. §§ 2, 7.) He is said to have been a great friend of Hercules (Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. i. 1209; Theod. Id. xiii. 39), and to have joined him in his expedition against Laomedon of Troy, which city he was the first to enter. He there erected to Hercules Calligisus or Arlesigus, an altar. Hercules, in return, gave to him Theaneira, or Hesione, a daughter of Laomedon, by whom he became the father of Teneus and Trambelus. (Apollod. ii. 6. § 4. iii. 10. § 8, 12. § 7; Tzetz. ad Lyogeph. 468; Diod. iv. 39.) On this expedition Telamon and Hercules also fought against the Meropes in Cos, on account of Chalciope, the beautiful daughter of Euryyps, the king of the Meropes, and against the giant Alciones, on the sthiums of Corinth. (Pind. Nem. iv. 40, &c., with the Schol.) He also accompanied Hercules on his expedition against the Amazons, and slew Melanipe. (Pind. Nem. iii. 65, with the Schol.) Respecting his sons, see Ajax and Telcuren. [L. S.]

TELChIN (Τελχίς), a son of Europa, and father of Apis, was king of Sicyon (Paus. ii. 5. § 5). According to Apollodoros (ii. 1. § 1. Τελχίς), in conjunction with Theseus, slew Apis, and was killed in consequence by Argus Panoptes. [L. S.]

TELCHINES (Τελχινες), a family, a class of people, or a tribe, said to have been descended from Thalassa or Poseidon, (Diod. v. 55; Nonn. Dionys. xiv. 40.) It is probably owing to this story about their origin, that Eustathius (ad Hom. p. 771) describes them as marine beings without feet, the place of the hands being occupied by fins, though in the same page he also states that originally they were the dogs of Actaeon, who were changed into men. The following are mentioned as the names of individual Telchines: — Μύλας (Hesych. s. r.), Atathysrus (Steph. Byz. s. v. Ἀτάθυς), Antaeus, Megaleus, Hormenus, Lyons, Icmon, Simon (Tzetz. Chil. vii. 124, &c., xii. 335; Zenob. Cent. 5, par. 41), Chryson, Argyron, Chalcion (Eustath. ad Hom. p. 772; Diod. v. 55). The accounts of the Telchines are very few and scanty, and in them they appear in three different relations: 1. As cultivators of the soil and ministers of the gods; and as such they came from Crete to Cyprus and from thence to Rhodes, or they proceeded from Rhodes to Crete and Boeotia, Rhodes, and in it the three towns of Cameirns, Ialyssos, and Lindos (whence the Telchines are called Ialyssii, Οv. Met. vii. 365), which was their principal seat and was named after them Τελχίνες (Sicyon also was called Telchinia, Eustath. ad Hom. p. 291), was abandoned by them, because they foresaw that the island would be inundated, and thence they scattered in different directions: Lyons went to Lycia, where he built the temple of the Lycian Apollo. This god was worshipped by them at Lindos (Ἀτάθυς Ἴλαιος), and Hera at Ialyssos and Cameirns (Ηήα τελχίνες), and Athena at Teunessus in Boeotia bore the surname of Telchinia. Nepheus also are called after them Telchiniae, Poseidon was in-trusted to them by Rhea, and they in conjunction with Capheira, a daughter of Oceanus, brought him up. (Diod. l. c.; Strab. xiv. p. 653; Paus. ix. 19. § 1.) Rhea, Apollo and Zeus, however, are also described as hostile to the Telchines (Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. i. 1141), for Apollo is said to have assumed the shape of a wolf and to have thus destroyed the Telchines (Serv. ad Aen. iv. 377; comp. Eustath. ad Hom. p. 771), and Zeus is said to have caused their destruction by an inundation (Ov. Met. vii. 367). 2. As sorcerers and enchanters. (Suid. s. v. Δαίμονας και γιάτρες; Strab. l. c.; Eustath. ad Hom. pp. 941, 1391.) Their very eyes and aspect are said to have been destructive. (I. c.; Tzetz. Chil. xii. 141.) They had in their power to bring on hail, rain, and snow, and to assume any form they pleased (Diod. l. c.); they further mixed Stygian water with sulphur, in order thereby to destroy animals and plants (Strab. xiv. p. 653).

3. As artists, for they are said to have invented useful arts and institutions in and to have made images of the gods. They worked in brass and iron, made the sickle of Cronos and the trident of Poseidon. (Diod. and Strab. l. c.; Callim. Hymn. in Del. 31.) This last feature in the character of the Telchines seems to have been the reason of their being put together with the Idaean Dactyls, and Strabo (x. p. 472) even states that those of the nine Rhodian Telchines who accompanied Rhea to Crete, and there brought up the infant Zeus, were called Curetes. (Comp. Hck, Creta, i. p. 345, &c.; Welcker, Die Aege. Triologie, p. 182, &c.; Lobock, Agyoomaph. p. 1182, &c.)

TELEBOAS (τελεβὼς). 1. A grandson of Lelex, a son of Pereklaus and brother of Taphus. (Eustath. ad Hom. p. 1473; Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. i. 747.) His descendants, the Teleboans, were believed to have settled in Acarmania. (Strab. vii. p. 322, x. p. 459.)

2. A son of Lycoan in Arcadia. (Apollod. iii. 8. § 1.)

3. A centaur. (Ov. Met. xii. 441.) [L. S.]

TELECLIDES (τελεκλίδης). A distinguished Athenian comic poet of the Old Comedy, flourished about the same time as Crates and Continus, and a little earlier than Aristophanes, with whom, how-ever, he may have been partly contemporary, and like whom he was an earnest advocate of peace, and a great admirer of the ancient manners of the age of Chemisctoles. Six plays are attributed to him (Anon. de Com. p. xxxiv.), perhaps including the one which the ancient critics considered spurious (Prynus, Ed. Att. p. 291?); for there are only five titles extant, Αμφικτονέως, Αρχέως, Ηαρδόων, Προφήτης, Στρατός. Of these plays we possess some interesting fragments, especially those in which he attacks Pericles and exalts Nicias. (Plut. Per. 3, 16, Nic. 4.) Meineke conjectures that the second of these fragments was written soon after the ostracism of Thucydides and the complete establishment of the power of Pericles, in Ol. 83, 4, n. c. 445. Bckr thinks that the anonymous quotation in Plutarch (Per. 7), referring to the subjugation of Euboia by Pericles, after it had revolted (n. c. 445), ought to be assigned to Telecleides, as well as a fragment in Herodian (περὶ μον. Α. Ε., p. 17, 11) respecting Aegina, which may very probably refer to the expulsion of the Aeginetans in n. c. 431 (Thuc. ii. 27). There are several other chronological allusions in the extant fragments, which are fully discussed by Meineke. (Meineke, Fragm. Com. Graec. vol. i. pp. 87—90, vol. ii. pp. 361—379, Editio Minor, pp. 130—138; Bergk, Relig. Com. Att. Ant. pp. 327—331.)

TELECLINES (τελεκλήσεως), was one of the ambassadors sent by the Achaean to Rome, in b. c. 160, to solicit the restoration of the remnant of the 1000 exiles, who had been taken by the Romans to Italy, in b. c. 167, after the conquest of Macedon. Telecles and his colleague Xeron, were especially enjoined to intercede on behalf of Polybius and Stratus and, to use towards the Roman senate no language but that of supplication. Their prayer was refused, and, in b. c. 155, Telecles and Xeron were sent again to Rome on mission. On this occasion the senate was more favourable to them, and there would have been a majority for granting their request, had it not been for the manoeuvring of A. Postumius (the praetor who presided) in putting the question. (Polyb. xxxii. 7, xxxiii. 1.) In the latter of these passages Polybius calls Telecles τὸν Αἴγεταν, but the conjectural substitution of Τεγεάτην is highly plausible. [E. E.]

TELECLIES (τελεκλής), artist. [Thedororus].

TELECLUS (τελέκλους), king of Sparta, 8th of the Agids, and son of Archelaus. In his reign the Spartans subdued the Achaean towns of Amycla, Pharis, and Geraoutha. Not long after these successes Teleclus was slain by the Messenians, in a temple of Artemis Limnatis, on the borders. According to the Spartan account, he had gone thither to offer sacrifice, with a company of men, in an attempt to rescue them from the violence of the Messenians. The Messenian statement, however, was, that he had treacherously brought with him a body of Spartan youths, disguised as maidens, and with daggers hidden under their dress, for the purpose of murdering a number of the noblest Messenians at the festival, and that the objects of the plot had killed him and his associates in self-defence. (Herod. vii. 204; Aristot. ap. Schol. ad Post. Ism. vii. 18; Paus. iii. 2, iv. 4; Ephor. ap. Strab. vi. p. 279; Clint. F. H. vol. i. pp. 129, 250, 337.) [E. E.]

TELEGONUS (Τελέγονος). 1. A son of Proteus and brother of Polygonus, was killed, together with his brother, by Heracles, whom they had challenged to a contest in wrestling. (Apollod. ii. 5. § 9; comp. POLYGONUS.)

2. A king of Egypt who married Io, after she had come to rest from her wandering and found her son Epaphus. (Apollod. ii. 1. § 3.) According to the Scholiast on Euripides (Ov. 920) this Telegonus was a son of Epaphus and a brother of Libya.

3. A son of Odysses by Circe. At the time when Odysses had returned to Ithaca, Circe sent out Telegonus in search of his father. A storm cast his ship on the coast of Ithaca, and being pressed by hunger, he began to plunder the fields. Odysses and Telemachus, on being informed of the navages caused by the stranger, went out to fight against him; but Telegonus ran Odysses through with a spear which he had received from his mother. (Comp. Horat. iii. 29. 8; Ov. Trist. i. 1, 114.) At the command of Athena, Telegonus accompanied by Telemachus and Penelope, went to Circe in Arne, there buried the body of Odysses.
and married Penelope, by whom he became the father of Ialysus. (Hes. Theog. 1014; Hygin. Fab. 127; Tzetz. ad Lyoph. 805; Eustath. ad Hom. pp. 1660, 1676; Serv. ad Aen. ii. 44; Lucian, De Sult. 46; Aristot. Poet. 14.) In Italy Telemachus was believed to have been the founder of the towns of Tusculum and Praeneste, (Ov. Fast. iii. 92, iv. 71; Hornt. l. c.; Dionys. Hal. iv. 45; Plut. Parall. Min. 41.) In some traditions Telephus (also called Teledamus) is described as a son of Odysseus by Calypso. (Eustath. ad Hom. p. 1796.)

TELEMACHUS (Πελαμαχος), the son of Odysseus and Penelope (Hom. Od. i. 216). He was still an infant at the time when his father went to Troy, and therefore must have been about twenty years he grew up to manhood. After the gods in council had determined that Odysseus should return home from the island of Ogygia, Athena, assuming the appearance of Mentor, king of the Taphians, went to Ithaca, and advised Telemachus to eject the troublesome suitors of his mother from his house, and to go to Pylos and Sparta, to gather information concerning his father. Telemachus followed the advice, but the suitors refused to quit his house; and Athena, in the form of Mentor, accompanied Telemachus to Pylos. There they were hospitably received by Nestor, who also sent his own son to conduct Telemachus to Sparta. Menelaus again kindly received him, and communicated to him the prophecy of Proteus concerning Odysseus. (Hom. Od. i.—iv.) From Sparta Telemachus returned home; and on his arrival there, he found his father, with the swineherd Eumaeus, and the household beggar, Telemachus did not recognize his father until the latter disclosed to him who he was. Father and son now agreed to punish the suitors; and when they were slain or dispersed, Telemachus accompanied his father to the aged Laertes. (Hom. Od. xx.—xxiv.; comp. Odyssey.) In the Post-Homerian traditions, we read that Palamedes, when endeavouring to persuade Odysseus to join the Greeks against Troy, and the latter feigned idleness, placed the infant Telemachus before the plague with which Odysseus was ploughing. (Hygin. Fab. 95; Serv. ad Aen. ii. 81; Tzetz. ad Lyoph. 384; Aelian, V. H. xii. 12.) According to some accounts, Telemachus became the father of Persepolis either by Polycaste, the daughter of Nestor, or by Nausicaa, the daughter of Alcinous. (Eustath. ad Hom. p. 1796; Dict. Cret. vi. 6.) Others relate that he was induced by Athena to marry Circe, and became by her the father of Latinus (Hygin. Fab. 127; comp. Telamon), or that he married Cassiphone, a daughter of Circe, but in a quarrel with his mother-in-law he slew her, for which in his turn he was killed by Cassiphone. (Tzetz. ad Lyoph. 806.) He also is said to have had a daughter called Roma, who married Aeneas. (Serv. ad Aen. i. 273.) One account states that Odysseus, in consequence of a prophecy that his son was dangerous to him, sent him away from Ithaca. Servius (ad Aen. x. 167) makes Telemachus the founder of the town of Clusium in Etruria. [L. S.]

TELEMACHUS, an Asiatic monk and martyr, who is justly renowned for the act of daring self-sacrifice, by which he caused the gladiatorial combats to be abolished, and obtained for himself the honours of canonization. In the year A.D. 404, in the midst of the spectacles of the amphitheatre, Telemachus rushed into the arena, and tried to separate the gladiators. The spectators, in the first moment of exasperation, stoned him to death, but the emperor Honorius proclaimed him a martyr, and soon afterwards abolished the gladiatorial combats, a measure which Constantine had in vain attempted, and which Honorius had long hopefully desired to effect. (Theodoret. H. E. v. 26.) Some doubt has been thrown upon the story, on account of the absence from the Theodosian Code of any edict of Honorius prohibiting such combats; but there was already such an edict by Constantine in existence, and no evidence can be produced to show that there were any gladiatorial fights after this period, although we know that the combats of wild beasts continued till the fall of the Western Empire. (Schröck, Christliche Kirchengeschichte, vol. vii. p. 254, or 238, 2d ed.; Gibbon, c. 30, vol. v. p. 199, ed. Milman, with Milman's Note.) [P. S.]

TELEMANNISUS (Τελεμανιστος), a Cretan, whom Perseus sent to Antiochus Epiphanes, in a. c. 168, to urge him by every motive of self-interest to side with him against Rome. (Polyb. xxix. 3.) We may perhaps identify this person with the Telemannus, a Gortyman, who with 500 men effectually aided the Achaean in their war with Nabis. (Polyb. xxxiii. 15.) [E. E.]

TELEMUS (Τελημως), a son of Eurymus, and a celebrated soothsayer. (Hom. Od. ix. 509; Ov. Met. xiii. 731; Theocrit. Idyl. vi. 23.) [L. S.]

TELENICUS (Τελεινος), of Byzantium, is mentioned by Athenaeus as one of the miserable flute-players of the Athenian dithyramb. (Ath. xiv. 638, § 20.) It appears to have been ridiculed by Cratinus, in his Scirphia, and the wish of his names gave rise to the proverbial expressions, 'Τελεικασια και Τελεικειως υψω (Hesych. s. v. Τελεικασια; Συγμ. Mag. s. v. p. 731. 5; Phot. Lex. s. v. p. 574. 6; Suid. s. v. Τελεικασια, which should be Τελευκασια; Meineke, Frag. Com. Græce, vol. ii. p. 130.) [P. S.]

TELEON (Τελεων). 1. An Athenian, a son of Ion, the husband of Zeneippe, and father of the Argonaut Butes. (Apollod. i. 9, § 16; Apollon. Rhod. ii. 95.) From him the Telemontes in Attica derived their name. (Eurip. Ion, 1579.)

2. The father of the Argonaut Eribotes. (Apollon. Rhod. i. 71.) [L. S.]

TELEPHANES (Τελεφανής), artist. 1. Of Sicyon. [Ar. Dak.] 2. A Phocian statuary, who flourished in Thessaly, where he worked for the Persian kings, and, according to Müller, for the Aleuads; but whatever probability there may be for the latter statement, it is not made by Pline, who is our only authority for the artist. (Plin. H. N. xxxiv. 8. s. 19. § 9; Müller, Archäol. d. Kunst, § 112, n. 1, § 247, n. 6.) Pline tells us that, although little known beyond Thessaly, where his works lay concealed from the notice of the rest of Greece, he was mentioned with great praise by artists who had written upon art, and who placed him on an equality with Polycleitus, Myron, and Pithagonia. His works were, Lorisina, Spintharos a victor in the pentathlon, and Apollo. As he worked for Darius and Xerxes, he must have flourished in the early part of the fifth century, B. C.

TELEPHASSA (Τελεφασσα), the wife of Age nor, and mother of Europa, Cadmus, Phoenix, and Cilix. She, with her sons, went out in search of
